THE LIFE OF JOHN MILTON.

To THOMAS RAULINS of Kilreag in Herefordſhire, Eſq;

I SEND You at length, my beſt Friend, what you have ſo often and earneſtly ſollicited me to write, the Life of JOHN MILTON, a Man eminent at home and famous abroad for his univerſal Learning, Sagacity, and ſolid Judgment: but particularly noted as well for thoſe excellent Volumes he wrote on the behalf of Civil, Religious, and Domeſtic Liberty; as for his divine and incomparable Poems, which, equalling the moſt beautiful Order and Expreſſion of any antient or modern Compoſitions, are infinitly above them all for Sublimity and Invention. Obſerving in this performance the Rules of a faithful Hiſtorian, being neither provok'd by Malice, nor brib'd by Favor, and as well daring to ſay all that is true, as ſcorning to write any Falſhood, I ſhall not conceal what may be thought againſt my Author's Honor, nor add the leaſt word for his Reputation: but three things I would have you ſpecially obſerve. Firſt, I ſhall not be too minute in relating the ordinary Circumſtances of his Life, and which are common to him with all other Men. Writings of this nature ſhould in my opinion be deſign'd to recommend Virtue, and to expoſe Vice; or to illuſtrate Hiſtory, and to preſerve the memory of extraordinary things. That a Man, for example, was ſick at ſuch a time, or well at another, ſhould never be mention'd; except in the Cauſes or Effects, Cure or Continuance, there happens ſomthing remarkable, and for the benefit of Mankind to know. I had not therfore related Milton's Headachs in his Youth, were it not for the influence which this Indiſpoſition had afterwards on his Eys, and that his Blindneſs was raſhly imputed by his Enemies to the avenging Judgment of God. Secondly, In the Characters of Sects and Parties, Books or Opinions, I ſhall produce his own words, as I find 'em in his Works; that thoſe who approve his Reaſons, may ow all the Obligation to himſelf, and that I may eſcape the blame of ſuch as may diſlike what he ſays. For it is commonly ſeen, that Hiſtorians are ſuſpected rather to make their Hero what they would have him to be, than ſuch as he really was; and that, as they are promted by different Paſſions, they put thoſe words in his mouth which they might not ſpeak themſelves without incurring ſom danger, and being accus'd perhaps of Flattery or Injuſtice: but I am neither writing a Satyr, nor a Panegyric upon Milton, but publiſhing the true Hiſtory of his Actions, Works, and Opinions. In the third place, I would not have it expected that when I quote a few Verſes or Paſſages in a different Language, I ſhould always pretend to tranſlate 'em, when the whole turn or fancy abſolutely depends upon the force of the Original words; for the Ignorant could be nothing the wiſer, and the beſt Tranſlation would ſpoil their Beauty to the Learned. But this happens ſo rarely, and almoſt only during his Travels abroad, that it ſcarce deſerv'd an Advertiſment. The ampleſt part of my Materials I had from his own Books, where, conſtrain'd by the Diffamations of his Enemys, he often gives an account of himſelf. I learnt ſom Particulars from a Perſon that had bin once his Amanuenſis, which were confirm'd to me by his Daughter now dwelling in London, and by a Letter written to one at my deſire from his laſt Wife, who is ſtill alive. I perus'd the Papers of one of his Nephews, learnt what I could in Diſcourſe with the other; and laſtly conſulted ſuch of his acquaintance, as, after the beſt inquiry, I was able to diſcover. Thus completely furniſh'd, I undertook, moſt ingenious Sir, the following Work, as well to oblige you, as to inform Poſterity; and perform'd what I knew would be acceptable to my Friend with as much pleaſure as ever you perus'd our Author's excellent Sheets.

JOHN MILTON, the Son likewiſe of John Milton, and Sarah Caſton, a Woman exemplary for her Liberality to the Poor, was born in London in the Year of Chriſt 1606. a Gentleman by his Education and Family, being deſcended from the Miltons of Milton in Oxfordſhire; tho if you conſider him in his admirable Works or Genius, he was truly and eminently noble. But he had too much good Senſe to value himſelf upon any other Qualities except thoſe of his Mind, and which only he could properly call his own: for all external and adventitious Titles, as they may at the pleaſure of a Tyrant, or by an unfortunat Attemt againſt his Government, be quite aboliſh'd; ſo we often find in hereditary Honors, that thoſe Diſtinctions which the Brave and the Wiſe had juſtly obtain'd from their Country, deſcend indifferently to Cowards, Traytors, or Fools, and ſpoil the Induſtry of better Souls from indeavoring to equal or excede the Merits of their Anceſtors. His Father was a polite Man, a great Maſter of Muſic, and by Profeſſion a Scrivener, in which Calling, thro his Diligence and Honeſty, he got a competent Eſtate in a ſmall time: for he was diſinherited by his bigotted Parents for imbracing the Proteſtant Religion, and abjuring the Popiſh Idolatry. He had two other Children, Anna marry'd to Edward Philips; and Chriſtopher bred to the Common Law, who, more reſembling his Grandfather than his Father or Brother, was of a very ſuperſtitious nature, and a man of no Parts or Ability. After the late Civil Wars, tho he was intirely addicted to the Royal Cauſe, no notice was taken of him, till the late King James, wanting a ſet of Judges that would declare his Will to be ſuperior to our Legal Conſtitution, created him the ſame day a Serjeant and one of the Barons of the Exchequer, knighting him of courſe, and making him next one of the Judges of the Common Pleas: But he quickly had his quietus eſt, as his Maſter not long after was depos'd for his Maladminiſtration by the People of England, repreſented in a Convention at Weſtminſter. To return now to the Perſon who makes the Subject of this Diſcourſe, John Milton was deſtin'd to be a Scholar; and partly under domeſtic Teachers (wherof one was Thomas Young, to whom the firſt of his familiar Letters is inſcrib'd) and partly under Dr. Gill, the chief Maſter of Paul's School (to whom likewiſe the fifth of the ſame Letters is written) he made an incredible Progreſs in the knowlege of Words and Things, his Diligence and Inclination outſtripping the care of his Inſtructors. After the twelfth Year of his Age, ſuch was his inſatiable thirſt for Learning, he ſeldom went to bed before midnight. This was the firſt undoing of his Eys, to whoſe natural debility were added frequent Headachs, which could not retard or extinguiſh his laudable Paſſion for Letters. Being thus initiated in ſeveral Tongues, and having not ſlightly taſted the inexpreſſible Sweets of Philoſophy, he was ſent at 15 to Chriſt's College in Cambridg to purſue more arduous and ſolid Studies. This ſame Year he gave ſeveral Proofs of his early Genius for Poetry, wherin he afterwards ſucceded ſo happily, that to all Ages he'l continue no leſs the Ornament and Glory of England, than Homer is own'd to be that of Greece, and Virgil of Italy. He firſt tranſlated ſom Pſalms into Engliſh Verſe, wherof the 114*th* begins in this manner.

When the bleſt Seed of Terah's faithful Son,
After long toil their Liberty had won,
And paſt from Pharian Fields to Canaan Land, Led by the ſtrength of the Almighty's Hand;
Jehovah's Wonders were in Iſrael ſhown,
His Praiſe and Glory was in Iſrael known.

In his ſeventeenth Year he wrote a handſom Copy of Engliſh Verſes on the Death of a Siſter's Child that dy'd of a Cough; and the ſame Year a Latin Elegy on the Death of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, with another on that of Ely. 'Twas then alſo that he compos'd his fine Poem on the Gunpouder-Treaſon; concerning all which and the reſt of his Juvenil pieces, the judicious Morhof, in his Polyhiſtor Literarius, ſays, that Milton's Writings ſhew him to have bin a Man in his very Childhood; and that theſe Poems are excedingly above the ordinary Capacity of that Age. He continu'd in Cambridg ſeven years, where he liv'd with great Reputation, and generally belov'd, till taking the degree of Maſter of Arts, and performing his Exerciſes with much applauſe, he left the Univerſity; for he aim'd at none of thoſe Profeſſions that require a longer ſtay in that place. Som of his Academic Performances are ſtill extant among his occaſional Poems, and at the end of his familiar Letters. The five ſucceding years he liv'd with his Father in his Country Retirement at Horton near Colebrook in Barkſhire, where at full leiſure he perus'd all the Greec and Latin Writers; but was not ſo much in love with his Solitude, as not to make an excurſion now and then to London, ſomtimes to buy Books, or to meet Friends from Cambridg; and at other times to learn ſom new thing in the Mathematics or in Muſic, with which he was extraordinarily delighted. It was about this time he wrote from London a Latin Elegy to his intimat Friend Charles Diodati, wherin ſom Verſes reflecting on the Univerſity, and preferring the Pleaſures of the Town, gave a handle afterwards to certain Perſons no leſs ignorant than malitious to report that either he was expel'd for ſom Miſdemeanor from Cambridg, or left it in diſcontent that he obtain'd no Preferment: and that at London he ſpent his time with leud Women, or at Playhouſes. But the falſity of this ſtory we ſhall in due place demonſtrat, and in the mean time inſert thoſe lines for the ſatisfaction of the curious.

Me tenet urbs reflua quam Thameſis alluit unda,
Meque nec invitum patria dulcis habet.
Jam nec arundiferum mihi cura reviſere Camum,
Nec dudum vetiti me laris angit amor.
Nuda nec arva placent, umbraſque negantia molles,
Quem malè Phœbicolis convenit ille locus!
Nec duri libet uſque minas perferre Magiſtri,
Cæteraque ingenio non ſubeunda meo.
Si ſit hoc exilium patrios adiſſe penates,
Et vacuum curis otia grata ſequi,
Non ego vel profugi nomen, ſortemve recuſo,
Lætus & exilii conditione fruor.
O utinam vates nunquam graviora tuliſſet
Ille Tomitano flebilis exul agro;
Non tunc Ionio quicquam ceſſiſſet Homero,
Neque foret victo laus tibi prima, Maro.
Tempora nam licet hic placidis dare libera Muſis,
Et totum rapiunt me mea vita libri.
Excipit hinc feſſum ſinuoſi pompa Theatri,
Et vocat ad plauſus garrula ſcena ſuos.

Et paulo poſt:

Sed neque ſub tecto ſemper, nec in urbe, latemus,
Irrita nec nobis tempora veris eunt.
Nos quoque lucus habet vicino conſitus ulmo,
Atque ſuburbani nobilis umbra loci.
Sæpius hic blandas ſpirantia Sydera flammas
Virgineos videas præteriiſſe Choros.

He wrote another Latin Elegy to Charles Diodati; and in his twentieth year he made one on the approach of the Spring: but the following year he deſcribes his falling in love with a Lady (whom he accidentally met, and never afterwards ſaw) in ſuch tender Expreſſions, with thoſe lively Paſſions, and Images ſo natural, that you would think Love himſelf had directed his Pen, or inſpir'd your own Breaſt when you peruſe them. We ſhall ſee him now appear in a more ſerious Scene, tho yet a Child in compariſon of the Figure he afterwards made in the World. The Death of his Mother happening likewiſe about this time facilitated his deſign, which was with his Father's leave to travel into foren Regions, being perſuaded that he could not better diſcern the Preeminence or Defects of his own Country, than by obſerving the Cuſtoms and Inſtitutions of others; and that the ſtudy of never ſo many Books, without the advantages of Converſation, ſerves only to render a Man either a ſtupid Fool, or an inſufferable

Pedant. Firſt therfore he procedes to France with one Servant, and no Tutor: for ſuch as ſtill need a Pedagog are not fit to go abroad; and thoſe who are able to make a right uſe of their Travels, ought to be the free Maſters of their own Actions, their good Qualifications being ſufficient to introduce 'em into all places, and to preſent 'em to the moſt deſerving Perſons. He had an elegant Letter of Direction and Advice from the famous Sir Henry Wotton, who was a long time Ambaſſador from King James the Firſt to the Republic of Venice. Being arriv'd at Paris, he was moſt kindly receiv'd by the Engliſh Ambaſſador, who recommended him to the famous Grotius, then Ambaſſador alſo from Queen Chriſtina of Sweden, at the French Court: for we may eaſily imagin that Milton was not a little deſirous to be known to the firſt Perſon then in the World for reading and latitude of Judgment, to ſpeak nothing of his other meritorious Characters. From hence he parted for Italy, where after paſſing thro ſeveral noted Places, he came at length to Florence; a City for the Politeneſs of the Language, and the Civility of the Inhabitants, he always infinitly admir'd. In this place he ſtaid about two months, and was daily aſſiſting at thoſe learned Conferences which they hold in their privat Academys, according to the laudable Cuſtom of Italy, both for the improvement of Letters, and the begetting or maintaining of Friendſhip. During this time he contracted an intimat Acquaintance with ſeveral ingenious Men, moſt of which have ſince made a noiſe in the World, and deſerve a mention in this place: I mean Gaddi, Dati, Freſcobaldo, Francini, Bonmattei, Coltellino, Chimentelli, and ſeveral others. With theſe he kept a conſtant Correſpondence, particularly with Carolo Dati, a Nobleman of Florence, to whom he wrote the tenth of his Familiar Epiſtles, and who gave him the following Teſtimonial of his Eſteem.

Joanni Miltoni Londinenſi,
Juveni patria & virtutibus eximio.

V*IRO qui multa peregrinatione, ſtudio cuncta orbis terrarum perſpexit, ut novus Ulyſſes omnia ubique ab omnibus apprehenderet. Polyglotto, in cujus ore linguæ jam deperditæ ſic reviviſcunt, ut idiomata omnia ſint in ejus laudibus infacunda; & jure ea percallet, ut admirationes & plauſus populorum ab propria ſapientia excitatos, intelligat. Illi, cujus animi dotes corporiſque ſenſus ad admirationem commovent, & per ipſam motum cuique auferunt; cujus opera ad plauſus hortantur, ſed venuſtate vocem auditoribus adimunt. Cui in memoria totus orbis: in intellectu ſapientia: in voluntate ardor gloriæ: in ore eloquentia. Harmonicos cœleſtium Sphærarum ſonitus, Aſtronomia duce, audienti; characteres mirabilium naturæ, per quos Dei magnitudo deſcribitur, magiſtra Philoſophia legenti; antiquitatum latebras, vetuſtatis excidia, eruditionis Ambages, comite aſſidua autorum lectione, exquirenti, reſtauranti, percurrenti. At cur nitor in arduum? Illi in cujus virtutibus evulgandis ora famæ non ſufficiant, nec hominum ſtupor in laudandis ſatis eſt, reverentiæ & amoris ergo hoc ejus meritis debitum admirationis tributum offert*

Carolus Datus Patricius Florentinus,

Tanto homini Servus, tantæ virtutis Amator.

I don't think the Italian Flouriſhes were ever carry'd further than in this Elogy, which notwithſtanding is ſincere, and pen'd by an honeſt Man. Francini is not leſs liberal of his Praiſes in the long Italian Ode he compos'd in his Honor, which becauſe it dos Juſtice to the Engliſh Nation, and foretold the future Greatneſs of Milton, I have annex'd to this Diſcourſe. That he correſponded afterwards with Bonmattei, appears from the eighth of his familiar Letters, which he wrote to him on his deſign of publiſhing an Italian Grammar, and is not more elegant than pertinent. But he attain'd that perfection himſelf in the Italian Language, as to make ſom Songs on a real or feign'd Miſtreſs, in one of which he gives a handſom account of his writing in this Tongue.

Qual in colle aſpro, al imbrunir di ſera,
L'avezza giovinetta paſtorella
Va bagnando L'herbetta ſtrana e bella,
Che mal ſi ſpande a diſuſata ſpera
Fuor di ſua natia alma prima vera:
Coſi amor meco inſu la lingua ſnella
Deſta il fior nuovo di ſtrania favella;
Mentre io di te, vezzozamente altera,

Canto dal mio buon popol non inteſo,
E'l bel Tamigi cangio col bel arno:
Amor lo volſe, ed io a l'altrui peſo;
Seppi ch'amor coſa mai volſe indarno.
Deh! foſs'il mio cuor lento, e'l duro ſeno
A chi pianta dal ciel ſi buon terreno.

From his beloved Florence he took his Journy next to Rome, where he ſtay'd two other Months to ſee the miſerable Remains of that famous City, once the glorious Miſtreſs of the World, and deſervedly ſo, as being then not only the faireſt thing under Heaven; but that, till the Ambition of a few Perſons corrupted her equal Government, ſhe extended Liberty and Learning as far as the Glory of her Name, or the Terror of her Arms. Here, no doubt, all the Examples he had hitherto read of the Virtue, Eloquence, Wiſdom, or Valor of her antient Citizens, occur'd to his mind, and could not but oppreſs with grief his generous Soul, when with his own eys he ſaw Rome now the chief Seat of the moſt exquiſit Tyranny exerciſ'd by effeminat Prieſts, not reigning in the World thro any conceiv'd opinion of their Juſtice, or dread of their Courage; for to theſe Qualities they are known and ſworn Enemys: but deluding men with unaccountable Fables, and diſarming 'em by imaginary Fears, they fill their heads firſt with Superſtition, and then their own Pockets with their Mony. Here he became acquainted with the celebrated Lucas Holſtenius the Vatican Librarian, who uſ'd him with great Humanity, and readily ſhew'd him al the Greec Authors, whether publiſh'd or otherwiſe, that paſt his Care and Emendations: He alſo preſented him to Cardinal Barberini, who at an entertainment of Muſic, perform'd at his own expence, look'd for him in the Croud, and gave him a kind Invitation. To thank Holſtenius for all theſe Favors, Milton wrote afterwards from Florence the ninth of his Familiar Letters. At Rome he likewiſe commenc'd a Friendſhip with the Poet Giovanni Salſilli, who in the following Tetraſtich extols him for writing ſo correctly in Latin, Greec, and Italian.

Cede Meles, cedat depreſſa Mincius urna,
Sebetus Taſſum deſinat uſque loqui:
At Thameſis victor cunctis ferat altior undas,
Nam per te, Milto, par tribus unus erit.

Milton in return ſent to Salſilli, ſhortly after lying ſick, thoſe fine Scazons, which may be read among his Juvenil Poems. And here too did Selvaggi adorn him with this Diſtich.

Græcia Mæonidem, jactet ſibi Roma Maronem: Anglia Miltonum jactat utrique parem.

Having departed from Rome to Naples, he was introduc'd by his Fellow-Traveller to Giovanni Battiſta Manſo, Marquiſs of Villa, a Perſon moſt nobly deſcended, of great Authority, renown'd for his military Atchievments, and a Patron of learned Men. To him the famous Taſſo inſcrib'd his Poem of Friendſhip, and makes honorable mention of him among the Princes of Campania in the twentieth Book of his Gieruſalemme Conquiſtata. He went himſelf to ſhew him all the remarkable Places of that City, viſited him often at his Lodging, and made this Diſtich in his Commendation, which he addreſſes to himſelf.

Non Anglus, verum Herclè Angelus ipſe fores.

This exception of his Piety relates to his being a Proteſtant; and the Marquiſs told him, he would have don him ſeveral other good Offices, had he bin more reſerv'd in matters of Religion. But our Author out of Gratitude for all theſe ſingular Favors from one of his high Quality, preſented him at his departure with an incomparable Latin Eclog, entitul'd Manſus, which is extant among his occaſional pieces: And that I may mention it by the way, I don't queſtion but it was from Manſo's Converſation and their Diſcourſes about Taſſo, that he firſt form'd his deſign of writing an Epic Poem, tho he was not ſo ſoon determin'd about the Subject.

He was now preparing to paſs over into Sicily and Greece, when he was recal'd by the ſad News of a Civil War beginning in England; eſteeming it an unworthy thing for him ſecurely to be diverting himſelf abroad, when his Countrymen were contending at home for their Liberty. Intending therfore to return to Rome, he was adviſ'd by ſom Merchants to the contrary; for they had learnt from their Correſpondents, that the Engliſh Jeſuits were framing Plots againſt him by reaſon of the great Freedom he us'd in his Diſcourſes of Religion. Notwithſtanding, having reſolv'd not to begin any Diſputes, but, being aſk'd, not to diſſemble his Sentiments whatever might enſue, he went the ſecond time to Rome, and ſtay'd there two months longer, neither concealing his Name, nor declining openly to defend the Truth under the Pope's noſe, when any thought fit to attack him: yet he return'd ſafe to his learned and affectionat Friends in Florence. I forgot al this while to mention that he paid a Viſit to Galileo, then an old man, and a Priſoner to the Inquiſition for thinking otherwiſe in Aſtronomy than pleas'd the Franciſcan Friers. He tarry'd two other months in Florence, and having ſeen Lucca, Bononia, Ferrara, he arriv'd in Venice. After ſpending one month here, and ſhipping off all the Books he collected in his Travels, he came thro Verona, Milan, croſs the Alps, and along the Lake Lemanno to Geneva, where he contracted an intimat Familiarity with Giovanni Diodati, a noted Profeſſor of Divinity, and was known to ſeveral others, particularly to the celebrated Critic and Antiquary Ezechiel Spanhemius now alive, to whom he wrote the 17th of his Familiar Letters, and who, together with Calandrini, and ſom more of that City, ſent him intelligence afterwards concerning his Antagoniſt Morus, wherof in due order. So leaving this place, and paſſing back again thro France, he did after one year and three month's Peregrination return ſafe into England, much about the ſame time that King Charles the Firſt made his ſecond unſucceſsful Expedition againſt the Scots. As ſoon as the Complements of Friends or Acquaintance were over, he hir'd a handſom Lodging in the City, to be a retreat for himſelf and his Books in ſuch uncertain and troubleſom times. But he continu'd a long while inconſolable for the loſs of his deareſt Friend and Schoolfellow Charles Diodati, mention'd before, who dy'd in his abſence. He was from Lucca originally, but an Engliſhman born, a Student in Phyſic, and an excellent Scholar, as I have good reaſons to believe, and appears by two Greec Letters of his to Milton, very handſomly written, and which I have now in my hands. Our Author in mournful Notes bitterly laments the immature fate of this young Gentleman, whom he denotes by the appellation of Damon in an Eclog nothing inferior to the Maronian Daphnis, and which is to be ſtill ſeen among his Latin Miſcellanies. By this piece we plainly find that he had already conceiv'd the Plan of an Epic Poem, wherof he then deſign'd the Subject ſhould be the warlike Actions of the old Britiſh Heroes, and particularly of King Arthur, as he declares himſelf in theſe Verſes.

> Ipſe ego Dardanias Rutupina per æquora puppes > Dicam, & Pandraſidos regnum vetus Inogeniæ, > Brennumque, Arviragumque Duces, priſcumque Belinum, > Et tandem Armoricos Britonum ſub lege Colonos;
> Tum gravidam Arturo fatali fraude Iögernen,
> Mendaces vultus aſſumtaque Gorlois arma, > Merlini Dolus.

But this particular Subject was reſerv'd for the celebrated Pen of Sir Richard Blackmore. Som few lines after he declares his Ambition of performing ſomthing in his native Language that might perpetuat his Name in theſe Ilands, tho he ſhould be the more obſcure and inglorious by it to the reſt of the World. His words, becauſe they are wonderfully fine, I ſhall here inſert.

> ———— ———— Mihi ſatis ampla > Merces, & mihi grande decus (ſim ignotus in ævum > Tum licet, externo penituſque inglorius orbi)
> Si me flava comas legat Uſa, & potor Alauni, > Vorticibuſque frequens Abra, & nemus omne Treantæ,
> Et Thameſis meus ante omnes, & fuſca metallis
> Tamara, & extremis me diſcant Orcades undis.

I ſaid above that it was by his Converſation with the Marquiſs of Villa, who ſo nobly honor'd the immortal Memory of Taſſo, that our Milton form'd his vaſt deſign. That this was not a mere Conjecture, and that King Arthur alſo was to be the Hero of that piece, let but theſe Verſes of his Manſus be conſider'd.

O mihi ſi mea ſors talem concedat amicum
Phœbæos decoraſſe viros qui tam bene norit,
Siquando indigenas revocabo in carmina reges,
Arturumque etiam ſub Terris bella moventem;
Aut dicam invictæ ſociali fœdere menſæ
Magnanimos Heroas, & (O modo ſpiritus adſit)
Frangam Saxonicas Britonum ſub Marte Phalanges.

But to return to his Lodgings, where we left him, there, both to be eas'd in the reading of the beſt Authors, and to diſcharge his Duty to his Siſter's Sons that were partly committed to his Tuition, he undertook the care of their Education, and inſtructed them himſelf in Latin, Greec, Hebrew and other Oriental Dialects; likewiſe in ſeveral parts of the Mathematics, in Coſmography, Hiſtory, and ſome modern Languages, as French and Italian. Some Gentlemen of his intimat Friends, and to whom he could deny nothing, prevail'd with him to impart the ſame benefits of Learning to their Sons, ſpecially ſince the trouble was no more with many than a few. He that well knew the greateſt Perſons in all ages to have bin delighted with teaching others the Principles of Knowlege and Virtue, eaſily comply'd; nor was his Succeſs unanſwerable to the opinion which was generally entertain'd of his Capacity. And not content to acquaint his Diſciples with thoſe Books that are commonly read in the Schools, wherof ſeveral, no doubt, are excellent in their kind, tho others are as trivial or impertinent; he made them likewiſe read in Latin the antient Authors concerning Husbandry, as Cato, Varro, Columella, and Palladius; alſo Cornelius Celſus the Phyſician, Pliny's Natural Hiſtory, the Architecture of Vitruvius, the Stratagems of Frontinus, and the Philoſophical Poets Lucretius and Manilius. To the uſual Greec Books, as Homer and Heſiod, he added Aratus, Dionyſius Periegetes, Oppian, Quintus Calaber, Apollonius Rhodius, Plutarch, Xenophon, Ælians Tactics, and the Stratagems of Polyænus. It was this greateſt ſign of a good Man in him, and the higheſt Obligation he could lay on his Friends, without any ſordid or mercenary purpoſes, that gave occaſion to his Adverſaries with opprobriouſly terming him a Schoolmaſter; tho were this charge as true as it is utterly falſe, I ſee not how it ſhould any way tend to his Diſhonor, if he had bin neceſſitated to ſuch a laborious occupation for his living, and diſcharg'd it with due Honeſty and Care. But what's very remarkable is, that the moſt forward to reproach him in this manner were themſelves mean Tutors in the Univerſity, and the greateſt of 'em only a Profeſſor, which are but nominally diſtinguiſhable from Schoolmaſters.

He tells us himſelf in his ſecond Defence, “ That on his return from Travelling he found all mouths open againſt the Biſhops, ſom complaining of their Vices, and others quarrelling at the very Order; and that thinking from ſuch beginnings a way might be open'd to true Liberty, he heartily engag'd in the Diſpute, as well to reſcue his Fellow-Citizens from Slavery, as to help the Puritan Miniſters, who were inferior to the Biſhops in Learning. He firſt of all therfore in the year 1641. publiſh'd two Books of Reformation, dedicated to a Friend. In the firſt of theſe he ſhews, by orderly ſteps, from Henry the Eighth's Reign, what were all along the real impediments in this Kingdom to a perfect Reformation, which in general he reduces to two heads, that is, our retaining of Ceremonies, and confining the Power of Ordination to Dioceſan Biſhops excluſively of the People. “ Our Ceremonies, he ſays, are ſenſleſs in themſelves, and ſerve for nothing but either to facilitat our return to Popery; or to hide the defects of better Knowlege, and to ſet off the Pomp of Prelacy. As for the Biſhops, many of whom he denys not to have bin good Men, tho not infallible, nor above all human Frailties, he affirms, “ that at the beginning, tho they had renounc'd the Pope, they hug'd the Popedom, and ſhar'd the Authority among themſelves. In King Edward the Sixth's time, he affirms, “ they were with their proſtitute Gravities the common Stales to countenance every politic fetch that was then on foot. If a Toleration for Maſs were to be beg'd of the King for his Siſter Mary, leſt Charles the Fifth ſhould be angry; who but the grave Prelats, Cranmer and Ridley, ſhould be ſent to extort it from the young King? When the Lord Sudley, Admiral of England, and the Protector's Brother, was wrongfully to loſe his Life, no man could be found fitter than Latimer to divulge in his Sermon the forg'd Accuſations laid to his charge, therby to defame him with the People. Cranmer, one of King Henry's Executors, and the other Biſhops, did, to gratify

“ Mary the Papiſt, but alſo Elizabeth the Proteſtant, tho before declar'd by them“ ſelves the lawful Iſſue of their late Maſter. In Queen Elizabeth's Reign he imputes the Obſtructions of a further Reformation ſtill to the Biſhops, and then procedes from Antiquity to prove that all Eccleſiaſtical Elections belong'd to the People; but that if thoſe Ages had favor'd Epiſcopacy, we ſhould not be much concern'd, ſince the beſt times were ſpreadingly infected, the beſt Men of thoſe times foully tainted, and the beſt Writings of thoſe Men dangerouſly adulterated; which Propoſitions he labors to prove at large. In the ſecond Book he continues his Diſcourſe of Prelatical Epiſcopacy, diſplays the Politics of the ſame; which, according to him, are always oppoſit to Liberty: he deduces the Hiſtory of it down from its remoteſt Original, and ſhews, “ that in England particularly it is ſo far from being, as they commonly allege, the only Form of Church-Diſciplin agreable to Monarchy, that the mortalleſt Diſeaſes and Convulſions of the Government did ever procede from the Craft of the Prelats, or was occaſion'd by their Pride. Then he encourages the Engliſh and Scots to purſue their begun Conteſt for Liberty by this Exhortation. “ Go on both, hand in “ hand, O Nations, never to be diſunited. Be the Praiſe and the heroic Song of “ all Poſterity. Merit this; but ſeek only Virtue, not to extend your limits:
“ for what need you win a fading triumphant Laurel out of the Tears of wretched “ Men; but to ſettle the pure Worſhip of God in his Church, and Juſtice in the “ State? Then ſhall the hardeſt Difficulties ſmooth out themſelves before you;
“ Envy ſhall ſink to Hell, Craft and Malice be confounded, whether it be home-“ bred Miſchief, or outlandiſh Cunning: Yea other Nations will then covet to “ ſerve you; for Lordſhip and Victory are but the Pages of Juſtice and Virtue.
“ Commit ſecurely to true Wiſdom the vanquiſhing and uncaſing of Craft and “ Subtilty, which are but her two Runnagates. Join your invincible Might to do “ worthy and Godlike Deeds; and then he that ſeeks to break your Union, a “ cleaving Curſe be his Inheritance to all Generations.

After this, certain Miniſters having written a Treatiſe againſt Epiſcopacy, the Title Smectymnuus conſiſting of the initial Letters of their Names, and a Biſhop of no ſmall Authority having beſtow'd an Anſwer upon it, Milton, to uſe his own words, ſuppoſing himſelf not leſs able to write for Truth, than others for their Profit or unjuſt Power, publiſh'd his piece of Prelatical Epiſcopacy. In this Book he proves againſt the famous Uſher (for he would not readily ingage a meaner Adverſary) that Dioceſan Epiſcopacy, or a ſuperior Order to the common Miniſtry, cannot be deduc'd from the Apoſtolical times by the force of ſuch Teſtimonies as are alleg'd to that purpoſe. Now Uſher's chief Talent lying in much reading, and being a great Editor and Admirer of old Writings, Milton ſhews the Inſufficiency, Inconveniency and Impiety of this method to eſtabliſh any part of Chriſtianity; and blames thoſe Perſons who cannot think any Doubt reſolv'd, or any Doctrin confirm'd, unleſs they run to that indigeſted heap and fry of Authors which they call Antiquity. “ Whatſoever either Time (ſays he) or the heedleſs hand of “ Fiſh or Seaweed, Shells or Shrubs, unpick'd, unchoſen, thoſe are the Fathers. And ſo he chides the good Biſhop for divulging uſeleſs Treatiſes, ſtuft with the ſpecious Names of Ignatius and Polycarpus, with Fragments of old Martyrologies and Legends, to diſtract and ſtagger the multitude of credulous Readers.

His next performance was the Reaſon of Church-Government urg'd againſt Prelacy, in two Books, principally intended againſt the ſame Uſher's account of the Original of Epiſcopacy. The Eloquence is maſculin, the Method is natural, the Sentiments are free, and the whole (God knows) appears to have a very different force from what the Nonconformiſt Divines wrote in thoſe days, or ſince that time, on the ſame Subject. In the beginning of the ſecond Book he mentions his deſign of writing an Epic Poem, but continues ſtill unreſolv'd, whether his Hero ſhould be ſom Prince before the Conqueſt, or the Argument be borrow'd from the Scripture or the antient Heathen Hiſtory. But becauſe the account he gives of what the Poet ſhould propoſe by ſuch a work is exactly juſt, and withal ſo properly expreſt, I ſhall not grudg to tranſcribe it in this place. “ Theſe Abilities (ſays he, “ ſpeaking of Invention and Compoſition) wherſoever they be found, are the in-“ ſpir'd Gift of God; rarely beſtow'd, but yet to ſom (tho moſt abuſe them)
“ in every Nation: and are of power to breed and cheriſh in a great People the “ Seeds of Virtue and public Civility, to allay the Perturbations of the Mind,

“ and ſublime, in Virtue amiable or grave, whatſoever has Paſſion or Admiration “ in all the changes of that which is call'd Fortune from without, or the wily “ Subtilties and Refluxes of Mans Thoughts from within, all theſe things with a ſolid “ and treatable Smoothneſs to paint out and deſcribe. Teaching over the whole “ Book of Sanctity and Virtue, thro all the inſtances of Example, and with ſuch “ delight, to thoſe eſpecially of a ſoft and delicious temper (who will not ſo “ much as look upon Truth her ſelf, unleſs they ſee her elegantly dreſt) that “ wheras the Paths of Honeſty and good Life appear now rugged and difficult, “ tho they be indeed eaſy and pleaſant; they would then appear to all Men both “ eaſy and pleaſant, tho they were rugged and difficult indeed. And what a “ Benefit this would be to our Youth and Gentry, may be ſoon gueſt by what we “ know of the Corruption and Bane which they ſuck in daily from the Writings “ and Interludes of libidinous and ignorant Poetaſters; who having ſcarce ever “ heard of that which is the main conſiſtence of a true Poem, the choice of ſuch “ Perſons as they ought to introduce, and what is moral and decent to each one, “ do for the moſt part lap up vitious Principles in ſweet Pills to be ſwallow'd “ down, and make the taſte of virtuous Documents harſh and ſour. But becauſe “ the Spirit of Man cannot demean it ſelf lively in this Body without ſom “ recreating intermiſſion of labor and ſerious things, it were happy for the “ Commonwealth if our Magiſtrats, as in thoſe famous Governments of old, would “ take into their care not only the deciding of our contentious Law-caſes or “ Brauls, but the managing of our public Sports and feſtival Paſtimes; that they “ might not be ſuch as were authoriz'd a while ſince, the Provocations of “ Drunkenneſs and Luſt, but ſuch as may inure and harden our Bodies by martial “ Exerciſes to all warlike Skill and Performances; and may civilize, adorn, and make “ diſcrete our Minds by the learned and affable meeting of frequent Academies, “ and the procurement of wiſe and artful Recitations, ſweeten'd with eloquent “ and graceful Enticements to the love and practice of Juſtice, Temperance and “ Fortitude, inſtructing and bettering the Nation at all opportunities, that the voice “ of Wiſdom and Virtue may be heard every where. Whether this may not be “ don, not only in Pulpits, but after another perſuaſive method, at ſet and “ ſolemn Paneguries, in Theaters, Porticos, or what other place or way may win “ moſt upon the People to receive at once both Recreation and Inſtruction, let “ them in Authority conſult.

Another eminent Biſhop having written againſt Smectymnuus, our Author publiſh'd Animadverſions upon his Book; and to the Reaſons alleg'd from Councils for ſubſtituting a conſtant form to occaſional Prayers in public, he gives the following Anſwer. “ Set the grave Councils, ſays he, upon their ſhelves again, and “ ſtring them hard, leſt their various and jangling opinions put their leaves into a “ flutter. I ſhall not intend this hot Seaſon to lead you a courſe thro the wide and “ duſty Champain of the Councils; but ſhall take counſel of that which “ counſel'd them, Reaſon: And tho I know there is an obſolete Reprehenſion now at “ your Tongues end, yet I ſhall be bold to ſay, that Reaſon is the Gift of God in “ one Man as well as in a thouſand. By that which we have taſted already of “ their Ciſterns, we may find that Reaſon was the only thing, and not any divine “ Command, that mov'd them to enjoin the ſet forms of a Liturgy. Firſt, leſt “ any thing in general might be miſſaid in their public Prayers, thro ignorance or “ want of care, contrary to the Faith: And next, leſt the Arians and Pelagians “ in particular ſhould infect the People by their Hymns and Forms of Prayer. “ But by the good leave of theſe antient Fathers, this was no ſolid prevention of “ ſpreading Hereſy, to debar the Miniſters of God the uſe of their nobleſt Talent, “ Prayer in the Congregation; unleſs they had forbid the uſe of all Sermons and “ Lectures too, but ſuch as were ready made to their hands like our Homilies: or “ elſe he that was heretically diſpos'd had as fair an opportunity of infecting in his “ Diſcourſe, as in his Prayer or Hymn. As inſufficiently, and, to ſay truth, as “ imprudently did they provide by their contriv'd Liturgies, leſt any thing ſhould “ be pray'd thro ignorance or want of care in the Miniſters: for if they were “ careleſs and ignorant in their Prayers, certainly they would be more careleſs in their “ preaching, and ſtill more careleſs in watching over their Flock; and what “ preſcription could reach to bound them in both theſe? What if Reaſon, now “ illuſtrated by the Word of God, ſhall be able to produce a better Prevention than “ theſe Councils have left us againſt Hereſy, Ignorance, or want of care in the “ Miniſtry, to wit, that ſuch Wiſdom and Diligence be us'd in the Education of “ thoſe that would be Miniſters, and ſuch a ſtrict and ſerious Examination to be “ undergon before their admiſſion, as St. Paul to Timothy ſets down at large; and “ then they need not carry ſuch an unworthy ſuſpicion over the Preachers of God's “ Word, as to tutor their Unſoundneſs with the a, b, c, of a Liturgy, or to “ diet their Ignorance and want of Care with the limited draught of a Mattin and Evenſong drench. What his opinion was of the Fathers he further declares when he calls them thoſe more antient than truſty Fathers, whom Cuſtom and fond “ Opinion, weak Principles, and the neglect of ſounder Knowlege, has exalted “ ſo high, as to have gain'd them a blind Reverence; whoſe Books, in bigneſs “ and number endleſs and immeaſurable, I cannot think that either God or Na- “ ture, either divine or human Wiſdom, did ever mean ſhould be a Rule or Reli- “ ance to us in the deciſion of any weighty and poſitive Doctrins: for certainly “ every Rule and Inſtrument of neceſſary Knowlege that God has given us, ought “ to be ſo in proportion as may be wielded and manag'd by the Life of Man, “ without penning him up from the Duties of human Society.—But he that ſhall “ bind himſelf to make Antiquity his Rule, if he reads but part (beſides the diffi- “ culty of choice) his Rule is deficient, and utterly unſatiſfying; for there may “ be other Writers of another mind, which he has not ſeen: And if he under- “ takes all, the length of Man's Life cannot extend to give him a full and requiſit “ knowlege of what was don in Antiquity.—Go therfore, and uſe all your Art, “ apply your Sledges, your Leavers, and your iron Crows, to heave and hale “ your mighty Polyphemus of Antiquity to the deluſion of Novices and unexpe- rienc'd Chriſtians. The preſent Eccleſiaſtical Revenues, he ſays, were not at “ firſt the effects of juſt Policy or wholeſom Laws, but of the ſuperſtitious Devo- “ tion of Princes and great Men that knew no better, or of the baſe importunity “ of begging Friers, haunting and haraſſing the Deathbeds of Men departing this “ Life in a blind and wretched condition of hope to merit Heaven for the building “ of Churches, Cloyſters, and Convents; the black Revenues of Purgatory, the “ price of abus'd and murder'd Souls, the damn'd Simony of Trentals, and the “ hire of Indulgences to commit mortal Sin.

Milton's next Book was his Apology againſt the Reverend Perſon who tax'd his Animadverſions with being a ſcurrilous Libel. This Adverſary, as it has always bin the cuſtom of ſome People when they can neither anſwer well nor defend, had recourſe to Defamation and perſonal Reflections, which, had they bin true, could not derogate from the force of his Arguments; but, being falſe, muſt be call'd by their true names of Lying and Slander. Our Author therfore intreats thoſe who have found the leiſure to read his name unworthily defam'd, that they would be ſo good and ſo patient as to hear the ſame Perſon not unneedfully defended. Being accus'd of having bin an inordinat and riotous Youth vomited out of the Univerſity, he makes this reply: “ For this commodious Ly I thank him; for it has “ given me an apt occaſion to acknowlege publicly with all grateful mind that “ more than ordinary Favor and Reſpect which I found above any of my Equals “ at the hands of thoſe courteous and learned Men, the Fellows of that College “ wherin I ſpent ſom years: who at my parting, aſter having taken two Degrees “ (as the manner is) ſignify'd many ways how much better it would content them “ that I ſhould ſtay, as by many Letters full of Kindneſs and loving Reſpect, both “ before that time and long after, I was aſſur'd of their ſingular good Affection to- “ wards me. Which being likewiſe propenſe to all ſuch as were for their ſtudious “ and civil Life worthy of Eſteem, I could not wrong their Judgments and upright “ Intentions ſo much as to think I had that regard from them for any other cauſe “ than that I might be ſtill encourag'd to procede in the honeſt and laudable “ Courſe, of which they apprehended I had given good proof.—As for the com- “ mon Approbation or Diſlike of that place, as now it is, that I ſhould eſteem or “ diſeſteem my ſelf or any other the more for that, is too ſimple and too credulous “ in the Confuter, if he thinks to obtain with me or any right Diſcerner. Of “ ſmall practice was that Phyſician who could not judg by what both ſhe or her “ Siſter have of a long time vomited, that the worſe ſtuff ſhe ſtrongly keeps in “ her Stomach, but the better ſhe is ever kecking at, and is queaſy. She vomits “ now out of Sickneſs, but e're it be well with her ſhe muſt vomit by ſtrong Phy- “ ſic.——The Suburb wherin I dwell ſhall be in my account a more honorable “ place than his Univerſity, which, as in the time of her better Health, and my “ own younger Judgment, I never greatly admir'd, ſo now much leſs. This is not the only paſſage of the Apology wherin he teſtifys his Contemt of the Uni- verſities, for in another place he ſays, “ that what with Truanting and Debauchery, “ what with falſe Grounds, and the weakneſs of natural Faculties in many of “ them (it being a Maxim with ſom Men to ſend the ſimpleſt of their Sons thither) perhaps there would be found among them as many unſolid and corrupted Judgments, both in Doctrin and Life, as in any other two Corporations of like bigneſs. This is undoubted, that if any Carpenter, Smith, or Weaver, were ſuch a bungler in his Trade, as the greater number of them are in their Profeſſion, he would ſtarve for any Cuſtom. And ſhould he exerciſe his Manufacture as little as they do their Talents, he would forget his Art: or ſhould he miſtake his Tools, as they do theirs, he would mar all the work he took in hand. How few among them that know how to write or ſpeak in a pure ſtile, much leſs to diſtinguiſh the Ideas and various kinds of Stile! In Latin barbarous, and oft not without Soleciſms, declaiming in rugged and miſcellaneous Gear blown together by the four Winds; and in their choice preferring the gay rankneſs of Apuleius, Arnobius, or any modern Fuſtianiſt, before the native Latiniſms of Cicero. In the Greec Tongue moſt of them unletter'd or unenter'd to any ſound Proficiency in thoſe Attic Maſters of Wiſdom and Eloquence. In the Hebrew Text, except it be ſom few of them, their Lips are utterly uncircumcis'd. No leſs are they out of the way in Philoſophy, peſtring their heads with the ſapleſs Dotages of old Paris and Salamanca. His Antagoniſt inſinuating a malicious Repreſentation even of his early riſing, he tells him, that his “ Morning haunts are, where they ſhould be, at home; not ſleeping, or concocting the Surfeits of an irregular Feaſt, but up and ſtirring, in Winter often before the Sound of any Bell awakens Men to Labor or Devotion; in Summer as oft as the Bird that firſt rouſes, or not much tardier, to read good Authors, or cauſe them to be read, till the Attention be weary, or the Memory have its full fraught. Then with uſeful and generous Labors preſerving the Bodys Health and Hardineſs, to render a lightſom, clear, and not a lumpiſh Obedience to the Mind, for the cauſe of Religion and our Countries Liberty, when it ſhall require firm Hearts in ſound Bodies to ſtand and cover their Stations, rather than ſee the Ruin of our Proteſtation, and the enforcement of a ſlaviſh Life. Paſſing over his ſerious and juſt Apology for frequenting Playhouſes, I ſhall ſubjoin the Reaſon he gives why ſom Terms of the Stage might appear in his Writings without having learnt them in the Theater; “ which was not needful, ſays he, when in the Colleges ſo many of the young Divines, and thoſe in next aptitude to Divinity, have bin ſeen ſo often on the Stage, writhing and unboning their Clergy Lims to all the antic and diſhoneſt Geſtures of Trinculos, Buffoons, and Bauds: proſtituting the ſhame of that Miniſtry, which either they had or were nigh having, to the eys of Courtiers and Court Ladys, with their Grooms and Mademoiſelles. There while they acted, and overacted, among other young Scholars I was a Spectator; they thought themſelves gallant Men, and I thought them Fools; they made ſport, and I laugh'd; they miſpronounc'd, and I miſlik'd; and, to make up the Atticiſm, they were out, and I hiſt. He was to anſwer next to the heavy charge of Leudneſs with common Proſtitutes; and becauſe the account he gives of himſelf upon this occaſion, and of that part of his Poetry which regards the affairs of Love, is not only eſſential to the Hiſtory of his Life, but of good Inſtruction alſo to ſuch as read ſuch pleaſant and alluring Books, I ſuppoſe none will be offended with me for laying it here before them. “ I had my time, ſays he, like others that have good Learning beſtow'd upon them, to be ſent to thoſe places where the opinion was it might be ſooneſt attain'd; and, as the manner is, was not unſtudy'd in thoſe Authors which are moſt commended. Of theſe ſom were grave Orators and Hiſtorians, whoſe matter methought I lov'd indeed, but as my Age then was, ſo I underſtood them; others were the ſmooth Elegiac Poets, whereof the Schools are not ſcarce, whom both for the pleaſing Sound of their numerous Writings (which in imitation I found moſt eaſy, and moſt agreable to Nature's part in me) and for their matter, which what it is there be few who know not, I was ſo allur'd to read, that no Recreation came to me more welcom: for that it was then thoſe years with me, which are excus'd tho they be leaſt ſevere, I may be ſav'd the labor to remember you. Whence having obſerv'd them to account it the chief Glory of their Wit that they were ableſt to judg, to praiſe, and by that could eſteem themſelves worthieſt to love thoſe high Perfections, which under one or other name they took to celebrat; I thought with my ſelf by every Inſtinct and Preſage of Nature (which is not wont to be falſe) that what embolden'd them to this task, might with ſuch diligence as they us'd embolden me: and that what Judgment, Wit, or Elegance, was my ſhare, would herein beſt appear,

“ and beſt value it ſelf, by how much more wiſely and with more love of Virtue “ I ſhould chuſe the Object of not unlike Praiſes. For tho theſe Thoughts to “ ſom will ſeem virtuous and commendable, to others only pardonable, to a “ third ſort perhaps idle; yet the mentioning of them now will end in ſerious.
“ Nor blame it, Readers, in thoſe years to propoſe to themſelves ſuch a Reward
“ as the nobleſt Diſpoſitions above other things in this Life have ſomtimes prefer'd: “ wherof not to be ſenſible, when good and fair in one Perſon meet, argues “ both a groſs and ſhallow Judgment, and withal an ungentle and ſwainiſh “ Breaſt. For by the firm ſettling of theſe Perſuaſions I became (to my beſt memory) “ ſo much a Proficient, that if I found thoſe Authors any where ſpeaking “ unworthy things of themſelves, or unchaſt of thoſe Names which before they “ had extol'd, this effect it wrought with me, that from that time forward their “ Art I ſtill applauded, but the Men I deplor'd; and above them all prefer'd the “ two famous Renowners of Beatrice and Laura, who never write but Honor of “ them to whom they devote their Verſe, diſplaying ſublime and pure Thoughts “ without tranſgreſſion. And long it was not after, when I was confirm'd in “ the opinion that he, who would not be fruſtrated of his hope to write well hereafter
“ in laudable things, ought himſelf to be a tru Poem; that is, a compoſition “ and pattern of the beſt and honorableſt things: not preſuming to ſing the high “ Praiſes of heroic Men or famous Cities, unleſs he has in himſelf the Experience “ and the Practice of all that is praiſeworthy. Theſe Reaſonings, together with “ a certain niceneſs of Nature, an honeſt Haughtineſs and Self-eſteem either of “ what I was or what I might be (which let Envy call Pride) and laſtly, a becoming “ Modeſty, all uniting the Supply of their natural aid together, kept me “ ſtill above thoſe low Deſcents of Mind, beneath which he muſt deject and “ plunge himſelf that can agree to ſalable and unlawful Proſtitutions. Next I betook “ me among thoſe lofty Fables and Romances which recount in ſolemn Cantos
“ the Deeds of Knighthood founded by our victorious Kings, and from hence “ had in renown over all Chriſtendom. There I read it in the Oath of every “ Knight, that he ſhould defend to the expence of his beſt Blood, or of his Life, “ if it ſo befel him, the Honor and Chaſtity of Virgin or Matron: from whence “ even then I learnt what a noble Virtue Chaſtity ſure muſt be, to the defence of “ which ſo many Worthies by ſuch a dear Adventure of themſelves had ſworn;
“ and if I found in the Story afterwards any of them by word or deed breaking “ that Oath, I judg'd it the ſame fault of the Poet, as that which is attributed to “ Homer, to have written undecent things of the Gods. Only this my mind gave “ me, that every free and gentle Spirit without that Oath ought to be born a “ Knight, nor needed to expect the gilt Spur, or the laying of a Sword upon his “ Shoulder, to ſtir him up both by his Counſil and his Arm, to ſecure and protect “ the weakneſs of any attemted Chaſtity. So that even thoſe Books, which to “ many others have bin the fuel of Wantonneſs and looſe Living (I cannot think “ how, unleſs by divine Indulgence) prov'd to me ſo many Enticements, as you “ have heard, to the love and ſtedfaſt obſervation of that Virtue which abhors the “ Society of Bordellos. Thus from the Laureat Fraternity of Poets, riper years, “ and the ceaſleſs round of Study and Reading, led me to the ſhady walks of Philoſophy;
“ but chiefly to the divine Volumes of Plato, and his equal Xenophon: “ where if I ſhould tell you what I learnt of Chaſtity and Love (I mean that “ which is truly ſo, whoſe charming cup is only Virtue, which ſhe bears in her “ hand to thoſe who are worthy; the reſt are cheated with a thick intoxicating “ Potion, which a certain Sorcereſs, the Abuſer of Love's Names, carries about:
“ and if I ſhould tell you too how the firſt and chiefeſt Office of Love begins and “ ends in the Soul, producing thoſe happy Twins of her divine Generation, “ Knowlege and Virtue) with ſuch abſtracted Sublimities as theſe, it might be “ worth your liſtening, Readers, as I may one day hope to have you in a ſtill time,
“ and when there ſhall be no chiding. Thus far our Author, who afterwards made this Character good in his inimitable Poem of Paradiſe Loſt; and before this time in his Comus or Mask preſented at Ludlow Caſtle, like which Piece in the peculiar diſpoſition of the Story, the ſweetneſs of the Numbers, the juſtneſs of the Expreſſion, and the Moral it teaches, there is nothing extant in any Language. But to procede with the reſt of the Apology, he's in it very ſevere upon the Clergy, not only becauſe in his Judgment he condemn'd ſeveral of their Maxims, but alſo provok'd by the ill uſage he receiv'd. Certainly nothing more barbarous and inhuman ever proceded from the mouth of Pope or Mufti, than this ſaying of his Antagoniſt, “ You that love Chriſt, and know this miſcreant Wretch, ſtone him

“ to death, leſt you ſmart for his Impunity. No wonder that ſo many are ſcandaliz’d when they find the name of Chriſt moſt impudently alleg’d to countenance ſuch deviliſh Practices, when there is nothing more evident than that he expreſly enjoin’d his Followers to forgive their Enemies, and not to purſue ’em with the Spirit of Revenge, but rather to reclaim them from their Errors, and to do ’em all the good they could. Our Author, on the other hand, carries his Reſentments, no doubt, too far, when the following words could drop from his Pen. “ There “ be ſuch in the World, and I among thoſe, who nothing admire the Idol of a “ Biſhoprick, and hold that it wants ſo much to be a Bleſſing, as that I rather “ deem it the mereſt, the falſeſt, the moſt unfortunat Gift of Fortune: and were “ the Puniſhment and Miſery of being a Biſhop terminated only in the Perſon, “ and did not extend to the Affliction of the whole Dioceſs, if I would wiſh any “ thing in the bitterneſs of my Soul to an Enemy, I ſhould wiſh him the biggeſt and fatteſt Biſhoprick. If Milton had bin ſuch a Saint as never miſt of a favorable anſwer to his Prayers, I queſtion not but at this rate more would covet to be his Enemies than his Friends. Another mark of his good Will to the Prelats is this unpardonable Simile. “ A Biſhop’s Foot, ſays he, that has all its Toes “ (maugre the Gout) and a linnen ſock over it, is the apteſt Emblem of the Prelat himſelf; who, being a Pluraliſt, may under one Surplice hide four Benefices “ beſides the great Metropolitan To which ſends a ſoul ſtench to Heaven. And in another place he calls them, “ the Gulfs and Whirlpools of Benefices, but the “ dry Pits of all ſound Doctrin. Agreable to theſe Flowers is his Deſcription of Chaplains ſomwhere in Iconoclaſtes. “ Biſhops or Presbyters we know, ſays he, “ and Deacons we know; but what are Chaplains? In State perhaps they may be “ liſted among the upper Serving men of ſom great Houſhold, and be admitted to “ ſom ſuch place as may ſtile them the Sewers or Yeomen-Uſhers of Devotion, “ where the Maſter is too reſty or too rich to ſay his own Prayers, or to bleſs his “ own Table. How much he lov’d to divert himſelf in this manner, we may perceive by his Apoſtrophe to the Presbyterian Miniſters, who were heavily branded by King Charles the Firſt, tho after his Death they would fain be thought his very dutiful and good Friends. “ O ye Miniſters, ſays Milton, read here what work “ he makes among your Gallypots, your Balms and your Cordials; and not only “ your ſweet Sippets in Widows Houſes, but the huge Gobbets wherwith he “ charges you to have devour’d Houſes and all. Cry him up for a Saint in your “ Pulpits, while he crys you down for Atheiſts into Hell. Nor is he more merciful to the Liturgy than to the Readers of it, as appears by this Character. To “ contend that it is fantaſtical, if not ſenſleſs in ſom places, were a copious Ar- “ gument, ſpecially in the Reſponſories. For ſuch Alternations as are there us’d “ muſt be by ſeveral Perſons; but the Miniſter and the People cannot ſo ſever “ their Intereſts as to ſuſtain ſeveral Perſons, he being the only mouth of the whole “ Body which he preſents. And if the People pray, he being ſilent, or they “ ask one thing and he another, it either changes the Property, making the Prieſt “ the People, and the People the Prieſt by turns, or elſe makes two Perſons and “ two Bodies Repreſentative where there ſhould be but one: which if there were “ nothing elſe, muſt be a ſtrange Quaintneſs in ordinary Prayer. The like or “ worſe may be ſaid of the Litany, wherin neither Prieſt nor People ſpeak any “ entire Senſe of themſelves throout the whole (I know not what to name it) only by the timely Contribution of their parted ſtakes, cloſing up as it were the “ Schiſm of a ſlic’d Prayer, they pray not in vain; for by this means they keep “ Life between them in a piece of gaſping Senſe, and keep down the Sawcineſs “ of a continual rebounding Nonſenſe. And hence it is that as it has bin far from “ the imitation of any warranted Prayer, ſo we all know it has bin obvious to be “ the pattern of many a Jig. And he who has but read in good Books of Devotion, and no more, cannot be ſo either of Ear or Judgment unpractis’d to diſtinguiſh what is grave, pathetical, devout, and what not; but he will preſently “ perceive this Liturgy all over in conception lean and dry, of Affections emty “ and unmoving, of Paſſion, or any heighth wherto the Soul might ſoar upon the “ wings of Zeal, deſtitute and barren. Beſides Errors, Tautologies, Impertinences, as thoſe Thanks in the Woman’s Churching for her delivery from Sunburning and Moonblaſting, as if ſhe had bin travelling, not in her Bed, but in “ the Deſerts of Arabia. So that while ſom men ceaſe not to admire the incomparable Frame of our Liturgy, I cannot but admire as faſt what they think is becom of Judgment and Taſte in other men, that they can hope to be heard without Laughter. And if this were all, perhaps it were a compliable matter. But “ when we remember this our Liturgy, where we found it, whence we had it,

“ and yet where we left it, ſtill ſerving to all the Abominations of the Antichriſtian “ Temple, it may be wonder'd how we can demur whether it ſhould be aboliſh'd “ or no, and not rather fear we have highly offended in uſing it ſo long. It “ has indeed bin pretended to be more antient than the Maſs, but ſo little prov'd, “ that wheras other corrupt Liturgies have had ſuch a ſeeming Antiquity, that “ their Publiſhers have ventur'd to aſcribe them either to Saint Peter, St. James, “ St. Mark, or at leaſt to Chryſoſtom or Baſil, ours has bin never able to find either “ Age or Author allowable on whom to father thoſe things which therin are leaſt “ offenſive, except the two Creeds. I ſhall conclude my account of his Books concerning religious Controverſies with this remarkable account of his reading in the Councils and Fathers of the Church. “ Som years, ſays he, I had ſpent in “ the Stories of thoſe Greec and Roman Exploits, wherin I found many things both “ nobly don and worthily ſpoken: when coming in the method of time to that “ age wherin the Church had obtain'd a Chriſtian Emperor, I ſo prepar'd my ſelf “ as being now to read Examples of Wiſdom and Goodneſs among thoſe who “ were foremoſt in the Church, not elſwhere to be parallel'd. But to the amazement “ of what I expected, Readers, I found it all quite contrary; excepting in “ ſom very few, nothing but Ambition, Corruption, Contention, Combuſtion: “ inſomuch that I could not but love the Hiſtorian Socrates, who in the Proem to “ his fifth Book profeſſes, he was fain to intermix Affairs of State, for that it “ would be elſe an extreme annoyance to hear in a continu'd Diſcourſe the endleſs “ Brabbles and Counterplottings of the Biſhops. Finding therfore the moſt of “ their Actions in particular to be weak and yet turbulent, full of Strife and yet “ flat of Spirit, and the ſum of their beſt Councils there collected to be moſt “ commonly in Queſtions either trivial and vain, or elſe of ſhort and eaſy deciſion, “ without that great buſtle which they made: I concluded that if their ſingle “ Ambition and Ignorance was ſuch, then certainly united in a Council it would “ be much more; and if the compendious recital of what they there did was ſo tedious “ and unprofitable, then ſurely to ſit out the whole extent of their tattle in “ a dozen Volumes, would be a loſs of time irrecoverable. Beſides that which “ I had read of St. Martin, who for his laſt ſixteen years could never be perſuaded “ to be at any Council of the Biſhops; and Gregory Nazianzen betook him to the “ ſame reſolution, affirming to Procopius that of any Council or Meeting of Biſhops “ he never ſaw good end, nor any remedy therby of evil in the Church, but “ rather an increaſe: for, ſays he, their Contentions and Deſire of Lording no “ Tongue is able to expreſs.

In the year 1643, he chang'd his condition, and was marry'd to Mary the Daughter of Richard Powel of Forreſthill in Oxfordſhire, a Juſtice of the Peace, and a man of good figure in that Country. But whether it was that this young Woman, accuſtom'd to a large and jovial Family, could not live in a Philoſophical Retirement; or that ſhe was not perfectly ſatisfy'd with the Perſon of her Husband; or laſtly, that, becauſe her Relations were all addicted to the Royal Intereſt, his democratical Principles were diſagreable to her Humor (nor is it impoſſible that the Father repented of this match upon the proſpect of ſom Succeſs on the King's ſide, who then had his Headquarters at Oxford) or whatever were the reaſon, 'tis certain that after he enjoy'd her Company at London about a month, ſhe was invited by her Friends to ſpend the reſt of the Summer in the Country, to which he conſented, on condition of her return by Michaelmas. Yet he ſaw her not at the time appointed, and, after receiving ſeveral of his Letters without ſending him any anſwer, ſhe did at length poſitively refuſe to come, diſmiſſing his Meſſenger with contempt. This uſage incens'd him to that degree, that he thought it againſt his Honor and Repoſe to own her any longer for his Wife. He made that time however as eaſy to himſelf as he might, ſomtimes by keeping a gaudy day with his Friends, and at other times in converſation with the Lady Margaret Lee, Daughter to the Earl of Marlborough, whoſe ſprightly Wit and good Senſe drew frequent Viſits from him, and for whom he had a ſingular eſteem, which he has left recorded by a Sonnet in her Praiſe among his other occaſional Poems. He thought it now high time to juſtify by proper Arguments the firm Reſolution he had taken of never receiving his Wife back again, and therfore in the year 1644, he publiſh'd his Doctrin and Diſciplin of Divorce, which he dedicated to the Parlament and to the Aſſembly of Divines, that as they were buſy then about the general Reformation of the Kingdom, they might alſo take this particular caſe of domeſtic Liberty into their conſideration: for he thought all the boaſted Freedom of public Judicatures ſignify'd ſy'd little, if in the mean while one muſt be oblig'd to indure a kind of Servitude at home below the Dignity of a Man. “ What thing, ſays he, is more inſtituted “ to the Solace and Delight of Man than Marriage? And yet the miſinterpreting “ of ſom Scriptures, directed mainly againſt the Abuſers of the Law for Divorce “ given by Moſes, has chang'd the Bleſſing of Matrimony not ſeldom into a familiar and cohabiting Miſchief; at leaſt, into a drooping and diſconſolat houſhold “ Captivity, without Refuge or Redemtion. So ungovern'd and ſo wild a race “ dos Superſtition run us, from one Extreme of abus'd Liberty into the other of “ unmerciful Reſtraint! Tho God in the firſt ordaining of Marriage taught us to “ what end he did it (the words expreſly implying the apt and chearful Converſation of Man with Woman, to comfort and refreſh him of the evil of a ſolitary “ Life; not mentioning the purpoſe of Generation till afterwards, as being but a “ ſecondary end in Dignity tho not in Neceſſity) yet now if any two be but once “ handed in the Church, and have taſted in any ſort the nuptial Bed, let them find “ themſelves never ſo miſtaken in their Diſpoſitions thro any Error, Concealment, or Miſadventure; that thro their different Tempers, Thoughts, and “ Conſtitutions, they can neither be to one another a remedy againſt Lonelineſs, “ nor live in any Union or Contentment all their days: yet they ſhall (ſo they be “ but found ſutably weapon'd to the leaſt poſſibility of ſenſual Enjoyment) be “ made in ſpite of Antipathy to fadg together, and combine, as they may, to “ their unſpeakable Weariſomneſs, and deſpair of all ſociable Delight, in the “ Ordinance which God eſtabliſh'd to that very end. Then he largely ſhews all the unjuſt Sanctions concerning Marriage to be owing to the Superſtition of ſom antient Fathers, and to the deſign of promoting the Gain or Authority of the Clergy, as they make a part of the Canon Law: For the Grecs, the Romans, and all civiliz'd Nations, did not only allow of Divorce upon mutual Averſion or Conſent; but in many other caſes, beſides the violation of the nuptial Bed, there was a Separation made on the Petition of one Party, tho the other ſhould not be willing. His purpoſe, in ſhort, is to ſhew that there are other ſufficient Reaſons for Divorce beſides Adultery; and that to prohibit any ſort of Divorce, but ſuch as are excepted by Moſes, is unjuſt and againſt the Reaſon of the Law: in handling which Heads he has, beſides his Arguments from Reaſon, had always a due care to explain thoſe Paſſages of Scripture which are thought to contradict his Opinion. The grand Poſition he maintains is, That Indiſpoſition, Unfitneſs, or contrary Humors, proceding from any unchangable cauſe in Nature, hindring and always likely to hinder the main ends and benefits of conjugal Society (that is to ſay, Peace and Delight) are greater Reaſons of Divorce than ADULTERY or natural FRIGIDITY, provided there be a mutual Conſent for Separation. And indeed it ſeems to be a perfect Tyranny to oblige a Man or Woman beyond the deſign of their Covenant: nor ſhould they, who never try'd this condition together, be hinder'd from diſcretely and orderly undoing it, when they find things otherwiſe than they promis'd themſelves; no more than in any other bargain People are puniſh'd for unwilful Ignorance: ſince, whenever both Parties are willing, they may draw back their ſtakes, and leave matters as they were before, or compound for the Damages that may be don. It ſeems likewiſe to me very groſs, that in Lawmaking (particularly in the Canon Law) a regard ſhould be had to the fit Diſpoſition of the marry'd Couples Bodies, and no conſideration of the Agreableneſs of their Minds, when the Charms of the latter are often the greateſt inducements to the conjunction of the former. And ſince no Man or Woman can be ſecure of true Information from others, nor infallible in their own Obſervations upon one another's Humors and Conditions (ſpecially ſince they are not admitted to a requiſit Familiarity for ſuch an inquiry before Marriage) it is the hardeſt thing in the world that no Clauſes ſhould be provided for caſes of this nature. As for the common Objection, that Marriage is a Remedy againſt Fornication and Adultery, I grant it to be moſt true, if the Parties mutually love; but if it be a forc'd Compact, or afterwards diſlik'd, it is ſo far from producing this good effect, that we clearly ſee by conſtant Experience (and Reaſon may convince us all of it) that ſuch a fatal Knot expoſes Men and Women to various Temtations, breaks the Peace of Families, expoſes the Reputation of the Children, and diſturbs or deſtroys all the Duties of Society. Nor dos it anſwer the firſt Inſtitution which ſuppoſes it was not good for Man to be alone, ſince every body would rather chuſe to be alone than be forc'd to keep bad Company. To conclude, Marriage certainly, like all other Contracts, was ordain'd for the benefit of Man, and not Man created for Marriage: wherfore it ought to be ſuted to his Convenience and Happineſs, and not be made a Snare to render him uneaſy or miſerable. No Pretences can be drawn from this Opinion to favor Libertiniſm, but on the contrary, the Conduct of the Oppoſers of it may be terribly hamper'd with infamous Conſequences, on which we ſhall not inſiſt in this place, referring the curious to Milton's own Book. As for the Popiſh and ridiculous practice in certain Spiritual Courts, of ſeparating People from bed and board (which any Couple may agree to do themſelves) and refuſing 'em the liberty of marrying more for their convenience (if the civil Power dos not interpoſe for their Relief) I ſhall have a more proper opportunity to ſhew the Miſchief and Unreaſonableneſs of it.

On the firſt appearing of this Book, the Clergy did generally declaim againſt it, and fix'd upon the Author the uſual Reproaches of Atheiſm, Hereſy, Leudneſs, and what not? They daily inſtigated the Parlament, which little minded their Clamors, to paſs their Cenſure on it; and at laſt one of them in a Sermon before that auguſt Aſſembly, on a day of Humiliation, roundly told them that there was a wicked Book abroad which deſerv'd to be burnt, and that among their other Sins they ought to repent it had not yet bin branded with a mark of their Diſpleaſure. This man's main accuſation being, that Milton taught other cauſes of Divorce than were mention'd by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, which was alſo urg'd againſt him at the ſame time by ſom others, he publiſh'd the Tetrachordon, dedicated to the Parlament, or his Expoſition of the four chief Paſſages of Scripture that treat of Marriage, and the nullifying of the ſame, namely Gen. 1. 27, &c. Gen. 2. 18, &c. Deut. 24. 1, &c. Mat. 5. 31, &c. and Mat. 29. 3, &c. Other places out of the Epiſtles he alſo occaſionally explains; he alleges the Authority of thoſe great Men who favor'd his Opinion, ſets down the determination of the Imperial Laws, with more proofs that are uſual in ſuch caſes. On this Book our Author himſelf made the following lines.

I did but promt the Age to quit their Clogs
By the known Rules of antient Liberty,
When ſtraight a barbarous Noiſe environs me
Of Owls, and Cuckoos, Aſſes, Apes, and Dogs:
As when thoſe Hinds that were transform'd to Frogs Rail'd at Latona's twinborn Progeny,
Which after held the Sun and Moon in fee.
But this is got by caſting Pearls to Hogs,
That baul for Freedom in their ſenſleſs mood,
And ſtill revolt when Truth would ſet them free.
Licence they mean, when they cry Liberty;
For who loves that, muſt firſt be wiſe and good:
But from that mark how far they roave we ſee,
For all this waſte of Wealth and loſs of Blood.

The next piece he publiſh'd on this Subject was the Judgment of the famous Reformer Martin Bucer touching Divorce, extracted out of the ſecond Book of the Kingdom of Chriſt, dedicated to King Edward the Sixth. He exactly agrees with Milton, tho the latter had not ſeen this Book till after the publication of his own. He alſo ſhews very fairly, that Paulus Fagius the Aſſociat of Bucer, that Peter Martyr, Eraſmus, and Grotius, did teach the ſame Doctrin, that he might ſtop the mouths of ſuch as were determin'd more by theſe Names than by all the light of Reaſon or Scripture; and that he might not appear to be call'd an Atheiſt or Libertin with more reaſon than theſe Perſons, who notwithſtanding they had affirm'd as much as he, were yet generally counted very ſober and pious.

The fourth Book he wrote relating to Divorce was his Colaſterion, being a Reply to one of his Anſwerers, who, to all the Dulneſs and Ignorance imaginable, added the higheſt Bitterneſs and Malice: ſo far from tolerably underſtanding any of the learned Languages (as in ſom ſecondhand Quotations he would be thought to do) that he could not rightly ſpell what he ſo meanly ſtole. Yet this rude Invective muſt be licens'd by Mr. Carryl, the ſame who in his voluminous and ſenſleſs Comments did more injury to the memory of Job, than the Devil and the Sabeans could inflict Torments on him in his life time. But, not content to prefix his Imprimatur, he pronounces his Judgment too againſt Milton, which was a moſt unworthy treatment of him from theſe men, of whom he deſerv'd ſo well by his former Writings againſt their Enemies the Biſhops; tho, to ſpeak the truth, this was only a ſervice to the Presbyterians by accident: for, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, he never ver intended by humbling the Hierarchy, to ſet up the Conſiſtorian Tribunal in the room of it. However, the following Reproach was extorted from him by their baſe Ingratitude. “ Mr. Licenſer, ſays he, you are reputed a man diſcrete “ enough, religious enough, honeſt enough, that is, to an ordinary competence in “ all theſe: But now your turn is to hear what your own hand has earn'd you, that “ when you ſuffer'd this nameleſs Hangman to caſt into public ſuch a ſpiteful “ Contumely upon a Name and Perſon deſerving of the Church and State equally “ to your ſelf, and one who has don more to the preſent advancement of your “ own Tribe, than you or many of them have don for themſelves; you forgot to “ be either honeſt, religious, or diſcrete. Whatever the State might do con- “ cerning it, ſuppoſing it were a matter to expect evil from it, I ſhould not doubt “ to meet among them with wiſe, and honorable, and knowing men. But as to “ this brute Libel, ſo much the more impudent and lawleſs for the abus'd Autho- “ rity which it bears, I ſay again, that I abominat the Cenſure of Raſcals and their “ Licenſers. Theſe are all the Pieces concerning Divorce written by Milton, whoſe Arguments ought not to be eſteem'd the leſs cogent, becauſe occaſion'd by his domeſtic Uneaſineſs; when this reaſon would equally enervat the Apologies exhibited for Chriſtianity under its Perſecutors, and fruſtrat all the noble Treatiſes of Civil Government, for which we are beholding to the Lawleſneſs of Tyrants or Uſurpers; witneſs the incomparable and golden Diſcourſes of that Heroic Patron of Liberty, Algernon Sidney. And indeed the beſt Books we have on any Subject, are ſuch as were oppos'd to the prevalency of the contrary opinion: for as he that was forc'd to paſs ſom part of his time in the Regions of extreme Heat or Cold, can beſt value the Bleſſings of a temperat Country; ſo none can be ſo well furniſh'd with Arguments for a good Cauſe, like ſuch as were Sufferers under a bad one; the Writings of unconcern'd and retir'd Perſons being either an Exerciſe of their Parts, and the Amuſements of idle time, or, what is worſe, pitiful Declamations without any Force, Experience, or Vivacity.

About this time he wrote a ſmall piece of Education to Samuel Hartlib, looking upon the right Inſtitution of Children to be the Nurſery of all true Liberty or Virtue; and of whatſoever in Government is good and wiſe, or in privat practice amiable and worthy.

The next Book he wrote was his Areopagitica, or an Oration to the Parlament of England for the liberty of Unlicens'd Printing, in which he proves that the Republics of Greece and Italy never cenſur'd any but immoral, defamatory, or atheiſtical Pieces. Nor was it by Inferences and Inſinuations they were to judg of Atheiſm; for they never ſuppreſt the Writings of the Epicureans, nor ſuch other Books denying even the Doctrins of Providence, and the future State: but it muſt have bin a formal doubt or denial of the being of a Deity. Yet it is beyond contradiction, that thoſe Nations maintain'd an excellent Government, diſtributing public and privat Juſtice, and abounding in all Knowlege and Virtue, infinitly above thoſe who have bin ever ſince the moſt rigid Purgers, Corrupters, or Executioners of Books. The Roman Emperors were Tyrants, and none but ſuch as would imitat them, ſhould quote their Examples. The Primitive Chriſtians obſerv'd no Uniformity of Conduct in this Affair. At firſt they were for reading all the Works of the Gentils, but none of thoſe they reckon'd Heretical among themſelves; after this they were only for confuting the Books of the Heretics, and ſuppreſſing thoſe of the Gentils, even ſuch as did not in the leaſt concern Religion: for about the year 400, in a Carthaginian Council, the very Biſhops were prohibited the reading of Heathen Authors. Had this infamous and barbarous Reſolution bin throly executed (for it had but too much effect) to what a degree of Ignorance and meanneſs of Spirit it would have reduc'd the World, depriving it of ſo many inimitable Hiſtorians, Orators, Philoſophers, and Poets, the Repoſitories of ineſtimable Treaſure, conſiſting of warlike and heroic Deeds, the beſt and wiſeſt Arts of Government, the moſt perfect Rules and Examples of Eloquence or Politeneſs, and ſuch divine Lectures of Wiſdom and Virtue, that the loſs of Cicero's Works alone, or thoſe of Livy, could not be repair'd by all the Fathers of the Church. In proceſs of time, when the Clergy begun to be exalted even above the ſupreme Magiſtrat himſelf, they burnt and deſtroy'd every thing that did not favor their Power or Superſtition, and laid a reſtraint on Reading as well as Writing, without excepting the very Bible; and thus they proceeded till the Inquiſition reduc'd this abominable practice to the perfection of an Art by expurgatory Indexes and Licenſing. All the conſequences of this Tyranny, as depriving men of their natural Liberty, ſtifling their Parts, introducing of Ignorance, ingroſſing all Advantages to one Party, and the like, were perpetually objected before the Civil Wars by the Presbyterians to the Biſhops; but no ſooner were they poſſeſt of the Biſhops Pulpits and Power, than they exercis'd the ſame Authority with more intolerable Rigor and Severity. Milton, after ſhewing the Origin, Progreſs, and Miſchief of this Cuſtom, proves firſt that we muſt not read the Bible, the Fathers, nor almoſt any ſort of Books, if we regard the Reaſons uſually alleg'd to forbid the publiſhing of others, ſuch as the fear of wreſting or miſtaking their meaning. Secondly, that the ends propos'd cannot be attain'd after this manner. And, Thirdly, that no man is fit to be a Licenſer, not in any one ſingle Faculty, unleſs he is univerſally learn'd, or a better Scholar than all the Authors whoſe Labors he's to licenſe: and that, granting theſe things poſſible (tho they are not ſo) he could neither find ſtrength nor time enough for peruſing all Books; and ſhould he uſe Deputies, he's likelieſt to have ignorant, lazy, and mercenary Fellows. Then diſplaying the Diſcouragement that muſt follow hence to all Literature and new Diſcoveries (with the danger of ſuppreſſing Truth, and propagating Error, as it happens in Popiſh Countries, and the not reprinting of antient Authors in any Language) he proves Licenſing to be both unjuſt in it ſelf, and diſhonorable to a free Government. “ To include the whole Nation, ſays he, and thoſe that never

“ paragement it is may be plainly underſtood. So much the more, ſince Debtors “ and Delinquents may walk abroad without a Keeper, but inoffenſive Books “ muſt not ſtir forth without a viſible Jailor in their Title. Nor is it to the com“ mon People leſs than a Reproach; for if we be ſo jealous over them, as that “ we dare not truſt them with an Engliſh Pamphlet, what do we but cenſure them “ for a giddy, vitious, and ungrounded People, in ſuch a ſick and weak ſtate of “ Faith and Diſcretion, as to be able to take nothing but thro the Gliſterpipe of a “ Licenſer? That this is any care or love of them, we cannot pretend, ſince in “ thoſe Popiſh Places, where the Laity are moſt hated and deſpis'd, the ſame “ ſtrictneſs is us'd over them. Wiſdom we cannot call it, becauſe it ſtops but “ one breach of Licenſe; nor that neither, ſeeing thoſe Corruptions, which it “ ſeeks to prevent, break in faſter at other doors which cannot be ſhut And it “ reflects on the Reputation of our Miniſters alſo, of whoſe Labors we ſhould “ hope better, and of the Proficiency which their Flocks reap by them, than that “ after all this light of the Goſpel which is, and is to be, and after all this conti“ nual Preaching, they ſhould be ſtill frequented with ſuch an unprincipl'd, unedi“ fy'd, and Laic Rabble, as that the whif of every new Pamphlet ſhould ſtagger “ them out of their Catechiſm. This may have much reaſon to diſcourage the “ Miniſters, when ſuch a low conceit is had of all their Exhortations and the bene“ fiting of their Hearers, that they are not thought fit to be turn'd looſe to three “ Sheets of Paper without a Licenſer. In another place he ſays, “ A man may be a “ Heretic in the Truth; and if he believes only becauſe his Paſtor ſays ſo, or the “ Aſſembly ſo determins, without knowing any other Reaſon: tho his Belief be “ true, yet the very Truth he holds becoms his Hereſy. There is not any bur“ den that ſom would gladlier put off to another, than the charge and care of their “ Religion. Who knows not that there be ſom Proteſtants who live in as arrant an “ implicit Faith as any Lay-Papiſt of Loretto? A wealthy man, addicted to his “ Pleaſures and his Profit, finds Religion to be a Traffic ſo intangl'd, and of ſo
“ many pidling accounts, that of all Myſteries he cannot endure to keep a ſtock “ going upon that trade. What dos he therſore, but reſolves to give over toil“ ing, and to find out ſom Factor to whoſe care and credit he may commit the “ whole management of his religious Affairs; and that muſt be ſom Divine of “ Note and Eſtimation. To him he adheres, reſigns the whole Warehouſe of his “ Religion with all the Locks and Keys into his cuſtody; and indeed makes the “ very Perſon of that Man his Religion, eſteems his aſſociating with him a ſuffici“ ent evidence and commendation of his own Piety. So that a man may ſay his “ Religion is now no more within himſelf, but is becom a dividual movable, and “ gos and coms near him according as that good man frequents the Houſe. He “ entertains him, gives him Gifts, feaſts him, lodges him; his Religion coms “ home at night, prays, is liberally ſup'd, and ſumtuouſly laid to ſleep; riſes, is “ ſaluted, and (after the Malmſy or ſom well-ſpic'd Brewage, and better break-“ faſted than he whoſe Morning-appetite would have gladly fed on green Figs be“ tween Bethany and Jeruſalem) his Religion walks abroad at eight, and leaves his “ kind Entertainer in the Shop trading all day without his Religion. Another “ ſort there be, who, when they hear that all things ſhall be order'd, all things re“ gulated and ſettled, nothing written but what paſſes thro the Cuſtomhouſe of “ certain Publicans that have the tunnaging and poundaging of all freeſpoken “ Truth, will ſtraight give themſelves up into your hands, make 'em and cut 'em “ out what Religion you pleaſe; there be Delights, there be Recreations, and “ jolly Paſtimes that will fetch the day about from Sun to Sun, and rock the tedi“ ous year as in a delightful dream. What need they torture their heads with that “ which others have taken ſo ſtrictly and ſo unalterably into their own purveying?

“ Theſe are the Fruits which a dull Eaſe and Ceſſation of our Knowlege will bring “ forth among the People. Nor much better will be the conſequence among the “ Clergy themſelves. It is no new thing never heard of before for a Parochial “ Miniſter, who has his Reward, and is at his Hercules Pillars in a warm Bene“ fice, to be eaſily inclinable (if he has nothing elſe that may rouſe up his Stu“ dies) to finiſh his Circuit in an Engliſh Concordance and a Topic Folio, the Ga“ therings and Sayings of a ſober Graduatſhip, a Harmony and a Catena, treading “ the conſtant round of certain common doctrinal Heads, attended with their “ Uſes, Motives, Marks, and Means; out of which, as out of an Alphabet or “ ſol fa mi, by forming and transforming, joining and disjoining variouſly a little “ Bookcraft, and two hours Meditation, he might furniſh himſelf unſpeakably to “ the performance of more than a weekly charge of Sermoning: not to reckon up
“ the infinit helps of Interlinearies, Breviaries, Synopſes, and other loitring gear.
“ But, as for the multitude of Sermons already printed on every Text that is not “ difficult, he need never fear penury of Pulpit Proviſion; yet if his Rear and “ Flanks be not impal'd, if his backdoor be not ſecur'd by the rigid Licenſer, but “ that a bold Book may now and then iſſue forth and give the aſſault to ſom of his “ old Collections in their trenches, it will concern him to keep waking, to ſtand
“ in watch, to ſet good Guards and Sentinels about his receiv'd Opinions, to walk
“ the round and counterround with his Fellow-Inſpectors, fearing leſt any of his “ Flock be ſeduc'd, who alſo then would be better inſtructed, better exercis'd and “ diſciplin'd. And God ſend that the fear of this Diligence, which muſt then be “ us'd, do not make us affect the lazineſs of a licenſing Church. Such was the effect of our Author's Areopagitica, that the following year Mabol, a Licenſer, offer'd Reaſons againſt Licenſing; and, at his own requeſt, was diſcharg'd that Office. And certainly there's nothing deſerves more wonder, than that any wiſe People ſhould ſuffer a ſmall number of injudicious Fellows, always ready to ſuppreſs whatever is not reliſh'd by their own Sect or the Magiſtrat, to be the ſole Maſters and Judges of what ſhould or ſhould not be printed; that is, of what the Nation is to know, ſpeak, or underſtand: and I need not heſitat to affirm that ſuch a Power in the hands of any Prince (the Licenſers being always his Creatures) is more dangerous even than a ſtanding Army to Civil Liberty; nor in point of Religion is it inferior to the Inquiſition.

But to return to his privat Affairs, leſt he might ſeem by his ſeveral Treatiſes of Divorce not to act from an intire Conviction, but out of ſudden Reſentment, or to ſhew his Parts in maintaining a Paradox, he was ſeriouſly treating a Marriage with a young Lady of great Wit and Beauty, when one day as he was at a Relations houſe whom he often viſited, he was extremely ſurpriz'd to find his Wife (whom he thought never to have ſeen more) acknowleging her fault at his feet, and begging Forgiveneſs with tears. At firſt he ſeem'd inexorable, but his own Generoſity, and the interceſſion of Friends, ſoon procur'd a perfect Reconciliation, with an act of Oblivion for all that was paſt. The firſt fruit of her return was a Girl, born within a year after: And ſo far was he from remembring former Provocations, that the King's Intereſt in every place viſibly declining, he receiv'd his Wives Father and Mother, ſeveral of her Siſters and Brothers into his own Houſe, where they had Protection and free Entertainment till their Affairs were in a better condition. And now both his own Father dying, and his Wives Relations returning to their ſeveral Habitations, he reviv'd his Academic Inſtitution of ſom young Gentlemen, with a deſign, perhaps, of putting in practice the model of Education lately publiſh'd by himſelf. Yet this courſe was of no long continuance; for he was to be made Adjutant General to Sir William Waller, but that the new modelling of the Army ſoon following, and Sir William turning cat in pan, this deſign was fruſtrated.

A little after Fairfax and Cromwel had march'd thro the City with the whole Army to quell the Inſurrection of Brown and Maſſy, now grown diſcontented likewiſe with the Parlament, our Author chang'd his great Houſe for one more accommodated to his Circumſtances, where in the midſt of all the noiſe and confuſion of Arms, he led a quiet and privat Life, wholly delighted with the Muſes, and proſecuting his indefatigable ſearch after uſeful and ſolid Knowlege.

Having occaſionally mention'd that Great man General Fairfax, I ſhall ſubjoin here, becauſe it is not printed among his other Poems, a Sonnet our Author ſent him.

Fairfax, whoſe Name in Arms thro Europe rings,
  And fills all mouths with Envy or with Praiſe,
  And all her jealous Monarchs with Amaze,
  And Rumors loud which daunt remoteſt things:
Thy firm unſhaken Valor ever brings Victory home, while new Rebellions raiſe
  Their Hydra Heads, and the falſe North diſplays
  Her broken League to imp her Serpent Wings.
O yet a nobler task awaits thy hand,
  For what can War but Acts of War ſtill breed,
  Till injur'd Truth from Violence be freed,
And public Faith be reſcu'd from the brand
  Of public Fraud? In vain dos Valor bleed, While Avarice and Rapine ſhare the Land.

The following lines, never likewiſe publiſh'd among his Poems, he wrote on Sir Henry Vane the Younger.

Vane, young in years, but in ſage Counſils old,
  Than whom a better Senator ne'er held
  The Helm of Rome (when Gowns not Arms repel'd
  The fierce Epirot, and the African bold)
Whether to ſettle Peace, or to unfold
  The drift of hollow States, hard to be ſpel'd.
  Then, to adviſe how War may beſt b'upheld,
  Man'd by her two main Nerves, Iron and Gold,
In all her Equipage: Beſides to know
  Both ſpiritual and civil, what each means,
  What ſerves each thou haſt learn'd, which few have don.
The bounds of either Sword to thee we ow;
  Therfore on thy right hand Religion leans,
  And reckons thee in chief her eldeſt Son.

But after Charles the Firſt (ſomtime before judg'd an Enemy by the Parlament) was made a Priſoner by their victorious Army, afterwards judicially try'd and condemn'd, and the form of the Government was chang'd into a Democracy or Free State, the Presbyterian Miniſters, who from the beginning were the King's mortal Enemies, but now inrag'd that the Independents and other Sects ſhould enjoy either Liberty or Life (not angry at the Fact but the Faction) did tragically declaim in their Pulpits, that the King's Uſage was very hard, that his Perſon was ſacred and inviolable, and that any Violence offer'd to him in the field (much leſs by the hands of an Executioner) was contrary to the Doctrin of the Reform'd Churches. This oblig'd Milton in the year 49, to write his Tenure of Kings and Magiſtrats, wherin he labors to prove that it is not only in it ſelf a moſt equitable thing, but that it has alſo bin ſo eſteem'd by the free and conſidering part of Mankind in all ages, that ſuch as had the Power might call a Tyrant to account for his Maladminiſtration, and after due Conviction to depoſe or put him to death, according to the nature of his Crimes: And further ſhews, that if the ordinary Magiſtrats of any Nation refuſe to do 'em this Juſtice, that then the duty of Self-preſervation, and the good of the whole (which is the ſupreme Law) impowers the People to deliver themſelves from Slavery by the ſafeſt and moſt effectual methods they can. As for the Presbyterians, who were then grown ſo tender of Majeſty (and that only becauſe they could not, abſolutely and excluſively of others, govern all mens Perſons and Conſciences) he evidently ſhews that they were the moſt zealous to take arms againſt the King, to deveſt and diſanoint him of his Dignity, nay to curſe him in all their Sermons and Pamphlets over the Kingdom (wherof there remain numerous Monuments ſtill to be produc'd) that, in a word, after they had join'd with others to a degree from which Men of Honor or Prudence could not retreat, they were louder than the Cavaliers themſelves to cry Diſloyalty and

Treaſon. After proving at large that they broke their Allegiance to him, obey'd another Authority, and had often given Commiſſion to ſlay where they knew his Perſon could not be exemt from danger; and where, if chance or flight had not ſav'd him like others, he muſt be infallibly kil'd, he ſhews how ridiculouſly it became them to pretend a tenderneſs for his Perſon or Character; wheras indeed it was neither Perſuaſion nor Remorſe, but their averſion to civil and religious Liberty that hurry'd 'em to theſe extremes. But becauſe I hope the bulk of thoſe now cal'd Presbyterians in England, ſom few leading Men excepted, are no ſuch Enemies to a Toleration, and that they underſtand no more of the Conſiſtorian, Claſſical, or Synodical Judicatories, than they allow of the Inquiſition or a Hierarchy, I ſhall in this place to diſabuſe 'em, and to let 'em ſee how much better others foreſaw their Fate than Paſſion would ſuffer themſelves at that time, inſert the following paſſage. "As for the Party cal'd Presbyterian, ſays Milton, of whom I believe very many to be good and faithful Chriſtians, tho miſled by ſom of turbulent Spirit, I wiſh them earneſtly and calmly not to fall off from their firſt Principles, nor to affect Rigor and Superiority over Men not under them; not to compel unforcible things in Religion eſpecially, which if not voluntary, becoms a Sin; nor to aſſiſt the clamor and malicious drifts of thoſe whom they themſelves have judg'd to be the worſt of Men, the obdurat Enemies of God and his Church: nor to dart againſt the Actions of their Brethren, for want of other Argument, thoſe wreſted Laws and Scriptures thrown by Prelats and Malignants againſt their own ſides, which tho they hurt not otherwiſe, yet taken up by them to the condemnation of their own doings, give ſcandal to all Men, and diſcover in themſelves either extreme Paſſion or Apoſtacy. Let them not oppoſe their beſt Friends and Aſſociats who moleſt 'em not at all, infringe not the leaſt of their Liberties, unleſs they call it their Liberty to bind other Mens Conſciences, but are ſtill ſeeking to live at peace with them, and brotherly Accord. Let them beware an old and perfect Enemy, who tho he hopes by ſowing Diſcord to make them his Inſtruments, yet cannot forbear a minute the open threatning of his deſtin'd Revenge upon them, when they have ſerv'd his purpoſes. Let them fear therfore, if they be wiſe, rather what they have don already, than what remains to do; and be warn'd in time that they put no confidence in Princes whom they have provok'd, leſt they be added to the Examples of thoſe that miſerably have taſted of the event.—I have ſomthing alſo to the Divines, tho brief to what were needful, not to be Diſturbers of the Civil Affairs, being in hands better able, and to whom it more belongs to manage them; but to ſtudy harder, and to attend the Office of good Paſtors, not perform'd by mounting twice into the Chair with a formal Preachment huddled up at the odd hours of a whole lazy Week, but by inceſſant pains and watching——which if they well conſider'd, how little leiſure would they find to be the moſt pragmatical Sideſmen of every popular Tumult and Sedition? And all this while they are to learn what the true end and reaſon is of the Goſpel which they teach, and what a world it differs from the cenſorious and ſupercilious lording over Conſcience. It would be good alſo they liv'd ſo as might perſuade the People they hated Covetouſneſs, which, worſe than Hereſy, is Idolatry; hated Pluralities and all kind of Simony; leſt rambling from Benefice to Benefice, like ravenous Wolves ſeeking where they may devour the biggeſt. Let them be ſorry that, being cal'd to aſſemble about reforming the Church, they fell to progging and ſoliciting the Parlament (tho they had renounc'd the name of Prieſts) for a new ſettling of their Tithes and Oblations, and doublelin'd themſelves with ſpiritual places of Commodity beyond the poſſible diſcharge of their Duty. Let them aſſemble in Conſiſtory with their Elders and Deacons to the preſerving of Church-Diſciplin each in his ſeveral charge, and not a pack of Clergymen by themſelves to bellychear in their preſumptuous Sion; or to promote deſigns to abuſe and gull the ſimple Laity, to ſtir up Tumults, as the Prelats did before them, for the maintenance of their Pride and Avarice. On this occaſion I muſt remark, that by reaſon of the Presbyterians warmly joining with others the laſt Parlament to promote Penal Laws againſt the Socinians, I find few People will believe that thoſe in England differ from their Brethren in Scotland about Perſecution, nor that their own Sufferings of late have made 'em more tender to the Conſciences of others. This naturally leads men to think that they have not repented of their Rigor in the Civil Wars; and that ſhould the Diſſenters once more get the Secular Sword into their hands, they would preſs Uniformity of Sentiments in Religion as far as any other Proteſtants or Papiſts ever yet have don: witneſs their inhuman

Treatment of Daniel Williams (a ſober man and a judicious Divine) for no cauſe that I can diſcern, but that he made Chriſtianity plainer than ſom of his Collegues in the Miniſtry, and that, it may be, he takes a greater latitude than ſuch as thro their ignorance cannot, or will not from deſign. But what renders them moſt ſuſpected of affecting Dominion, is the Project of Comprehenſion now on foot, wherof ſom men of figure among 'em ſeem to be ſo fond, wherby the reſt are eaſily deceiv'd, and like to be left in the lurch by certain Perſons who for ſeveral years paſt made the Hierarchy and Liturgy ſuch ſtrange Bugbears: tho, if the Church will pleaſe to becom a kind Mother to themſelves, and ſhew a little complaiſance for their old Friends, they are ready to pronounce her Orders, her Prayers, and her Ceremonies to be very innocent and harmleſs things; but miſtaken formerly for the Pillars of Antichriſt, the Symbols of Idolatry, the Dregs of Popery, the Rags of Superſtition, and Proteſtant Paint to hide the Deformities of the old Babyloniſh Whore. And after all, whatever ours may be, Comprehenſion in all other places of the World has never bin any thing elſe but the Combination of a few Parties to fortify themſelves, and to oppreſs all others by their united Force, or by an abſolute Excluſion from Preferment, and other Advantages to which by Nature or perſonal Merit they had an equal claim with the reſt of their Fellow-Citizens. Tho to be perſecuted in their turn is the juſt Judgment of God upon Perſecutors, yet Vengeance muſt be left to Heaven: and the Wiſhes of all good Men are that the National Church, being ſecur'd in her Worſhip and Emoluments, may not be allow'd to force others to her Communion; and that all Diſſenters from it, being ſecur'd in their Liberty of Conſcience, may not be permitted to meddle with the Riches or Power of the National Church.

After theſe things our Author thinking to have leiſure enough for ſuch an undertaking, apply'd himſelf intirely to the Hiſtory of the Engliſh Nation, which he intended from the remoteſt traditional beginning to continue down to his own time, and had already finiſh'd four Books of the ſame, when neither courting nor expecting any ſuch Preferment, he was taken into the Service of the New Commonwealth. Hitherto he gratuitouſly lent his Country the aid of his Pen, content with the eſteem of good Men, and the internal Satisfaction of having perform'd his Duty; while others, that deſerv'd it not ſo well, were variouſly rewarded, ſom with Riches, ſom with Honors, and all with Liberty. But the Publication of the Tenure of Kings and Magiſtrats reviving the fame of his other Books, and as well ſhewing the Excellency of his Stile and Capacity, as his Affection to the good old Cauſe, he was made Secretary to the Council of State for all foren Affairs: for the Republic ſcorn'd to acknowlege that ſort of Tribute to any Prince in the World, which is now paid to the French King, of managing their Matters only in his Language; and took up a noble Reſolution, to which they firmly adher'd, that they would neither write to others, nor receive their Anſwers, except in the Latin Tongue, as being common to them all, and the propereſt in it ſelf to contain great things, or the Subject of future Pens. But this Proceding could not be acceptable to thoſe whoſe Tranſactions were aſham'd or afraid to ſee the light, and whoſe Names will not be tranſmitted to Poſterity, unleſs for dextrouſly cheating their own People, and laying the Springs of their Tyranny or Neglect in the dark, tho the Effects are ſufficiently felt by their deluded Subjects, and the Injuſtice viſibly expos'd to all diſcerning eys. None could be found more fitted for ſuch a Poſt than Milton, who quickly gain'd no leſs Reputation to himſelf than Credit to the State that imploy'd ſo able a Perſon. Of this the Letters he wrote under that and the ſucceding Adminiſtrations (for he ſerv'd Oliver, Richard, and the Rump) are abundant evidence, being for different Reaſons admir'd by Critics and Stateſmen, as they are certain and authentic Materials for ſuch as may hereafter write the Hiſtory of thoſe times.

But it was not only in foren Diſpatches that the Government made uſe of his Pen; for juſt after the King's Death appear'd a Book under his Name, intitul'd, Eikon Baſilike, wherin he vindicats himſelf in ſo many diſtinct Chapters from the chief Heads of thoſe Tyrannies charg'd upon him by the People, either as occaſions of the Civil War, or as Inhumanities committed during the ſame. This piece, like Ceſar's laſt Will, doing more execution upon the Enemy than its Author when alive, Milton was commanded to prevent by an Anſwer thoſe ill effects the Eikon Baſilike might produce. Having undertaken this task, he obſerves that Kings indeed have gain'd glorious Titles from their Flatterers or Favorers for writing againſt privat men, as our Henry the Eighth was ſtil'd Defender of the Faith for ingaging Luther; yet that no man can expect much Honor by writing againſt a

King, as not uſually meeting with that force of Argument in ſuch courtly Antagoniſts, which to confute might add to his fame. “ Kings, ſays he, tho ſtrong in “ Legions, are moſt commonly but weak at Arguments. As they who ever “ have accuſtom'd from the Cradle to uſe their Will only as their right hand, their “ Reaſon always as their left: whence unexpectedly conſtrain'd to that kind of “ Combat, they prove but weak and puny Adverſaries. Nevertheleſs, continues “ he, for their ſakes, who thro Cuſtom, Simplicity, or want of better teaching,
“ have not more ſeriouſly conſider'd Kings than in the gaudy name of Majeſty, “ and admire them and their doings, as if they breath'd not the ſame Breath with “ other mortal men, I ſhall make no ſcruple to take up this Gauntlet, tho a Kings, “ in the behalf of Liberty and the Commonwealth. Having thus accepted the Challenge, he fairly meaſures Weapons, and anſwers all the Allegations of that Book beyond the poſſibility of a Reply. But every Chapter of it ending with Devotion, model'd into the form of a privat Pſalter, he once for all gives his judgment of it in theſe words. “ They, who ſo much admire the Archbiſhops “ late Breviary, and many other as good Manuals and Handmaids of Devotion,
“ the Lipwork of every prelatical Liturgiſt, clapt this together, and quilted it out “ of Scripture Phraſe, with as much eaſe, and as little need of Chriſtian Diligence “ or Judgment, as belongs to the compiling of any ordinary and ſalable piece of “ Engliſh Divinity that the Shops value. But he who from ſuch a kind of Pſalmiſtry, “ or any other verbal Devotion, without the pledg and earneſt of ſutable “ Deeds, can be perſuaded of a Zeal and true Righteouſneſs in the Perſon, has “ much yet to learn; and knows not that the deepeſt Policy of a Tyrant has bin “ ever to counterfeit Religion: and Ariſtotle in his Politics has mention'd that ſpecial “ Craft among twelve other tyrannical Sophiſms. Neither want we Examples.
“ Andronicus Comnenus the Byzantin Emperor, tho a moſt cruel Tyrant, is “ reported by Nicetas to have bin a conſtant Reader of St. Paul's Epiſtles; and by “ continual Study had ſo incorporated the Phraſe and Stile of that Apoſtle into all “ his familiar Letters, that the Imitation ſeem'd to vy with the Original. Then having inſtanced our Richard the Third, to whom he might have added Tarquin who built the ſtately Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and the Ruſſian Baſilowitz that pray'd ſeven times a day, he diſcovers a piece of Royal Plagiariſm, or (to be more charitable) of his Chaplains Prieſtcraft; for one of King Charles's Prayers, ſtil'd a Prayer in the time of Captivity, deliver'd by himſelf to Dr. Juxon, and twice printed among his Works in Folio, is plainly ſtolen and taken without any conſiderable Variation from the mouth of Pamela, an imaginary Lady, to a Heathen Deity in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia. This has bin mention'd by others after Milton, and thoſe Prayers laid parallel together on divers occaſions. One of Milton's Sagacity could not but perceive by the Compoſition, Stile, and timing of this Book, that it was rather the production of ſom idle Clergyman, than the Work of a diſtreſt Prince, either in perpetual hurry at the head of a flying Army, or remov'd from one Priſon to another during his unfortunat Captivity till his Death.
Beſides the Theological Phraſes frequently interſpers'd, there are ſuch fanciful Alluſions and bold Comments in it upon the ſecret Judgments of God, as ſmell rankly of a Syſtem or the Pulpit. When he mentions the fate of the Hothams, by whom he was repuls'd at Hull, he ſays of the Father, That his Head was divided from his Body, becauſe his Heart was divided from the King; and that two Heads were cut off in one Family for affronting the Head of the Commonwealth; the eldeſt Son being infected with the Sin of the Father, againſt the Father of his Country. Theſe and ſuch Arguments drawn only from the Book it ſelf, without any further light, induc'd a great many at that time to ſuſpect the Impoſture; and that becauſe Cromwel got ſuch a Reputation among the People for his ſuppos'd Piety, the Royaliſts would repreſent the King to be a wiſer Man and better Chriſtian. But in the year 1686, Mr. Millington happening to ſell the late Lord Angleſey's Library by Auction, put up an Eikon Baſilike; and a few bidding very low for it, he had leiſure to turn over the Leaves, when to his great Surprize he perceiv'd written with the ſame noble Lords own hand the following Memorandum.

King Charles the Second, and the Duke of York, did both (in the laſt Seſſions of Parlament, 1675. when I ſhew'd them in the Lords Houſe the written Copy of this Book, wherin are ſom Corrections and Alterations written with the late King Charles the Firſt's own hand) aſſure me, that this was none of the ſaid King's compiling, but made by Dr. Gauden Biſhop of Exeter: which I here inſert for the undeceiving of others in this point, by atteſting ſo much under my own hand.

Angleſey.

This occaſion'd the World to talk; and ſeveral knowing the Relation which the late Dr. Anthony Walker an Eſſex-Divine had to Biſhop Gauden, they inquir'd of him what he knew concerning this Subject, which he then verbally communicated to them: but being afterwards highly provok'd by Dr. Hollingworth's harſh and injurious Reflections, he was oblig'd in his own defence to print an account of that Book, wherin are ſufficient Anſwers to all the Scruples or Objections that can be made, and wherof I here inſert an exact Epitome. He tells us in the firſt place that Dr Gauden was pleas'd to acquaint him with the whole deſign, and ſhew'd him the Heads of divers Chapters, with ſom others that were quite finiſh'd: and that Dr. Gauden asking his opinion of the thing, and he declaring his Diſſatisfaction that the World ſhould be ſo impos'd upon, Gauden bid him look on the Title, which was the King's Portraiture; for that no man is ſuppos'd to draw his own Picture. A very nice Evaſion! He further acquaints us, that ſom time after this, being both in London, and having din'd together, Dr. Gauden took him along with him to Dr. Duppa the Biſhop of Salisbury (whom he made alſo privy to his deſign) to fetch what Papers he had left before for his Peruſal, or to ſhew him what he had ſince written: and that upon their return from that place, after Gauden and Duppa were a while in privat together, the former told him the Biſhop of Salisbury wiſh'd he had thought upon two other Heads, the Ordinance againſt the Common-Prayer-Book, and the denying his Majeſty the attendance of his Chaplains; but that Duppa deſir'd him to finiſh the reſt, and he would take upon him to write two Chapters on thoſe Subjects, which accordingly he did. The reaſon, it ſeems, why Dr. Gauden himſelf would not perform this, was, firſt, that during the Troubles he had forborn the uſe of the Liturgy, which he did not extraordinarily admire; and, Secondly, that he had never bin the King's Chaplain, wheras Dr. Duppa was both his Chaplain, his Tutor, and a Biſhop, which made him more concern'd about theſe Particulars. Thirdly, Dr. Walker informs us that Dr. Gauden told him he had ſent a Copy of Eikon Baſilike by the Marquiſs of Hartford to the King in the Ile of Wight; where it was, we may be ſure, that he made thoſe Corrections and Alterations with his own Pen, mention'd in my Lord Angleſey's Memorandum: and which gave occaſion to ſom then about him that had accidentally ſeen, or to whom he had ſhown the Book, to believe the whole was his own. Fourthly, Dr. Gauden, after the Reſtoration, told Dr. Walker, that the Duke of York knew of his being the real Author, and had own'd it to be a great ſervice; in conſideration of which, it may be, the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, tho he was afterwards put off with that of Worceſter, was promis'd him. And, notwithſtanding it was then a Secret, we now know that in expectation of this Tranſlation, the great Houſe on Clapham-Common was built indeed in the name of his Brother Sir Denis, but really to be a Manſionhouſe for the Biſhops of Wincheſter. Fifthly, Dr. Walker ſays, that Mr. Gauden the Doctor's Son, his Wife, himſelf, and Mr. Gifford who tranſcrib'd it, did believe it as firmly as any fact don in the place where they were; and that in that Family they always ſpoke of it among themſelves (whether in Dr. Gauden's Preſence or Abſence) as undoubtedly written by him, which he never contradicted. We learn, Sixthly, that Dr. Gauden, after part of it was printed, gave to Dr. Walker with his own hand what was laſt ſent to London; and after ſhewing him what it was, ſeal'd it, giving him cautionary Directions how to deliver it, which he did on Saturday the 23d of December, 1648. for Mr. Royſton the Printer, to Mr. Peacock Brother to Dr. Gauden's Steward, who, after the Impreſſion was finiſh'd, gave him, for his trouble, ſix Books, wherof he always kept one by him. To theſe Particulars Dr. Walker adds that the Reaſon why the Covenant is more favorably mention'd in Eikon Baſilike, than the King or any other of his Party would do, was becauſe Dr. Gauden himſelf had taken it: That in the devotional part of this Book there occur ſeveral Expreſſions which were habitual to Dr. Gauden in his Prayers, which always in privat and public were conceiv'd or extemporary: and that to his knowlege it was Dr. Gauden, being beſt acquainted with the Beauty of his own Sayings, who made that Collection of Sentences out of Eikon Baſilike, entitul'd, Apophthegmata Caroliniana. Theſe and ſom Obſervations about the ſame individual Perſons variation of Stile on different Subjects, with the facility and frequency of perſonating others, may be further conſider'd in Dr. Walker's original account. In this condition ſtood the Reputation of this Book, till the laſt and finiſhing diſcovery of the Impoſture was made after this manner. Mr. Arthur North, a Merchant now living on Towerhill, London, a man of good Credit, and a Member of the Church of England, marry'd the Siſter of her that was Wife to the Doctor's Son Charles Gauden, who dying left ſom Papers with his Widow, among which Mr. North, being concern'd about his Siſter in Law's Affairs, found a whole bundle relating to Eikon Baſilike: Theſe Papers old Mrs. Gauden left to her darling Son John, and he to his Brother Charles. There is firſt a Letter from Secretary Nicholas to Dr. Gauden. 2. The Copy of a Letter from Biſhop Gauden to Chancellor Hyde, where, among his other Deſerts, he pleads that what was don like a King, ſhould have a Kinglike Retribution, and that his deſign in it was to comfort and incourage the King's Friends, to expoſe his Enemies, and to convert, &c. There is, 3. The Copy of a Letter from the Biſhop to the Duke of York, wherin he ſtrongly urges his Services. 4. A Letter under Chancellor Hyde's own hand, dated the 13*th* of March, 1661. wherin he expreſſes his uneaſineſs under the Biſhop's importunity, and excuſes his inability yet to ſerve him: but towards the Concluſion it contains theſe remarkable words; The Particular you mention has indeed bin imparted to me as a Secret; I am ſorry I ever knew it: and when it ceaſes to be a Secret, it will pleaſe none but Mr. Milton. There are other Papers in this bundle, but particularly a long Narrative of Mrs. Gauden's own Writing, irrefragably ſhewing her Husband to be Author of Eikon Baſilike. It entirely confirms Dr. Walker's account, and contains moſt of the facts we have hitherto related, with many other curious Circumſtances too long to be here inſerted, yet too extraordinary not to be known; wherfore I refer the Reader to the original Papers, or to the faithful extract made out of it before ſeveral learned and worthy Perſons, and which is printed in a Paper intitul'd, Truth brought to light. Thus came all the World to be convinc'd of this notorious Impoſture; but which as it was dexterouſly contriv'd, and moſt cunningly improv'd by a Party whoſe Intereſt oblig'd 'em to keep the Secret, ſo it happen'd to be diſcover'd by very nice and unforeſeen Accidents. Had not Gauden bin diſappointed of Wincheſter, he had never pleaded his Merit in this affair; nor would his Wife have written her Narrative, had King Charles the Second beſtow'd one half years Rent upon her after her Husband's deceaſe, which upon her Petition, and conſidering her numerous Family, none could imagin ſhould be refuſ'd. It was a ſlighter accident that begot a Confeſſion from two Kings, and Charles's own Sons: and I doubt if any other than one of Mr. Millington's great Curioſity, and no Bigotry, had the diſpoſal of my Lord Angleſey's Books, we ſhould never have heard of the Memorandum. Had not Hollingworth's indiſcrete Zeal provok'd the only Man then alive who had any perſonal knowlege of this buſineſs, Dr. Walker had never publiſh'd his Account; nor could the whole diſcovery be ſo complete, without the leaſt intricacy or queſtion, without Mr. North's Papers. When I ſeriouſly conſider how all this happen'd among our ſelves within the compaſs of forty years, in a time of great Learning and Politeneſs, when both Parties ſo narrowly watch'd over one another's Actions, and what a great Revolution in Civil and Religious Affairs was partly occaſion'd by the Credit of that Book, I ceaſe to wonder any longer how ſo many ſuppoſititious pieces under the name of Chriſt, his Apoſtles, and other great Perſons, ſhould be publiſh'd and approv'd in thoſe primitive times, when it was of ſo much importance to have 'em believ'd; when the Cheats were too many on all ſides for them to reproach one another, which yet they often did; when Commerce was not near ſo general, and the whole Earth intirely overſpread with the darkneſs of Superſtition. I doubt rather the Spuriouſneſs of ſeveral more ſuch Books is yet undiſcover'd, thro the remoteneſs of thoſe Ages, the death of the Perſons concern'd, and the decay of other Monuments which might give us true Information; eſpecially when we conſider how dangerous it was always for the weaker ſide to lay open the tricks of their Adverſaries, tho never ſo groſs: and that the prevailing Party did ſtrictly order all thoſe Books which offended them to be burnt, or otherwiſe ſuppreſt, which was accordingly perform'd, as well in obedience to the Laws by ſom, as out of conſcientious Obligations by others, which made the execution more effectual than uſually happens in caſes of an ordinary Nature. Of this we are furniſh'd with numberleſs Examples by Church-Hiſtorians, who have preſerv'd intire ſeveral of the Laws and Orders enacted to this purpoſe. From theſe general Remarks I muſt obſerve in particular, that it's likely when Charles the Second knew the forgery of this Book, he was fully confirm'd in the Popiſh Religion, which in his Childhood he learnt of his Mother, and in his Exile by his Foren Converſation. The Author of Eikon Baſilike deſires him to adhere to the Church of England, as neceſſary both for his Soul's peace, and that of the Kingdom. This and the like Exhortations of Reſpect for the Liturgy and Clergy, might ſhew, at leaſt, the Judgment of his dying Father; but from Dr. Gauden it was mere Intereſt and Impoſture. Charles therfore, who knew Morley, Duppa, and others, to approve of this Fraud to which they were privy, and for whoſe Advantage the belief of it was ſerviceable, muſt either ſuſpect the Forgeries laid by Proteſtants to the charge of Popery, when he actually knew the Proteſtants to play the ſame Game: or not being able to deny the Popiſh Cheats, 'tis moſt probable the Opinion which his intimat Friends had of him was too true, that he was really of neither Church, but believed the Pretences of both to be Credulity or Craft; and that the tranſactions of his laſt Minutes were only the effects of a weak Mind in a diſtemper'd Body.

Milton wrote alſo in the year 48. Obſervations upon the Repreſentation of the Preſbytery of Belfaſt in Ireland, concerning the King's Death, the breaking of the Covenant, and the Toleration of different Perſuaſions, to which theſe Prieſtlings, as he calls them, were mortal Enemies; while they call'd their own Presbyterian Government the Hedg and Bulwark of Religion, which is exactly the language of the Popiſh Inquiſition. In the ſame Obſervations he examins the Duke of Ormond's Letter to Colonel Jones Governor of Dublin, perſuading him to revolt from the Parlament. Milton is very angry that Ormond made a contemtuous mention of General Cromwel, “ who, according to him, had don in a few years more eminent and remarkable Deeds wheron to found Nobility in his Houſe tho it were wanting, and perpetual Renown to Poſterity, than Ormond and all his Anceſtors put together could ſhew from any Record of their Iriſh Exploits, the wideſt Scene of their Glory. But his chiefeſt Remarks are upon the Articles of Peace which Ormond concluded in the King's Name, and by his Authority, with the Popiſh Iriſh Rebels, wherin they are pardon'd for the Maſſacre and Depredation of the Engliſh Proteſtants; acknowleg'd to be dutiful and loyal Subjects; are diſcharg'd from taking the Oath of Supremacy, principally fram'd on the account of Papiſts; and, in a word, ſuch Freedoms and Privileges were granted to thoſe inhuman Butchers, as were never injoy'd by their Engliſh Conquerors. The Second Article empowers the Iriſh Parlament to repeal or ſuſpend (as they think fit) Poyning's Act, the only ſecurity of their dependence on England. They are intruſted by him with the Militia; and ſo indulgent was he to theſe his choice Favorits, as ridiculouſly to promiſe them the repealing of thoſe Acts which prohibited their plowing with Horſes by the Tail, or burning of Oats in the Straw, marks of their ſottiſh and indocil Barbarity.

And now we com to his Maſter-piece, his chief and favorit Work in Proſe, for Argument the nobleſt, as being the Defence of a whole free Nation, the People of England; for ſtile and diſpoſition the moſt eloquent and elaborat, equalling the old Romans in the purity of their own Language, and their higheſt Notions of Liberty; as univerſally ſpread over the learned World as any of their Compoſitions; and certain to endure while Oratory, Politics, or Hiſtory, bear any eſteem among Men. It cannot be deny'd, ſays that excellent Critic Monſieur Baile, that Milton*'s Latin ſtile is eaſy, briſk, and elegant; nor that he defended the Republican Cauſe with a world of Addreſs and Wit*: Agreable to which Judgment is the unanimous Suffrage of Foreners, not excepting the moſt zealous Aſſertors of Monarchy. It was written upon this occaſion. Charles eldeſt Son to the King of the ſame name living in Exile, and wanting ſom body to paint the Death of his Father in the blackeſt Colors, either to render the Authors of it odious, the better to bring about his own return; or, if that effect did not anſwer, to move the Compaſſion of Foren Potentats to procure his Reſtoration, was told of Salmaſius a Profeſſor of the Univerſity of Leyden in Holland, as the fitteſt perſon for his purpoſe. This Man had got ſuch a mighty Name from his Plinian Exercitations, and his critical Notes on ſeveral Latin and Greec Authors, that none was thought ſo knowing to equal, or ſo hardy to incounter him. This Man therfore Charles the Second hir'd for a hundred Jacobuſes to write that bulky Volume, which in the year 49 appear'd under the Title of Defenſio Regia, or a Defence of Charles the Firſt to Charles the Second. Salmaſius being better verſt in the Writings of Grammarians, and Lexicographers (which ſort of Men were his chief Admirers) than in thoſe of Legiſlators and Politicians, gave a true Demonſtration that mere Scholars, when they meddle with any thing that requires Reaſoning or Thought, are but mere Aſſes: For being wholly occupy'd about frivolous Etymologies, or the bare ſound of words, and living moſt of their time excluded from Converſation, bury'd in duſt among Worms and mouldy Records, they have no exact knowlege of things, and are perfect ſtrangers to all the uſeful buſineſs of the World. Accordingly the Royal Defence was deſtitute of Eloquence or Art, being nothing elſe but a huge heap of Rubbiſh, conſiſting of injudicious Quotations, very diſorderly piec'd together, ſeldom making for his purpoſe; and, when they ſeem'd to favor him, quite ſpoil'd again by his own impertinent Comments. But what's worſe than all the reſt, he appear'd on this occaſion ſuch an abſolute ſtranger and bungler in his own Province, as to open a large Field for Milton to divert himſelf with his barbarous Phraſes and Soleciſms. Nor had he more Wit likewiſe than to publiſh his Defence of Monarchy in Holland, at the ſame time that he had a Penſion from that Free State, and was actually entertain'd in their Service; for tho the Dutch were then no good Friends to the Engliſh, being jealous of their growing Power, yet they could not be pleas'd with any Writing oppos'd to the common Cauſe of Liberty, and accordingly they blam'd Salmaſius, and order'd the Defence to be ſuppreſt. No ſooner did this Book appear in England, but Milton being then preſent, was unanimouſly nam'd by every Member of the Council of State to anſwer it; ſo good an opinion they had of his Capacity, neither did he fail their Expectations: for within a very ſhort time he publiſh'd his Defenſio pro Populo Anglicano, or the Defence of the People of England; wherin, to ſpeak no more of his admirable Stile than we have don already, nor of his handſomly expoſing the Ignorance or Fury of Salmaſius, he defended the Procedings of the People of England from the beginning of the Civil War to that time, with ſuch Force of Arguments and Authority of Examples, that ſince there could be no diſpute about the Victory he obtain'd over his Adverſary, the only doubt remaining with his Readers was, which ſhould be counted ſuperior, his own great Reading, Politeneſs, or Judgment. The Subject is too nice for me to make any extract of it according to the method I obſerv'd in ſom of his other Books; and beſides it deſerves ſo much to be conſider'd at length in the Original, or in the Engliſh Verſion by Mr. Waſhington of the Temple, that I will not deprive any body of that pleaſure. It's true indeed, that ſom have blam'd Milton for his rough uſage of Salmaſius, nor herein will I pretend wholly to excuſe him: But when I conſider how baſely the whole Engliſh Nation was abus'd by Salmaſius, as ſo many Barbarians or Enthuſiaſts, fiercer than their own Maſtifs and yet ſillier than Athenian Owls, it gos a great way with me towards Milton's Juſtification; and if we add to this, that he ſpeaks not in his own Perſon, but as the Mouth of a potent State traduc'd by a pitiful Profeſſor, there be thoſe in the World that will poſitively commend him. Two paſſages only I ſhall inſert here out of his Book; wherof the firſt ſhall be an Epigram he made to ridicule his Adverſary for medling with Affairs to which he was a ſtranger, having all his intelligence from inrag'd and partial Exiles; but particularly for his miſtaking of Engliſh Names, and his mentioning of the County Court, and Hundred.

Quis expedivit Salmaſio ſuam Hundredam?
Picamque docuit verba noſtra conari?
Magiſter artis venter, & Jacobæi
Centum, exulantis viſcera Marſupii regis.
Quod ſi doloſi ſpes refulſerit nummi,
Ipſe, Antichriſti modo qui primatum Papæ
Minatus uno eſt diſſipare ſufflatu,
Cantabit ultro Cardinalitium Melos.

Engliſh'd.

Who taught Salmaſius, that French chattring Py,
To aim at Engliſh, and Hundreda cry?
The ſtarving Raſcal, fluſht with juſt a hundred Engliſh Jacobuſſes, Hundreda blunder'd;

An outlaw'd King's laſt Stock. A hundred more
Would make him pimp for th'Antichriſtian Whore;
And in Rome's praiſe imploy his poiſon'd Breath,
Who threaten'd once to ſtink the Pope to death.

In theſe Verſes he reflects on Salmaſius for declaring himſelf againſt any ſort of Hierarchy in his Book de Primatu Papæ, and yet being a mighty ſtickler for Biſhops in his Defence of the King. The other Paſſage ſhall be the Epilogue or Concluſion of Milton's Book. “And now I think, ſays he, that by God's Aſſiſtance I have finiſh'd the Work I undertook, namely, to defend the noble Actions of my Countrymen at home and abroad, againſt the raging and envious madneſs of this diſtracted Sophiſter; and to aſſert the common Rights of the People againſt the unjuſt domination of Kings, not out of any hatred to Kings, but Tyrants: nor have I purpoſely left unanſwer'd any one Argument alleg'd by my Adverſary, nor any Example or Authority quoted by him, that ſeem'd to have any force in it, or the leaſt color of a proof; perhaps I have bin guilty rather of the other extreme, of replying to ſom of his Fooleries and Trifles as if they were ſolid Arguments, and therby may ſeem to have attributed more to them than they deſerv'd. One thing yet remains to be don, which perhaps is of the greateſt concern of all, and that is, that you my Countrymen confute this Adverſary of yours your ſelves; which I do not ſee any other means of your effecting than by a conſtant indeavor to outdo all Mens bad words by your own good Deeds. When you labor'd under more ſorts of Oppreſſion than one, you betook your ſelves to God for Refuge, and he was graciouſly pleas'd to hear your moſt earneſt Prayers and Deſires. He gloriouſly deliver'd you, the firſt of Nations, from the two greateſt Miſchiefs of this Life, and the moſt pernicious to Virtue, Tyranny and Superſtition; he indu'd you with that Greatneſs of Soul to be the firſt of Mankind, who, after having conquer'd and captivated their own King, have not ſcrupl'd to condemn him judicially, and, according to that juſt Sentence, to put him to death. After performing ſo illuſtrious an Action as this, you ought to do nothing that's mean and little, not even to think, much leſs to do any thing but what is great and ſublime. To attain which Praiſe there is only this one way, that as you have ſubdu'd your Enemies in the field, ſo to make it appear that unarm'd and in full Peace you of all Mankind are ableſt to conquer Ambition, Avarice, the love of Riches, and can beſt avoid thoſe Corruptions of Proſperity which are apt to get the better of other Nations; to ſhew as great Juſtice, Temperance, and Moderation, in preſerving your Liberty, as you have don Courage in freeing your ſelves from Slavery. Theſe are the only Arguments and Authorities by which you will be able to evince that you are not ſuch perſons as this Fellow repreſents you, Traitors, Robbers, Murderers, Parricides, Madmen; that you did not put your King to death out of any ambitious deſign or a deſire of invading the Rights of others, not out of any ſeditious Principles or ſiniſter Ends, not agitated by Fury or Madneſs; but that it was wholly out of love to your Liberty, Religion, Juſtice, Virtue, and inflam'd with an Affection for your Country, that you puniſh'd a Tyrant. But if it ſhould happen otherwiſe (which I pray God mercifully to forbid) if as you have bin valiant in War, you ſhould grow debauch'd in Peace, you that have had ſuch viſible Demonſtrations of the Goodneſs of God to your ſelves, and his Wrath againſt your Enemies, and that you ſhould not learn by ſo eminent and memorable an Example before your eys, to fear God and work Righteouſneſs, for my part, I ſhall eaſily grant and confeſs (for I cannot deny it) all the ill that Liers and Slanderers now think or ſpeak of you to be true. And you will find in a little time that God's Diſpleaſure againſt you will be greater than it has bin againſt your Adverſaries, greater than his benign Favor and paternal Care which you have experienc'd above all the Nations under Heaven. Milton was rewarded with a thouſand Pounds for this performance; and how differently his Defence of the People, and that of Salmaſius for the King were entertain'd by the curious, we may learn from the mouth of him that next appear'd for the Royal Cauſe. “What the moſt accompliſh'd Salmaſius, ſays he, has diſcretely written in defence of the Right and Honor of Charles the Britiſh Monarch, murder'd by wicked Men, has born but one Impreſſion, and ſaw the Light with great difficulty; with ſo much hatred dos the World perſecute Truth in theſe latter times: but of what the moſt execrable Milton has ſpitefully elaborated to ruin the Reputation of the deceas'd King, and to deſtroy the hereditary Suc-

“ ceſſion of the Crown, there are ſo many Editions, that I am uncertain to “ which of them I ſhould refer my Reader; ſo paſſionatly fond are Men grown “ now of Lies and Calumnies! On this Book our Author did not think it worth his while to animadvert, but delegated that eaſy taſk to his younger Nephew John Philips, now alive, who ſoon wrote a ſufficient Anſwer to Biſhop Bramhal: for ſo this new Antagoniſt was ſuppos'd to be cal'd.

Salmaſius made a huge figure at this time in the Swediſh Court, whither Queen Chriſtina invited all the Men of Letters in Europe, ſo that her whole Train was compos'd in a manner of Grammarians, Rhetoricians, Philoſophers, Aſtrologers, and Critics: nor was her Adminiſtration unanſwerable to her Attendents; for beſides a total neglect of good Laws for the public Benefit, and her imprudent preferring of Strangers before the Natives of the Country, ſhe led a mere romantic Life, ſomtimes frolicſomly diſguiſing her ſelf in Mens Clothes, and then gravely diſputing with her Doctors, till at laſt ſhe was forc'd to a ſhameful Abdication of the Government; and the end of all her Learning was to turn Papiſt for a Penſion from the Pope, or to have an old meager Frier to pardon her Sins, and a brawny Cardinal for her Stallion. Now no ſooner had the Defence of the Engliſh Nation reach'd Sweden, and was read to the Queen at her own deſire, but Salmaſius, who till then had bin as it were her prime Miniſter, and who, when he firſt ſaw the Book, fooliſhly ſwore he would deſtroy Milton and the whole Parlament, decreas'd ſo much in her eſteem, and dwindled to ſuch a degree in the opinion of all others, that he thought it not for his Intereſt to continue longer there, and was diſmiſt with extraordinary Coldneſs and Contemt. And not expecting to be better receiv'd in Holland, or any where elſe, he left an imperfect poſthumous Reply, and had recourſe to Death, the laſt refuge of the Miſerable, and the ſafeſt ſhelter to cover them from Infamy and Diſgrace. Milton, on the other hand, was, on the firſt appearance of his Book, viſited or invited by all the Ambaſſadors at London, not excepting thoſe of Crown'd Heads, and particularly eſteem'd by Adrian Paw the Ambaſſador of the flouriſhing Republic of Holland. His Book indeed was burnt at Paris, not by order of the Parlament, but, at the inſtigation of the Prieſts, by the Lieutenant Civil, and likewiſe at Tholouſe, which ſerv'd only to procure it more Readers: for he was highly extol'd at the ſame time, or complemented by Letters from the moſt ingenious Perſons in Germany or France; and, as if the old Grecian Republics had reviv'd to decree the accuſtom'd Honors to the Aſſertors of Liberty, Leonardus Philaras, an Athenian born, and Ambaſſador from the Duke of Parma to the French King, wrote a fine Commendation of his Defence, and ſent him his Picture, together with a perſonal Elogium. From theſe undeniable Matters of Fact (without deciding the merit of the cauſe on either ſide) it is plain that in the judgment of all Europe, Milton got infinitly the better of Salmaſius; for it could not be Partiality to a Free Government, but the reſiſtleſs Light of Truth, that obtain'd ſuch a Confeſſion from the Miniſters or Subjects of abſolute Princes.

Now he had ſom leiſure again to follow his other Studies of a more delightful and peaceable nature than theſe Controverſies, and had alſo a Son born to him, who dy'd in his Infancy. In the year 52, he remov'd for his Health from his Lodgings at Whitehal to a Houſe opening into St. James's Park, which ſhall be the Scene of all his Actions till the Reſtoration of the Royal Family. In this place his firſt Wife dying in Childbed, he, after a convenient ſpace, marry'd a ſecond, Catharine the Daughter of Captain Woodcock of Hackney, who within a year dy'd alſo in the ſame condition, and was about a month after follow'd by her Child, which was a Girl. His Sight was quite gon before this Match; for by reaſon of his continual Studies, and the Headach, to which he was ſubject from his Youth, his Eys were decaying for a dozen years before: but we ſhall have an occaſion by and by to give a further account of this matter.

The ſame year appear'd a bitter Invective from abroad againſt the Parlamentarians. The Title of it was, * The Cry of the King's Blood for Vengeance to Heaven againſt the Engliſh Parricides. In this Book Milton is particularly traduc'd, and accus'd to have bin expel'd out of the Univerſity of Cambridg for ſom Miſdemeanors, wherupon he retir'd into Italy: but the falſity of this Story is already prov'd. Several other frivolous things are laid to his charge, which he on the other hand denies; nor do his Adverſaries inſiſt upon them in their Anſwers: now there cannot be a clearer proof of his Innocence, than that being accus'd he publicly denies the fact, and his Enemies can't contradict him. But Envy and Malice often carry ſuch as have got the worſe to affirm moſt abſurd and ridiculous things: So Salmaſius in his dying Reply fooliſhly reports that Milton wrote not the Defence himſelf, but lent his Name to the Hand of a little French Schoolmaſter at London. But, as it always happens in ſuch caſes, he got nothing by this ſilly figment, but gave Milton an opportunity of making his own Ability, and the Weakneſs of Salmaſius, further known to the World. Thus ſom People think to gratify an offended Perſon with telling him a hundred ilnatur'd Stories of his Antagoniſt, to which his Paſſion makes him give credit without due Examination,and then becoms a Fool by aſſerting them. The true Author of the Clamor Regii Sanguinis was Peter du Moulin the younger, a Prebendary of Canterbury; but Alexander Morus a French Miniſter being the Publiſher of it, and having prefix'd a Dedication in the Printer's Name to Charles II. he was generally thought to be the Writer of the whole. This Morus was the Son of a learned Scot, who was Principal of the Proteſtant College formerly at Caſtres in Languedoc. His inſufferable Haughtineſs, immoderat Inclination for Women, and Contemt of his Collegues, made him odious and uneaſy wherever he liv'd. He was haſty, ambitious, ſatyrical, and could never commend any thing but his own Works, or thoſe of his Admirers. He was cry'd up for a Seraphic Preacher; but, as Baile judiciouſly ſays, his Talent muſt have conſiſted in the Gracefulneſs of his Pronunciation and Geſture, or in thoſe Flouriſhes and Puns wherof his Sermons are full: for 'tis certain that they retain not thoſe Charms now on Paper which they were ſaid to have formerly in the Pulpit. Againſt him therfore Milton by public Command publiſhes a ſecond Defence for the People of England, which, beſides what the Title promiſes, contains a bloody Satyr upon Morus, nor dos he deny himſelf to have bin the occaſion of Salmaſius's Death. I ſhall not rake into the Aſhes of the Dead, but content my ſelf with inſerting here two pieces of Milton's Wit. The firſt is a Diſtich made upon Morus for getting Pontia the Maid of his Friend Salmaſius with Child.

Galli ex Concubitu gravidam te, Pontia, Mori,
Quis bene moratam, morigeramque neget?

The other ſhall be an Epigram wherin Milton laughs at Morus for threatning him with a ſecond Edition of Salmaſius's Defence of the King, augmented with Animadverſions on his Defence of the People.

Gaudete Scombri, & quicquid eſt piſcium Salo,
Qui frigida Hyeme incolitis algentes freta,
Veſtrûm miſertus ille Salmaſius Eques
Bonus amicire nuditatem cogitat;
Chartæque largus apparat papyrinos
Vobis cucullos præferentes Claudii
Inſignia, nomenque, & Decus Salmaſii: Geſtetis ut per omne cetarium forum
Equitis clientes, ſcriniis mungentium
Cubito virorum, & capſulis gratiſſimos.

The Author of the Clamor Regii Sanguinis having barbarouſly objected to Milton his Blindneſs, and that he was meager and pale, he gives him an Anſwer in theſe words: " I was never counted deform'd, as I know, by any. that ever ſaw me; but whether to be counted handſom or not is none of my concern. My Stature, I confeſs, is not extraordinary tall, yet I am rather a middleſiz'd than little Man. But what if little I were? Have not many Perſons eminent in the Arts of War and Peace bin ſo before me? tho I ſee no reaſon why that ſhould be cal'd little which in Courage is ſufficiently great. Neither am I ſo ſlender; for I was ſtrong and capable enough in my Youth to handle my Weapons, and to exerciſe daily Fencing; ſo that wearing a Sword by my ſide, as became a Gentleman, I thought my ſelf a match for thoſe that were much ſtronger, and was not afraid of receiving an affront from any body. I have ſtill the ſame Soul and Vigor, but not the ſame Eyes; yet to all outward appearance ſo ſound, ſo clear, and free from the leaſt ſpot, as theirs who ſee furtheſt: and herein only, in ſpite of my ſelf, I am a Deceiver. My Countenance, than which he ſays there's nothing paler, is ſtill of a Color ſo contrary to wan and bloodleſs, that tho I am above forty, any body would think me ten years younger, being neither contracted in Body or Skin. If in any of theſe Particulars I told a Ly, I ſhould be deſervedly ridiculous to many thouſands of my own Countrymen, and to ſeveral Strangers that perſonally know me. As for his Blindneſs, he ſays that ſuch a condition is not miſerable, but not to be able to bear it; and then quotes the Examples of valiant, learned, wiſe, and holy Men of all times that have bin blind. But the loſs of his Eys being objected to him as an effect of divine Vengeance, after ſolemnly proteſting that he's not conſcious of any thing for which he ſhould deſerve that puniſhment more than other Men, he adds, “ As for what I wrote at “ any time (ſince the Royaliſts think I now ſuffer on that account, and triumph “ over me) I call God to witneſs that I did not write any thing but what I then “ thought, and am ſtill perſuaded to be right, and true, and acceptable to God; “ not led by any ſort of Ambition, Profit, or Vainglory; but have don all from “ a ſenſe of Duty and Honor, out of piety to my Country, and for the Liberty of “ Church and State. On the contrary, when that Task of anſwering the King's “ Defence was injoin'd me by public Authority, being both in an ill ſtate of “ Health, and the Sight of one Ey almoſt gon already, the Phyſicians openly “ predicting the loſs of both if I undertook this Labor; yet nothing terrify'd by “ their Premonition, I did not long balance whether any Duty ſhould be prefer'd to my Eys. And what he really thought of his Blindneſs, and how he bore it, may be further perceiv'd by this Sonnet to his Friend Cyriac Skinner, never printed with his other Poems.

Cyriac, this three years day, theſe Eys, tho clear
To outward view of blemiſh or of ſpot,
Bereſt of ſight, their ſeeing have forgot.
Nor to their idle Orbs dos Day appear,
Or Sun, or Moon, or Star, throout the year;
Or Man, or Woman. Yet I argue not Againſt Heaven's hand, or will, nor bate one jot
Of Heart or Hope; but ſtill bear up, and ſteer Right onward. What ſupports me, doſt thou ask?
The Conſcience, Friend, t'have loſt them overply'd
In Liberty's Defence, my noble Task, Wherof all Europe rings from ſide to ſide.
This Thought might lead me thro this World's vain Mask, Content, tho blind, had I no other Guide.

Morus publiſht his Fides publica in anſwer to Milton's ſecond Defence, to which the latter oppos'd a * Defence of himſelf; and by Original Letters, or the like Authentic Pieces, made good all his Aſſertions againſt his Adverſary: wherupon Morus vanquiſht and baffled, quitted the Field. Our Author was now Latin Secretary to the Protector Oliver Cromwel, who, he confidently hop'd, would imploy his Truſt and Power to extinguiſh the numerous Factions of the State, and to ſettle ſuch a perfect Form of a Free Government, wherin no ſingle Perſon ſhould injoy any Power above or beſide the Laws: but he particularly expected his eſtabliſhing an impartial Liberty of Conſcience, to which he incourages him by theſe Lines, never printed among his Poems.

* Defenſio pro ſe.

Cromwel, our chief of Men, that thro a croud
Not of War only, but Diſtractions rude, (Guided by Faith and matchleſs Fortitude)
To Peace and Truth thy glorious Way haſt plow'd,
And fought God's Battles, and his Work purſu'd,
While Darwent ſtreams with Blood of Scots imbru'd,
And Dunbar Field reſound thy Praiſes loud,
And Worc'ſters Laureat Wreath. Yet much remains
To conquer ſtill; Peace has her Victories,
No leſs than thoſe of War. New Foes ariſe Threatning to bind our Souls in ſecular Chains:
Help us to ſave free Conſcience from the Paw
Of Hireling Wolves, whoſe Goſpel is their Maw.

He had leiſure enough now from his Imployment in the State (no Adverſary daring to appear any more) to purſue his Hiſtory of Britain, and his new Theſaurus Linguæ Latinæ: but what took up moſt of his time was the Epic Poem he had ſo long deſign'd, and which is ſince printed under the Title of Paradiſe Loſt, wherof in due order. But the next Book he publiſht was a Treatiſe, dedicated to the Parlament, of Civil Power in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, ſhewing that it is not lawful for any Power on Earth to compel in Matters of Religion, whether Speculative or Practical; or in any thing except Immorality, or what evidently ſubverts the Foundations of Civil Society: for which reaſon he juſtly excludes Popery from this Toleration, for being not ſo much a Religion, as a Politic Faction wherof the Members, wherſoever they are, own the Pope for their Superior, to the prejudice of the Allegiance due to their Natural Soverains. Beſides, that they never tolerat others where they have the maſtery; and that their Doctrin of Diſpenſations, or keeping no Faith with ſuch as they count Heretics, renders 'em worſe than Atheiſts, and the declar'd Enemies of all Mankind beſides thoſe of their own Communion.

After this he addreſt to the Parlament, Conſiderations touching the likelieſt means to remove Hirelings out of the Church; not that he was againſt all ſort of Maintenance for the public miniſtry of Religion, which he acknowleges due by the Light of Reaſon, as well as the Examples of all Ages; but he proves that Tithes were inconvenient, and not of Divine Right, which was then ſtrongly aſſerted even by the Presbyterians and Independents. He obſerves, that two things do mainly corrupt Religion, and hinder the advancement of Truth, Force on the one ſide reſtraining the Profeſſors, and Hire on the other ſide corrupting the Teachers of it. “ The latter of theſe, ſays he, is by much the more dangerous: for
“ and flouriſhes; but the corruption of Teachers, moſt commonly the effect of “ Hire, is the very bane of Truth in them who are ſo corrupted. There is much curious Hiſtory in this Book concerning Church Revenues, to which I refer thoſe who have not read Father Paul of Beneficiary Matters, nor Father Simon who wrote after him. Speaking of the Miniſters, “ They pretend, ſays he, that their “ Education, either at School or the Univerſity, has bin very chargeable, and “ therfore ought to be repair'd afterwards by a fruitful Maintenance: wheras it is “ well known that the better half of them (and ofttimes poor and pitiful Boys,
“ of no merit or promiſing hopes that might intitle them to the public Proviſion, “ but their poverty and the unjuſt favor of Friends) have had the moſt of their “ breeding, both at School and Univerſity, by Scholarſhips, Exhibitions, and Fellowſhips, “ at the public Coſt, which might ingage them the rather to give freely
“ as they freely receiv'd. Or if they have miſs'd of theſe Helps at the latter place, “ they have after two or three years left the courſe of their Studies there (if they “ ever well began them) and undertaken, tho furniſht with little elſe but ignorance, “ boldneſs, and ambition, if with no worſe Vices, a Chaplainſhip in ſom “ Gentleman's Houſe, to the frequent imbaſing of his Sons with illiterat and “ narrow Principles. Or if they have liv'd there upon their own, who knows “ not that ſeven years charge of living there, to them who fly not from the Government “ of their Parents to the Licenſe of a Univerſity, but com ſeriouſly to “ ſtudy, is no more than may be well defray'd and reimburſt by one year's Revenue “ of an ordinary good Benefice? If they had then Means of breeding from “ their Parents, 'tis likely they have more now; and if they have, it muſt needs
“ be mechanic and diſingenuous in them to bring a Bill of Charges for the learning “ thoſe liberal Arts and Sciences which they have learnt (if they have indeed “ learnt them, as they ſeldom have) to their own benefit and accompliſhment.
Towards the concluſion he has theſe words; “ I have thus at large examin'd the “ uſual Pretences of Hirelings, color'd over moſt commonly with the Cauſe of “ Learning and Univerſities; as if with Divines Learning ſtood and fell, wherin
“ for the moſt part their Pittance is ſo ſmall; and, to ſpeak freely, it were much “ better there were not one Divine in the Univerſity, nor no School Divinity “ known, the idle Sophiſtry of Monks, the Canker of Religion; and that they “ who intended to be Miniſters, were train'd up in the Church only by the Scripture, “ and in the Original Languages therof at School, without fetching the “ compaſs of other Arts and Sciences more than what they can well learn at ſecondary “ leiſure, and at home. Neither ſpeak I this in contemt of Learning,

"not like theſe at preſent our Patrons of Chriſtian Liberty, will pay none but ſuch whom by their Committees of Examination, they find conformable to their Intereſt and Opinions: And Hirelings will ſoon frame themſelves to that Intereſt and thoſe Opinions which they ſee beſt pleaſing to their Paymaſters; and, to ſeem right themſelves, will force others as to the Truth. After proving the Chriſtian Religion not to be more difficult than any other Art or Science, nay, and that the knowlege of it may be much ſooner attain'd; "We may conclude, ſays he, that if Men be not all their lifetime under a Teacher to learn Logic, Natural Philoſophy, Ethics, or Mathematics, which are more difficult; that certainly it is not neceſſary to the attainment of Chriſtian Knowlege, that Men ſhould ſit all their life long at the feet of a pulpited Divine, while he, a Lollard indeed over his elbow Cuſhion, in almoſt the ſeventh part of forty or fifty years, teaches them ſcarce half the Principles of Religion: And his Sheep oftimes ſit all the while to as little purpoſe of benefiting, as the Sheep in their pews at Smithfield, and for the moſt part are by ſom Simony or other bought and ſold like them; or, if this Compariſon be too low, like thoſe Women, mention'd by St. Paul, ever learning and never attaining; yet not ſo much thro their own Fault, as thro the unſkilful and immethodical Teaching of their Paſtor, preaching here and there at random out of this or that Text, as his eaſe or fancy, and ofttimes as his health guides him.

Cromwel being dead, Richard depoſ'd, and the Army having reſtor'd the old famous Parlament, but almoſt as ſoon diſſolv'd it, Milton wrote a Letter to ſom Stateſman, with whom he had a ſerious diſcourſe about the lamentable Confuſions of that time. It is in a very pathetic Stile, and contains a true Repreſentation of what the Soldiers had don; to whom he tells, that it is ſcarce to be exampled, even among Barbarians, that an Army duly paid ſhould, for no cauſe at all, ſubdue the Supreme Power that ſet them up. "This, ſays he, other Nations will judg to the ſad diſhonor of that Army, lately renown'd for the civileſt and beſt order'd in the Univerſe, and by us here at home for the moſt conſcientious. Now, if an Army deſerving this Character was capable of inſlaving their Country, what may be expected from any other, as moſt are, of a worſe diſpoſition? In this Letter he delivers the Model of a Commonwealth; not ſuch as he thought the beſt, but what might be readieſt ſettled at that time to prevent the reſtitution of Kingſhip and Domeſtic Diſorders, till a more favorable Seaſon, or better Diſpoſitions for erecting a perfect Democracy. This and another ſmall Piece to the ſame purpoſe, addreſt I ſuppoſe to Monk, were communicated to me by a worthy Friend, who, a little after the Author's Death, had them from his Nephew; and I imparted them to the Publiſhers of the new Edition of his Works in Folio.

His laſt Piece before the Reſtoration of the Royal Family, except the brief Notes he publiſht on Dr. Griffith's Sermon, was intitul'd, The ready and eaſy Way to eſtabliſh a Free Commonwealth, and the Excellence therof compar'd with the Inconveniences and Dangers of readmitting Kingſhip in this Nation. This Book appear'd in Sixty, when he perceiv'd that noxious humor of returning to Bondage, as he calls it, to prevail, which was inſtil'd by ſom Deceivers, and nouriſht by the bad Principles or falſe Apprehenſions of the People. "If their abſolute Determination be to enthral us, ſays he; before ſo long a Lent of Servitude, they may permit us a little Shroving time firſt, wherin to ſpeak freely and take our leaves of Liberty. He indeavors to ſet before the Eys of the Nation the folly and unreaſonableneſs of all they had ſo valiantly don for ſeveral years, if they at laſt readmitted Kingſhip; that they would be the ſhame of all free Countrys, and the Laughingſtock of all Monarchies. "Where is this goodly Tower of a Commonwealth, will Foreners ſay, which the Engliſh boaſted they would build to overſhadow Kings, and be another Rome in the Weſt? The Foundation indeed they laid gallantly, but fell into a worſe Confuſion, not of Tongues but of Factions, than thoſe at the Tower of Babel; and have left no Memorial of their Work behind them remaining, but in the common laughter of Europe. Which muſt needs redound the more to our ſhame, if we but look on our Neighbors the United Provinces, to us inferior in all outward Advantages; who notwithſtanding, in the midſt of greater Difficulties, couragiouſly, wiſely, conſtantly went thro with the ſame Work, and are ſettled in all the happy injoyments of a potent and flouriſhing Republic to this day. Beſides this, if we return to Kingſhip, and ſoon repent (as undoubtedly we ſhall when we find the old Incroachments coming by little and little upon our Conſciences, which “ muſt neceſſarily procede ſrom King and Biſhop united inſeparably in one Intereſt) we may be forc'd perhaps to fight over again all that we have fought. ——A Free Commonwealth was not only held by wiſeſt Men in all Ages, the nobleſt, the manlieſt, the equalleſt, the juſteſt Government, the moſt agreable to due Liberty, and proportion'd Equality, both Human, Civil, and Chriſtian, moſt cheriſhing to Virtue and true Religion, but alſo plainly commended, or rather injoin'd by our Savior himſelf to all Chriſtians, not without a remarkable diſallowance, and the brand of Gentiliſm upon Kingſhip. God in much diſpleaſure gave a King to the Iſraelits, and imputed it a Sin to them that they ſought one: but Chriſt apparently forbids his Diſciples to admit of any ſuch Heatheniſh Government. The Kings of the Gentils, ſays he, exerciſe Lordſhip over them, and they that exerciſe Authority upon them are cal'd Benefactors: But you ſhall not do ſo, but he that is greateſt among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that ſerves. The occaſion of theſe words was the ambitious deſire of Zebedees two Sons to be exalted above their Brethren in the Kingdom, which they thought was to be er'e long upon Earth. That he ſpeaks of Civil Government is manifeſt by the former part of the Compariſon, which infers the other part to be always of the ſame kind. And what Government coms nearer to this Precept of Chriſt, than a Free Commonwealth? Wherin they who are greateſt are perpetual Servants and Drudges to the Public at their own coſt and charges, neglecting their own Affairs, yet are not elevated above their Brethren, live ſoberly in their Families, walk the Streets as other Men, may be ſpoken to freely, familiarly, friendly, without Adoration. Wheras a King muſt be ador'd like a Demigod, with a diſſolute and haughty Court about him, of vaſt Expence and Luxury, Masks and Revels, to the debauching of our prime Gentry both Male and Female, not in their Paſtimes only, but in earneſt by the looſe Imployments of Court-Service, which will be then thought honorable. There will be a Queen of no leſs charge; in moſt likelihood outlandiſh and a Papiſt, beſides a Queenmother ſuch already, together with both their Courts and numerous Train. Then a Royal Iſſue, and e're long ſeverally their ſumtuous Courts, to the multiplying of a ſervil Crew, not of Servants only, but of Nobility and Gentry bred up then, not to the hopes of Public, but of Court Offices; to be Stewards, Chamberlains, Uſhers, Grooms, even of the Cloſeſtool: And the lower their Minds are debas'd with Court opinions contrary to all Virtue and Reformation, the haughtier will be their Pride and Profuſeneſs. As to the burden of Expence, we ſhall ſoon know it to our coſt; for any good to us, deſerving to be term'd no better than the vaſt and laviſh price of our Subjection, and their Debauchery, which we are now ſo greedily cheapening, and would ſo fain be paying moſt inconſideratly to a ſingle Perſon, who, for any thing wherin the Public really needs him, will have little elſe to do but to beſtow the eating and drinking of exceſſive Dainties, to ſet a pompous face upon the ſuperficial actings of State, to pageant himſelf up and down in progreſs among the perpetual Bowings and Cringings of an abject People, on either ſide deifying and adoring him for nothing don that can deſerve it. In this Book he delivers the Model of a Commonwealth, well ſuted perhaps to the Circumſtances of that time, but inferior in all reſpects to Harrington's Oceana, which for the Practicableneſs, Equality, and Completeneſs of it, is the moſt perfect form of ſuch a Government that was ever delineated by any antient or modern Pen.

And now, the King being ready to land, our Author was diſcharg'd from his Office of Latin Secretary, and oblig'd for the Safety of his Perſon to leave his Houſe near St. James's Park, where for eight years before he was viſited by all Foreners of Note, by ſeveral Perſons of Quality, and by the Ingenious of every Perſuaſion or Party. Andrew Marvel, who by his Parts and Probity made himſelf ſo much known ſince that time in England, us'd to frequent him the ofteneſt of any body; and whether it was he or Milton (for both are nam'd for it) that made the Verſes ſent with Cromwel's Picture to the Queen of Sweden, I am uncertain: but whoever was the Author, they deſerve a room in this place.

Cromwel ſpeaks:

Bellipotens virgo, ſeptem Regina Trionum
Chriſtina, Arctoi lucida ſtella poli;

Cernis quas merui dura ſub Caſſide rugas,
Utque ſenex armis impiger ora tero:
Invia fatorum dum per veſtigia nitor,
Exequor & populi fortia juſſa manu.
Aſt tibi ſubmittit frontem reverentior umbra,
Nec ſunt hi vultus regibus uſque truces.

Engliſh'd.

Bright martial Maid, Queen of the frozen Zone,
The Northern Pole ſupports thy ſhining Throne;
Behold what Furrows Age and Steel can plow,
The Helmet's weight oppreſt this wrinkled Brow.
Thro Fate's untrodden Paths I move, my Hands
Still act my freeborn Peoples bold Commands:
Yet this ſtern ſhade to you ſubmits his Frowns,
Nor are theſe looks always ſevere to Crowns.

From the year 52, to that of 60, he correſponded much with learned Foreners, as appears by his Letters to Millius, Oldenburg, Heimbachius, De Braſs, Leo ab Aizema, and Emeric Bigot. His Admirer Leonardus Philaras coming upon ſom occaſions to London, went to ſee Milton, who, tho he could not ſee him again, was extremely pleas'd with his Converſation. He afterwards acquainted Milton by a Letter, that there was a Phyſician who perform'd Wonders on blind People at Paris, and requeſts him to ſend in writing the ſtate and progreſs of his Diſtemper, which to gratify his Friend our Author perform'd, yet without expreſſing any hopes of a cure. Cyriac Skinner was one of his conſtant Viſiters, which Honor he not ſeldom receiv'd alſo from the pious and virtuous Lady Ranelagh, whoſe Son, the preſent Earl of Ranelagh, he inſtructed for ſom time, and ſent him ſeveral Letters of Advice during his Travels abroad; but in one directed to him at the Univerſity, he uſes theſe words: "As for what you write to me, that you are ſo much pleas'd "with Oxford, you cannot perſuade me the more that you receiv'd any Improve"ment there, or art becom a bit the wiſer, unleſs you ſhew me ſom other Rea"ſons for it. Thoſe Victories of Princes which you extol, and ſuch other things, "wherin Force has the greateſt ſhare, I would not have you too much admire, "eſpecially now being a Hearer of Philoſophers: where's the wonder if in the "Country of Rams there grow ſtrong Horns, which are able to batter Towns "and Cities with ſuch violence? But learn thou from thy Childhood to diſ"cern and judg of great Examples, not from Violence and Force, but by Juſtice "and Temperance.

But, as I ſaid before, he was now oblig'd to abſcond till the Act of Oblivion was publiſh'd, wherin he and John Goodwin (the great ſpreader of Arminianiſm, and who in writing alſo juſtify'd the Death of Charles the Firſt) were only excepted from bearing any Office in the Nation. Our Author had many good Friends to intercede for him both in the Privy Council and in the Houſe of Commons; nor was Charles the Second ſuch an Enemy to the Muſes as to require his Deſtruction, tho ſom are of opinion that he was more oblig'd to that Prince's Forgetfulneſs than to his Clemency.

As ſoon as his Pardon was paſt the Seals, he appear'd again, and marry'd his third Wife Elizabeth, the Daughter of Mr. Minſhal of Cheſhire, recommended to him by his Friend Dr. Paget. He had no Children by this laſt Wife, nor any living by his ſecond; but of his three Daughters by the firſt, he made two very ſerviceable to himſelf, and, in ſo doing, to the reſt of the World. For tho many ſent their Sons to read for him, and ſeveral grown Perſons were ambitious of obliging him that way for their own Improvement; yet he taught theſe young Women to read and pronounce with great exactneſs the Engliſh, Italian, Spaniſh, French, Hebrew, Greec, and Latin Languages. So that whatever Book he had occaſion to uſe, one of 'em was forc'd to read it to him, tho neither of 'em underſtood a word of thoſe Writings, except Engliſh their Mother Tongue. This Drudgery could not but render them in time very uneaſy; and accordingly when he underſtood their Murmurs, he diſpens'd with their Duty in this caſe, and ſent them out to learn other things more becoming their Sex and Condition.

What imploy'd a good part of his Thoughts for many years before, and was at firſt only deſign'd to be a Tragedy, I mean his incomparable Epic Poem, intitul'd, Paradiſe Loſt, he now had ſufficient leiſure to proſecute and finiſh. It is a great wonder that this piece ſhould ever be brought to perfection, conſidering the many Interruptions that obſtructed it. His Youth was ſpent in Study, Travelling, and religious Controverſy; his Manhood was imploy'd in Affairs of State, or thoſe of his Family; and in his latter years, to ſpeak nothing of a decaying Fancy, nor of his perſonal Troubles, he was by reaſon of his Blindneſs oblig'd to write by whatſoever hand came next, ten, or twenty, or thirty Verſes at a time; and conſequently muſt truſt the judgment of others at leaſt for the Pointing and Orthography. But another difficulty that ſtopt its paſſage to the World was very ſingular: for his Vein never happily flow'd but from the Autumnal to the Vernal Equinox, as his Nephew Edward Philips affirms, who ſays he was told this particular by Milton himſelf; and yet I fancy he might be miſtaken as to the time, becauſe our Author in his Latin Elegy on the approach of the Spring ſeems to ſay juſt the contrary, as if he could not make any Verſes to his ſatisfaction till the Spring begun, according to theſe lines.

Fallor? An & nobis redeunt in carmina vires,
Ingeniumque mihi munere veris adeſt?
Munere veris adeſt, iterumque vigeſcit ab illo,
(Quis putet) atque aliquod jam ſibi poſcit opus.

A more judicious Friend of his informs me, that he could never compoſe well but in the Spring and Autumn: And let it be which way you will, it follows that this Piece was compos'd in half the time he was thought to be about it. As to the choice of his Subject, or the Particulars of his Story, I ſhall ſay nothing in defence of them againſt thoſe People who brand 'em with Hereſy and Impiety: for to incur the Diſpleaſure of certain ignorant and ſupercilious Critics, argues free Thinking, accurat Writing, and a generous Profeſſion of Truth. I'm ſure if Heſiod, or ſuch other fabulous Authors in the rude ages of the World, had given ſo intelligible, coherent, and delightful an account of the Creation of the Univerſe, and the Origin of Mankind their Syſtem had paſt for Divine Inſpiration; and the Unbelievers of it would appear to be ſo few, that any of 'em might well be ſhewn for a Monſter rather than be thought worthy of Puniſhment or Confutation. As to the regularity of the Poem, I never knew it queſtion'd by any but ſuch as would build themſelves a Reputation on the flaws and miſtakes they diſcover in other Mens Labors. But the unparallel'd Sublimity and Force of the Expreſſion, with the delicacy of his Thoughts, and the copiouſneſs of his Invention, are unanimouſly own'd by all ranks of Writers. He has inconteſtably exceded the fecundity of Homer, whoſe two Poems he could almoſt repeat without book: nor did he com much ſhort of the correctneſs of Virgil; which is affirm'd by one whoſe judgment in this Province will be acknowleg'd by every man that is not willing to expoſe the defect of his own. I mean the famous John Dryden, the beſt Engliſh Poet alive, the preſent Glory of our Stage, and the Model of the ſame to future Ages; for he (having abſolutely maſter'd theſe three Originals by framing a Tragedy out of Paradiſe Loſt, making the Charms of Virgil appear in the Engliſh Tongue, and ſtudying Homer for the ſame purpoſe) pronounces his Judgment in favor of Milton by this incomparable and envy'd Epigram.

Three Poets in three diſtant Ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England did adorn:
The firſt in Loftineſs of Thought ſurpaſt;
The next in Majeſty; in both the laſt.
The Force of Nature could no further go:
To make a Third, ſhe join'd the other Two.

The firſt Edition of Paradiſe Loſt was publiſh'd in the year 1666, in ten Books; but afterwards, amended and inlarg'd by himſelf, it was diſpos'd according to his Direction into twelve Books, as it is read at preſent. I muſt not forget that we had like to be eternally depriv'd of this Treaſure by the Ignorance or Malice of the Licenſer; who, among other frivolous Exceptions, would needs ſuppreſs the whole Poem for imaginary Treaſon in the following lines.

—As, when the Sun new riſen Looks thro the Horizontal miſty Air

Shorn of his Beams, or from behind the Moon
In dim Eclipſe diſaſtrous Twilight ſheds
On half the Nations, and with fear of change Perplexes Monarchs.

Milton, taking an occaſion from Satan's aſcending out of infernal Darkneſs towards the Light of this World then newly created, perpetuats the Hiſtory of his own Blindneſs in this admirable Paſſage.

Hail, holy Light; Oſpring of Heaven Firſtborn,
Or of th' eternal coeternal Beam,
May I expreſs thee unblam'd? Since God is Light,
And never but in unapproached Light
Dwelt from Eternity, dwelt then in thee
Bright Effluence of bright Eſſence increate.
Or hearſt thou rather pure ethereal Stream,
Whoſe Fountain who ſhall tell? Before the Sun,
Before the Heavens thou wert; and at the Voice
Of God, as with a Mantle, didſt inveſt
The riſing World of Waters dark and deep,
Won from the void and formleſs Infinite.
Thee I reviſit now with bolder Wing,
Eſcap'd the Stygian Pool, tho long detain'd
In that obſcure Sojourn; while in my flight (Thro utter and thro middle Darkneſs born)
I ſung of Chaos and eternal Night,
Taught by the heavenly Muſe to venture down
The dark Deſcent, and up to reaſcend
Tho hard and rare. Thee I reviſit ſafe,
And feel thy ſovrain vital Lamp; but thou Reviſit'ſt not theſe Eys that roll in vain
To find thy piercing Ray, and find no dawn:
So thick a Drop ſerene has quench'd their Orbs
Or dim Suffuſion veil'd! Yet not the more Ceaſe I to wander where the Muſes haunt Clear Spring, or ſhady Grove, or ſunny Hill,
Smit with the Love of ſacred Song; but chief,
Thee, Sion, and thy flowry Brooks beneath
That waſh thy hallowed Feet, and warbling flow, Nightly I viſit. Nor ſomtimes forget Thoſe other two equal'd with me in Fate
(So were I equal'd with them in Renown)
Blind Thamyris and blind Mæonides,
And Tyreſias and Phineus, Prophets old.
Then feed on Thoughts that voluntary move Harmonious Numbers; as the wakeful Bird
Sings darkling, and, in ſhadyeſt Coverts hid, Tunes her nocturnal Note. Thus with the Year
Seaſons return, but not to me returns
Day, or the ſweet approach of Ev'n, or Morn,
Or ſight of vernal Bloom, or Summers Roſe,
Or Flocks, or Herds, or human Face divine:
But Cloud inſtead, and everduring Dark Surrounds me, from the chearful ways of Men
Cut off; and, for the Book of Knowlege fair, Preſented with an univerſal Blank
Of Nature's Works to me expung'd and raz'd,
And Wiſdom at one entrance quite ſhut out.
So much the rather, thou Celeſtial Light,
Shine inward, and the Mind thro all her Powers Irradiat: there plant Eys, all Miſt from thence Purge and diſperſe, that I may ſee and tell
Of things inviſible to mortal ſight.

An Epic Poem is not a bare Hiſtory delightfully related in harmonious Numbers, and artfully diſpos'd; but it always contains, beſides a general repreſentation of Paſſions and Affections, Virtues and Vices, ſom peculiar Allegory or Moral. Homer therfore, according to Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, expreſſes ſtrength of Body in his Iliad by the Wars of the Greecs and Trojans, but particularly by the valiant Deeds of Achilles; and in his Odyſſeus he deſcribes generoſity of Mind by the Adventures and Wandrings of Ulyſſes in his return from Troy. Thus Torquato Taſſo has prefixt an Explication to his Gieruſalemme Liberata: Nor was Milton behind any body in the choice or dignity of his Inſtruction; for to diſplay the different Effects of Liberty and Tyranny, is the chief deſign of his Paradiſe Loſt. This in the concluſion of his ſecond Book of Reformation, publiſh'd in 41, he tells us was his Intention at that time; and he afterwards made this promiſe good. His own words, being part of a Prayer to God, deſerve ſerious conſideration. “Then, “ ſays he, amidſt the Hymns and Hallelujahs of Saints, ſom one may perhaps be “ heard offring at high ſtrains in new and lofty meaſures, to ſing and celebrat “ thy divine Mercies, and marvellous Judgments in this Land throout all “ Ages, wherby this great and warlike Nation (inſtructed and inur'd to the fer- “ vent and continual practice of Truth and Righteouſneſs, and caſting far from “ it the Rags of its old Vices) may preſs on hard to that high and happy Emula- “ tion to be found the ſobereſt, wiſeſt, and moſt Chriſtian People at that day, “ when Thou, the eternal and ſhortly expected King, ſhalt open the Clouds to “ judg the ſeveral Kingdoms of the World; and, diſtributing national Honors and “ Rewards to religious and juſt Commonwealths, ſhalt put an end to all earthly “ Tyrannies, proclaiming thy univerſal and mild Monarchy thro Heaven and “ Earth. Where they undoubtedly, that by their Labors, Counſels, and Prayers, “ have bin earneſt for the common Good of Religion and their Country, ſhall “ receive (above the inferior Orders of the Bleſſed) the regal addition of Princi- “ palities, Legions, and Thrones into their glorious Titles; and in ſupereminence “ of beatific Viſion, progreſſing the dateleſs and irrevoluble Circle of Eternity, “ ſhall clap inſeparable hands with joy and bliſs in overmeaſure for ever. But “ they on the contrary, that by the impairing and diminution of the true Faith, “ by the Diſtreſſes and Servitude of their Country, aſpire to high Dignity, Rule, “ and Promotion here, after a ſhameful end in this life (which God grant them) “ ſhall be thrown down eternally into the darkeſt and deepeſt Gulf of Hell: “ where under the deſpitful controul, the trample, and ſpurn of all the other “ Damn'd, that in the anguiſh of their torture ſhall have no other eaſe than to “ exerciſe a raving and beſtial Tyranny over them as their Slaves and Negros, “ they ſhall remain in that plight for ever, the baſeſt, the lowermoſt, the moſt de- “ jected, moſt underfoot, and downtrodden Vaſſals of Perdition. I ſhall end my account of this Divine Poem with a Copy of Latin Verſes made upon it by Samuel Barrow, a Doctor of Phyſic.

In the year 1670 he publiſh'd his Paradiſe Regain'd, conſiſting of four Books; but generally eſteem'd much inferior to Paradiſe Loſt, which he could not endure to hear, being quite of another mind: yet this occaſion'd ſom body to ſay wittily enough that Milton might be ſeen in Paradiſe Loſt, but not in Paradiſe Regain'd. With this laſt Book he publiſht his Samſon Agoniſtes, an admirable Tragedy, not a ridiculous mixture of Gravity and Farce according to moſt of the Modern, but after the Example of the yet unequal'd Antients, as they are juſtly cal'd, Æſchylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

In the year 70 alſo came abroad his Hiſtory of Britain, wherof we had occaſion to ſpeak before. He deduc'd it only to the Norman Conqueſt, and yet we have it not as it came out of his hands; for the Licenſers, thoſe ſworn Officers to deſtroy Learning, Liberty, and good Senſe, expung'd ſeveral paſſages of it wherin he expos'd the Superſtition, Pride, and Cunning of the Popiſh Monks in the Saxon Times, but apply'd by the ſagacious Licenſers to Charles the Second's Biſhops. This puts me in mind of a Reply to a certain Perſon by Sir Robert Howard lately deceaſt, a Gentleman of great Generoſity, a Patron of Letters, and a hearty Friend to the Liberty of his Country. Being told that he was charg'd in a Book with whipping the Proteſtant Clergy on the back of the Heathen and Popiſh Prieſts, he preſently ask'd what they had to do there? He was a great admirer of Milton to his dying day; and, being his particular Acquaintance, would tell many pleaſant Stories of him, as that he himſelf having demanded of him once what made him ſide with the Republicans? Milton anſwer'd, among other Reaſons, becauſe theirs was the moſt frugal Government; for that the Trappings of a Monarchy might ſet up an ordinary Commonwealth. But not to digreſs too far, our Author beſtow'd a Copy of the unlicens'd Papers of his Hiſtory on the Earl of Angleſey, who, as well as ſeveral of the Nobility and Gentry, was his conſtant Viſitor. Nor was he leſs frequented by Foreners to the laſt, than in the time of his flouriſhing condition before the Reſtoration. It is an irreparable loſs to this moſt potent Nation, that Milton did not find leiſure to bring down his Hiſtory to his own times: For (as the nobleſt Ornament of all Politeneſs and Literature Sir William Temple juſtly complains) "tho the Engliſh are ſo renown'd by the Fame of their Arms and Exploits "abroad, ſo applauded and envy'd for their wiſe and happy Inſtitutions at home, "ſo flouriſhing in Arts and Learning, and ſo adorn'd by excellent Writers in o"ther Kinds, yet none of 'em has produc'd one good or approv'd general Hiſtory "of England. But our Hiſtories (continues he) have bin written by ſuch mean "and vulgar Authors, ſo tedious in their Relations, or rather Collections; ſo in"judicious in the choice of what was fit to be told or to be let alone; with ſo little "order, and in ſo wretched a Stile; that as it is a ſhame to be ignorant in the "Affairs of our own Country, ſo 'tis hardly worth the time or pains to be inform'd, "ſince for that end a Man muſt read over a Library, rather than a Book: and after "all, muſt be content to forget more than he remembers. This Charge is too true, and yet it's very ſtrange it ſhould be ſo, ſeeing no Country in the World has afforded a greater diverſity or a better choice of Actions, nor is furniſht with more ample or authentic Materials for framing a juſt and full body of Hiſtory. Would Sir William be pleaſ'd to continue ſo uſeful a Work, according to the inimitable Specimen he has publiſht for encouraging ſom other to purſue this Attemt, England might boldly compare with Rome, and himſelf be reckon'd equal with Livy. But tho he gos no further than the Norman Conqueſt, which is the period of Milton, yet we expect a larger Account from James Tyrrel, the worthy Grandſon of Archbiſhop Vſher. This learned Gentleman, to ſupply the Defects wherof Sir William Temple complains, has undertaken to write a General Hiſtory of England, from the remoteſt traditional Beginnings to this time. The firſt Volume of it is already abroad, which reaches likewiſe to William the Firſt; the Second is now finiſht; and I hope he'l meet with ſufficient encouragement to make a ſpeedy publication of the reſt. For tho his Work may not perfectly reach Sir William's Plan in the niceſt exactneſs of Order, Stile, and Compoſition; yet it muſt be confeſt by all true Judges to be the moſt impartial and complete, the faithfulleſt, the moſt methodical, and in all reſpects the beſt Collection that was ever made in England. All our Manuſcript hiſtorical Records, and the numerous company of our particular Hiſtorians, can ſerve for little more to poſterity than to verify the Contents of this Book; nor will any body be at the trouble to preſerve 'em for this purpoſe, that is not a ſtranger to Mr. Tyrrel's Diligence and Integrity.

Milton wrote ſom Miſcellaneous Pieces much inferior to his other Works, as a Grammar for learning the Latin Tongue; a Logic after the method of Petrus Ramus; a brief Hiſtory of Muſcovy, and of other leſs known Countries lying eaſtward of it as far as Cathay, collected from the Relations of ſeveral Travellers: he tranſlated out of Latin into Engliſh the Declaration of the Poles concerning the Election of their King John the Third, containing an Account of the Virtues and Merits of the ſaid Prince; he publiſht Sir Walter Raleigh's Prince, or his Maxims and Aphoriſms of State; and he alſo printed his Cabinet Council. More pieces of this rarely accompliſht, tho unfortunat Gentleman, were made public by other perſons; and I daily expect ſom more from James Tyrrel, who has the Manuſcript Copies in his hands, and, I dare affirm, will not envy ſuch a bleſſing to the Nation.

Our Author's Juvenil and Occaſional Poems, both in Engliſh and Latin, were printed in one ſmall Volume. I took notice of the beſt of 'em in many places of this Diſcourſe; but the Monody wherin he bewails his Learned Friend Mr. King drown'd in the Iriſh Seas, is one of the fineſt he ever wrote.

The Daniſh Reſident prevail'd with Milton to get the Letters of State (formerly mention'd) tranſcrib'd, and which were publiſht after his death; as were alſo his Familiar Letters in 74, wherin, to uſe the words of Morhof, there are many Characters of Antient and Modern, of Domeſtic and Foren Authors, very fit to be read and underſtood. The laſt thing he wrote, and that was publiſht a little before his Death, is his Treatiſe of true Religion, Hereſy, Schiſm, Toleration, and the beſt means that may be uſ'd to prevent the growth of Popery. He obſerv'd (as all diſcerning Men muſt have don at that time) the prodigious increaſe of the Romiſh Superſtition, occaſion'd partly by the Perſecution againſt Diſſenting Proteſtants, but more by the incouragement it receiv'd from the Royal Brothers Charles and the Duke of York. From the Principles which our Author lays in his Book (and which, I think, are thoſe of the firſt Reformers) he infers that no true Proteſtant can perſecute any perſons for ſpeculative Points of Conſcience, much leſs not tolerat his fellow Proteſtant, tho in ſom things diſſenting from his own Judgment. After ſhewing that falſe Religion conſiſts in the corrupt Traditions of Men, and their arbitrary Additions to the divine Rule or Standard of all Truth, he was at no great labor to prove the Members of the Roman Church to be the greateſt Heretics in the World. As for Schiſm, or the diviſion of Congregations from their difference in Opinions, he ſhews it may happen in the true Church as well as in the falſe; but that in the firſt it need not break Communion or brotherly Love, no more than among the Phariſes and Sadduces, who amicably met at their common Worſhip in Jeruſalem. “It is human frailty to err, ſays he, and no Man is infallible “ here on Earth. But ſo long as the Lutherans, Calviniſts, Anabaptiſts, Socinians, “ and Arminians, profeſs to ſet the Word of God only before them as the Rule “ of their Faith and Obedience; and uſe all diligence and ſincerity of heart by “ reading, by learning, by ſtudy, by prayer for illumination of the Holy Spirit, to “ underſtand this Rule and obey it, they have don whatever Man can do. God “ will aſſuredly pardon them, as he did the Friends of Job, good and pious Men, “ tho much miſtaken (as there it appears) in ſom points of Doctrin. But ſom will ſay, with Chriſtians it is otherwiſe, whom God has promis'd by his Spirit to teach all things. True, all things abſolutely neceſſary to Salvation: But the hotteſt Diſputes among Proteſtants, calmly and charitably examin'd, will be found leſs than ſuch. The Lutheran holds Conſubſtantiation; an error indeed, but not mortal. The Calviniſt is tax'd with Predeſtination, and to make God the Author of Sin; not with any diſhonorable thoughts of God, but, it may be, overzealouſly aſſerting his abſolute Power, not without plea from Scripture. The Anabaptiſt is accus'd of denying Infants their right to Baptiſm; they ſay again, that they deny nothing but what the Scripture denys them. The Arian and Socinian are charg'd to diſpute againſt the Trinity; yet they affirm to believe the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, according to Scripture and the Apoſtolic Creed. As for the terms of Trinity, Triunity, Coeſſentiality, Triperſonality, and the like, they reject them as Scholaſtic Notions not to be found in Scripture, which, by a general Proteſtant Maxim, is plain and perſpicuous abundantly to explain its own meaning in the propereſt words belonging to ſo high a matter, and ſo neceſſary to be known; a myſtery indeed in their Sophiſtic Subtilties, but in Scripture a plain Doctrin. The Arminian laſtly is condemned for ſetting up Free Will againſt Free Grace; but that imputation he diſclaims in all his Writings, and grounds himſelf largely upon Scripture only. It cannot be deny'd that the Authors or late Revivers of all theſe Sects or Opinions were learned, worthy, zealous, and religious Men, as appears by their Lives written, and the Fame of their many eminent and learned Followers, perfect and powerful in the Scriptures, holy and unblamable in their Actions: And it cannot be imagin'd that God would deſert ſuch painful and zealous Laborers in his Church, and ofttimes great ſufferers for their Conſcience, to damnable Errors and a reprobat Senſe, who had ſo often implor'd the aſſiſtance of his Spirit; but rather, having made no Man infallible, that he has pardon'd their Errors, and accepts their pious Endeavors, ſincerely ſearching all things according to the Rule of Scripture, with ſuch guidance and direction as they can obtain of God by Prayer. What Proteſtant then, who himſelf maintains the ſame Principles, and diſavows all implicit Faith, would perſecute, and not rather charitably tolerat ſuch men as theſe, unleſs he means to abjure the Principles of his own Religion? If it be ask'd how far they ſhould be tolerated? I anſwer, doutleſs equally, as being all Proteſtants; that is, on all occaſions to be permitted to give an account of their Faith, either by arguing, preaching in their ſeveral Aſſemblies, by public writing, and the freedom of printing. Nothing can be imagin'd more reaſonable, honeſt, or pious, than this paſſage; and I don't remember ever to have met with any perſon who ſpoke with ſuch diſintereſtedneſs and impartiality of our various Sects in Religion except Thomas Firmin, whoſe Charity was as much extended to men of different Opinions, as it was to the Poor of all ſorts in good Works; but in this laſt reſpect he was never yet equal'd, nor likely to be eaſily exceded by any hereafter: tho his excellent Example is admir'd by ſeveral, and deſerves to be imitated by all. In the laſt place, Milton ſhews that Popery (not as it is a Religion, but as a tyrannical Faction oppreſſing all others) is intolerable, and that the beſt method of keeping it from ever increaſing in this Nation, is by the toleration of all kinds of Proteſtants, or any others whoſe Principles do not neceſſarily lead 'em to Sedition or Vice. But this Subject is ſince perfectly exhauſted, and treated with greater clearneſs and brevity than ever before in a Letter concerning Toleration by John Lock, who in his Book of Human Underſtanding muſt be confeſt to be the greateſt Philoſopher after Cicero in the World; for he's perfectly acquainted with human Nature, well vers'd in the uſeful Affairs of the World, a great Maſter of Eloquence (Qualities in which the Roman Conſul excel'd) and like him alſo a hearty lover of his Country, as appears by his Treatiſes of Government and Education, not inferior in their kind to the divineſt Pieces of Tully. Milton's Theſaurus Lingua Latina, deſign'd as a Supplement to Stephanus, was never publiſht, and has bin of great uſe to Dr. Littleton in compiling his Dictionary. He wrote likewiſe a Syſtem of Divinity, but whether intended for public view, or collected merely for his own uſe, I cannot determin. It was in the hands of his Friend Cyriac Skinner; and where at preſent is uncertain.

This is a full and true account of his genuin Works and Sentiments, not putting the Directions or Aſſiſtance, which he frequently gave other Writers, to his account. Towards the latter part of his time he contracted his Library, both becauſe cauſe the Heirs he left could not make a right uſe of it, and that he thought he might ſell it more to their advantage than they could be able to do themſelves. His Enemies reported that Poverty conſtrain'd him thus to part with his Books: and were this true, it would be indeed a great diſgrace, not to him (for Perſons of the higheſt Merits have bin often reduc'd to that condition) but to any Country that ſhould have no more regard to Probity or Learning: this Story however is ſo falſe, that he dy'd worth fifteen hundred Pounds, beſides all his Goods. The Houſe wherin he was born, and which Strangers us'd to viſit before the Fire, was part of his Eſtate as long as it ſtood. He put two thouſand Pounds into the Exciſe, which he loſt when that Bank fail'd; not to mention another great Sum which was gon for want of management and good advice. He was never very healthy, nor too ſickly; and the Diſtemper that troubled him moſt of any other was the Gout, of which he dy'd without much pain in the year from the birth of Chriſt 1674, and in the ſix and ſixtieth of his own Age. All his learned and great Friends in London, not without a friendly concourſe of the Vulgar, accompany'd his Body to the Church of S. Giles near Cripplegate, where he lies buried in the Chancel, and where the Piety of his Admirers will ſhortly erect a Monument becoming his worth, and the incouragement of Letters in King William's Reign.

Thus liv'd and dy'd JOHN MILTON, a Perſon of the beſt Accompliſhments, the happieſt Genius, and the vaſteſt Learning which this Nation, ſo renown'd for producing excellent Writers, could ever yet ſhew: eſteem'd indeed at home, but much more honor'd abroad, where almoſt in his very Childhood he made a conſiderable figure, and continues to be ſtill reputed one of the brighteſt Luminaries of the Sciences. He was middleſiz'd and well proportion'd, his Deportment erect and manly, his Hair of a light brown, his Features exactly regular, his Complexion wonderfully fair when a Youth, and ruddy to the very laſt. He was affable in Converſation, of an equal and chearful Temper, and highly delighted with all ſorts of Muſic, in which he was himſelf not meanly ſkil'd. He was extraordinary temperat in his Diet, which was any thing moſt in ſeaſon or the eaſieſt procur'd, and was no Friend to ſharp or ſtrong Liquors. His Recreations, before his Sight was gon, conſiſted much in feats of Activity, particularly in the exerciſe of his Arms, which he could handle with dexterity: but when Blindneſs and Age confin'd him, he play'd much upon an Organ he kept in the Houſe; and had a Pully to ſwing and keep him in motion. But the love of Books exceded all his other Paſſions. In Summer he would be ſtirring at four in the Morning, and in Winter at five; but at Night he us'd to go to bed by nine, attributing the loſs of his Eys to his late watching when he was a Student, and looking on this cuſtom as very pernicious to Health at any time: but when he was not diſpos'd to riſe at his uſual hours, he always had one to read to him by his bedſide. As he look'd upon true and abſolute Freedom to be the greateſt Happineſs of this Life, whether to Societies or ſingle Perſons, ſo he thought Conſtraint of any ſort to be the utmoſt Miſery: for which Reaſon he us'd frequently to tell thoſe about him the intire Satiſfaction of his Mind, that he had conſtantly imploy'd his Strength and Faculties in the defence of Liberty, and in a direct oppoſition to Slavery. He ever expreſt the profoundeſt Reverence to the Deity as well in Deeds as Words; and would ſay to his Friends, that the divine Properties of Goodneſs, Juſtice, and Mercy, were the adequat Rule of human Actions, nor leſs the Object of Imitation for privat Advantages, than of Admiration or Reſpect for their own Excellence and Perfection. In his early days he was a Favorer of thoſe Proteſtants then opprobriouſly cal'd by the name of Puritans: In his middle years he was beſt pleas'd with the Independents and Anabaptiſts, as allowing of more Liberty than others, and coming neareſt in his opinion to the primitive practice: but in the latter part of his Life, he was not a profeſt Member of any particular Sect among Chriſtians, he frequented none of their Aſſemblies, nor made uſe of their peculiar Rites in his Family. Whether this proceded from a diſlike of their uncharitable and endleſs Diſputes, and that Love of Dominion, or Inclination to Perſecution, which, he ſaid, was a piece of Popery inſeparable from all Churches; or whether he thought one might be a good Man, without ſubſcribing to any Party; and that they had all in ſom things corrupted the Inſtitutions of Jeſus Chriſt, I will by no means adventure to determin: for Conjectures on ſuch occaſions are very uncertain, and I never met with any of his Acquaintance who could be poſitive in aſſigning the true Reaſons of his Conduct.

I ſhall now conclude this Diſcourſe with a Character given of him by a Man of unparallel'd Diligence and Induſtry, who has diſoblig'd all ſides merely for telling the Truth either intirely, or without diſguiſe; and who, ſince moſt Men have the frailty of ingaging in Factions, cannot be ſuſpected of Partiality in favor of Milton. He was a Perſon, ſays Anthony Wood in the firſt Volume of his Athenæ Oxonienſes, of wonderful Parts, of a very ſharp, biting, and ſatyrical Wit; he was a good Philoſopher and Hiſtorian; an excellent Poet, Latiniſt, Grecian, and Hebrician; a good Mathematician and Muſician; and ſo rarely endow'd by Nature, that had he bin but honeſtly principled, he might have bin highly uſeful to that Party, againſt which he all along appear'd with much Malice and Bitterneſs.

AND now, Sir, I end with you, with whom I begun, not doubting but this ſmall Preſent, both from the dignity of the Subject and your Favor to the Writer, will be kindly accepted. It may indeed be the more plain and unpoliſh'd, but not the leſs uſeful or ſincere for coming out of a Country Retirement. The moſt knowing Perſons acknowlege that Divine Philoſophy her ſelf was begot in the Woods, where agreably paſſing her Infancy, and growing up in the neighboring Fields, ſhe became gentle in time, and ſo ventur'd to com into Towns and Cities; but being quickly weary'd there with the Tumult of Buſineſs or Faction, and longing for her former Tranquillity, ſhe ſtraight retir'd into Gardens or Groves, to her Fields and Woods again. 'Tis probable that you (as well as I or any other) may diſapprove of Milton's Sentiments in ſeveral caſes, but, I'm ſure, you are far from being diſpleas'd to find 'em particulariz'd in the Hiſtory of his Life; for we ſhould have no true Account of things, if Authors related nothing but what they lik'd themſelves: one Party would never ſuffer the Lives of Tarquin, or Phalaris, or Sylla, or Cæſar, to appear; while another would be as ready to ſuppreſs thoſe of Cicero, of Cato, of Trajan, or Brutus. But a Hiſtorian ought to conceal or diſguiſe nothing, and the Reader is to be left Judg of the Virtues he ſhould imitate, or the Vices he ought to deteſt and avoid, without ever loving his Book the leſs: for (as the Lord Bacon truly ſaid) a forbidden Writing is thought to be a certain Spark of Truth that flies up in the faces of them who ſeek to tread it out. But your extraordinary Judgment and Candor, join'd to the beſt Learning, and an exact Knowlege of Men and Affairs, render my further inculcating of theſe Maxims very needleſs; and therfore I ſhall only put you in mind, Sir, that my deſire of gratifying your Curioſiry conquer'd my Averſion to write any thing during this pleaſanteſt Seaſon of the Year.

AMSTERDAM,
Finiſh'd in the Year M. DC. XC. VIII.

All imaginable care was taken by the Publiſhers to acquit themſelves as they ought in this Edition of Milton's Works, which is not only a complete Collection of all his printed Pieces, but augmented alſo with an addition of two Letters never before publiſh'd, and a correct Tranſlation of his Defence of the People, and his Letters of State for the benefit of Engliſh Readers. The Printer indeed has tranſpos'd ſome of the Books, which ſhould have bin inſerted according to the Order of Time as they were ſeverally written; this Neglect however is of ſmall importance, becauſe few of theſe Books have any dependence one upon another: Yet leſt any Confuſion might procede from hence, here follows an exact Catalogue of Milton's Works in their true Order, as they are found in the Hiſtory of his Life. The firſt Figure ſtands for the Page of the Life, wherein each Book is treated of, and the ſecond for the Page of the enſuing Volumes where the ſame Book begins.

1. Of Reformation in England, and the Cauſes that hitherto have hinder'd it. In two Books: Written to a Friend. Page 11. 249.
2. Of Prelatical Epiſcopacy, and whether it can be deduc'd from the Apoſtolical Time. ———p. 12. 239.

BOOK I.

THE beginning of Nations, thoſe excepted of whom ſacred Books have ſpok'n, is to this day unknown. Nor only the beginning, but the Deeds alſo of many ſucceeding Ages, yea periods of Ages, either wholly unknown, or obſcur'd and blemiſh'd with Fables. Whether it were that the uſe of Letters came in long after, or were it the violence of barbarous Inundations, or they themſelves at certain Revolutions of Time, fatally decaying, and degenerating into Sloth and Ignorance; wherby the Monuments of more ancient Civility have bin ſom deſtroy'd, ſom loſt. Perhaps Diſeſteem and Contempt of the public Affairs then preſent, as not worth recording, might partly be in cauſe. Certainly oft-times we ſee that wiſe Men, and of beſt Ability, have forborn to write the Acts of thir own days, while they beheld with a juſt Loathing and Diſdain, not only how unworthy, how pervers, how corrupt, but often how ignoble, how petty, how below all Hiſtory the Perſons and thir Actions were; who either by Fortune, or ſom rude Election, had attain'd as a ſore Judgment and Ignominy upon the Land, to have chief ſway in managing the Commonwealth. But that any Law or Superſtition of our old Philoſophers the Druids forbad the Britans to write thir memorable Deeds, I know not why any out of Cæſar ſhould allege: he indeed ſaith, that thir Doctrin they thought not lawful to commit to Letters; but in moſt Matters elſe, both privat and public, among which well may Hiſtory be reck'nd, they us'd the Greek Tongue: and that the Britiſh Druids who taught thoſe in Gaul would be ignorant of any Language known and us'd by thir Diſciples, or ſo frequently writing other things, and ſo inquiſitive into higheſt, would for want of recording be ever Children in the Knowledg of Times and Ages, is not likely. Whatever might be the reaſon, this we find, that of Britiſh Affairs, from the firſt peopling of the Iland to the coming of Julius Cæſar, nothing certain, either by Tradition, Hiſtory, or ancient Fame hath hitherto bin left us. That which we have of oldeſt ſeeming, hath by the greater part of judicious Antiquaries bin long rejected for a modern Fable.

Cæſ. l. 6.

Nevertheleſs there being others beſides the firſt ſuppos'd Author, Men not unread, nor unlerned in Antiquity, who admit that for approved Story, which the former explode for Fiction; and ſeeing that oft-times Relations heertofore accounted fabulous have bin after found to contain in them many Footſteps and Reliques of ſomthing true, as what we read in Poets of the Flood, and Giants little beleev'd, till undoubted Witneſſes taught us, that all was not fain'd ; I have therfore determin'd to beſtow the telling over ev'n of theſe reputed Tales ; be it for nothing elſe but in favour of our Engliſh Poets and Rhetoricians, who by thir Art will know how to uſe them judiciouſly.

I might alſo produce example, as Diodorus among the Greeks, Livie and others of the Latins, Polydore and Virunnius accounted among our own Writers. But I intend not with Controverſies and Quotations to delay or interrupt the ſmooth courſe of Hiſtory ; much leſs to argue and debate long who were the firſt Inhabitants, with what Probabilities, what Authorities each Opinion hath bin upheld, but ſhall endevor that which hitherto hath bin needed moſt, with plain and lightſom Brevity, to relate well and orderly things worth the noting, ſo as may beſt inſtruct and benefit them that read. Which, imploring divine Aſſiſtance, that it may redound to his Glory, and the Good of the Britiſh Nation, I now begin.

That the whole Earth was inhabited before the Flood, and to the utmoſt point of habitable Ground, from thoſe effectual Words of God in the Creation, may be more then conjectur'd. Hence that this Iland alſo had her Dwellers, her Affairs, and perhaps her Stories, ev'n in that old World thoſe many hunderd years, with much reaſon we may infer. After the Flood, and the diſperſing of Nations, as they journey'd leaſurely from the Eaſt, Gomer the eldeſt Son of Japhet, and his Off-ſpring, as by Authorities, Arguments, and Affinity of divers Names is generally beleev'd, were the firſt that peopl'd all theſe Weſt and Northern Climes. But they of our own Writers, who thought they had don nothing, unleſs with all circumſtance they tell us when, and who firſt ſet foot upon this Iland, preſume to name out of fabulous and counterfet Authors a certain Samothes or Dis, a fourth or ſixt Son of Japhet, whom they make about 200 years after the Flood, to have planted with Colonies, firſt the Continent of Celtica, or Gaul, and next this Iland ; thence to have nam'd it Samothea, to have reign'd heer, and after him lineally four Kings, Magus, Saron, Druis, and Bardus. But the forg'd Beroſus, whom only they have to cite, no where mentions that either he, or any of thoſe whom they bring, did ever paſs into Britain, or ſend thir People hither. So that this outlandiſh Figment may eaſily excuſe our not allowing it the room heer ſo much as of a Britiſh Fable.

That which follows, perhaps as wide from Truth, though ſeeming leſs impertinent, is, that theſe Samotheans under the Reign of Bardus were ſubdu'd by Albion a Giant, Son of Neptune ; who call'd the Iland after his own Name, and rul'd it 44 years. Till at length paſſing over into Gaul, in aid of his Brother Leſtrygon, againſt whom Hercules was haſting out of Spain into Italy, he was there ſlain in fight, and Bergion alſo his Brother.

Sure anough we are that Britain hath bin anciently term'd Albion, both by the Greeks and Romans. And Mela the Geographer makes mention of a ſtony ſhoar in Languedoc, where by report ſuch a Battel was fought. The reſt, as his giving name to the Ile, or ever landing heer, depends altogether upon late Surmiſes. But too abſurd, and too unconſcionably groſs is that fond Invention that wafted hither the fifty Daughters of a ſtrange Diocleſian King of Syria ; brought in doubtleſs by ſom illiterat Pretender to ſomthing miſtak'n in the common poetical Story of Danaus King of Argos, while his Vanity, not pleas'd with the obſcure beginning which trueſt Antiquity affords the Nation, labour'd to contrive us a Pedigree, as he thought, more noble. Theſe Daughters by appointment of Danaus on the Marriage-night having murder'd all thir Husbands, except Linceus, whom his Wifes Loyalty ſav'd, were by him at the ſuit of his Wife thir Siſter, not put to Death, but turn'd out to Sea in a Ship unmann'd ; of which whole Sex they had incurr'd the hate : and as the Tale goes, were driv'n on this Iland. Where the Inhabitants, none but Devils, as ſom write, or as others, a lawleſs crew left heer by Albion without Head or Governour, both entertain'd them, and had iſſue by them a ſecond Breed of Giants, who tyranniz'd the Ile, till Brutus came.

The eldeſt of theſe Dames in thir Legend they call Albina ; and from thence, for which cauſe the whole Scene was fram'd, will have the name Albion deriv'd. Incredible it may ſeem ſo ſluggiſh a Conceit ſhould prove ſo ancient, as to be authoriz'd by the Elder Ninnius, reputed to have liv'd above a thouſand years ago. This I find not in him ; but that Hiſtion ſprung of Japhet, Holinſhed.

phet, had four Sons; Francus, Romanus, Alemannus, and Britto, of whom the Britans; as true, I believe, as that thoſe other Nations whoſe names are reſembl'd, came of the other three; if theſe Dreams give not juſt occaſion to call in doubt the Book it ſelf, which bears that title.

Hitherto the things themſelves have giv'n us a warrantable diſpatch to run them ſoon over. But now of Brutus and his Line, with the whole Progeny of Kings, to the entrance of Julius Cæſar, we cannot ſo eaſily be diſcharg'd; Deſcents of Anceſtry, long continu'd, Laws and Exploits not plainly ſeeming to be borrow'd, or deviſ'd, which on the common belief have wrought no ſmall impreſſion; defended by many, deny'd utterly by few. For what though Brutus, and the whole Trojan pretence were yeelded up, ſeeing they who firſt deviſ'd to bring us from ſom noble Anceſtor, were content at firſt with Brutus the Conſul; till better invention, although not willing to forgo the name, taught them to remove it higher into a more fabulous Age, and by the ſame remove lighting on the Trojan Tales in affectation to make the Britan of one Original with the Roman, pitch'd there, yet thoſe old and inborn names of ſucceſſive Kings, never any to have bin real Perſons, or don in thir lives at leaſt ſom part of what ſo long hath bin remember'd, cannot be thought without too ſtrict an incredulity.

For theſe, and thoſe cauſes above mention'd, that which hath receiv'd Approbation from ſo many, I have choſ'n not to omit. Certain or uncertain, be that upon the Credit of thoſe whom I muſt follow; ſo far as keeps alooff from impoſſible and abſurd, atteſted by antient Writers from Books more antient, I refuſe not, as the due and proper ſubject of Story. The principal Author is well known to be Geoffrey of Monmouth; what he was, and whence his Authority, who in his Age, or before him, have deliver'd the ſame matter, and ſuch like general Diſcourſes, will better ſtand in a Treatiſe by themſelves. All of them agree in this, that Brutus was the Son of Silvius; he of Aſcanius; whoſe Father was Æneas a Trojan Prince, who at the burning of that City, with his Son Aſcanius, and a collected number that eſcap'd, after long wandering on the Sea, arriv'd in Italy. Where at length by the aſſiſtance of Latinus King of Latium, who had giv'n him his Daughter Lavinia, he obtain'd to ſucceed in that Kingdom, and left it to Aſcanius, whoſe Son Silvius (though Roman Hiſtories deny Silvius to be Son of Aſcanius) had maried ſecretly a Neece of Lavinia.

Henry of Huntingdon, Matthew of Weſtminſter.

She being with Child, the matter became known to Aſcanius. Who commanding his Magicians to enquire by Art, what Sex the Maid had conceiv'd, had anſwer, that it was one who ſhould be the death of both his Parents; and baniſh'd for the Fact, ſhould after all in a far Country, attain to higheſt Honour. The Prediction fail'd not, for in Travel the Mother di'd. And Brutus (the Child was ſo call'd) at fifteen years of Age, attending his Father to the Chace, with an Arrow unfortunately kill'd him.

Baniſh'd therfore by his kindred, he retires into Greece. Where meeting with the race of Helenus King Priams Son, held there in ſervile Condition by Pandraſus then King, with them he abides. For Pirrhus in revenge of his Father ſlain at Troy, had brought thither with him Helenus, and many others into ſervitude. There Brutus among his own Stock ſo thrives in Vertue and in Arms, as renders him belov'd to Kings, and great Captains above all the Youth of that Land. Wherby the Trojans not only begin to hope, but ſecretly to move him, that he would lead them the way to liberty. They allege thir numbers, and the promis'd help of Aſſaracus a Noble Greekiſh Youth, by the Mothers ſide a Trojan; whom for that cauſe his Brother went about to diſpoſſeſs of certain Caſtles bequeath'd him by his Father. Brutus conſidering both the Forces offer'd him, and the ſtrength of thoſe Holds, not unwillingly conſents.

Firſt therfore having fortifi'd thoſe Caſtles, he with Aſſaracus and the whole Multitude betake them to the Woods and Hills, as the ſafeſt place from whence to expoſtulate; and in the name of all ſends to Pandraſus this Meſſage; That the Trojans holding it unworthy thir Anceſtors to ſerv in a Foren Kingdom, had retreated to the Woods; chooſing rather a ſavage life then a ſlaviſh: If that diſpleas'd him, that then with his leave they might depart to ſome other Soil.

As this may paſs with good allowance, that the Trojans might be many in theſe parts, for Helenus was by Pirrhus made King of the Chaonians, and the Sons of Pirrhus by Andromache Hectors Wife, could not but be powerful through all Epirus, ſo much the more it may be doubted, how theſe Trojans could be thus in Bondage, where they had Friends and Country-men ſo potent. But to examin theſe things with diligence, were but to confute the Fables of Britain, with the Fables of Greece or Italy; for of this Age, what we have to ſay, as well concerning moſt other Countries, as this Iland, is equally under queſtion. Be how it will, Pandraſus not expecting ſo bold a Meſſage from the Sons of Captives, gathers an Army; and marching toward the Woods, Brutus who had notice of his approach nigh to a Town call'd Sparatinum, (I know not what Town, but certain of no Greek name) over night planting himſelf there with good part of his men, ſuddenly ſets upon him, and with ſlaughter of the Greeks purſues him to the paſſage of a River, which mine Author names Akalon, meaning perhaps Achelous, or Acheron: where at the Ford he overlaies them afreſh. This victory obtain'd, and a ſufficient ſtrength left in Sparatinum, Brutus with Antigonus, the Kings Brother, and his Friend Anacletus, whom he had tak'n in the Fight, returns to the reſidue of his Friends in the thick Woods; while Pandraſus with all ſpeed recollecting, beſeiges the Town. Brutus to relieve his men beſeig'd, who earneſtly call'd him, diſtruſting the ſufficiency of his Force, bethinks himſelf of this Policy. Calls to him Anacletus, and threatning inſtant death elſe, both to him and his friend Antigonus, enjoyns him, that he ſhould go at the ſecond Hour of Night to the Greekiſh Leagre, and tell the Guards he had brought Antigonus by ſtealth out of Priſon to a certain woody Vale, unable through the waight of his Fetters to move furder; entreating them to come ſpeedily and fetch him in. Anacletus to ſave both himſelf and his friend Antigonus, ſwears this, and at fit Hour ſets on alone toward the Camp; is met, examin'd, and at laſt unqueſtionably known. To whom, great profeſſion of Fidelity firſt made, he frames his Tale, as had bin taught him; and they now fully aſſur'd, with a credulous raſhneſs leaving thir Stations, far'd accordingly by the Ambuſh that there awaited them. Forthwith Brutus dividing his men into three parts, leads on in ſilence to the Camp; commanding firſt each part at a ſeveral place to enter, and forbear Execution, till he with his Squadron poſſeſs'd of the King's Tent, gave Signal to them by Trumpet. The ſound wherof no ſooner heard, but huge Havock begins upon the ſleeping, and unguarded Enemy; whom the beſeiged alſo now ſallying forth, on the other ſide aſſail. Brutus the while had ſpecial care to ſeiſe and ſecure the Kings Perſon; whoſe Life ſtill within his Cuſtody, he knew was the ſureſt pledg to obtain what he ſhould demand. Day appearing, he enters the Town, there diſtributes the Kings Treaſury, and leaving the place better fortifi'd, returns with the King his Priſner to the Woods. Strait the antient and grave men he ſummons to Counſel, what they ſhould now demand of the King.

After long debate Mempricius, one of the graveſt, utterly diſſuading them from thought of longer ſtay in Greece, unleſs they meant to be deluded with a ſuttle Peace, and the awaited revenge of thoſe whoſe Friends they had ſlain, adviſes them to demand firſt the Kings Eldeſt Daughter Innogen in mariage to thir Leader Brutus with a rich Dowry, next Shipping, Money, and fit Proviſion for them all to depart the Land.

This reſolution pleaſing beſt, the King now brought in, and plac'd in a high Seat, is briefly told, that on theſe Conditions granted, he might be free; not granted, he muſt prepare to die.

Preſt with fear of death, the King readily yeelds; eſpecially to beſtow his Daughter on whom he confeſs'd ſo Noble and ſo Valiant: offers them alſo the third part of his Kingdom, if they like to ſtay; if not, to be thir Hoſtage himſelf, till he had made good his word.

The Mariage therfore ſolemniz'd, and ſhipping from all parts got together, the Trojans in a Fleet, no leſs writt'n then three hunderd four and twenty Sail, betake them to the wide Sea: where with a proſperous Courſe two days and a Night bring them on a certain Iland long before diſpeopl'd and left waſt by Sea-Rovers, the name wherof was then Leogecia, now unknown. They who were ſent out to diſcover, came at length to a ruin'd City, where was a Temple and Image of Diana that gave Oracles: but not meeting firſt or laſt ſave wild Beaſts, they return with this notice to thir Ships: Wiſhing thir General would enquire of that Oracle what Voiage to purſue.

Conſultation had, Brutus taking with him Gerion his Diviner, and twelv of the ancienteſt, with wonted Ceremonies before the inward ſhrine of the Goddeſs, in Verſe, as it ſeems the manner was, utters his requeſt, Diva potens nemorum, &c.

Goddeſs of Shades, and Huntreſs, who at will Walk'ſt on the rowling Sphear, and through the deep,
On thy third Reign the Earth look now, and tell
What Land, what Seat of reſt thou bidſt me ſeek,
What certain Seat, where I may worſhip thee
For aye, with Temples vow'd, and Virgin quires.

To whom ſleeping before the Altar, Diana in a Viſion that night thus anſwer'd, Brute ſub occaſum Solis, &c.

Brutus far to the Weſt, in th' Ocean wide
Beyond the Realm of Gaul, a Land there lies,
Sea-girt it lies, where Giants dwelt of old,
Now void, it fits thy People; thether bend
Thy courſe, there ſhalt thou find a laſting ſeat,
There to thy Sons another Troy ſhall riſe,
And Kings be born of thee, whoſe dredded might Shall aw the World, and conquer Nations bold.

Theſe Verſes originally Greek, were put in Latin, ſaith Virunnius, by Gildas a Britiſh Poet, and him to have liv'd under Claudius. Which granted true, adds much to the Antiquity of this Fable; and indeed the Latin Verſes are much better, then for the Age of Geoffrey ap-Arthur, unleſs perhaps Joſeph of Exeter, the only ſmooth Poet of thoſe times, befriended him: in this Diana overſhot her Oracle thus ending, Ipſis totius terræ ſubditus orbis erit, That to the Race of Brute Kings of this Iland, the whole Earth ſhall be ſubject.

But Brutus guided now, as he thought, by divine Conduct, ſpeeds him towards the Weſt; and after ſom encounters on the Afric ſide, arrives at a place on the Tyrrhen Sea; where he happ'ns to find the Race of thoſe Trojans, who with Antenor came into Italy; and Corineus a man much fam'd, was thir Chief: though by ſurer Authors it be reported, that thoſe Trojans with Antenor, were ſeated on the other ſide of Italy, on the Adriatic, not the Tyrrhen Shoar. But theſe joining Company, and paſt the Herculean Pillars, at the mouth of Ligeris in Aquitania caſt Anchor: Where after ſom diſcovery made of the Place, Corineus hunting nigh the ſhoar with his Men, is by Meſſengers of the King Goffarius Pictus met, and queſtion'd about his Errand there. Who not anſwering to thir mind, Imbertus, one of them, lets fly an Arrow at Corineus, which he avoiding, ſlaies him: and the Pictavian himſelf heerupon levying his whole Force, is overthrown by Brutus, and Corineus; who with the Battel Ax which he was wont to manage againſt the Tyrrhen Giants, is ſaid to have done marvels. But Goffarius having drawn to his aid the whole Country of Gaul, at that time govern'd by twelv Kings, puts his Fortune to a ſecond Trial; wherin the Trojans over-born by Multitude, are driv'n back, and beſeig'd in thir own Camp, which by good foreſight was ſtrongly ſituate. Whence Brutus unexpectedly iſſuing out, and Corineus in the mean while, whoſe device it was, aſſaulting them behind from a Wood, where he had convay'd his men the Night before: The Trojans are again Victors, but with the loſs of Turon a Valiant Nefew of Brutus; whoſe Aſhes left in that place, gave name to the City of Tours, built there by the Trojans. Brutus finding now his Powers much leſſn'd, and this yet not the place foretold him, leavs Aquitain, and with an eaſy Courſe, arriving at Totneſs in Dev'nſhire, quickly perceivs heer to be the promis'd end of his Labours.

The Iland not yet Britain but Albion, was in a manner deſert and inhoſpitable; kept only by a remnant of Giants, whoſe exceſſive Force and Tyranie had conſum'd the reſt. Them Brutus deſtroys, and to his People divides the Land, which with ſome reference to his own Name he thenceforth calls Britain. To Corineus, Cornwal, as now we call it, fell by Lot; the rather by him lik't, for that the hugeſt Giants, in Rocks and Caves were ſaid to lurk ſtill there; which kind of Monſters to deal with was his old Exerciſe.

And heer with leave be ſpok'n to recite a grand Fable, though dignifi'd by our beſt Poets, while Brutus on a certain Feſtival Day ſolemnly kept on that ſhoar, where he firſt landed, was with the People in great jollity and mirth, a crew of theſe Savages breaking in upon them, began on the ſudden another ſort of Game then at ſuch a meeting was expected. But at length by many hands overcom, Goemagog the hugeſt, in higth twelv Cubits, is reſerv'd alive, that with him Corineus, who deſir'd nothing more, might try his ſtrength; whom in a Wreſtle the Giant catching aloft, with a terrible hugg broke three of his Ribs: nevertheleſs Corineus enrag'd, heaving him up by main force, and on his Shoulders bearing him to the next high Rock, threw him headlong all ſhatter'd into the Sea, and left his Name on the Cliff, call'd ever ſince Langoemagog, which is to ſay, the Giant's Leap.

After this, Brutus in a choſen place builds Troia nova, chang'd in time to Trinovantum, now London: and began to enact Laws; Heli being then high Prieſt in Judæa: and having govern'd the whole Ile 24 Years, dy'd, and was buried in his new Troy. His three Sons Locrine, Albanact, and Camber divide the Land by conſent. Locrine had the middle part Loegria; Camber poſſeſs'd Cambria or Wales; Albanact Albania, now Scotland. But he in the end by Humber King of the Hunns, who with a Fleet invaded that Land, was ſlain in fight, and his People driv'n back into Loegria. Locrine and his Brother go out againſt Humber; who now marching onward, was by them defeated, and in a River drown'd, which to this day retains its name. Among the ſpoils of his Camp and Navy, were found certain young Maids, and Eſtrildis, above the reſt, paſſing fair, the Daughter of a King in Germany; from whence Humber, as he went waſting the Sea-Coaſt, had led her Captive: whom Locrine, though before contracted to the Daughter of Corineus, reſolvs to marry. But being forc'd and threatn'd by Corineus, whoſe Autority, and Power he fear'd, Guendolen the Daughter he yeelds to marry, but in ſecret loves the other: and oft-times retiring as to ſom privat Sacrifice, through Vaults and Paſſages made under ground, and ſeven Years thus enjoying her, had by her a Daughter equally fair, whoſe Name was Sabra. But when once his fear was off by the Death of Corineus, not content with ſecret Enjoyment, divorcing Guendolen, he makes Eſtrildis now his Queen. Guendolen all in rage departs into Cornwall, where Madan, the Son ſhe had by Locrine, was hitherto brought up by Corineus his Grandfather. And gathering an Army of her Father's Friends and Subjects, gives Battel to her Husband by the River Sture; wherein Locrine ſhot with an Arrow ends his Life. But not ſo ends the fury of Guendolen; for Eſtrildis and her Daughter Sabra, ſhe throws into a River: and to leave a Monument of Revenge, proclaims, that the ſtream be thenceforth call'd after the Damſel's Name; which by length of time is chang'd now to Sabrina, or Severn.

Fifteen Years ſhe governs in behalf of her Son; then reſigning to him at Age, retires to her Father's Dominion. This ſaith my Author, was in the days of Samuel. Madan hath the praiſe to have well and peacefully rul'd the ſpace of 40 Years; leaving behind him two Sons, Mempricius, and Malim. Mempricius had firſt to do with the ambition of his Brother, aſpiring to ſhare with him in the Kingdom; whom therfore at a meeting to compoſe matters, with a treachery which his cauſe needed not, he ſlew.

Nor was he better in the ſole poſſeſſion, wherof ſo ill he could endure a Partner, killing his Nobles, and thoſe eſpecially next to ſucceed him; till laſtly giv'n over to unnatural Luſt, in the twentieth of his Reign, hunting in a Foreſt, he was devour'd by Wolves.

His Son Ebranc, a Man of mighty Strength and Stature, reign'd 40 Years. He firſt after Brutus waſted Gaul; and returning rich and proſperous, builded Caerebranc, now York; in Albania, Alclud, Mount Agned, or the Caſtle of Maydens, now Edinburgh. He had 20 Sons and 30 Daughters by 20 Wives. His Daughters he ſent to Silvius Alba into Italy, who beſtow'd them on his Peers of the Trojan Line. His Sons under the leading of Aſſaracus thir Brother, won them Lands and Signiories in Germany; thence call'd, from theſe Brethren Germania: a Derivation too haſtily ſuppos'd, perhaps before the word Germanus or the Latin Tongue was in uſe. Som who have deſcrib'd Henault, as Jacobus Bergomas, and Leſſabeus, are cited to affirm that Ebranc in his War there, was by Brunchildis Lord of Henault put to the worſe.

Brutus therfore ſurnam'd Greenſhield ſucceeding, to repair his Father's Loſſes, as the ſame Leſſabeus reports, fought a ſecond Battail in Henault with Brunchild at the mouth of Scaldis, and encamp'd on the River Hania. Of which our Spencer alſo thus ſings.

> Let Scaldis tell, and let tell Hania,
> And let the Marſh of Eſthambruges tell
> What colour were thir Waters that ſame day,
> And all the Moar twixt Elverſham and Dell,
> With Blood of Henalois which therin fell;
> How oft that day did ſad Brunchildis ſee
> The Greenſhield dy'd in dolorous Vermeil, &c.

But Henault, and Brunchild, and Greenſhield, ſeem newer Names then for a Story pretended thus antient.

Him ſucceeded Leil, a maintainer of Peace and Equity; but ſlackn'd in his latter end, whence aroſe ſom civil Diſcord. He built in the North Cairleil; and in the days of Solomon.

Rudhuddibras, or Hudibras, appeaſing the Commotions which his Father could not, founded Caerkeynt or Canturbury, Caergueni, or Winchester, and Mount Paladur, now Septonia or Shaftsbury: but this by others is contradicted.

Bladud his Son built Caerbadus or Bathe, and thoſe medcinable Waters he dedicated to Minerva, in whoſe Temple there he kept Fire continually burning. He was a Man of great Invention, and taught Necromancy: till having made him Wings to fly, he fell down upon the Temple of Apollo in Trinovant, and ſo dy'd after twenty Years reign.

Hitherto from Father to Son the direct Line hath run on: but Leir who next reign'd, had only three Daughters, and no Male Iſſue: govern'd laudably, and built Caer-Leir, now Leiceſtre, on the bank of Sora. But at laſt, failing through Age, he determins to beſtow his Daughters, and ſo among them to divide his Kingdom. Yet firſt to try which of them lov'd him beſt (a Trial that might have made him, had he known as wiſely how to try, as he ſeem'd to know how much the trying behoov'd him) he reſolves a ſimple Reſolution, to ask them ſolemnly in order; and which of them ſhould profeſs largeſt, her to believ. Gonorill th' eldeſt, apprehending too well her Father's weakneſs, makes anſwer invoking Heav'n, That ſhe lov'd him above her Soul. Therfore, quoth the old Man overjoy'd, ſince thou ſo honourſt my declin'd Age, to thee and the Husband whom thou ſhalt chooſe, I give the third part of my Realm. So fair a ſpeeding for a few words ſoon utter'd, was to Regan the ſecond, ample inſtruction what to ſay. She on the ſame demand ſpares no proteſting, and the Gods muſt witneſs, that otherwiſe to expreſs her thoughts ſhe knew not, but that ſhe lov'd him above all Creatures; and ſo receavs an equal reward with her Siſter. But Cordeilla the youngeſt, though hitherto beſt belov'd, and now before her Eyes the rich and preſent hire of a little eaſie ſoothing, the danger alſo, and the loſs likely to betide plain dealing, yet moves not from the ſolid purpoſe of a ſincere and vertuous Anſwer. Father, ſaith ſhe, my love towards you, is as my Duty bids; what ſhould a Father ſeek, what can a Child promiſe more? they who pretend beyond this, flatter. When the old Man, ſorry to hear this, and wiſhing her to recal thoſe words, perſiſted asking, with a loial ſadneſs at her Father's infirmity, but ſomthing on the ſudden, harſh, and glancing rather at her Siſters, then ſpeaking her own mind, Two waies only, ſaith ſhe, I have to anſwer what you require me; the former, your command is, I ſhould recant; accept then this other which is left me; look how much you have, ſo much is your value, and ſo much I love you. Then hear thou, quoth Leir now all in paſſion, what thy Ingratitude hath gain'd thee; becauſe thou haſt not reverenc'd thy aged Father equal to thy Siſters, part in my Kingdom, or what what elſe is mine reck'n to have none. And without delay gives in Marriage his other Daughters, Gonorill to Maglaunus Duke of Albania, Regan to Henninus Duke of Cornwall; with them in preſent half his Kingdom; the reſt to follow at his Death. In the mean while Fame was not ſparing to divulge the Wiſdom and other Graces of Cordeilla, inſomuch that Aganippus a great King in Gaul (however he came by his Greek Name not found in any Regiſter of French Kings) ſeeks her to Wife, and nothing alter'd at the loſs of her Dowry, receavs her gladly in ſuch manner as ſhe was ſent him. After this King Leir more and more drooping with Years, became an eaſy Prey to his Daughters and thir Husbands; who now by daily encroachment had ſeis'd the whole Kingdom into thir hands: and the old King is put to ſojorn with his eldeſt Daughter, attended only by threeſcore Knights. But they in a ſhort while grudg'd at, as too numerous and diſorderly for continual Gueſts, are reduc'd to thirty. Not brooking that Affront, the old King betakes him to his ſecond Daughter: but there alſo Diſcord ſoon ariſing between the Servants of differing Maſters in one Family, five only are ſuffer'd to attend him. Then back again he returns to the other; hoping that ſhe his eldeſt could not but have more pity on his gray Hairs: but ſhe now refuſes to admit him, unleſs he be content with one only of his Followers. At laſt the remembrance of his youngeſt Cordeilla comes to his thoughts; and now acknowledging how true her words had bin, though with little hope from whom he had ſo injur'd, be it but to pay her the laſt recompence ſhe can have from him, his confeſſion of her wiſe forewarning, that ſo perhaps his Miſery, the proof and experiment of her Wiſdom, might ſomthing ſoft'n her, he takes his Journy into France. Now might be ſeen a difference between the ſilent, or down-right ſpok'n Affection of ſom Children to thir Parents, and the talkative Obſequiouſneſs of others; while the hope of Inheritance over-acts them, and on the Tongues end enlarges thir Duty. Cordeilla out of meer love, without the ſuſpicion of expected Reward, at the meſſage only of her Father in diſtreſs, pours forth true filial Tears. And not enduring either that her own, or any other Eye ſhould ſee him in ſuch forlorn condition as his Meſſenger declar'd, diſcreetly appoints one of her truſted Servants, firſt to convay him privatly towards ſom good Sea Town, there to array him, bathe him, cheriſh him, furniſh him with ſuch Attendance and State, as beſeem'd his Dignity, that then, as from his firſt landing, he might ſend word of his Arrival to her Husband Aganippus. Which don with all mature, and requiſit contrivance, Cordeilla with the King her Husband, and all the Barony of his Realm, who then firſt had news of his paſſing the Sea, go out to meet him; and after all honourable and joyful Entertainment, Aganippus, as to his Wives Father, and his Royal Gueſt, ſurrenders him, during his abode there, the power, and diſpoſal of his whole Dominion: permitting his Wife Cordeilla to go with an Army, and ſet her Father upon his Throne. Wherin her Piety ſo proſper'd, as that ſhe vanquiſh'd her impious Siſters with thoſe Dukes; and Leir again, as ſaith the Story, three Years obtain'd the Crown. To whom dying, Cordeilla with all regal Solemnities gave Burial in the Town of Leiceſtre. And then as right Heir ſucceeding, and her Huſband dead, rul'd the Land five Years in Peace. Until Marganus and Cunedagius her two Siſters Sons, not bearing that a Kingdom ſhould be govern'd by a Woman, in the unſeaſonableſt time to raiſe that quarrel againſt a Woman ſo worthy, make War againſt her, depoſe her, and impriſon her; of which impatient, and now long unexercis'd to ſuffer, ſhe there, as is related, kill'd her ſelf. The Victors between them part the Land: but Marganus the eldeſt Siſter's Son, who held by agreement from the North-ſide of Humber to Cathneſs, incited by thoſe about him to invade all as his own right, wars on Cunedagius, who ſoon met him, overcame, and overtook him in a Town of Wales, where he left his Life, and ever ſince his Name to the place.

Cunedagius was now ſole King, and govern'd with much praiſe many Years, about the time when Rome was built.

Him ſucceeded Rivallo his Son, wiſe alſo and fortunat; ſave what they tell us of three days raining Blood, and ſwarms of ſtinging Flies, wherof Men di'd. In order then Gurguſtius, Jago or Lago, his Nefew; Siſilius, Kinmarcus. Then Gorboguda, whom others name Gorbodego, and Gorbodion, who had two Sons, Ferrex and Porrex. They in the old Age of thir Father falling to contend who ſhould ſucceed, Porrex attempting by Treachery his Brother's Life, drives him into France; and in his return, though aided with the Force of that Country, defeats and ſlays him. But by his Mother Videna who leſs lov'd him, is himſelf, with the aſſiſtance of her Women, ſoon after ſlain in his Bed: With whom ended, as is thought, the Line of Brutus. Wherupon, the whole Land with civil Broils was rent into five Kingdoms, long time waging War each on other; and ſom ſay 50 Years. At length Dunwallo Molmutius the Son of Cloten King of Cornwal, one of the foreſaid five, excelling in Valour, and goodlineſs of Perſon, after his Father's deceaſe, found means to reduce again the whole Iland into a Monarchy; ſubduing the reſt at opportunities. Firſt, Ymner King of Loegria whom he ſlew; then Rudaucus of Cambria, Statcrius of Albania, confederat together. In which fight Dunwallo is reported, while the Victory hung doubtful, to have us'd this Art. He takes with him 600 ſtout Men, bids them put on the Armour of thir ſlain Enemies; and ſo unexpectly approaching the Squadron, where thoſe two Kings had plac'd themſelves in fight, from that part which they thought ſecureſt, aſſaults and diſpatches them. Then diſplaying his own Enſigns which before he had conceal'd, and ſending notice to the other part of his Army what was don, adds to them new Courage, and gains a final Victory. This Dunwallo was the firſt in Britain that wore a Crown of Gold; and therfore by ſome reputed the firſt King. He eſtabliſhed the Molmutine Laws, famous among the Engliſh to this day; writt'n long after in Latin by Gildas, and in Saxon by King Alfred: So ſaith Geofry, but Gildas denies to have known aught of the Britans before Cæſar; much leſs knew Alfred. Theſe Laws, whoever made them, beſtow'd on Temples the Privilege of Sanctuary; to Cities alſo, and the ways thither leading, yea to Plows granted a kind of like refuge; and made ſuch riddance of Thieves and Robbers, that all Paſſages were ſafe. Forty Years he govern'd alone, and was buried nigh to the Temple of Concord; which he, to the memory of Peace reſtor'd, had built in Trinovant.

His two Sons, Belinus and Brennus, contending about the Crown, by deciſion of Friends, came at length to an Accord; Brennus to have the North of Humber, Belinus the Sov'rainty of all. But the younger not long ſo contented, that he, as they whiſper'd to him, whoſe Valour had ſo oft repell'd the Invaſions of Ceulphus the Morine Duke, ſhould now be ſubject to his Brother, upon new Deſign ſails into Norway; enters League and Affinity with Elſing that King: which Belinus perceaving, in his abſence diſpoſſeſſes him of all the North. Brennus with a Fleet of Norwegians, makes toward Britain; but encounter'd by Guithlac the Daniſh King, who laying claim to his Bride, purſu'd him on the Sea; his haſte was retarded, and he bereft of his Spouſe: who from the Fight by a ſudden Tempeſt, was with the Daniſh King driv'n on Northumberland, and brought to Belinus. Brennus nevertheleſs finding means to recollect his Navy, lands in Albania, and gives Battel to his Brother in the Wood Calaterium; but loſing the day, eſcapes with one ſingle Ship into Gaul. Mean while the Dane, upon his own offer to become tributary, ſent home with his new Prize, Belinus returns his thoughts to the adminiſtring of Juſtice, and the perfecting of his Father's Law. And to explain what High-ways might enjoy the foreſaid Privileges, he caus'd to be drawn out and pav'd four main Roads to the utmoſt length and bredth of the Iland, and two others athwart; which are ſince attributed to the Romans. Brennus on the other ſide ſolliciting to his Aid the Kings of Gaul, happ'ns at laſt on Seginus Duke of the Allobroges; where his worth, and comelineſs of Perſon, wan him the Duke's Daughter and Heir. In whoſe Right he ſhortly ſucceeding, and by obtain'd leave paſſing with a great Hoſt through the length of Gaul, gets footing once again in Britain. Now was Belinus unprepar'd: And now the Battel ready to join, Conuvenna the Mother of them both, all in a fright, throws her ſelf between; and calling earneſtly to Brennus her Son, whoſe abſence had ſo long depriv'd her of his ſight, after imbracements and tears, aſſails him with ſuch a motherly Power, and the mention of things ſo dear and reverend, as irreſiſtibly wrung from him all his Enmity againſt Belinus.

Then are hands join'd, Reconciliation made firm, and Counſel held to turn thir united Preparations on Foren parts. Thence that by theſe two all Gallia was over-run, the Story tells; and what they did in Italy, and at Rome, if theſe be they, and not Gauls, who took that City, the Roman Authors can beſt relate. So far from home I undertake not for the Monmouth Chronicle; which here againſt the ſtream of Hiſtory carries up and down theſe Brethren, now into Germany, then again to Rome, purſuing Gabius and Porſena, two unheard of Conſuls. Thus much is more generally believ'd, that both this Brennus, and another famous Captain, Britomarus, whom the Epitomiſt Florus and others mention, were not Gauls but Britains; the name of the firſt in that Tongue ſignifying a King, and of the other a Great Britain. However Belinus after a while returning home, the reſt of his days rul'd in Peace, Wealth, and Honour, above all his Predeceſſors; building ſom Cities, of which one was Caeroſe upon Oſca, ſince Caerlegion; beautifying others, as Trinovant, with a Gate, a Hav'n, and a Towr, on the Thames, retaining yet his Name; on the top wherof his Aſhes are ſaid to have bin laid up in a Golden Urn.

After him Gurguntius Barbirus was King, mild and juſt, but yet inheriting his Father's Courage; he ſubdu'd the Dacian, or Dane, who refus'd to pay the Tribute cov'nanted to Belinus for his Enlargement. In his return finding about the Orkneies 30 Ships of Spain, or Biſcay, fraught with Men and Women for a Plantation, whoſe Captain alſo Bartholinus wrongfully baniſh't, as he pleaded, beſought him that ſom part of his Territory might be aſſign'd them to dwell in, he ſent with them certain of his own Men to Ireland, which then lay unpeopl'd; and gave them that Iland to hold of him as in Homage. He was buried in Caerlegion, a City which he had wall'd about.

Guitheline his Son is alſo remember'd as a juſt and good Prince, and his Wife Martia to have excell'd ſo much in Wiſdom, as to venture upon a new Inſtitution of Laws. Which King Alfred tranſlating, call'd Marchen Leage; but more truly therby is meant, the Mercian Law; not tranſlated by Alfred, but digeſted or incorporated with the Weſt-Saxon. In the minority of her Son ſhe had the Rule; and then, as may be ſuppos'd, brought forth theſe Laws, not her ſelf, for Laws are Maſculine Births, but by the Advice of her ſageſt Counſellors; and therin ſhe might do vertuouſly, ſince it befel her to ſupply the Nonage of her Son: elſe nothing more awry from the Law of God and Nature, then that a Woman ſhould give Laws to Men.

Her Son Siſilius coming to Years, receiv'd the Rule; then in order Kimarus, then Danius or Elanius his Brother. Then Morindus, his Son by Tangueſtela a Concubin, who is recorded a Man of exceſſive Strength, Valiant, Liberal, and fair of Aſpect, but immanely Cruel; not ſparing in his Anger Enemy or Friend, if any Weapon were in his hand. A certain King of the Morines, or Picards, invaded Northumberland; whoſe Army this King, though not wanting ſufficient Numbers, chiefly by his own Proweſs overcame: But diſhonour'd his Victory by the cruel uſage of his Priſners, whom his own hands, or others in his preſence put all to ſeveral Deaths: well fitted to ſuch a beſtial Cruelty was his end; for hearing of a huge Monſter that from the Iriſh Sea infeſted the Coaſt, and in the pride of his Strength fooliſhly attempting to ſet manly Valour againſt a brute Vaſtneſs, when his Weapons were all in vain, by that horrible Mouth he was catch't up and devour'd.

Gorbonian the eldeſt of his five Sons, then whom a juſter Man liv'd not in his Age, was a great builder of Temples, and gave to all what was thir due; to his Gods devout Worſhip, to Men of deſert Honor and Preferment, to the Commons encouragement in thir Labours and Trades, defence and protection from Injuries and Oppreſſions; ſo that the Land floriſh'd above her Neighbours, Violence and Wrong ſeldom was heard of. His Death was a general Loſs: he was buried in Trinovant.

Archigallo the ſecond Brother follow'd not his Example; but depreſs'd the ancient Nobility; and by peeling the wealthier ſort, ſtuff'd his Treaſury, and took the right way to be depos'd.

Elidure the next Brother, ſurnam'd the Pious, was ſet up in his place; a Mind ſo noble, and ſo moderat, as almoſt is incredible to have bin ever found. For having held the Scepter five Years, hunting one day in the Foreſt of Calater, he chanc'd to meet his depoſed Brother, wandring in mean condition; who had bin long in vain beyond the Seas, importuning Foren Aids to his Reſtorement; and was now in a poor Habit, with only ten Followers, privatly return'd to find Subſiſtence among his ſecret Friends. At the unexpected ſight of him, Elidure himſelf alſo then but thinly accompanied, runs to him with open Arms; and after many dear and ſincere Welcomings, conveys him to the City Alclud; there hides him in his own Bed-chamber. Afterwards faining himſelf ſick, ſummons all his Peers as about greateſt Affairs; where admitting them one by one, as if his Weakneſs endur'd not the diſturbance of more at once, cauſes them, willing or unwilling, once more to ſwear Allegiance to Archigallo. Whom after Reconciliation made on all ſides, he leads to York; and from his own head, places the Crown on the head of his Brother. Who thenceforth, Vice it ſelf diſſolving in him, and forgetting her firmeſt hold with the admiration of a Deed ſo Heroic, became a true converted Man; rul'd worthily ten Years, dy'd, and was buried in Caerleir. Thus was a Brother ſav'd by a Brother, to whom love of a Crown, the thing that ſo often dazles, and vitiats mortal Men, for which thouſands of neareſt Blood have deſtroy'd each other, was in reſpect of Brotherly dearneſs, a contemptible thing.

Elidure now in his own behalf reaſſumes the Government, and did as was worthy ſuch a Man to do. When Providence, that ſo great Vertue might want no ſort of trial to make it more illuſtrious, ſtirs up Vigenius, and Peredure his youngeſt Brethren, againſt him who had deſerv'd ſo nobly of that Relation, as leaſt of all by a Brother to be injur'd. Yet him they defeat, him they impriſon in the Towr of Trinovant, and divide his Kingdom; the North to Peredure, the South to Vigenius. After whoſe Death Peredure obtaining all; ſo much the better us'd his Power, by how much the worſe he got it: So that Elidure now is hardly miſs't. But yet in all right owing to his Elder the due place wherof he had depriv'd him, Fate would that he ſhould die firſt: And Elidure after many years Impriſonment, is now the third time ſeated on the Throne; which at laſt he enjoy'd long in Peace, finiſhing the interrupted courſe of his mild and juſt Reign, as full of vertuous Deeds, as Days to his end.

After theſe five Sons of Morindus, ſucceded alſo thir Sons in order. * Regin of Gorbonian, Marganus of Archigallo, both good Kings. But Enniaunus his Brother taking other courſes, was after ſix Years depos'd. Then Idwallo taught by a near Example, govern'd ſoberly. Then Runno, then Geruntius, He of Peredure, this laſt the Son of Elidure. From whoſe Loyns (for that likely is the durable, and ſurviving Race that ſprings of juſt Progenitors) iſſu'd a long deſcent of Kings, whoſe Names only for many Succeſſions, without other memory, ſtand thus regiſter'd; Catellus, Coillus, Porrex, Cherin, and his three Sons, Fulgenius, Eldadus, and Andradius, his Son Vrianus; Eliud, Eledaucus, Clotenus, Gurguntius, Merianus, Bleduno, Capis, Oenus, Siſillius, twenty Kings in a continu'd row, that either did nothing, or liv'd in Ages that wrote nothing, at leaſt a foul pretermiſſion in the Author of this, whether Story or Fable; himſelf weary, as ſeems, of his own tedious Tale.

* Matth. Weſtm.

But to make amends for this Silence, Blegabredus next ſucceeding, is recorded to have excell'd all before him in the Art of Muſic; opportunely, had he but left us one Song of his 20 Predeceſſors doings.

Yet after him nine more ſucceeded in Name; His Brother Archimailus, Eldol, Redion, Rederchius, Samulius, Peniſſel, Pir, Capoirus; but Cliguellius, with the addition of Modeſt, Wiſe, and Juſt.

His Son Heli reign'd 40 Years, and had three Sons, Lud, Caſſibelan, and Nennius. This Heli ſeems to be the ſame whom Ninnius in his Fragment calls Minocan; for him he writes to be the Father of Caſſibelan. Lud was he who enlarg'd, and wall'd about Trinovant; there kept his Court, made it the prime City, and call'd it from his own Name Caer-Lud, or Lud's Town, now London. Which, as is alledg'd out of Gildas, became matter of great diſſention betwixt him, and his Brother Nennius; who took it hainouſly that the Name of Troy thir ancient Country ſhould be aboliſh'd for any new one. Lud was hardy, and bold in War, in Peace a jolly Feaſter. He conquer'd many Ilands of the Sea, ſaith Huntingdon, and was buried by the Gate which from thence we call Ludgate. His two Sons, Androgeus and Tenuantius, were were left to the Tuition of Caſſibelan; whoſe Bounty and high Demeanor, ſo wraught with the common People, as got him eaſily the Kingdom transfer'd upon himſelf. He neverthleſs continuing to favour and ſupport his Nefews, confers freely upon Androgeus, London with Kent; upon Tenuantius, Cornwal; reſerving a Superiority both over them, and all the other Princes to himſelf, till the Romans for a while circumſcrib'd his Power. Thus far, though leaning only on the Credit of Geffrey Monmouth, and his Aſſertors, I yet for the ſpecified Cauſes have thought it not beneath my purpoſe, to relate what I found. Wherto I neither oblige the belief of other Perſon, nor over-haſtily ſubſcribe mine own. Nor have I ſtood with others computing or collating Years and Chronologies, leſt I ſhould be vainly curious about the Time and Circumſtance of things wherof the Subſtance is ſo much in doubt. By this time, like one who had ſet out on his way by Night, and travail'd through a Region of ſmooth or idle Dreams, our Hiſtory now arrives on the Confines, where Daylight and Truth meet us with a clear Dawn, repreſenting to our view, though at a far diſtance, true Colours and Shapes. For albeit Cæſar, whoſe Autority we are now firſt to follow, wanted not who tax'd him of miſreporting in his Commentaries, yea in his Civil Wars againſt Pompey, much more, may we think, in the Britiſh Affairs, of whoſe little skill in writing he did not eaſily hope to be contradicted; yet now in ſuch variety of good Authors, we hardly can miſs, from one hand or other, to be ſufficiently inform'd as of things paſt ſo long ago. But this will better be referr'd to a ſecond Diſcourſe.

THE HISTORY OF BRITAIN.

The Second Book.

I Am now to write of what befel the Britains from fifty and three years before the Birth of our Saviour, when firſt the Romans came in, till the decay and ceaſing of that Empire; a Story of much Truth, and for the firſt hunderd years and ſomwhat more, collected without much Labour. So many and ſo prudent were the Writers, which thoſe two, the civileſt and the wiſeſt of European Nations, both Italy and Greece, afforded to the Actions of that puiſſant City. For worthy Deeds are not often deſtitute of worthy Relaters: as by a certain Fate great Acts and great Eloquence have moſt commonly gon hand in hand, equalling and honoring each other in the ſame Ages. 'Tis true that in obſcureſt times, by ſhallow and unskilful Writers, the indiſtinct noiſe of many Battels, and Devaſtations of many Kingdoms over-run and loſt, hath come to our ears. For what wonder, if in all Ages Ambition and the love of Rapine hath ſtirr'd up greedy and violent Men to bold Attempts in waſting and ruining Wars, which to Poſterity have left the Work of wild Beaſts and Deſtroyers, rather then the Deeds and Monuments of Men and Conquerors? But he whoſe juſt and true Valour uſes the neceſſity of War and Dominion, not to deſtroy but to prevent Deſtruction, to bring in Liberty againſt Tyrants, Law and Civility among barbarous Nations, knowing that when he conquers all things elſe, he cannot conquer Time or Detraction, wiſely conſcious of this his want as well as of his Worth not to be forgott'n or conceal'd, honours and hath recourſe to the aid of Eloquence, his freindlieſt and beſt Supply; by whoſe immortal Record his noble Deeds, which elſe were tranſitory, becoming fixt and durable againſt the Force of Years and Generations, he fails not to continue through all Poſterity, over Envy, Death, and Time, alſo victorious. Therfore when the Eſteem of Science and liberal Study waxes low in the Commonwealth, we may preſume that alſo there all civil Vertue, and worthy Action is grown as low to a decline: and then Eloquence, as it were conſorted in the ſame Deſtiny, with the decreaſe and fall of Vertue corrupts alſo and fades; at leaſt reſigns her Office of relating to illiterat and frivolous Hiſtorians, ſuch as the Perſons themſelvs both deſerv, and are beſt pleas'd with; whilſt they want either the underſtanding to chooſe better, or the Innocence to dare invite the examining, and ſearching Stile of an intelligent and faithful Writer to the Survay of thir unſound Exploits, better befreinded by Obſcurity then Fame. As for theſe, the only Authors we have of Britiſh Matters, while the Power of Rome reach'd hither, (for Gildas affirms that of the Roman times no Britiſh Writer was in his days extant, or if any ever were, either burnt by Enemies, or tranſported with ſuch as fled the Pictiſh and Saxon Invaſions) theſe therfore only Roman Authors ther be who in the Engliſh Tongue have laid together as much, and perhaps more then was requiſite to a Hiſtory of Britain. So that were it not for leaving an unſightly gap ſo neer to the beginning, I ſhould have judg'd this Labour, wherin ſo little ſeems to be requir'd above Tranſcription, almoſt ſuperfluous. Notwithſtanding ſince I muſt through it, if ought by Diligence may be added or omitted, or by other diſpoſing may be more explain'd, or more expreſs'd, I ſhall aſſay.

Cic. Att. l. 4. Ep. 17.

Julius Cæſar (of whom, and of the Roman Free State, more then what appertains, is not here to be diſcours'd) having ſubdu'd moſt part of Gallia, which by a potent Faction he had obtain'd of the Senat as his Province for many years, ſtirr'd up with a deſire of adding ſtill more Glory to his Name, and the whole Roman Empire to his Ambition, ſom ſay, with a far meaner and ignobler, the deſire of Britiſh Pearls, whoſe bigneſs he delighted to ballance in his hand, determins, and that upon no unjuſt pretended occaſion, to try his Force in the Conqueſt alſo of Britain. For he underſtood that the Britains in moſt of his Gallian Wars had ſent Supplies againſt him, had receiv'd Fugitives of the Bellovaci his Enemies, and were call'd over to aid the Cities of Armorica, which had the year before conſpir'd all in a new Rebellion. Therfore Cæſar, though now the Summer well nigh ending, and the Seaſon unagreeable to tranſport a War, yet judg'd it would be great Advantage, only to get entrance into the Ile, Knowledg of the Men, the Places, the Ports, the Acceſſes; which then, it ſeems, were ev'n to the Gauls thir Neighbours almoſt unknown. For except Merchants and Traders, it is not oft, ſaith he, that any uſe to travel thether; and to thoſe that do, beſides the Sea Coaſt, and the Ports next to Gallia, nothing elſe is known. But heer I muſt require, as Pollio did, the Diligence, at leaſt the Memory of Cæſar: for if it were true, as they of Rhemes told him, that Divitiachus, not long before a puiſſant King of the Soiſſons, had Britain alſo under his Command, beſides the Belgian Colonies which he affirms to have nam'd, and peopl'd many Provinces there; if alſo the Britans had ſo frequently giv'n them aid in all thir Wars; if laſtly the Druid Learning honour'd ſo much among them, were at firſt taught them out of Britain, and they who ſooneſt would attain that Diſciplin, ſent hether to learn; it appears not how Britain at that time ſhould be ſo utterly unknown in Gallia, or only known to Merchants, yea to them ſo little, that being call'd together from all parts, none could be found to inform Cæſar of what bigneſs the Ile, what Nations, how great, what uſe of War they had, what Laws, or ſo much as what commodious Havens for bigger Veſſels. Of all which things as it were then firſt to make diſcovery, he ſends Caius Voluſenus, in a long Galley, with Command to return as ſoon as this could be effected. He in the mean time with his whole Power draws nigh to the Morine Coaſt, whence the ſhorteſt Paſſage was into Britain. Hether his Navy which he us'd againſt the Armoricans, and what elſe of Shipping can be provided, he draws together. This known in Britain, Embaſſadors are ſent from many of the States there, who promiſe Hoſtages and Obedience to the Roman Empire. Them, after Audience giv'n, Cæſar as largely promiſing and exhorting to continue in that mind, ſends home, and with them Comius of Arras, whom he had made King of that Country, and now ſecretly employ'd to gain a Roman Party among the Britans, in as many Cities as he found inclinable, and to tell them, that he himſelf was ſpeeding thether. Voluſenus with what Diſcovery of the Iland he could make from aboard his Ship, not daring to venture on the ſhoar, within five days returns to Cæſar. Who ſoon after, with two Legions, ordnarily amounting, of Romans and thir Allies, to about 25000 Foot, and 4500 Horſe, the Foot in 80 Ships of Burden, the Horſe in 18, beſides what Gallies were appointed for his chief Commanders, ſets off about the third watch of Night with a good Gale to Sea; leaving behind him Sulpitius Rufus to make good the Port with a ſufficient Strength. But the Horſe whoſe appointed Shipping lay Wind-bound 8 Mile upward in another Hav'n, had much trouble to imbark. Cæſar now within ſight of Britain beholds on every Hill multitudes of armed Men, ready to forbid his Landing; and Cicero writes to his Friend Atticus, that the Acceſſes of the Iland were wondrouſly fortify'd with ſtrong Works or Moles. Heer from the fourth to the ninth hour of day he awaits at Anchor the coming up of his whole Fleet. Mean while with his Legats and Tribuns conſulting and giving order to fit all things for what might happ'n in ſuch a various and floating Water-fight as was to be expected. This place, which was a narrow Bay, cloſe environ'd with Hills, appearing no way commodious, he removes to a plain and open ſhoar 8 Mile diſtant; commonly ſuppos'd about Deal in Kent. Which when the Britans perceav'd, thir Horſe and Chariots, as then they us'd in fight, ſcowring before, thir main Powr ſpeeding after, ſom thick upon the ſhoar, others not tarrying to be aſſail'd, ride in among the Waves to encounter, and aſſault the Romans ev'n under thir Ships, with ſuch a bold and free Hardihood, that Cæſar himſelf between confeſſing and excuſing that his Souldiers were to com down from thir Ships, to ſtand in Water heavy arm'd, and to fight at once, denies not but that the Terror of ſuch new and reſolute Oppoſition made them forget thir wonted Valour. To ſuccour which he commands his Gallies, a ſight unuſual to the Britans, and more apt for Motion, drawn from the bigger Veſſels, to row againſt the op'n ſide of the Enemy, and thence with Slings, Engines, and Darts, to beat them back. But neither yet, though amaz'd at the ſtrangeneſs of thoſe new Sea-Caſtles, bearing up ſo neer, and ſo ſwiftly as almoſt to over-whelm them, the hurtling of Oars, the battring of feirce Engines againſt thir Bodies barely expos'd, did the Britans give much ground, or the Romans gain; till he who bore the Eagle of the tenth Legion, yet in the Gallies, firſt beſeeching his Gods, ſaid, thus alow'd, Leap down Souldiers, unleſs ye mean to betray your Enſign; I for my part will perform what I ow to the Commonwealth and my General. This utter'd, over-board he leaps, and with his Eagle feircly advanc'd runs upon the Enemy; the reſt hartning one another not to admit the Diſhonour of ſo nigh loſing thir cheif Standard, follow him reſolutely. Now was fought eagerly on both ſides. Ours who well knew thir own Advantages, and expertly us'd them, now in the Shallows, now on the Sand, ſtill as the Romans went trooping to thir Enſigns, receav'd them, diſpatch'd them, and with the help of thir Horſe, put them every where to great Diſorder. But Cæſar cauſing all his Boats and Shallops to be fill'd with Souldiers, commanded to ply up and down continually with Relief where they ſaw need; wherby at length all the Foot now diſ-imbark'd, and got together in ſom order on firm ground, with a more ſteddy charge put the Britans to flight: but wanting all thir Horſe, whom the Winds yet with-held from ſailing, they were not able to make purſuit. In this confuſed Fight Scæva a Roman Souldier having preſs'd too far among the Britans, and beſet round, after incredible Valour ſhewn, ſingle againſt a multitnde, ſwom back ſafe to his General; and in the place that rung with his Praiſes, earneſtly beſought Pardon for his raſh Adventure againſt Diſciplin: which modeſt confeſſing after no bad Event, for ſuch a Deed wherin Valour and Ingenuity ſo much out-weigh'd Tranſgreſſion, eaſily made amends and preferr'd him to be a Centurion. Cæſar alſo is brought in by Julian, attributing to himſelf the Honour (if it were at all an Honour to that Perſon which he ſuſtain'd) of being the firſt that left his Ship, and took Land: but this were to make Cæſar leſs underſtand what became him than Scæva. The Britans finding themſelvs maſter'd in fight, forthwith ſend Embaſſadors to treat of Peace, promiſing to give Hoſtages, and to be at Command. With them Comius of Arras alſo return'd; whom hitherto ſince his firſt coming from Cæſar, they had detain'd in Priſon as a Spy: the blame wherof they lay on the common People; for whoſe Violence, and thir own Imprudence they crave Pardon. Cæſar complaining they had firſt ſought Peace, and then without cauſe had begun War, yet content to pardon them, commands Hoſtages: wherof part they bring in ſtrait, others far up in the Country to be ſent for, they promiſe in a few days. Mean while the People disbanded and ſent home, many Princes and cheif Men from all parts of the Ile ſubmit themſelves and thir Cities to the Diſpoſe of Cæſar, who lay then encamp'd, as is thought, on Baram-down. Thus had the Britans made thir Peace; when ſuddenly an Accident unlook'd for put new Counſels into thir Minds. Four days after the coming of Cæſar, thoſe 18 Ships of burden, which from the upper Hav'n had tak'n in all the Roman Horſe, born with a ſoft Wind to the very Coaſt, in ſight of the Roman Camp, were by a ſudden Tempeſt ſcatter'd and driv'n back, ſom to the Port from whence they loos'd, others down into the Weſt Country; who finding there no Safety either to land or to caſt Anchor, choſe rather to commit themſelvs again to the troubl'd Sea; and as Oroſius reports, were moſt of them caſt away. The ſame Night, it being full Moon, the Gallies left upon dry Land, were, unaware to the Romans, cover'd with a Spring-tide, and the greater Ships that lay off at Anchor torn and beat'n with Waves, to the great perplexity of Cæſar, and his whole Army; who now had neither Shipping left to convay them back, nor any proviſion made to ſtay heer, intending to have winter'd in Gallia. All this the Britans well perceaving, and by the Compaſs of his Camp, which without Baggage appear'd the ſmaller, gueſſing at his Numbers, conſult together, and one by one ſlily withdrawing from the Camp, where they were waiting the concluſion of a Peace, reſolve to ſtop all Proviſions, and to draw out the buſineſs till Winter. Cæſar, though ignorant of what they intended, yet from the condition wherin he was, and thir other Hoſtages not ſent, ſuſpecting what was likely, begins to provide apace, all that might be, againſt what might happ'n; lays in Corn, and with Materials fetch'd from the Continent, and what was left of thoſe Ships which were paſt help, he repairs the reſt. So that now by the inceſſant Labour of his Souldiers, all but twelv were again made ſerviceable. While theſe things are doing, one of the Legions being ſent out to forage, as was accuſtom'd, and no ſuſpicion of War, while ſom of the Britans were remaining in the Country about, others alſo going and coming freely to the Roman Quarters, they who were in ſtation at the Camp Gates ſent ſpeedy Word to Cæſar, that from that part of the Country, to which the Legion went, a greater Duſt than uſual was ſeen to riſe. Cæſar gueſſing the matter, commands the Cohorts of Guard to follow him thether, two others to ſucceed in thir ſtead, the reſt all to arm and follow. They had not march'd long, when Cæſar diſcerns his Legion ſore over-charg'd: for the Britans not doubting but that thir Enemies on the morrow would be in that place which only they had left unreap'd of all thir Harveſt, had plac'd an Ambuſh; and while they were diſperſt and buſieſt at thir Labour, ſet upon them, kill'd ſom, and routed the reſt. The manner of thir fight was from a kind of Chariots; wherin riding about, and throwing Darts, with the clutter of thir Horſe, and of thir Wheels, they ofttimes broke the rank of thir Enemies; then retreating among the Horſe, and quitting thir Chariots, they fought on foot. The Charioters in the mean while ſomwhat aſide from the Battel, ſet themſelves in ſuch order, that thir Maſters at any time oppreſs'd with odds, might retire ſafely thether, having perform'd with one Perſon both the nimble Service of a Horſe-man, and the ſtedfaſt Duty of a Foot-Souldier. So much they could with thir Chariots by uſe and exerciſe, as riding on the ſpeed down a ſteep Hill, to ſtop ſuddenly, and with a ſhort rein turn ſwiftly, now running on the Beam, now on the Yoke, then in the Seat. With this ſort of new skirmiſhing the Romans now over-match'd and terrify'd, Cæſar with opportune Aid appears; for then the Britans make a ſtand: but he conſidering that now was not fit time to offer Battel, while his Men were ſcarce recover'd of ſo late a fear, only keeps his ground, and ſoon after leads back his Legions to the Camp. Furder Action for many days following was hinder'd on both ſides by foul Weather; in which time the Britans diſpatching Meſſengers round about, to how few the Romans were reduc'd, what hope of Priſe and Booty, and now if ever of freeing themſelvs from the fear of like Invaſions heerafter, by making theſe an example, if they could but now uncamp thir Enemies, at this intimation multitudes of Horſe and Foot coming down from all parts make towards the Romans. Cæſar foreſeeing that the Britans, tho beat'n and put to flight, would eaſily evade his Foot, yet with no more then 30 Horſe, which Comius had brought over, draws out his Men to Battel, puts again the Britans to flight, purſues with Slaughter, and returning burns and lays waſte all about. Wherupon Embaſſadors the ſame day being ſent from the Britans to deſire Peace, Cæſar, as his Affairs at preſent ſtood, for ſo great a breach of Faith, only impoſes on them double the former Hoſtages, to be ſent after him into Gillia: And becauſe September was nigh half ſpent, a ſeaſon not fit to tempt the Sea with his weather-beat'n Fleet, the ſame Night with a fair Wind he departs towards Belgia; whether two only of the Britain Cities ſent Hoſtages, as they promis'd, the reſt neglected. But at Rome when the News came of Cæſar's Acts here, whether it were eſteem'd a Conqueſt or a fair Eſcape, Supplication of twenty days is decreed by the Senat, as either for an Exploit done, or a Diſcovery made, wherin both Cæſar and the Romans gloried not a little, tle, though it brought no benefit either to him, or to the Commonwealth.

Dion.
Cæſar Com.

The Winter following, Cæſar, as his Cuſtom was, going into Italy, when as he ſaw that moſt of the Britans regarded not to ſend thir Hoſtages, appoints his Legats whom he left in Belgia, to provide what poſſible Shipping they could either build, or repair. Low built they were to be, as therby eaſier both to fraught, and to hale aſhoar; nor needed to be higher, becauſe the Tide ſo often changing, was obſerv'd to make the Billows leſs in our Sea then thoſe in the Mediterranean: broader likewiſe they were made, for the better tranſporting of Horſes, and all other fraughtage, being intended chiefly to that end. Theſe all about 600 in a readineſs, with 28 Ships of burden, and what with Adventurers, and other Hulks above 200, Cotta one of the Legates wrote them, as Athæneus affirms, in all 1000; Cæſar from Port Iccius, a Paſſage of ſom 30 mile over, leaving behind him Labienus to guard the Hav'n, and for other ſupply at need, with five Legions, though but 2000 Horſe, about Sun ſet hoyſing Sail with a ſlack South-Weſt, at midnight was becalm'd. And finding when it was Light, that the whole Navy lying on the Current, had fal'n off from the Ile, which now they could deſcry on thir left hand, by the unwearied labour of his Souldiers, who refus'd not to tug the Oar, and kept courſe with Ships under ſayl, he bore up as neer as might be, to the ſame place where he had landed the yeer before; where about Noon arriving, no Enemy could be ſeen. For the Britans, which in great number, as was after known, had bin there, at ſight of ſo huge a Fleet durſt not abide. Cæſar forthwith landing his Army, and encamping to his beſt advantage, ſom notice being giv'n him by thoſe he took, where to find the Enemy, with his whole Power, ſave only ten Cohorts, and 300 Horſe, left to Quintus Atrius for the guard of his Ships, about the third watch of the ſame Night marches up twelv Mile into the Country. And at length by a River, commonly thought the Stowre in Kent, eſpies embattail'd the Britiſh Forces. They with thir Horſes and Chariots advancing to the higher Banks, oppoſe the Romans in thir March, and begin the Fight; but repuls't by the Roman Cavalry give back into the Woods to a place notably made ſtrong both by Art and Nature; which, it ſeems, had bin a Fort, or Hold of ſtrength rais'd heertofore in time of Wars among themſelvs. For entrance, and acceſs on all ſides, by the felling of huge Trees overthwart one another, was quite barr'd up; and within theſe the Britans did thir utmoſt to keep out the Enemy. But the Souldiers of the ſeventh Legion locking all thir Shields together like a Rooff cloſe over head, and others rayſing a Mount, without much loſs of Blood took the Place, and drove them all to forſake the Woods. Purſuit they made not long, as being through ways unknown; and now Ev'ning came on, which they more wiſely ſpent, in chooſing out where to pitch and fortify thir Camp that Night. The next Morning Cæſar had but newly ſent out his men in three Bodies to purſue, and the laſt no furder gon then yet in ſight, when Horſemen all in Poſt from Quintus Artrius bring word to Cæſar, that almoſt all his Ships in a Tempeſt that Night had ſuffer'd wrack, and lay brok'n upon the ſhoar. Cæſar at this news recalls his Legions, himſelf in all haſt riding back to the Sea-ſide, beheld with his own Eyes the ruinous proſpect. About forty Veſſels were ſunk and loſt, the reſidue ſo torn and ſhak'n, as not to be new rigg'd without much labour. Strait he aſſembles what number of Ship-wrights either in his own Legions or from beyond Sea, could be ſummon'd; appoints Labienus on the Belgian ſide to build more; and with a dreadful induſtry of ten days, not reſpiting his Souldiers day or night, drew up all his Ships, and entrench'd them round within the circuit of his Camp. This don, and leaving to thir defence the ſame Strength as before, he returns with his whole Forces to the ſame Wood, where he had defeated the Britans; who preventing him with greater Powers then before, had now repoſſeſs'd themſelves of that place, under Caſſibelan thir chief Leader. Whoſe Territory from the States bordering on the Sea was divided by the River Thames about 80 mile inward. With him formerly other Cities had continual War; but now in the common danger had all made choiſe of him to be thir General. Heer the Britiſh Horſe and Charioters meeting with the Roman Cavalry, fought ſtoutly; and at firſt, ſomthing overmatch'd they retreat to the neer advantage of thir Woods and Hills, but ſtill follow'd by the Romans, make head again, cut off the forwardeſt among them, and after ſome pauſe, while Cæſar, who thought the days work had bin don, was buſied about the entrenching of his Camp, march out again, give feirce aſſault to the very Stations of his Guards and Senteries; and while the main Cohorts of two Legions that were ſent to the Alarm, ſtood within a ſmall diſtance of each other terrifi'd at the newneſs and the boldneſs of thir fight, charg'd back again through the midſt, without loſs of a man. Of the Romans that day was ſlain Quintus Laberius Durus a Tribune; the Britans having fought thir fill at the very entrance of Cæſars Camp, and ſuſtain'd the reſiſtance of his whole Army entrench'd, gave over the Aſſault. Cæſar heer acknowledges that the Roman way both of arming, and of fighting, was not ſo well fitted againſt this kind of Enemy; for that the Foot in heavy Armour could not follow thir cunning flight, and durſt not by antient Diſciplin ſtir from thir Enſign; and the Horſe alone, disjoin'd from the Legions, againſt a Fo that turn'd ſuddenly upon them with a mixt encounter both of Horſe and Foot, were in equal danger both following and retiring. Beſides thir faſhion was, not in great Bodies, and cloſe Order, but in ſmall Diviſions, and open Diſtances to make thir onſet; appointing others at certain ſpaces, now to releev and bring off the weary, now to ſucceed and renew the Conflict; which argu'd no ſmall experience, and uſe of Arms. Next day the Britans afar off upon the Hills begin to ſhew themſelves heer and there, and though leſs boldly then before, to skirmiſh with the Roman Horſe. But at Noon Cæſar having ſent out 3 Legions, and all his Horſe with Trebonius the Legat, to ſeek Fodder, ſuddenly on all ſides they ſet upon the Foragers, and charge up after them to the very Legions, and thir Standards. The Romans with great Courage beat them back, and in the Chace, being well ſeconded by the Legions, not giving them time either to rally, to ſtand, or to deſcend from thir Chariots as they were wont, ſlew many. From this overthrow, the Britans, that dwelt farder off, betook them home; and came no more after that time with ſo great a Power againſt Cæſar. Wherof advertis'd he marches onward to the Frontiers of Caſſibelan, which on this ſide were bounded by the Thames, not paſſable except in one place and that difficult, about Coway ſtakes neer Oatlands, as is conjectur'd. Hither coming he deſcries on the other ſide great Forces of the Enemy, plac'd in good Array; the Bank ſet all with ſharp Stakes, others in the bottom, cover'd with Water; wherof the marks in Beda's time, were to be ſeen, as he relates. This having learnt by ſuch as were tak'n, or had run to him, he firſt commands his Horſe to paſs over; then his Foot, who wading up to the Neck went on ſo reſolutely, and ſo faſt, that they on the furder ſide not enduring the Violence, retreated and fled. Caſſibelan no more now in hope to contend for Victory, diſmiſſing all but 4000 of thoſe Charioters, through Woods, and intricate waies attends thir Motion; where the Romans are to paſs, drives all before him; and with continual Sallies upon the Horſe, where they leaſt expected, cutting off ſome and terrifying others, compels them ſo cloſe together, as gave them no leave to fetch in prey or booty without ill ſucceſs. Wherupon Cæſar ſtrictly commanding all not to part from the Legions, had nothing left him in his way but empty Fields and Houſes, which he ſpoil'd and burnt. Mean while the Trinobantes, a State, or Kingdom, and perhaps the greateſt then among the Britans, leſs favouring Caſſibelan, ſend Embaſſadors, and yeild to Cæſar upon this reaſon. Immanuentius had bin thir King: him Caſſibelan had ſlain, and purpos'd the like to Mandubratius his Son, whom Oroſius calls Androgorius, Beda Androgius; but the youth eſcaping by flight into Gallia, put himſelf under the protection of Cæſar. Theſe entreat that Mandubratius may be ſtill defended, and ſent home to ſucceed in his Fathers right. Cæſar ſends him, demands 40 Hoſtages and Proviſion for his Army, which they immediately bring in, and have thir Confines protected from the Souldier. By thir example the Cenimagni, Segontiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, Caſſi (ſo I write them, for the Modern names are but gueſs'd) on like terms make thir Peace. By them he learns that the Town of Caſſibelan, ſuppos'd to be Verulam, was not far diſtant; fenc't about with Woods and Marſhes, well ſtuff't with men and much Cattel. For Towns then in Britain were only Woody places Ditch't round, and with a Mud Wall encompaſs'd againſt the inrodes of Enemies. Thether goes Cæſar with his Legions, and though a place of great Strength both by Art and Nature, aſſaults it in two places. The Britans after ſome defence fled out all at another end of the Town; in the flight many were taken, many ſlain, and great ſtore of Cattel found there. Caſſibelan for all theſe Loſſes yet deſerts not himſelf; nor was yet his Authority ſo much impair'd, but that in Kent, though in a manner poſſeſt by the Enemy, his Meſſengers and Commands find obedience anough to raiſe all the People. By his direction, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus and Segonax, four Kings reigning in thoſe Countries which ly upon the Sea, lead them on to aſſault that Camp wherin the Romans had entrench'd thir Shipping: but they whom Cæſar left there, iſſuing out, ſlew many, and took Priſners Cingetorix a noted Leader, without loſs of thir own. Caſſibelan after ſo many defeats, mov'd eſpecially by revolt of the Cities from him, thir inconſtancie and falſhood one to another, uſes mediation by Comius of Arras to ſend Embaſſadors about Treatie of yielding. Cæſar who had determin'd to winter in the Continent, by reaſon that Gallia was unſettl'd, and not much of the Summer now behind, commands him only Hoſtages, and what yearly Tribute the Iland ſhould pay to Rome, forbids him to moleſt the Trinobants, or Mandubratius; and with his Hoſtages, and great number of Captives he puts to Sea, having at twiſe embark't his whole Armie. At his return to Rome, as from a glorious enterpriſe, he offers to Venus the Patroneſs of his Family, a Corſlet of Britiſh Pearles.

Pliny.

Howbeit other antient Writers have ſpok'n more doubtfully of Cæſars Victories heer; and that in plain terms he fled from hence; for which the common Verſe in Lucan, with divers paſſages heer and there in Tacitus, is alleg'd. Paulus Oroſius, who took what he wrote from a Hiſtorie of Suetonius now loſt, writes that Cæſar in his firſt journey entertain'd with a ſharp Fight, loſt no ſmall number of his Foot, and by Tempeſt nigh all his Horſe. Dion affirms that once in the ſecond Expedition all his Foot were routed; Oroſius that another time all Horſe. The Britiſh Author, whom I uſe only then when others are all ſilent, hath many trivial diſcourſes of Cæſars being heer, which are beſt omitted. Nor have we more of Caſſibelan, then what the ſame Story tells, how he warr'd ſoon after with Androgeus, about his Neſew ſlain by Evelinus Neſew to the other; which buſineſs at length compos'd, Caſſibelan dies, and was buried in York, if the Monmouth Book fable not. But at Cæſars coming hither, ſuch likelieſt were the Britans, as the Writers of thoſe times, and thir own actions repreſent them; in courage and warlike readineſs to take advantage by Ambuſh or ſudden Onſet, not inferiour to the Romans; nor Caſſibelan to Cæſar; in Weapons, Arms, and the skill of Encamping, Embattailing, Fortifying, overmatch't; thir Weapons were a ſhort Spear and light Target, a Sword alſo by thir ſide, thir fight ſometimes in Chariots phangd at the Axle with Iron Sithes, thir Bodies moſt part naked, only painted with woad in ſundry figures to ſeem terrible as they thought, but purſu'd by Enemies, not nice of thir painting to run into Bogs, worſe then wild Iriſh up to the Neck, and there to ſtay many daies holding a certain Morſel in thir Mouths no bigger then a Bean, to ſuffice hunger; but that receit, and the Temperance it taught, is long ſince unknown among us: thir Towns and ſtrong holds were ſpaces of ground fenc't about with a Ditch and great Trees fell'd overthwart each other, thir Buildings within were thatch't Houſes for themſelves and thir Cattel: in peace the Upland Inhabitants beſides Hunting, tended thir Flocks and Herds, but with little skill of Countrie Affairs; the making of Cheeſe they commonly knew not, Wool or Flax they ſpun not, Gardning and Planting many of them knew not; Clothing they had none, but what the skins of Beaſts afforded them, and that not alwaies; yet gallantrie they had, painting thir own skins with ſeveral Portratures of Beaſt, Bird, or Flower, a Vanitie which hath not yet left us, remov'd only from the skin to the skirt behung now with as many colour'd Ribands and Gewgawes: towards the Sea ſide they till'd the Ground, and liv'd much after the manner of Gauls thir Neighbours, or firſt Planters: thir Money was brazen pieces or Iron Rings, thir beſt Merchandiſe Tin, the reſt Trifles of Glaſs, Ivory, and ſuch like; yet Gems and Pearls they had, ſaith Mela, in ſome Rivers: thir Ships of light timber wicker'd with Oyſier between, and cover'd over with Leather, ſerv'd not therfore to tranſport them far, and thir Commodities were fetch't away by foren Merchants:

thir dealing, ſaith Diodorus, plain and ſimple without fraud; thir Civil Government under many Princes and States, not confederate or conſulting in common, but miſtruſtful, and oft-times warring one with the other, which gave them up one by one an eaſie Conqueſt to the Romans: thir Religion was govern'd by a ſort of Prieſts or Magicians, call'd Druides from the Greek name of an Oke, which Tree they had in great reverence, and the Miſleto eſpecially growing thereon. Pliny writes them skill'd in Magic no leſs then thoſe of Perſia: by thir abſtaining from a Hen, a Hare, and a Gooſe, from Fiſh alſo, ſaith Dion, and thir opinion of the Soul's paſſing after Death into other Bodies, they may be thought to have ſtudied Pythagoras; yet Philoſophers I cannot call them, reported Men factious and ambitious, contending ſomtimes about the Archprieſthood not without Civil War and Slaughter; nor reſtrain'd they the People under them from a lewd adulterous and inceſtuous Life, ten or twelve Men abſurdly againſt Nature, poſſeſſing one Woman as thir common Wife, though of neareſt kin, Mother, Daughter or Siſter; Progenitors not to be glori'd in. But the Goſpel, not long after preach'd heer, aboliſh'd ſuch Impurities, and of the Romans we have cauſe not to ſay much worſe, then that they beat us into ſome Civility; likely elſe to have continu'd longer in a barbarous and ſavage manner of Life. After Julius (for Julius before his Death tyrannouſly had made himſelf Emperor of the Roman Commonwealth, and was ſlain in the Senat for ſo doing) he who next obtain'd the Empire, Octavianus Cæſar Auguſtus, either contemning the Iland, as Strabo would have us think, whoſe neither Benefit was worth the having, nor Enmity worth the fearing; or out of a wholſom State Maxim, as ſom ſay, to moderate and bound the Empire from growing vaſt and unweildy, made no attempt againſt the Britans. But the truer cauſe was partly civil War among the Romans, partly other Affairs more urging. For about 20 Years after, all which time the Britans had liv'd at thir own diſpoſe, Auguſtus in imitation of his Uncle Julius, either intending or ſeeming to intend an Expedition hither, was come into Gallia, when the news of a Revolt in Pannonia diverted him: about ſeven Years after in the ſame Reſolution, what with the unſetl'dneſs of Gallia, and what with Embaſſadors from Britain which met him there, he proceeded not. The next year, difference ariſing about Cov'nants, he was again prevented by other new Commotions in Spain. Nevertheleſs ſom of the Britiſh Potentates omitted not to ſeek his friendſhip by gifts offer'd in the Capitol, and other obſequious Addreſſes. Inſomuch that the whole Iland became ev'n in thoſe days well known to the Romans; too well perhaps for them, who from the knowledg of us were ſo like to prove Enemies. But as for Tribute, the Britains paid none to Auguſtus, except what eaſie Cuſtoms were levied on the ſlight Commodities wherwith they traded into Gallia.

After Caſſibelan, Tenantius the younger Son of Lud, according to the Monmouth Story, was made King. For Androgeus the elder, conceaving himſelf generally hated for ſiding with the Romans, forſook his Claim here, and follow'd Cæſar's Fortune. This King is recorded Juſt and Warlike.

An. Dom. 40.

His Son Kymbeline or Cunobeline ſucceeding, was brought up, as is ſaid, in the Court of Auguſtus, and with him held friendly Correſpondences to the end; was a warlike Prince, his chief Seat Camalodunum, or Maldon, as by certain of his Coins, yet to be ſeen, appears. Tiberius the next Emperor, adhering always to the Advice of Auguſtus, and of himſelf leſs caring to extend the Bounds of his Empire, ſought not the Britans; and they as little to incite him, ſent home courteouſly the Souldiers of Germanicus, that by Shipwrack had bin caſt on the Britan ſhoar. But Caligula his Succeſſor, a wild and diſſolute Tyrant, having paſt the Alps with intent to rob and ſpoil thoſe Provinces, and ſtir'd up by Adminius the Son of Cunobeline; who by his Father baniſh'd, with a ſmall number fled thither to him, made ſemblance of marching toward Britain; but being come to the Ocean, and there behaving himſelf madly, and ridiculouſly, went back the ſame way: yet ſent before him boaſting Letters to the Senate, as if all Britain had bin yeilded him. Cunobeline now dead, Adminius the eldeſt by his Father baniſh'd from his Country, and by his own practice againſt it from the Crown, though by an old Coin ſeeming to have alſo reign'd; Togodumnus, and Caractacus the two younger, uncertain whether equal or ſubordinat in Power, were advanc'd into his place.

But through civil diſcord, Bericus (what he was furder, is not known) with others of his party flying to Rome, perſwaded Claudius the Emperor to an Invaſion. Claudius now Conſul the third time, and deſirous to do ſomthing, whence he might gain the honour of a Triumph, at the perſuaſion of theſe Fugitives, whom the Britans demanding, he had deny'd to render, and they for that cauſe had deny'd furder Amity with Rome, makes choiſe of this Iland for his Province: and ſends before him Aulus Plautius the Prætor, with this Command, if the buſineſs grew difficult to give him notice. Plautius with much ado perſuaded the Legions to move out of Gallia, murmuring that now they muſt be put to make War beyond the World's end, for ſo they counted Britain; and what welcom Julius the Dictator found there, doubtleſs they had heard. At laſt prevail'd with, and hoiſſing ſail from three ſeveral Ports, leſt thir landing ſhould in any one place be reſiſted, meeting croſs Winds, they were caſt back and diſheartn'd: till in the night a meteor ſhooting flames from the Eaſt, and, as they fanci'd, directing thir courſe, they took heart again to try the Sea, and without oppoſition landed. For the Britans having heard of thir unwillingneſs to com, had bin negligent to provide againſt them; and retiring to the Woods and Mores, intended to fruſtrate, and wear them out with delays, as they had ſerv'd Cæſar before. Plautius after much trouble to find them out, encountring firſt with Caractacus, then with Togodumnus, overthrew them; and receaving into conditions part of the Boduni, who then were ſubject to the Catuellani, and leaving there a Gariſon, went on toward a River; where the Britans not imagining that Plautius without a Bridg could paſs, lay on the furder ſide careleſs and ſecure. But he ſending firſt the Germans, whoſe Cuſtom was, arm'd as they were, to ſwim with eaſe the ſtrongeſt Current, commands them to ſtrike eſpecially at the Horſes, wherby the Chariots, wherin conſiſted thir chief art of fight, became unſerviceable. To ſecond them he ſent Veſpatian, who in his latter days obtain'd the Empire, and Sabinus his Brother; who unexpectedly aſſailing thoſe who were leaſt aware, did much execution. Yet not for this were the Britans diſmaid; but reuniting the next day, fought with ſuch a Courage, as made it hard to decide which way hung the Victory: till Caius Sidius Geta, at point to have bin tak'n, recover'd himſelf ſo valiantly, as brought the day on his ſide; for which at Rome he receav'd high honours. After this the Britans drew back toward the mouth of Thames, and acquainted with thoſe places, croſs'd over; where the Romans following them through Bogs and dangerous Flats, hazarded the loſs of all. Yet the Germans getting over, and others by a Bridg at ſome place above, fell on them again with ſundry Alarms and great Slaughter; but in the heat of purſuit running themſelves again into Bogs and Mires, loſt as many of thir own. Upon which ill ſucceſs, and ſeeing the Britans more enrag'd at the Death of Togodumnus, who in one of theſe Battels had bin ſlain, Plautius fearing the worſt, and glad that he could hold what he held, as was enjoyn'd him, ſends to Claudius. He who waited ready with a huge Preparation, as if not ſafe anough amidſt the flowr of all his Romans, like a great Eaſtern King, with armed Elephants marches through Gallia. So full of peril was this Enterpriſe eſteem'd, as not without all this Equipage, and ſtranger Terrors then Roman Armies to meet the native and the naked Britiſh Valour defending thir Country. Join'd with Plautius, who encamping on the Bank of Thames attended him, he paſſes the River. The Britans, who had the Courage, but not the wiſe Conduct of old Caſſibelan, laying all Stratagem aſide, in downright Manhood ſcrupl'd not to affront in op'n field almoſt the whole Power of the Roman Empire. But overcom and vanquiſh'd, part by Force, others by Treaty com in and yeild. Claudius therfore who took Camalodunum, the Royal Seat of Cunobeline, was oft'n by his Army ſaluted Imperator; a Military Title which uſually they gave thir General after any notable Exploit; but to others not above once in the ſame War; as if Claudius by theſe Acts had deſerv'd more then the Laws of Rome had provided honour to reward. Having therfore diſarm'd the Britans, but remitted the Confiſcation of thir Goods, for which they worſhip'd him with Sacrifice and Temple as a God, leaving Plautius to ſubdue what remain'd; he returns to Rome, from whence he had bin abſent only ſix Months, and in Britain but ſixteen days; ſending the News before him of his Victories, though in a ſmall part of the Iland. By which is manifeſtly refuted that which Eutropius and Oroſius write of his conquering at that time alſo the Orcades Ilands lying to the North of Scotland; and not conquer'd by the Romans (for aught found in any good Author) till above forty Years after, as ſhall appear. To Claudius the Senat, as for Atchievments of higheſt merit, decreed exceſſive Honours; Arches, Triumphs, annual Solemnities, and the Sirname of Britannicus both to him and his Son.

Suetonius writes that Claudius found here no Reſiſtance, and that all was don without ſtroke: but this ſeems not probable. The Monmouth Writer names theſe two Sons of Cunobeline, Guiderius, and Arviragus; that Guiderius being ſlain in fight, Arviragus to conceal it, put on his Brother's Habillements, and in his Perſon held up the Battel to a Victory; the reſt, as of Hamo the Roman Captain, Genuiſſa the Emperors Daughter, and ſuch like ſtuff, is too palpably untrue to be worth reherſing in the midſt of Truth. Plautius after this, employing his freſh Forces to conquer on, and quiet the rebelling Countries, found work anough to deſerve at his return a kind of Triumphant riding Sueton. Claud. 5. 24. into the Capital ſide by ſide with the Emperour. Veſpatian alſo under Plautius had thirty conflicts with the Enemie; in one of which encompaſs'd, and in Sueton. Veſp. Dio. l. 60. great danger, he was valiantly and piouſly reſcu'd by his Son Titus: two powerful Nations he ſubdu'd heer, above 20 Towns and the Ile of Wight; for 47. which he receav'd at Rome Triumphal Ornaments, and other great Dignities. For that Citie in reward of Vertue was ever magnificent; and long after when true merit was ceas't among them, leſt any thing reſembling Vertue ſhould want honour, the ſame rewards were yet allow'd to the very ſhadow and oſtentation of Merit. 50. Oſtorius in the room of Plautius Vice-prætor, met with turbulent Affairs; the Tacit. an. 12. Britans not ceaſing to vex with inrodes all thoſe Countries that were yielded to the Romans; and now the more eagerly, ſuppoſing that the new General Eutropius. unacquainted with his Armie, and on the edg of Winter, would not haſtily oppoſe them. But he waighing that firſt events were moſt available to breed fear or contempt, with ſuch Cohorts as were next at hand ſets out againſt them: whom having routed, ſo cloſe he follows, as one who meant not to be every day moleſted with the Cavils of a ſlight Peace, or an embolden'd Enemy. Leſt they ſhould make head again, he diſarms whom he ſuſpects; and to ſurround them, places many Gariſons upon the Rivers of Antona and Sabrina. But the Icenians, a ſtout People untouch'd yet by theſe Wars, as having before ſought Alliance with the Romans, were the firſt that brook'd not this. By thir Example others riſe; and in a choſen place, fenc't with high Banks of Earth, and narrow Lanes to prevent the Horſe, warily encamp. Oſtorius, though yet not ſtrengthn'd with his Legions, cauſes the Auxiliar Bands, his Troops alſo alighting, to aſſault the rampant. They within, though peſter'd with thir own number, ſtood to it like Men reſolv'd, and in a narrow compaſs did remarkable Deeds. But overpower'd at laſt, and others by thir ſucceſs quieted, who till then waver'd, Oſtorius next bends his Force upon the Cangians, waſting all ev'n to the Sea of Ireland, without Fo in his way, or them, who durſt, ill handl'd; when the Brigantes attempting new matters, drew him back to ſettle firſt what was unſecure behind him. They, of whom the chief were puniſh'd, the reſt forgiv'n, ſoon gave over, but the Silures no way tractable were not to be repreſs'd without a ſet War. To furder this, Camalodunum was planted with a Colony of Veteran Souldiers; to be a firm and ready Aid againſt Revolts, and a means to teach the Natives Roman Law and Civility. Cogidunus alſo a Britiſh Tacit. vit. Agric. King, thir faſt Friend, had to the ſame intent certain Cities giv'n him: a haughtie Craft, which the Romans us'd, to make Kings alſo the ſervile Agents of enſlaving others. But the Silures hardy of themſelves, rely'd more on the Valour of Caractacus; whom many doubtful, many proſperous Succeſſes had made eminent above all that rul'd in Britain. He adding to his Courage Policy, and knowing himſelf to be of Strength inferior, in other Advantages the better, makes the Seat of his War among the Ordovices; a Country wherin all the odds were to his own Party, all the difficulties to his Enemie. The Hills and every Acceſs he fortifi'd with heaps of Stones, and Guards of Men; to com at whom a River of unſafe Paſſage muſt be firſt waded. The place, as Camden conjectures, had thence the name of Caer-Caradoc on the Weſt edg of Shropſhire. He himſelf continually went up and down, animating his Officers and Leaders, that this was the Day, this the Field, either to defend thir Libertie, or to die free; calling to mind the Names of his glorious Anceſtors, who drove Cæſar the Dictator out of Britain, whoſe Valour hitherto had preſerv'd them from Bondage, thir Wives and Children from Diſhonour. Inflam'd with theſe words, they all vow thir utmoſt, with ſuch undaunted reſolution as amaz'd the Roman General; but the Souldier leſs weighing, becauſe leſs knowing, clamour'd to be led on againſt any Danger. Oſtorius after wary Circumſpection bids them paſs the River: The Britains no ſooner had them within reach of thir Arrows, Darts, and Stones, but ſlew and wounded largly of the Romans. They on the other ſide cloſing thir Ranks, and over head cloſing thir Targets, threw down the looſe Rampires of the Britains, and purſue them up the Hills, both light armed and Legions; till what with gauling Darts and heavy Strokes, the Britains who wore neither Helmet nor Cuiraſs to defend them, were at laſt overcom. This the Romans thought a famous Victory; wherin the Wife and Daughter of Caractacus were tak'n, his Brothers alſo reduc'd to obedience; himſelf eſcaping to Cartiſmandua Queen of the Brigantes, againſt Faith giv'n was to the Victors deliver'd bound; having held out againſt the Romans nine Years, ſaith Tacitus, but by truer computation, Seven. Wherby his Name was up through all the adjoining Provinces, ev'n to Italy and Rome; many deſiring to ſee who he was, that could withſtand ſo many Years the Roman Puiſſance: and Cæſar, to extol his own Victory, extoll'd the Man whom he had vanquiſh'd. Being brought to Rome, the People as to a ſolemn Spectacle were call'd together, the Emperor's Guard ſtood in Arms. In Order came firſt the King's Servants, bearing his Trophies won in other Wars, next his Brothers, Wife, and Daughter, laſt himſelf. The Behaviour of others, through fear, was low and degenerate; he only neither in Countenance, Word, or Action, ſubmiſſive ſtanding at the Tribunal of Claudius, briefly ſpake to this purpoſe. If my mind, Cæſar, had bin as moderate in the height of Fortune, as my Birth and Dignity was eminent, I might have come a Friend rather then a Captive into this City. Nor couldſt thou have diſlik'd him for a confederate, ſo noble of deſcent, and ruling ſo many Nations. My preſent Eſtate to me diſgraceful, to thee is glorious. I had Riches, Horſes, Arms, and Men; no wonder then if I contended, not to loſe them. But if by Fate, yours only muſt be Empire, then of neceſſity ours among the reſt muſt be ſubjection. If I ſooner had bin brought to yield, my Misfortune had bin leſs notorious, your Conqueſt had been leſs renown'd; and in your ſevereſt determining of me, both will be ſoon forgott'n. But if you grant that I ſhall live, by me will live to you for ever that praiſe which is ſo near Divine, the clemency of a Conquerour. Cæſar mov'd at ſuch a Spectacle of Fortune, but eſpecially at the nobleneſs of his bearing it, gave him pardon, and to all the reſt. They all unbound, ſubmiſly thank him, and did like reverence to Agrippina the Emperor's Wife, who ſat by in State; a new and diſdained ſight to the manly Eyes of Romans, a Woman ſitting public in her female Pride among Enſigns and armed Cohorts. To Oſtorius Triumph is decreed; and his Acts eſteem'd equal to thirs, that brought in Bonds to Rome famouſeſt Kings. But the ſame Proſperity attended not his later Actions here; for the Silures, whether to revenge thir loſs of Caractacus, or that they ſaw Oſtorius, as if now all were done, leſs earneſt to reſtrain them, beſet the Prefect of his Camp, left there with Legionary Bands to appoint Gariſons: And had not ſpeedy Aid com in from the neighbouring Holds and Caſtles, had cut them all off; notwithſtanding which, the Prefect with eight Centurions, and many thir ſtouteſt Men, were ſlain: and upon the neck of this, meeting firſt with Roman Foragers, then with other Troops haſting to thir relief, utterly foil'd and broke them alſo. Oſtorius ſending more after, could hardly ſtay thir flight; till the weighty Legions coming on, at firſt pois'd the Battel, at length turn'd the Scale: to the Britans without much loſs, for by that time it grew Night. Then was the War ſhiver'd, as it were, into ſmall Frays and Bickerings; not unlike ſomtimes to ſo many Robberies, in Woods, at Waters, as Chance or Valour, Advice or Raſhneſs, led them on, commanded or without command. That which moſt exaſperated the Silures, was a Report of certain words caſt out by the Emperor, That he would root them out to the very Name. Therfore two Cohorts more of Auxiliars, by the avarice of thir Leaders too ſecurely pillaging, they quite intercepted; and beſtowing liberally the Spoils and Captives, wherof they took plenty, drew other Countries to join with them. Theſe Loſſes falling ſo thick upon the Romans, Oſtorius with the thought and anguiſh therof ended his days; the Britans rejoicing, although no Battel, that yet adverſe War had worn out ſo great a Souldier. Cæſar in his place ordains Aulus Didius: but ere his coming, though much haſtn'd, that the Province might not want a Governour, the Silures had giv'n an overthrow to Manlius Valens with his Legion, rumor'd on both ſides greater then was true, by the Silures to amate the new General; by him in a double reſpect, of the more praiſe if he quel'd them, or the more excuſe if he fail'd. Mean time the Silures forget not to infeſt the Roman Pale with wide Excurſions; till Didius marching out, kept them ſomwhat more within Bounds. Nor were they long to ſeek, who after Caractacus ſhould lead them; for next to him in worth and skill of War, Venutius a Prince of the Brigantes merited to be thir Chief. He at firſt faithful to the Romans, and by them protected, was the Husband of Cartiſmandua Queen of the Brigantes, himſelf perhaps reigning elſwhere. She who had betray'd Caractacus and her Country to adorn the Triumph of Claudius, therby grown powerful and gracious with the Romans, preſuming on the hire of her Treaſon, deſerted her Husband; and marrying Vellocatus one of his Squires, confers on him the Kingdom alſo. This Deed ſo odious and full of Infamy, diſturb'd the whole State; Venutius with other Forces, and the help of her own Subjects, who deteſted the Example of ſo foul a Fact, and withal the uncomlineſs of thir Subjection to the Monarchy of a Woman, a piece of Manhood not every day to be found among Britans, though ſhe had got by ſuttle train his Brother with many of his Kindred into her hands, brought her ſoon below the confidence of being able to reſiſt longer. When imploring the Roman Aid, with much ado, and after many a hard Encounter, ſhe eſcap'd the Puniſhment which was ready to have ſeiz'd her. Venutius thus debar'd the Autority of ruling his own Houſhold, juſtly turns his Anger againſt the Romans themſelves; whoſe Magnanimity not wont to undertake diſhonourable Cauſes, had arrogantly intermedl'd in his Domeſtic Affairs, to uphold the Rebellion of an Adultreſs againſt her Husband. And the Kingdom he retain'd againſt thir utmoſt oppoſition; and of War gave them thir fill: firſt in a ſharp Conflict of uncertain Event, then againſt the Legion of Cæſius Naſica. Inſomuch that Didius growing old, and managing the War by Deputies, had work anough to ſtand on his Defence, with the gaining now and then of a ſmall Caſtle. And Nero (for in that part of the Ile things continu'd in the ſame plight to the reign of Veſpatian) was minded but for ſhame to have withdrawn the Roman Forces out of Britain: In other parts wherof, about the ſame time, other things befel. Verannius, whom Nero ſent hither to ſucceed Didius, dying in his firſt Year, ſave a few inrodes upon the Silures, left only a great Boaſt behind him, That in two Years, had he liv'd, he would have conquer'd all. But Suetonius Paulinus, who next was ſent hither, eſteem'd a Souldier equal to the beſt in that Age, for two Years together went on proſperouſly, both confirming what was got, and ſubduing onward. At laſt overconfident of his preſent Actions, and æmulating others, of whoſe Deeds he heard from abroad, marches up as far as Mona, the Ile of Angleſey, a populous place. For they it ſeems had both entertain'd Fugitives, and giv'n good Aſſiſtance to the reſt that withſtood him. He makes him Boats with flat bottoms, fitted to the Shallows which he expected in that narrow Frith; his Foot ſo paſs'd over, his Horſe waded or ſwom. Thick upon the Shoar ſtood ſeveral groſs Bands of Men well weapn'd, many Women like Furies running to and fro in diſmal Habit, with Hair looſe about thir Shoulders, held Torches in thir hands. The Druids, thoſe were thir Prieſts, of whom more in another place, with hands lift up to Heav'n uttering direful Prayers, aſtoniſh'd the Romans; who at ſo ſtrange a ſight ſtood in amaze, though wounded: At length awak'd and encourag'd by thir General, not to fear a barbarous and lunatic Rout, fall on, and beat them down ſcorch't and rouling in thir own Fire. Then were they yok'd with Gariſons, and the Places conſecrate to thir bloody Superſtitions deſtroy'd. For whom they took in War, they held it lawful to ſacrifice; and by the Entrails of Men us'd Divination.

Tacit. vit. Agric.

Tacit. Hiſt. 3. Sueton.

While thus Paulinus had his thought ſtill fix'd before to go on winning, his back lay broad op'n to occaſion of loſing more behind: For the Britans, urg'd and oppreſs'd with many unſufferable Injuries, had all banded themſelves to a general Revolt. The particular Cauſes are not all writt'n by one Author; Tacitus who liv'd next thoſe Times of any to us extant, writes that Praſutagus King of the Icenians, abounding in Wealth, had left Cæſar Coheir with his two Daughters; therby hoping to have ſecur'd from all wrong both his Kingdom and his Houſe; which fell out far otherwiſe. For under colour to overſee and take poſſeſſion of the Emperor's new Inheritance, his Kingdom became a Prey to Centurions, his Houſe to rav'ning Officers, his Wife Boadicea violated with Stripes, his Daughters with Rape, the wealthieſt of his Subjects, as it were, by the Will and Teſtament of thir King thrown out of thir Eſtates, his Kindred made little better then Slaves. The new Colony alſo at Camalodunum took Houſe or Land from whom they pleas'd, terming them Slaves and Vaſſals; the Souldiers complying with the Colony, out of hope hereafter to uſe the ſame Licenſe themſelves. Moreover the Temple erected to Claudius as a Badg of thir eternal Slavery, ſtood a great Eye-ſore; the Prieſts wherof, under pretext of what was due to the religious Service, waſted and imbezl'd each Man's Subſtance upon themſelves. And Catus Decianus the Procurator, endeavour'd to bring all thir Goods within the compaſs of a Dion. new Confiſcation, by diſavowing the remitment of Claudius. Laſtly, Seneca, in his Books a Philoſopher, having drawn the Britans unwillingly to borrow of him vaſt Sums upon fair Promiſes of eaſy Loan, and for repaiment to take thir own time, on a ſudden compels them to pay in all at once with great Extortion. Thus provok't by heavieſt Sufferings, and thus invited by Opportunities in the abſence of Paulinus, the Icenians, and by thir Example the Trinobantes, and as many elſe as hated Servitude, riſe up in Arms. Of theſe enſuing Troubles many foregoing Signs appear'd; the Image of Victory at Camalodunum fell down of it ſelf with her Face turn'd, as it were, to the Britans; certain Women, in a kind of Extaſy, foretold of Calamities to come: In the Council-houſe were heard by night barbarous Noiſes; in the Theater hideous Howlings, in the Creek horrid Sights, betok'ning the deſtruction of that Colony; hereto the Ocean ſeeming of a bloody hew, and human ſhapes at a low ebb, left imprinted on the Sand, wrought in the Britans new Courage, in the Romans unwonted Fears. Camalodunum, where the Romans had ſeated themſelves to dwell pleaſantly, rather then defenſively, was not fortifi'd; againſt that therfore the Britans make firſt aſſault. The Souldiers within were not very many. Decianus the Procurator could ſend them but 200, thoſe ill arm'd: and through the Treachery of ſom among them, who ſecretly favour'd the Inſurrection, they had defer'd both to entrench, and to ſend out ſuch as bore not Arms; ſuch as did, flying to the Temple, which on the ſecond day was forcibly tak'n, were put all to the Sword, the Temple made a heap, the reſt rifl'd and burnt. Petilius Cerealis coming to his Succour, is in his way met, and overthrown, his whole Legion cut to pieces; he with his Horſe hardly eſcaping to the Roman Camp. Decianus, whoſe rapine was the cauſe of all this, fled into Gallia. But Suetonius at theſe tidings not diſmay'd, through the midſt of his Enemies Country, marches to London (though not term'd a Colony, yet full of Roman Inhabitants, and for the frequency of Trade, and other Commodities, a Town ev'n then of principal note) with purpoſe to have made there the ſeat of War. But conſidering the ſmalneſs of his Numbers, and the late raſhneſs of Petilius, he chuſes rather with the loſs of one Town to ſave the reſt. Nor was he flexible to any Prayers or Weeping of them that beſought him to tarry there; but taking with him ſuch as were willing, gave ſignal to depart; they who through weakneſs of Sex or Age, or love of the place went not along, periſh'd by the Enemy; ſo did Verulam a Roman free Town. For the Britans omitting Forts and Caſtles, flew thither firſt where richeſt Booty, and the hope of pillaging toald them on. In this Maſſacre about 70000 Romans and thir Aſſociats, in the places above-mention'd, of a certain loſt thir lives. None might be ſpar'd, none ranſom'd, but taſted all either a preſent or a lingring Death; no cruelty that either outrage, or the inſolence of Succeſs put into thir heads, was left unacted. The Roman Wives and Virgins hang'd up all naked, had thir Dion. l. 62.

Breaſts cut off, and ſow'd to thir Mouths; that in the grimneſs of Death they might ſeem to eat thir own Fleſh; while the Britans fell to feaſting and carouſing in the Temple of Andate thir Goddeſs of Victory. Suetonius adding to his Legion other old Officers and Souldiers therabout, which gather'd to him, were neer upon ten thouſand; and purpoſing with thoſe not to defer Battel, had chos'n a place narrow, and not to be over-wing'd, on his rear a Wood; being well inform'd that his Enemies were all in front on a Plain unapt for Ambuſh: the Legionaries ſtood thic in order, impal'd with light armed; the Horſe on either Wing. The Britans in Companies and Squadrons were every where ſhouting and ſwarming, ſuch a multitude as at other time never; no leſs reckon'd then 200 and 30 thouſand, ſo feirce and confident of Victory, that thir Wives alſo came in Waggons to ſit and behold the ſport, as they made full account of killing Romans: a Folly doubtleſs for the ſerious Romans to ſmile at, as a ſure Tok'n of proſpering that day: a Woman alſo was thir Commander in Chief. For Boadicea and her Daughters ride about in a Chariot, telling the tall Champions as a great Encouragement, that with the Britans it was uſual for Women to be thir Leaders. A deal of other Fondneſs they put into her Mouth, not worth recital; how ſhe was laſh'd, how her Daughters were handl'd, things worthier Silence, Retirment, and a Vail, then for a Woman to repeat, as don to hir own Perſon, Dion. or to hear repeated before an Hoſt of Men. The Greek Hiſtorian ſets her in the Field on a high heap of Turves, in a looſe-bodied Gown declaming, a Spear in her hand, a Hare in her Boſom, which after a long Circumlocution ſhe was to let ſlip among them for luck's ſake; then praying to Andate the Britiſh Goddeſs, to talk again as fondly as before. And this they do out of a Vanity, hoping to embelliſh and ſet out thir Hiſtory with the ſtrangneſs of our manners, not caring in the mean while to brand us with the rankeſt note of Barbariſm, as if in Britain Women were Men, and Men Women. I affect not ſet Speeches in a Hiſtory, unleſs known for certain to have bin ſo ſpok'n in effect as they are writ'n, nor then, unleſs worth rehearſal; and to invent ſuch, though eloquently, as ſome Hiſtorians have don, is an Abuſe of Poſterity, raiſing in them that read other Conceptions of thoſe Times and Perſons then were true. Much leſs therfore do I purpoſe heer or elſwhere to copy out tedious Orations without Decorum, though in thir Authors compos'd ready to my hand. Hitherto what we have heard of Caſſibelan, Togadumnus, Venuſius, and Caractacus, hath bin full of Magnanimity, Soberneſs, and martial Skill: but the truth is, that in this Battel and whole Buſineſs the Britans never more plainly manifeſted themſelves to be right Barbarians; no Rule, no Foreſight, no Forecaſt, Experience or Eſtimation, either of themſelves or of thir Enemies; ſuch Confuſion, ſuch Impotence, as ſeem'd likeſt not to a War, but to the wild hurry of a diſtracted Woman, with as mad a Crew at her heels. Therfore Suetonius, contemning thir unruly Noiſes and fierce looks, heart'ns his Men but to ſtand cloſe a while, and ſtrike manfully this headleſs Rabble that ſtood neereſt, the reſt would be a purchaſe rather then a toil. And ſo it fell out; for the Legion, when they ſaw thir time, burſting out like a violent wedg, quickly broke and diſſipated what oppos'd them; all elſe held only out thir Necks to the Slayer, for thir own Carts and Waggons were ſo plac'd by themſelves, as left them but little room to eſcape between. The Roman ſlew all; Men, Women, and the very drawing Horſes lay heap'd along the Field in a gory mixture of Slaughter. About fourſcore thouſand Britans are ſaid to have bin ſlain on the place; of the Enemy ſcarſe 400, and not many more wounded. Boadicea poyſon'd her ſelf, or, as others ſay, Dion. ſick'nd and dy'd. She was of Stature big and tall, of Viſage grim and ſtern, harſh of Voice, her Hair of bright colour flowing down to her Hips; ſhe wore a plighted Garment of divers Colours, with a great gold'n Chain; button'd over all a thick robe. Gildas calls her the crafty Lioneſs, and leaves an ill fame upon her doings. Dion ſets down otherwiſe the Order of this Fight, and that the Field was not won without much Difficulty, nor without intention of the Britans to give another Battel, had not the Death of Boadicea come between. Howbeit Suetonius, to preſerve Diſciplin, and to diſpatch the Reliques of War, lodg'd with all his Army in the op'n Field; which was ſupply'd out of Germany with 1000 Horſe and 10000 Foot; thence diſpers'd to winter, and with Incurſions to waſt thoſe Countries that ſtood out. But to

to till the Ground, and made reck'ning to ſerve themſelves on the Proviſions of thir Enemy. Neverthleſs thoſe Nations that were yet untam'd, hearing of ſome Diſcord ris'n between Suetonius and the new Procurator Claſſicianus, were brought but ſlowly to terms of Peace; and the Rigor us'd by Suetonius on them that yeilded, taught them the better Courſe to ſtand on thir Defence.
For it is certain that Suetonius, though elſe a worthy Man, over-proud of his Tacit. vit. A-Victory, gave too much way to his Anger againſt the Britans. Claſſician gric.
therfore ſending ſuch word to Rome, that theſe ſevere Proceedings would beget an endleſs War, Polycletus, no Roman but a Courtier, was ſent by Nero to examin how things went. He admoniſhing Suetonius to uſe more Mildneſs, aw'd the Army, and to the Britans gave matter of Laughter. Who ſo much even till then were nurs'd up in thir nativ Liberty, as to wonder that ſo great a General with his whole Army ſhould be at the Rebuke and ordering of a Court Servitor. But Suetonius a while after, having loſt a few Gallies on the 62.
ſhoar, was bid reſign his Command to Petronius Turpilianus, who not provoking the Britans, nor by them provok'd, was thought to have pretended the Love of Peace to what indeed was his Love of Eaſe and Sloth. Trebellius Maximus follow'd his ſteps, uſurping the name of Gentle Government to any Remiſneſs or Neglect of Diſciplin; which brought in firſt Licence, next Diſobedience into his Camp; incens'd againſt him partly for his Covetouſneſs, partly by the Incitement of Roſcius Cælius, Legat of a Legion; with whom formerly diſagreeing, now that civil War began in the Empire, he fell to op'n Diſcord; Tacit. Hiſt. l. 1.

forc'd at length to fly the Land. Which notwithſtanding remain'd in good quiet, govern'd by Cælius and the other Legat of a Legion, both faithful to Vitellius then Emperor; who ſent hither Vettius Bolanus; under whoſe Lenity, 69.

by ſeveral Paſſages in the Hiſtories of Tacitus, that no ſmall number of Britiſh & vit. Agric.
Forces were commanded over Sea the Year before to ſerve in thoſe bloody Wars between Otho and Vitellius, Vitellius and Veſpaſian contending for the Empire. To Cerealis ſucceeded Julius Frontinus in the Government of Britain, who by taming the Silures, a People warlike and ſtrongly inhabiting, augmented much his Reputation. But Julius Agricola, whom Veſpaſian in his laſt 79.
Year ſent hither, train'd up from his Youth in the Britiſh Wars, extended with Victories the Roman Limit beyond all his Predeceſſors. His coming was in the midſt of Summer; and the Ordovices to welcom the new General had hew'n in peeces a whole Squadron of Horſe which lay upon thir Bounds, few eſcaping. Agricola, who perceav'd that the noiſe of this Defeat had alſo in the Province deſirous of Novelty ſtirr'd up new Expectations, reſolves to be before-hand with the danger: and drawing together the choice of his Legions with a competent number of Auxiliars, not being met by the Ordovices, who kept the Hills, himſelf in the head of his Men, hunts them up and down through difficult places, almoſt to the final extirpating of that whole Nation.
With the ſame current of Succeſs, what Paulinus had left unfiniſh'd he conquers in the Ile of Mona: for the Ilanders altogether fearleſs of his Approach, whom they knew to have no Shipping, when they ſaw themſelves invaded on a ſudden by the Auxiliars, whoſe Country Uſe had taught them to ſwim over with Horſe and Arms, were compell'd to yeild. This gain'd Agricola much opinion; who at his very entrance, a time which others beſtow'd of courſe in hearing Complements and Gratulations, had made ſuch early Progreſs into laborious and hardeſt Enterpriſes. But by far not ſo famous was Agricola in bringing War to a ſpeedy end, as in cutting off the Cauſes from whence War ariſes. For he knowing that the end of War was not to make way for Injuries in Peace, began Reformation from his own Houſe; permitted not his Attendants and Followers to ſway, or have to do at all in public Affairs: lays on with Equality the Proportions of Corn and Tribute that were impos'd; takes off Exactions, and the Fees of encroaching Officers, heavier than the Tribute it ſelf. For the Countries had bin compell'd before, to ſit and wait the op'ning of public Granaries, and both to ſell and to buy thir Corn at what rate the Publicans thought fit; the Pourveyers alſo commanding when they pleas'd to bring it in, not to the neereſt, but ſtill to the remoteſt places, either by the compounding of ſuch as would be excus'd, or by cauſing a Dearth, where none was, made a particular Gain. Theſe Greevances and the like, he in the time of Peace removing, brought Peace into ſome Credit; which before, 80. ſince the Romans coming, had as ill a name as War. The Summer following,

Titus then Emperor, he ſo continually with Inroads diſquieted the Enemy over all the Ile, and after Terror ſo allur'd them with his gentle Demeanour, that many Cities which till that time would not bend, gave Hoſtages, admitted Gariſons, and came in voluntarily. The Winter he ſpent all in worthy Actions; teaching and promoting like a public Father the Inſtitutes and Cuſtoms of civil Life. The Inhabitants rude and ſcatter'd, and by that the proner to War, he ſo perſwaded as to build Houſes, Temples, and Seats of Juſtice; and by praiſing the forward, quick'ning the ſlow, aſſiſting all, turn'd the name of Neceſſity into an Emulation. He caus'd moreover the Noblemens Sons to be bred up in liberal Arts; and by preferring the Wits of Britain before the Studies of Gallia, brought them to affect the Latin Eloquence, who before hated the Language. Then were the Roman Faſhions imitated, and the Gown; after a while the Incitements alſo and Materials of Vice, and voluptuous Life, proud Buildings, Baths, and the Elegance of Banqueting; which the fooliſher ſort call'd Civility, but was indeed a ſecret Art 81. to prepare them for Bondage. Spring appearing, he took the Field, and with a proſperous Expedition waſted as far Northward as the Frith of Taus all that obey'd not, with ſuch a Terror, as he went, that the Roman Army, though much hinder'd by tempeſtuous Weather, had the leaſure to build Forts and Caſtles where they pleas'd, none daring to oppoſe them. Beſides, Agricola had this Excellence in him, ſo providently to chooſe his Places where to fortify, as not another General then alive. No Sconce or Fortreſs of his raiſing was ever known either to have bin forc'd, or yeilded up, or quitted.
Out of theſe impregnable by Seige, or in that caſe duly releev'd, with continual Irruptions he ſo prevail'd, that the Enemy, whoſe manner was in Winter to regain what in Summer he had loſt, was now alike in both Seaſons kept ſhort and ſtrait'n'd. For theſe Exploits, then eſteem'd ſo great and honourable, Dion. l. 66. Titus in whoſe Reign they were atcheev'd was the fifteenth time ſaluted Imperator; and of him Agricola receav'd triumphal Honours. The fourth 82. Summer, Domitian then ruling the Empire, he ſpent in ſetling and confirming what the Year before he had travail'd over with a running Conqueſt. And had the Valour of his Souldiers bin anſwerable, he had reach'd that Year, as was thought, the utmoſt Bounds of Britain. For Glota and Bodotria, now Dunbritton, and the Frith of Edinburrow, two oppoſite Arms of the Sea, divided only by a neck of Land, and all the Creeks and Inlets on this ſide, were held by the Romans, and the Enemy driv'n as it were into another Iland. In 83. his fift Year he paſs'd over into the Orcades, as we may probably gueſs, and other Scotch Iles; diſcovering and ſubduing Nations, till then unknown. He gain'd alſo with his Forces that part of Britain which faces Ireland, as aiming alſo to conquer that Iland; where one of the Iriſh Kings driv'n out by civil Wars coming to him, he both gladly receav'd and retain'd him as againſt a 84. fit time. The Summer enſuing, on miſtruſt that the Nations beyond Bodotria would generally riſe, and forelay the Paſſages by Land, he caus'd his Fleet, making a great ſhew, to bear along the Coaſt, and up the Friths and Harbours; joining moſt commonly at Night on the ſame ſhoar both Land and Sea Forces, with mutual Shouts and loud Greetings. At ſight wherof the Britans, not wont to ſee thir Sea ſo ridd'n, were much daunted. Howbeit the Caledonians with great Preparation, and by Rumor, as of things unknown much greater, taking Arms, and of thir own Accord beginning War by the Aſſault of ſundry Caſtles, ſent back ſome of thir Fear to the Romans themſelves:

ſelves: and there were of the Commanders, who cloking thir fear under ſhew of ſage Advice, counſel'd the General to retreat back on this ſide Bodotria. He in the mean while having intelligence, that the Enemy would fall on in many Bodies, divided alſo his Armie into three parts. Which advantage the Britans quickly-ſpying, and on a ſudden uniting what before they had diſjoin'd, aſſail by Night with all thir Forces that part of the Roman Armie which they knew to be the weakeſt; and breaking in upon the Camp, ſurpris'd between ſleep and fear, had begun ſom Execution. When Agricola, who had learnt what way the Enemies took, and follow'd them with all ſpeed, ſending before him the lighteſt of his Horſe and Foot to charge them behind, the reſt as they came on to afright them with clamour, ſo ply'd them without reſpit, that by approach of day the Roman Enſigns glittering all about, had encompaſs'd the Britans: who now after a ſharp fight in the very Ports of the Camp, betook them to thir wonted refuge, the Woods and Fens, purſu'd a while by the Romans; that day elſe in all appearance had ended the War. The Legions reincourag'd by this event, they alſo now boaſting, who but lately trembl'd, cry all to be led on as far as there was Britiſh ground. The Britans alſo not acknowledging the loſs of that day to Roman valour, but to the policy of thir Captain, abated nothing of thir ſtoutneſs; but arming thir youth, conveying thir Wives and Children to places of ſafety, in frequent Aſſemblies, and by ſolemn Cov'nants bound themſelves to mutual aſſiſtance againſt the common Enemy. About the ſame time a Cohort of Germans having ſlain thir Centurion with other Roman Officers in a Mutiny, and for fear of puniſhment fled a Shipboard, launch'd forth in three light Gallies without Pilot; and by Tide or Weather carried round about the Coaſt, uſing Piracy Dion. l. 66. where they landed, while thir Ships held out, and as thir skill ſerv'd them, with various fortune, were the firſt diſcoverers to the Romans that Britain was an Iland. The following Summer, Agricola having before ſent his Navie to hover on the 85. Coaſt, and with ſundrie and uncertain Landings to divert and diſunite the Britans, himſelf with a power beſt appointed for Expedition, wherin alſo were many Britans, whom he had long try'd both valiant and faithful, marches onward to the Mountain Grampius, where the Britiſh, above 30 thouſand, were now lodg'd, and ſtill encreaſing; for neither would thir old men, ſo many as were yet vigorous and luſty, be left at home, long practis'd in War, and every one adorn'd with ſome Badg, or cogniſance of his warlike deeds long ago. Of whom Galgacus, both by Birth and Merit the prime Leader to thir courage, though of it ſelf hot and violent, is by his rough Oratory, in deteſtation of ſervitude and the Roman yoke, ſaid to have added much more eagerneſs of Fight, teſtifi'd by thir ſhouts and barbarous applauſes. As much did on the other ſide Agricola exhort his Souldiers to Victory and Glorie; as much the Soldiers by his firm and well grounded Exhortations were all on a fire to the Onſet. But firſt he orders them in this ſort: Of 8000 Auxiliar Foot he makes his middle ward, on the Wings 3000 Horſe, the Legions as a Reſerve, ſtood in array before the Camp; either to ſeiſe the Victory won without thir own hazard, or to keep up the Battle if it ſhould need. The Britiſh powers on the Hill ſide, as might beſt ſerve for ſhew and terrour, ſtood in thir Battalions; the firſt on even Ground, the next riſing behind, as the Hill aſcended. The Field between rung with the noiſe of Horſemen and Chariots ranging up and down. Agricola doubting to be over wing'd, ſtretches out his Front, though ſomwhat with the thinneſt, inſomuch that many advis'd to bring up the Legions: yet he not altering, alights from his Horſe, and ſtands on foot before the Enſigns. The fight began aloof, and the Britans had a certain skill with thir broad ſwaſhing Swords and ſhort Bucklers either to ſtrike aſide, or to bear off the Darts of thir Enemies; and withal to ſend back ſhowers of thir own. Until Agricola diſcerning that thoſe little Targets and unweildie Glaves ill pointed, would ſoon become ridiculous againſt the thruſt and cloſe, commanded three Batavian Cohorts, and two of the Tungrians exercis'd and arm'd for cloſe fight, to draw up, and come to handy-ſtrokes. The Batavians, as they were commanded, running in upon them, now with thir long Tucks thruſting at the face, now with thir piked Targets bearing them down, had made good riddance of them that ſtood below; and for haſt omitting furder Execution, began apace to advance up Hill, ſeconded now by all the other Cohorts. Mean while the Horſe-men fly, the Charioters mix themſelves to fight among the Foot, where many of thir Horſe alſo fall'n in diſorderly, were now more a miſchief to thir own, then before a terrour to thir Enemies. The Battle was a confuſ'd heap, the ground unequal; Men, Horſes, Chariots crowded Pelmel; ſomtimes in little room, by and by in large, fighting, ruſhing, felling, over-bearing, over-turning. They on the Hill, which were not yet com to blows, perceaving the fewneſs of thir Enemies, came down amain; and had encloſ'd the Romans unawares behind, but that Agricola with a ſtrong Body of Horſe, which he reſerv'd for ſuch a purpoſe, repell'd them back as faſt; and others drawn off the Front, were commanded to wheel about and charge them on the backs. Then were the Romans clearly Maſters; they follow, they wound, they take, and to take more, kill whom they take: the Britans in whole Troops with weapons in thir Hands, one while flying the purſuer, anon without Weapons deſperately running upon the Slayer. But all of them, when once they got the Woods to thir ſhelter, with freſh boldneſs made head again, and the forwardeſt on a ſudden they turn'd and ſlew, the reſt ſo hamper'd, as had not Agricola, who was every where at hand, ſent out his readieſt Cohorts, with part of his Horſe to alight and ſcowr the Woods, they had receiv'd a foyl in the midſt of Victorie; but following with a cloſe and orderly purſuit, the Britans fled again, and were totally ſcatter'd; till Night and wearineſs ended the chaſe. And of them that day 10 thouſand fell; of the Romans 340, among whom Aulus Atticus the Leader of a Cohort; carried with heat of Youth, and the firceneſs of his Horſe too far on. The Romans jocond of this Victorie, and the ſpoil they got, ſpent the Night; the vanquiſh'd wandring about the Field, both Men and Women, ſom lamenting, ſom calling thir loſt Friends, or carrying off thir Wounded; others forſaking, ſom burning thir own Houſes; and it was certain enough, that there were who with a ſtern Compaſſion laid violent hands on thir Wives and Children, to prevent the more violent hands of hoſtile Injury. Next day appearing manifeſted more plainly the greatneſs of thir loſs receav'd; every where ſilence, deſolation, Houſes burning afar off, not a man ſeen, all fled, and doubtful whether: ſuch word the Scouts bringing in from all parts, and the Summer now ſpent, no fit ſeaſon to diſperſe a War, the Roman General leads his Armie among the Horeſtians; by whom Hoſtages being giv'n, he commands his Admiral with a ſufficient Navie to ſail round the Coaſt of Britain; himſelf with ſlow marches, that his delay in paſſing might ſerve to aw thoſe new conquer'd Nations, beſtows his Army in thir Winter-quarters. The Fleet alſo having fetch't a proſperous and Camden. ſpeedy compaſs about the Ile, put in at the Haven Trutulenſis, now Richborrow Juvenal, ſat. 2. near Sandwich, from whence it firſt ſet out: and now likelieſt, if not two years before, as was mention'd, the Romans might diſcover and ſubdue the Iles of Eutrop. l. 7. Orkney; which others with leſs reaſon following Euſebius and Oroſius, attribute to the deeds of Claudius. Theſe perpetual Exploits abroad won him wide fame; with Domitian, under whom great Virtue was as puniſhable as op'n Dion. l. 66. Crime, won him Hatred. For he maligning the renown of theſe his acts, in 86. ſhew decreed him honours, in ſecret deviſ'd his ruin. Agricola therfore, commanded home for doing too much of what he was ſent to do, left the Province to his Succeſſor quiet and ſecure. Whether he, as is conjectured, were Saluſtius Lucullus, or before him ſom other, for Suetonius only names him Legat of Britain under Domitian; but furder of him, or ought elſe don here until the time of Hadrian, is no where plainly to be found. Som gather by a Preface in Tacitus to the Book of his Hiſtories, that what Agricola won here, was ſoon after by Domitian either through want of Valour loſt, or through Envy neglected. And Juvenal the Poet ſpeaks of Arviragus in theſe days, and not before, King of Britain; who ſtood ſo well in his reſiſtance, as not only to be talk'd of at Rome, but to be held matter of a glorious Triumph, if Domitian could take him Captive, or overcom him. Then alſo Claudia Rufina the Daughter of a Britan, and Wife of Pudence a Roman Senator, liv'd at Rome; famous by the Verſe of Martial for Beauty, Wit, and Learning. The next we hear of Britain, is that when Trajan was Emperor, it revolted, Spartianus in vit. Hadrian. and was ſubdued. But Hadrian next entring on the Empire, they ſoon unſubdu'd themſelves. Julius Severus, ſaith Dion, then govern'd the Iland, a prime Souldier of that Age: he being call'd away to ſuppreſs the Jews then in Tumult, left things at ſuch a paſs, as caus'd the Emperor in Perſon to take a Journey 122.

Mound, fourſcore mile in length, to divide what was Roman from Barbarian;
as his manner was to do in other Frontiers of his Empire, where great Rivers divided not the Limits. No antient Author names the place, but old Inſcriptions, and ruin it ſelf yet teſtifies where it went along between Solway Frith by Agricola, finiſh heer a new War: Commodus after him obteining the Empire. Digeſt l. 36.

In his time, as among ſo many different accounts may ſeem moſt probable,
Lucius a ſuppos'd King in ſome part of Britain, the firſt of any King in Europe, Beda.
that we read of, receav'd the Chriſtian Faith, and this Nation the firſt by public Authority profeſs'd it: a high and ſingular Grace from above, if ſinceritie and perſeverance went along, otherwiſe an empty boaſt, and to be fear'd the verifying of that true ſentence, The firſt ſhall be laſt. And indeed the praiſe of this action is more proper to King Lucius, then common to the Nation; whoſe firſt profeſſing by public Authority was no real commendation of thir true Faith, which had appear'd more ſincere and praiſe-worthy, whether in this or other Nation, firſt profeſs'd without public Authority or againſt it, might elſe have bin but outward conformity. Lucius in our Monmouth Story is made the ſecond by Deſcent from Marius; Marius the Son of Arviragus is there ſaid to have overthrown the Picts then firſt coming out of Scythia, ſlain Roderic thir King; and in ſign of Victorie to have ſet up a Monument of Stone in the Country ſince call'd Weſtmaria; but theſe things have no Foundation. Coilus the Son of Marius, all his Reign which was juſt and peaceable, holding great amity with the Romans, left it Hereditary to Lucius.
He (if Beda err not, living neer 500 years after, yet our antienteſt Author of this report) ſent to Eleutherius then Biſhop of Rome, an improbable Letter, as ſom of the Contents diſcover, deſiring that by his appointment he 181.
and his People might receave Chriſtianity. From whom two religious Doctors, nam'd in our Chronicles Faganus and Deruvianus, forthwith ſent, are ſaid to have converted and baptiz'd well nigh the whole Nation: thence Lucius Nennius. to have had the ſirname of Levermaur, that is to ſay, Great light. Nor yet then firſt was the Chriſtian Faith heer known, but ev'n from the latter daies of Tiberius, as Gildas confidently affirms, taught and propagated, and that as ſom ſay by Simon Zelotes, as others by Joſeph of Arimathæa, Barnabas, Paul, Peter, and thir prime Diſciples. But of theſe matters, variouſly written and believ'd, Eccleſiaſtic Hiſtorians can beſt determin; as the beſt of them do, with little Credit giv'n to the particulars of ſuch uncertain relations. As for Lucius, they write, that after a long Reign he was buried in Gloſter; but dying Geff. Mon.
without Iſſue, left the Kingdom in great Commotion. By truer teſtimony we find that the greateſt War which in thoſe days buſy'd Commodus, was in Dion. l. 72.
this Iland. For the Nations Northward, notwithſtanding the Wall rais'd to keep them out, breaking in upon the Roman Province, waſted wide; and both the Army and the Leader that came againſt them wholly routed, and deſtroy'd; which put the Emperor in ſuch a fear, as to diſpatch hither one of his beſt Commanders, Ulpius Marcellus. He a man endu'd with all nobleneſs 183.
of mind, frugal and temperate, mild and magnanimous, in War bold and watchful, invincible againſt Lucre, and the aſſault of Bribes; what with his Valour, and theſe his other Virtues, quickly ended this War that look'd ſo dangerous, and had himſelf like to have been ended by the Peace which he brought home, for preſuming to be ſo worthy and ſo good under the envy of ſo worthleſs and ſo bad an Emperor. After whoſe departure the Roman Lamprid. in comm. Legions fell to Sedition among themſelves; fifteen hundred of them went to Rome in name of the reſt, and were ſo terrible to Commodus himſelf, as that 186. to pleaſe them he deliver'd up to thir care Perennis the Captain of his Guard, for having in the Britiſh War remov'd thir Leaders, who were Senators, and in thir places put thoſe of the Equeſtrian Order. Notwithſtanding which compliance, they endeavour'd here to ſet up another Emperor againſt him; and Helvius Pertinax who ſucceeded Governour, found it a work ſo difficult to appeaſe them, that once in a Mutiny he was left for dead among many ſlain; and though afterwards he ſeverely puniſh'd the Capitolin. in Pert. Tumulters, was fain at length to ſeek a diſmiſſion from his Charge. After him Clodius Albinus took the Government; but he, for having to the Souldiers Capitolin. in Alb. made an Oration againſt Monarchy, by the appointment of Commodus

193. was bid reſign to Junius Severus. But Albinus in thoſe troubleſom times enſuing Dion. under the ſhort Reign of Pertinax and Didius Julianus, found means to Did. Jul. keep in his hands the Government of Britain; although Septimius Severus who Spartian. in Sever. next held the Empire, ſent hither Heraclitus to diſplace him; but in vain, for Herod. l. 3. Albinus with all the Britiſh Powers and thoſe of Gallia met Severus about
Lyons in France, and fought a bloody Battail with him for the Empire, though Herod. l. 3. at laſt vanquiſh'd and ſlain. The Government of Britain, Severus divided Digeſt. l. 28. tit. 6. between two Deputies; till then one Legat was thought ſufficient; the North he committed to Virius Lupus. Where the Meatæ riſing in Arms, and the Caledonians, though they had promis'd the contrary to Lupus, preparing to Dion. defend them, ſo hard beſet, he was compell'd to buy his Peace, and a few of Priſ'ners with great Sums of Money. But hearing that Severus had now Herod. l. 3. brought to an end his other Wars, he writes him plainly the ſtate of things here, that the Britans of the North made War upon him, broke into the Province, and haraſs'd all the Countries nigh them, that there needed ſuddenly either more Aid, or himſelf in Perſon. Severus, though now much weaken'd with Age and the Gout, yet deſirous to leav ſom Memorial of his warlike Acheevments here, as he had don in other places, and beſides to withdraw by this means his two Sons from the Pleaſures of Rome, and his Souldiers from Idleneſs, with a mighty power far ſooner than could be expected, 208. arrives in Britain. The Northern People much daunted with the report of whom he lov'd, to the violence of an enraged Crew, he firſt cuts off the Head of his Friend Alanus, as was agreed; next his Wife, though loth and delaying, yet by her entreated and importun'd, refuſing to outlive her Huſband, he diſpatches: for which her Reſolution, Sozomenus an Eccleſiaſtic Writer gives her high praiſe, both as a Wife, and as a Chriſtian. Laſt of all againſt himſelf he turns his Sword; but miſſing the mortal place, with his Poinard finiſhes the Work. Thus far is purſu'd the ſtory of a famous Britan, related negligently by our other Hiſtorians. As for Conſtantine, his ending was not anſwerable to his ſetting out; for he with his other Son Julian beſieg'd by Conſtantius in Arles, and miſtruſting the change of his wonted Succeſs, to ſave his head, poorly turns Prieſt; but that not availing him, is carried into Italy, and there put to death; having four Years acted the Emperor. While theſe things were doing, the Britans at home, deſtitute of Roman Aid, and the chief ſtrength of thir own Youth, that went firſt with Maximus, then with Conſtantine, not returning home, vext and haras'd by thir wonted Enemies, had ſent Meſſages to Honorius; but he at that time not being able to defend Rome it ſelf, which the ſame Year was taken by Alaric, adviſes them by his Letter to conſult how beſt they might for thir own Safety, and acquits them of the Roman Juriſdiction. They therfore thus relinquiſht, and by all Right the Government relapſing into thir own hands, thenceforth betook themſelves to live after thir own Laws, defending thir Bounds as well as they were able; and the Armoricans, who not long after were call'd the Britans of France, follow'd thir Example. Thus expir'd this great Empire of the Romans; firſt in Britain, ſoon after in Italy it ſelf: having born chief ſway in this Iland, though never throughly ſubdu'd, or all at once in ſubjection, if we reck'n from the coming in of Julius to the taking of Rome by Alaric, in which Year Honorius wrote thoſe Letters of Diſcharge into Britain, the ſpace of 462 Years. And with the Empire fell alſo what before in this Weſtern World was chiefly Roman; Learning, Valour, Eloquence, Hiſtory, Civility, and ev'n Language it ſelf, all theſe together, as it were, with equal pace, diminiſhing and decaying. Henceforth we are to ſtear by another ſort of Authors; near anough to the things they write, as in thir own Country, if that would ſerve; in time not much belated, ſom of equal Age, in expreſſion barbarous; and to ſay how judicious, I ſuſpend a while: This we muſt expect; in Civil Matters to find them dubious Relaters, and ſtill to the beſt advantage of what they term Holy Church, meaning indeed themſelves: in moſt other Matters of Religion, blind, aſtoniſh'd, and ſtrook with Superſtition as with a Planet; in one word, Monks. Yet theſe Guides, where can be had no better, muſt be follow'd; in groſs, it may be true anough; in circumſtance each Man as his Judgment gives him, may reſerve his Faith, or beſtow it. But ſo different a ſtate of things requires a ſeveral relation.

THE HISTORY OF BRITAIN.

The Third Book.

THIS third Book having to tell of Accidents as various and exemplary as the Intermiſſion or Change of Government hath any where brought forth, may deſerve Attention more than common, and repay it with like benefit to them who can judiciouſly read: conſidering eſpecially that the late civil Broils had caſt us into a condition not much unlike to what the Britans then were in, when the imperial Juriſdiction departing hence left them to the ſway of thir own Councils; which times by comparing ſeriouſly with theſe later, and that confuſed Anarchy with this Interreign, we may be able from two ſuch remarkable turns of State, producing like Events among us, to raiſe a Knowledg of our ſelves both great and weighty, by judging hence what kind of Men the Britans generally are in Matters of ſo high Enterpriſe, how by Nature, Induſtry, or Cuſtom, fitted to attempt or undergo Matters of ſo main Conſequence: for if it be a high point of Wiſdom in every private Man, much more is it in a Nation to know it ſelf; rather then puft up with vulgar Flatteries and Encomiums, for want of ſelf-knowledg, to enterpriſe raſhly and come off miſerably in great Undertakings. The Britans thus as we heard being left without protection from the Empire, and the Land in a manner emptied of all her Youth, conſum'd in Wars abroad, or not caring to return home, themſelves through long Subjection, ſervile in Mind, ſlothful of Body, and with the uſe of Arms unacquainted, ſuſtain'd but ill for many Years the Violence of thoſe barbarous Invaders, who now daily grew upon them. For although at firſt greedy of Change, and to be thought the leading Nation to Freedom from the Empire, they ſeem'd a while to beſtir them with a ſhew of Diligence in thir new Affairs, ſom ſecretly aſpiring to rule, others adoring the name of Liberty, yet ſo ſoon as they felt by proof the weight of what it was to govern well themſelves, and what was wanting within them, not ſtomach or the love of Licence, but the Wiſdom, the Vertue, the Labour, to uſe and maintain true Liberty, they ſoon remitted thir heat, and ſhrunk more wretchedly under the Burden of thir own Liberty, then before under a foren Yoke. Inſomuch that the Reſidue of thoſe Romans which had planted themſelves heer, deſpairing of thir ill Department at home, and weak Reſiſtance in the Field by thoſe few who had the Courage or the Strength to bear Arms, nine Years after the ſacking of Rome remov'd out of Britain into France, hiding for haſte great part of thir Treaſure, which was never after found. And now again the Britans, no longer able to ſupport themſelves againſt the prevailing Enemy, ſolicit Honorius to thir aid, with mournful Letters, Embaſſages and Vows of perpetual Subjection to Rome, if the Northern Fo were but repuls'd. He at thir requeſt ſpares them one Legion, which with great Slaughter of the Scots and Picts drove them beyond the Borders, reſcu'd the Britans, and adviſ'd them to build a Wall croſs the Iland, between Sea and Sea, from the place where

But the Material being only Turf, and by the rude multitude unartificially Gildas. built up without better Direction, avail'd them little. For no ſooner was the Legion departed, but the greedy Spoilers returning, land in great numbers from thir Boats and Pinaces, waſting, ſlaying, and treading down all before them. Then are Meſſengers again poſted to Rome in lamentable ſort, beſeeching that they would not ſuffer a whole Province to be deſtroy'd, and the Roman Name, ſo honourable yet among them, to become the Subject of 423. Barbarian Scorn and Inſolence. The Emperor, at thir ſad Complaint, with what ſpeed was poſſible, ſends to thir ſuccour. Who coming ſuddenly on thoſe ravenous multitudes that minded only Spoil, ſurpriſe them with a terrible Slaughter. They who eſcap'd fled back to thoſe Seas from whence yearly they were wont to arrive, and return lad'n with Booties. But the Romans, who came not now to rule, but charitably to aid, declaring that it ſtood not longer with the eaſe of thir Affairs to make ſuch laborious Voyages in purſuit of ſo baſe and vagabond Robbers, of whom neither Glory was to be got, nor Gain, exhorted them to manage thir own Warfare; and to defend like Men thir Country, thir Wives, thir Children, and what was to be dearer then Life, thir Liberty, againſt an Enemy not ſtronger then themſelves, if thir own Sloth and Cowardiſe had not made them ſo; if they would but only find hands to graſp defenſive Arms, rather then baſely ſtretch them out to receave Bede, ibid. Bonds. They gave them alſo thir help to build a new Wall, not of Earth as Gildas. the former, but of Stone, (both at the public Coſt, and by particular Contributions) traverſing the Ile in direct Line from Eaſt to Weſt between certain Cities plac'd there as Frontiers to bear off the Enemy, where Severus had wall'd once before. They rais'd it 12 foot high, 8 broad. Along the South Shoar, becauſe from thence alſo like Hoſtility was fear'd, they place Towers by the Sea-ſide at certain diſtances, for Safety of the Coaſt. Withal they inſtruct them in the Art of War, leaving Patterns of thir Arms and Weapons behind them; and with animating Words, and many Leſſons of Valour to a faint-hearted Audience, bid them finally farewel, without purpoſe to return. And theſe two friendly Expeditions, the laſt of any hither by the Romans, were perform'd, as may be gather'd out of Beda and Diaconus, the two laſt Years of Honorius. Thir Leader, as ſom modernly write, was Gallio of Blond. Ravenna; Buchanan, who departs not much from the Fables of his Predeceſſor Sabellic. Boethius, names him Maximianus, and brings againſt him to this Battel Fergus firſt King of Scots, after thir ſecond ſuppos'd coming into Scotland, Durſtus King of Picts, both there ſlain, and Dioneth an imaginary King of Britain, or Duke of Cornwall, who improbably ſided with them againſt his own Country, Buch. l. 5. hardly eſcaping. With no leſs exactneſs of particular Circumſtances he takes upon him to relate all thoſe tumultuary Inrodes of the Scots and Picts into Britain, as if they had but yeſterday happen'd, thir Order of Battel, manner of Fight, number of Slain, Articles of Peace, things wherof Gildas and Beda are utterly ſilent, Authors to whom the Scotch Writers have none to cite comparable in Antiquity; no more therfore to be believ'd for bare Aſſertions, however quaintly dreſt, then our Geofry of Monmouth when he varies moſt from authentick Story. But either the inbred Vanity of ſom, in that reſpect unworthily call'd Hiſtorians, or the fond Zeal of praiſing thir Nations above Truth, hath ſo far tranſported them, that where they find nothing faithfully to relate, they fall confidently to invent what they think may either beſt ſet off thir Hiſtory, or magnify thir Country.

The Scots and Picts in Manners differing ſomwhat from each other, but ſtill unanimous to rob and ſpoil, hearing that the Romans intended not to return Gildas, Bede. from thir Gorroghs or leathern Frigats, pour out themſelves in Swarms upon the Land more confident then ever: and from the North end of the Ile to the very Wall-ſide, then firſt took poſſeſſion as Inhabitants; while the Britans with idle Weapons in thir hands ſtand trembling on the Battlements, till the half-naked Barbarians with thir long and formidable Iron Hooks pull them down headlong. The reſt not only quitting the Wall, but Towns and Cities, leave them to the bloody Purſuer, who follows killing, waſting, and deſtroying all in his way. From theſe Confuſions aroſe a Famin, and from thence Diſcord and civil Commotion among the Britans: each Man living by what he robb'd or took violently from his Neighbour. When all Stores were conſum'd and ſpent where Men inhabited, they betook them to the Woods, and liv'd by hunting, which was thir only Suſtainment. To the heaps of theſe Evils from Bede.

without were added new Diviſions within the Church. For Agricola the Son Conſtantius.

Strength of thoſe two Men, then in thir own thouſands arm'd. They came, and thir Preſence in the Camp was not leſs then if a whole Army had com to ſecond them. It was then the time of Lent, and the People inſtructed by the daily Sermons of theſe two Paſtors, came flocking to receave Baptiſm.
There was a place in the Camp ſet apart as a Church, and trick'd up with Boughs upon Eaſter-day. The Enemy underſtanding this, and that the Britans were tak'n up with Religions more then with feats of Arms, advances, after the Paſchal Feaſt, as to a certain Victory. German, who alſo had intelligence of thir Approach, undertakes to be Captain that day; and riding out with ſelected Troops to diſcover what Advantages the place might offer, lights on a Valley compaſs'd about with Hills, by which the Enemy was to paſs.
And placing there his Ambuſh, warns them, that what word they heard him pronounce aloud, the ſame they ſhould repeat with univerſal ſhout. The Enemy paſſes on ſecurely, and German thrice aloud cries Hallelujah; which anſwer'd by the Souldiers with a ſudd'n burſt of Clamour, is from the Hills and Valleys redoubled. The Saxons and Picts on a ſudden ſuppoſing it the noiſe of a huge Hoaſt, throw themſelves into flight, caſting down thir Arms, and great numbers of them are drown'd in the River which they had newly paſs'd.
This Victory, thus won without hands, left to the Britans plenty of Spoil, and to the Perſon and the Preaching of German greater Authority and Reverence then before. And the Exploit might paſs for current, if Conſtantius, the Writer of his Life in the next Age, had reſolv'd us how the Britiſh Army came to want baptizing; for of any Paganiſm at that time, or long before, in the Land, we read not, or that Pelagianiſm was re-baptiz'd. The place of this Victory, as is reported, was in Flintſhire, by a Town call'd Guid-cruc, Uſſer.Primord.

Sea, the Sea drives us back to the Barbarians; thus bandied up and down between two Deaths, we periſh either by the Sword or by the Sea. But the Empire, at that time overſpread with Hunns and Vandals, was not in condition to lend them aid. Thus rejected and wearied out with continual flying from place to place, but more afflicted with Famin, which then grew outrageous among them, many for Hunger yielded to the Enemy, others either more reſolute, or leſs expos'd to wants, keeping within Woods and mountainous places, not only defended themſelves, but ſallying out at length gave a ſtop to the inſulting Fo, with many ſeaſonable Defeats; led by ſom eminent Perſon, as may be thought, who exhorted them not to truſt in thir own Strength, but in Divine Aſſiſtance. And perhaps no other heer is meant then the foreſaid Deliverance by German, if computation would permit, which Gildas either not much regarded, or might miſtake; but that he tarried ſo long heer, the Gildas. Writers of his Life aſſent not. Finding therfore ſuch oppoſition, the Scots or Iriſh Robbers, for ſo they are indifferently term'd, without delay get them home. The Picts, as before was mention'd, then firſt began to ſettle in the utmoſt parts of the Iland, uſing now and then to make Inroads upon the Britans. But they in the mean while thus rid of thir Enemies, begin afreſh to till the Ground; which after Ceſſation yields her Fruit in ſuch abundance, as had not formerly bin known for many Ages. But Wantonneſs and Luxury, the wonted Companions of Plenty, grow up as faſt, and with them, if Gildas deſerve belief, all other Vices incident to human Corruption. That which he notes eſpecially to be the chief perverting of all Good in the Land, and ſo continued in his days, was the hatred of Truth, and all ſuch as durſt appear to vindicate and maintain it. Againſt them, as againſt the only Diſturbers, all the Malice of the Land was bent. Lies and Falſities, and ſuch as could beſt invent them, were only in requeſt. Evil was embrac'd for Good, Wickedneſs honour'd and eſteem'd as Vertue. And this quality thir Valour had, againſt a foren Enemy to be ever backward and heartleſs; to civil Broils eager and prompt. In Matters of Government, and the ſearch of Truth, weak and ſhallow, in Falſhood and wicked Deeds pregnant and induſtrious. Pleaſing to God, or not pleaſing, with them weighed alike; and the worſe moſt an end was the weightier. All things were don contrary to public Welfare and Safety; nor only by ſecular Men, for the Clergy alſo, whoſe Example ſhould have guided others, were as vitious and corrupt. Many of them beſotted with continual Drunkenneſs; or ſwoln with Pride and Wilfulneſs, full of Contention, full of Envy, indiſcreet, incompetent Judges to determin what in the practice of Life is good or evil, what lawful or unlawful. Thus furniſh'd with Judgment, and for Manners thus qualify'd both Prieſt and Lay, they agree to chuſe them ſeveral Kings of thir own; as neer as might be, likeſt themſelves; and the words of my Author import as much. Kings were anointed, ſaith he, not of God's anointing, but ſuch as were cruelleſt, and ſoon after as inconſiderately, without examining the truth, put to death by thir Anointers, to ſet up others more fierce and proud. As for the Election of thir Kings (and that they had not all one Monarch, appears both in Ages paſt and by the Sequel) it began, as nigh as may be gueſs'd, either this 447. Year or the following, when they ſaw the Romans had quite deſerted thir Conſtant. claim. About which time alſo Pelagianiſm again prevailing by means of ſom Bede. few, the Britiſh Clergy too weak, it ſeems, at diſpute, entreat the ſecond time German to thir Aſſiſtance. Who coming with Severus a Diſciple of Lupus that was his former Aſſociate, ſtands not now to argue, for the People generally continu'd right; but enquiring thoſe Authors of new Diſturbance, ad- 448. judges them to Baniſhment. They therfore by conſent of all were deliver'd Sigon. to German; who carrying them over with him, diſpos'd of them in ſuch Gildas. place where neither they could infect others, and were themſelves under cure of better Inſtruction. But Germanus the ſame year dy'd in Italy; and the Britans not long after found themſelves again in much perplexity, with no ſlight rumour that thir old Troublers the Scots and Picts had prepar'd a ſtrong Invaſion, purpoſing to kill all, and dwell themſelves in the Land from end to end. But e're thir coming in, as if the Inſtruments of Divine Juſtice had bin at ſtrife, which of them firſt ſhould deſtroy a wicked Nation, the Peſtilence foreſtalling the Sword, left ſcarce alive whom to bury the dead; and for that time, as one Extremity keeps off another, preſerv'd the Land from a worſe Incumbrance of thoſe barbarous Diſpoſſeſſors, whom the Contagion gave not Malmſ. l. 1. leave now to enter far. And yet the Britans, nothing better'd by theſe heavy Judgments, the one threatn'd, the other felt, inſtead of acknowledging the hand of Heaven, run to the Palace of thir King Vortigern with Complaints and Cries of what they ſuddenly fear'd from the Pictiſh Invaſion. Vortigern, who at that time was chief rather then ſole King, unleſs the reſt had perhaps left thir Dominions to the common Enemy, is ſaid by him of Monmouth to have procur'd the Death firſt of Conſtantine, then of Conſtance his Son, who of a Monk was made King, and by that means to have uſurp'd the Crown. But they who can remember how Conſtantine with his Son Conſtance the Monk, the one made Emperor, the other Cæſar, periſh'd in France, may diſcern the ſimple fraud of this Fable. But Vortigern however coming to reign, is decipher'd by truer ſtories a proud unfortunate Tyrant, and yet of the People much belov'd, becauſe his Vices ſorted ſo well with theirs. For neither was he ſkill'd in War, nor wiſe in Counſel, but covetous, luſtful, luxurious, and prone to all Vice; waſting the public Treaſure in Gluttony and Riot, careleſs of the common danger, and through a haughty Ignorance, unapprehenſive of his own. Nevertheleſs importun'd and awak'd at length by unuſual clamours of the People, he ſummons a general Council, to provide ſome better means then heertofore had been us'd againſt theſe continual annoyances from the North. Wherin by advice of all it was determin'd, that the Saxons be invited into Britain againſt the Scots and Picts; whoſe breaking in they either ſhortly expected, or already found they had not ſtrength anough to oppoſe. The Saxons were a barbarous and heathen Nation, famous for nothing elſe but Robberies and Cruelties done to all thir Neighbours, both by Sea and Land; in particular to this Iland, witneſs that military Force which the Roman Emperors maintain'd heer purpoſely againſt them, under a ſpecial Commander, whoſe title, as is found on good record, was Count of the Saxon ſhoar in Britain; and the many miſchiefs done by thir landing heer, both alone and with the Picts, as above hath bin related, witneſs as much. They were a People thought by good Writers, to be deſcended of the Sacæ, a kind of Scythian in the North of Aſia, thence call'd Sacaſons, or Sons of Sacæ, who with a Flood of other Northern Nations came into Europe, toward the declining of the Roman Empire; and uſing Pyracy from Denmark all along theſe Seas, poſſeſs'd at length by intruſion all that Coaſt of Germany and the Nether-lands, which took thence the name of old Saxony, lying between the Rhene and Elve, and from thence North as far as Eidora, the River bounding Holſatia, though not ſo firmly, or ſo largely, but that thir multitude wander'd yet uncertain of Habitation. Such Gueſts as theſe the Britans reſolve now to ſend for, and entreat into thir Houſes and Poſſeſſions, at whoſe very name heertofore they trembl'd afar off. So much do men through impatience count ever that the heavieſt which they bear at preſent, and to remove the evil which they ſuffer, care not to pull on a greater; as if variety and change in evil alſo were acceptable. Or whether it be that men in the deſpair of better, imagin fondly a kind of refuge from one miſery to another.

The Britans therfore, with Vortigern, who was then accounted King over them all, reſolve in full Council to ſend Embaſſadors of thir choiceſt men with great Gifts, and ſaith a Saxon Writer in theſe words, deſiring thir aid. Worthy Saxons, hearing the fame of your proweſs, the diſtreſſed Britains wearied out, and overpreſt by a continual invading Enemy, have ſent us to beſeech your aid. They have a Land fertile and ſpatious, which to your commands they bid us ſurrender. Heertofore we have liv'd with freedom, under the obedience and protection of the Roman Empire. Next to them we know none worthier then your ſelves; and therfore become ſuppliants to your Valour. Leave us not below our preſent Enemies, and to ought by you impos'd, willingly we ſhall ſubmit. Yet Ethelwerd writes not that they promis'd ſubjection, but only Amity and League. They therfore who had chief Rule among them, hearing themſelves entreated by the Britans, to that which gladly they would have wiſh't to obtain of them by entreating, to the Britiſh Embaſſy return this anſwer: Be aſſur'd henceforth of the Saxons, as of faithful Friends to the Britans, no leſs ready to ſtand by them in thir need, then in thir beſt of fortune. The Embaſſadors return joyful, and with news as welcom to thir Country, whoſe ſiniſter fate had now blinded them for deſtruction. The Saxons, conſulting firſt thir Gods (for they had anſwer, that the Land wherto they went, they ſhould hold 300 years, half that time conquering, and half quietly poſſeſſing) furniſh out three long Gallies, or Kyules, with a choſ'n company of warlike Youth, under the conduct of two Brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, deſcended in the fourth degree from Woden; of whom, deify'd for the fame of his Acts, moſt Kings of thoſe Nations derive thir Pedigree. Hengiſt at firſt, though it fell out perhaps according to his drift, held off, excuſing his meanneſs; then obſcurely intimating a deſire and almoſt a neceſſity, by reaſon of his augmented numbers, to have his narrow bounds of Tanet enlarg'd to the Circuit of Kent, had it ſtreit by Donation; though Guorangonus till then was King of that place; and ſo, as it were overcom by the great munificence of Vortigern, gave his Daughter. And ſtill encroaching on the Kings Favour, got furder leave to call over Octa and Ebiſſa, his own and his Brothers Son; pretending that they, if the North were giv'n them, would ſit there as a continual defence againſt the Scots, while himſelf guarded the Gildas. Bed. Ninn. Eaſt. They therfore ſayling with forty Ships ev'n to the Orcades, and every way curbing the Scots and Picts, poſſeſs'd that part of the Ile which is now Northumberland. Notwithſtanding this they complain that thir Monthly pay was grown much into Arrear; which when the Britans found means to ſatisfy, though alleging withal that they to whom promiſe was made of Wages, were nothing ſo many in number: quieted with this a while, but ſtill ſeeking occaſion to fall off, they find fault next, that thir Pay is too ſmall for the danger they undergo, threatning op'n War unleſs it be augmented. Guortimer the Kings Son perceaving his Father and the Kingdom thus betray'd, from that time bends his utmoſt endeavour to drive them out. They on the other ſide making League with the Picts and Scots, and iſſuing out of Kent, waſted without reſiſtance almoſt the whole Land ev'n to the Weſtern Sea, with ſuch a horrid devaſtation, that Towns and Colonies overturn'd, Prieſts and People ſlain, Temples and Palaces, what with Fire and Sword, lay altogether heap'd in one mixt ruin. Of all which multitude, ſo great was the ſinfulneſs that brought this upon them, Gildas adds that few or none were likely to be other then lewd and wicked Perſons. The reſidue of theſe, part overtak'n in the Mountains were ſlain; others ſubdu'd with Hunger preferr'd ſlavery before inſtant Death;

Vortigern. The third in a Feild by Stonar, then call'd Lapis tituli, in Tanet, ſuch an overthrow, that flying in great fear they left the ſpoil of all to thir Enemies. And theſe perhaps are the four Battels, according to Nennius, fought by Guortemir, though by theſe Writers far differently related; and happ'ning beſides many other bickerings, in the ſpace of 20 years, as Malmsbury reck'ns. Nevertheleſs it plainly appears that the Saxons, by whomſoever, were put to hard ſhifts, being all this while fought withal in Kent, thir own allotted dwelling, and ſomtimes on the very edg of the Sea, which the word Wippeds-fleot ſeems to intimat. But Guortemir now dead, and none of Courage Nennius. left to defend the Land, Vortigern either by the power of his Faction, or by conſent of all, reaſſumes the Government: and Hengiſt thus rid of his grand oppoſer, hearing gladly the reſtorement of his old favourer, returns again with great Forces; but to Vortigern whom he well knew how to handle without warring, as to his Son in Law, now that the only Author of diſſention between them was remov'd by Death, offers nothing but all terms of new League and Amity. The King both for his Wives ſake and his own ſottiſh-neſs, conſulting alſo with his Peers not unlike himſelf, readily yields; and the place of Parly is agreed on; to which either ſide was to repair without Weapons. Hengiſt, whoſe meaning was not Peace, but Treachery, appointed his men to be ſecretly arm'd, and acquainted them to what intent. The Malmſ. watch-word was, Nemet eour Saxes, that is, Draw your Daggers; which they obſerving, when the Britans were throughly heated with Wine (for the Treaty it ſeems was not without Cups) and provok'd, as was plotted, by ſom Affront, diſpatch'd with thoſe Poniards every one his next man, to the number of 300, the chief of thoſe that could do ought againſt him, either in Counſel or in Field. Vortigern they only bound and kept in Cuſtody, until he granted them for his ranſom three Provinces, which were called afterward Eſſex, Suſſex, and Middleſex. Who thus diſmiſt, retiring again to his ſolitary abode in the Country of Guorthigirniaun, ſo call'd by his name, from thence to the Caſtle of his own building in North Wales, by the River Tiebi; and living there obſcurely among his Wives, was at length burnt in his Tower by Fire Nin. ex le- from Heav'n, at the Praier, as ſome ſay, of German, but that coheres not; as gend St. Ger. others, by Ambroſius Aurelian; of whom as we have heard at firſt, he ſtood Galfrid. in great fear, and partly for that cauſe invited in the Saxons. Who whether Monmouth. by conſtraint, or of thir own accord after much miſchief don, moſt of them returning back into thir own Country, left a fair opportunity to the Britans of avenging themſelves eaſier on thoſe that ſtaid behind. Repenting therfore, and with earneſt ſupplication imploring divine help to prevent thir final rooting out, they gather from all parts, and under the leading of Ambroſius Aurelianus, a vertuous and modeſt man, the laſt heer of the Roman Stock, advancing now onward againſt the late Victors, defeat them in a memorable Battel.

Common opinion, but grounded chiefly on the Britiſh Fables, makes this Ambroſius to be a younger Son of that Conſtantine, whoſe eldeſt, as we heard, was Conſtance the Monk; who both loſt thir Lives abroad uſurping the Empire.
But the expreſs words both of Gildas and Bede, aſſure us, that the Parents of this Ambroſius having heer born regal Dignity, were ſlain in theſe
Pictiſh Wars and Commotions in the Iland. And if the fear of Ambroſe induc'd Vortigern to call in the Saxons, it ſeems Vortigern uſurp'd his Right. I perceave not that Nennius makes any difference between him and Merlin: for that Child without Father that propheci'd to Vortigern, he names not Merlin, but Ambroſe, makes him the Son of a Roman Conſul; but conceal'd by his Mother, as fearing that the King therfore ſought his Life: yet the Youth no ſooner had confeſs'd his Parentage, but Vortigern either in reward of his Predictions, or as his Right, beſtow'd upon him all the Weſt of Britain; himſelf Gildas. Bed. retiring to a ſolitary Life. Whoſe ever Son he was, he was the firſt, according to ſureſt Authors, that led againſt the Saxons, and overthrew them; but whether before this time or after, none have writt'n. This is certain, that in a time when moſt of the Saxon Forces were departed home, the Britans gather'd Strength; and either againſt thoſe who were left remaining, or againſt thir whole Powers, the ſecond time returning obtain'd this Victory. Thus Ambroſe as chief Monarch of the Ile ſucceeded Vortigern; to whoſe third Son Paſcentius he permitted the rule of two Regions in Nenn. Wales, Buelth, and Guorthigirniaun. In his daies, ſaith Nennius, the Saxons prevail'd not much: againſt whom Arthur, as being then Chief General for the Britiſh Kings, made great War, but more renown'd in Songs and Romances, then in true ſtories. And the ſequel it ſelf declares as 477. much. For in the year 477, Ella the Saxon, with his three Sons, Cymen, Leage, but which won the day is not by any ſet down. Hitherto hath bin collected what there is of certainty with circumſtance of time and place to be found regiſter'd, and no more then barely regiſter'd in Annals of beſt note; without deſcribing after Huntingdon the manner of thoſe Battels and Encounters, which they who compare, and can judg of Books, may be confident he never found in any current Author whom he had to follow. But this Diſeaſe hath bin incident to many more Hiſtorians: and the Age wherof we now write, hath had the ill hap, more then any ſince the firſt fabulous times, to be ſurcharg'd with all the idle fancies of Poſterity. Yet that we may not rely altogether on Saxon Relaters, Gildas, in Antiquity far before theſe, and every way more credible, ſpeaks of theſe Wars in ſuch a manner, though nothing conceited of the Britiſh Valour, as declares the Saxons in his time and before to have bin foil'd not ſeldomer then the Britans. For beſides that firſt Victory of Ambroſe, and the interchangeable Succeſs long after, he tells that the laſt overthrow which they receav'd at Badon Hill, was not the leaſt; which they in thir oldeſt Annals mention not at all. And becauſe the time of this Battel, by any who could do more then gueſs, is not ſet down, or any Foundation giv'n from whence to draw a ſolid compute, it cannot be much wide to inſert it in this place. For ſuch Authors as we have to follow, give the Conduct and Praiſe of this Exploit to Arthur; and that this was the laſt of twelve great Battels which he fought victoriouſly againſt the Saxons. The ſeveral places writt'n by Nennius in thir Welch Names, were many hunder'd years ago unknown, and ſo here omitted. But who Arthur was, and whether ever any ſuch reign'd in Britain, hath bin doubted hertofore, and may again with good reaſon. For the Monk of Malmsbury, and others whoſe Credit hath ſway'd moſt with the learneder ſort, we may well perceave to have known no more of this Arthur 500 years paſt, nor of his doings, then we now living; and what they had to ſay, tranſcrib'd out of Nennius, a very trivial Writer yet extant, which hath already bin related; or out of a Britiſh Book, the ſame which he of Monmouth ſet forth, utterly unknown to the World, till more then 600 Years after the days of Arthur, of whom (as Sigebert in his Chronicle confeſſes) all other Hiſtories were ſilent, both Foren and Domeſtic, except only that fabulous Book. Others of later time have ſought to aſſert him by old Legends and Cathedral Regeſts. But he who can accept of Legends for good Story, may quickly ſwell a Volume with Traſh, and had need be furniſh'd with two only Neceſſaries, Leiſure and Belief, whether it be the Writer, or he that ſhall read. As to Arthur, no leſs is in doubt who was his Father; for if it be true as Nennius or his Notiſt avers, that Arthur was call'd Mab-Vther, that is to ſay, a cruel Son, for the fierſeneſs that Men ſaw in him of a Child, and the intent of his Name Arturus imports as much, it might well be that ſom in after Ages who ſought to turn him into a Fable, wreſted the word Vther into a proper Name, and ſo fain'd him the Son of Vther; ſince we read not in any certain Story, that ever ſuch Perſon liv'd till Geffry of Monmouth ſet him off with the ſirname of Pendragon. And as we doubted of his Parentage, ſo may we alſo of his Puiſſance; for whether that Victory at Badon Hill were his or no, is uncertain; Gildas not naming him, as he did Ambroſe in the former. Next, if it be true as Caradoc relates, that Melvas King of that Country which is now Summerſet, kept from him Gueniver his Wife a whole Year in the Town of Glaſton, and reſtor'd her at the entreaty of Gildas, rather then for any enforcment that Artur with all his Chivalry could make againſt a ſmall Town defended only by a moory ſituation; had either his knowledg in War, or the force he had to make, bin anſwerable to the Fame they bear, that petty King had neither dar'd ſuch an affront, nor he bin ſo long, and at laſt without effect, in revenging it. Conſidering laſtly how the Saxons gain'd upon him every where all the time of his ſuppos'd Reign, which began, as ſom write, in the tenth year of Kerdic, who wrung from him by long War the Countries of Summerſet and Hamſhire; there will remain neither place nor circumſtance in ſtory, which may adminiſter any likelihood of thoſe great Acts that are aſcrib'd him. This only is alledg'd by Nennius in Artur's behalf, that the Saxons, though vanquiſh'd never ſo oft, grew ſtill more numerous upon him by continual Supplies out of Germany. And the truth is, that Valour may be over-toil'd, and overcom at laſt with endleſs overcoming. But as for this Battel of Mount Badon where the Saxons were hemm'd in, or beſieg'd, whether by Artur won, or whenſoever, it ſeems indeed to have giv'n a moſt undoubted and important blow to the Saxons, and to have ſtop'd thir proceedings for a good while after. Gildas himſelf witneſſing that the Britans having thus compell'd them to ſit down with Peace, fell therupon to civil diſcord among themſelves.

Which words may ſeem to let in ſom light toward the ſearching out when this Battel was fought. And we ſhall find no time ſince the firſt Saxon War, from whence a longer Peace enſu'd, then from the fight at Kerdic's Leage in the year 527. which all the Chronicles mention, without Victory to Kerdic; and give us argument from the cuſtom they have of magnifying thir own Deeds upon all occaſions, to preſume here his ill ſpeeding. And if we look ſtill onward, ev'n to the 44th year after, wherin Gildas wrote, if his obſcure utterance be underſtood, we ſhall meet with very little War between the Britans and Saxons. This only remains difficult, that the Victory firſt Gildas.
won by Ambroſe, was not ſo long before this at Badon Siege, but that the ſame Men living might be eye-witneſſes of both; and by this rate hardly can the latter be thought won by Artur, unleſs we reck'n him a grown youth at leaſt in the days of Ambroſe, and much more then a youth, if Malmsbury be heard, who affirms all the Exploits of Ambroſe to have bin don chiefly by Artur as his General, which will add much Unbelief to the common Aſſertion of his reigning after Ambroſe and Uther, eſpecially the fight at Badon, being the laſt of his twelve Battels. But to prove by that which follows, that the fight at Kerdic's Leage, though it differ in name from that of Badon, may be thought the ſame by all effects; Kerdic three years after, not proceeding onward, as 530.
his manner was, on the Continent, turns back his Forces on the Ile of Wight; Sax. an. omn.

which bore his Name. Notwithſtanding all theſe unlikelihoods of Artur's Reign and great Acheivments, in a Narration crept in I know not how among the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, Artur the famous King of Britans, is ſaid not only to have expell'd hence the Saracens, who were not then known in Europe, but to have conquer'd Freeſland, and all the North Eaſt Iles as far as Ruſſia, to have made Lapland the Eaſtern bound of his Empire, and Norway the Chamber of Britain. When ſhould this be don? from the Saxons, till after twelve Battels, he had no reſt at home; after thoſe, the Britans contented with the quiet they had from thir Saxon Enemies, were ſo far from ſeeking Conqueſts abroad, that, by report of Gildas above cited, they fell to civil Wars at home. Surely Artur much better had made War in old Saxony, to repreſs thir flowing hither, then to have won Kingdoms as far as Ruſſia, ſcarce able here to defend his own. Buchanan our Neighbour Hiſtorian reprehends him of Monmouth and others for fabling in the Deeds of Artur; yet what he writes therof himſelf, as of better Credit, ſhews not whence he had but from thoſe Fables; which he ſeems content to believe in part, on condition that the Scots and Picts may be thought to have aſſiſted Artur in all his Wars, and Achievments; wherof appears as little ground by any credible Story, as of that which he moſt counts fabulous. But not furder to conteſt about ſuch Uncertainties.

In the Year 547, Ida the Saxon, ſprung alſo from Woden in the tenth Degree, 547.
began the Kingdom of Bernicia in Northumberland; built the Town The Kingdom of leſs then Kingdoms were the prize of every fortunate Commander, they thought it but reaſon, as well as others of thir Nation, to aſſume Royalty.

Of whom Ida was the firſt, a Man in the Prime of his Years, and of Parentage Malmsb.
as we heard; but how he came to wear the Crown, aſpiring or by free choice, is not ſaid. Certain anough it is, that his Vertues made him not leſs noble then his Birth, in War undaunted, and unfoil'd; in Peace tem-

Alla deſcended alſo of Woden, but by another Line, ſet up a ſecond Kingdom 560. in Deira, the South part of Northumberland, and held it 30 Years; while Adda, Annal. the Son of Ida, and five more after him reign'd without other memory in Florenc. Bernicia: And in Kent, Ethelbert the next Year began. For Eſca the Son of 561. Hengiſt had left Otha, and he Emeric to rule after him; both which, without adding to thir Bounds, kept what they had in Peace 53 Years. But Ethelbert in length of reign equal'd both his Progenitors, and as Beda counts, three Malmſ. Years exceeded. Young at his firſt entrance, and unexperienc'd, he was the firſt raiſer of Civil War among the Saxons; claiming from the priority of time wherin Hengiſt took poſſeſſion here, a kind of Right over the later Kingdoms; and therupon was troubleſom to thir Confines: but by them twice defeated, he who but now thought to ſeem dreadful, became almoſt contemptible.
Ann. omn. For Keaulin and Cutha his Son, perſuing him into his own Territory,

By this means the Britans, but chiefly by this Victory at Badon, for the ſpace of 44 Years, ending in 571, receiv'd no great Annoyance from the Saxons: But the Peace they enjoy'd, by ill uſing it, prov'd more deſtructive to them then War. For being rais'd on a ſudden by two ſuch eminent Succeſſes, from the loweſt condition of Thraldom, they whoſe Eyes had beheld both thoſe Deliverances, that by Ambroſe, and this at Badon, were taught by the experience of either Fortune, both Kings, Magiſtrates, Prieſts, and privat Gildas. Men, to live orderly. But when the next Age, unacquainted with paſt Evils, and only ſenſible of thir preſent eaſe and quiet, ſucceeded, ſtrait follow'd the apparent ſubverſion of all Truth, and Juſtice, in the minds of moſt Men: ſcarce the leaſt footſtep, or impreſſion of Goodneſs left remaining through all Ranks and Degrees in the Land; except in ſom ſo very few, as to be hardly viſible in a general Corruption: which grew in ſhort ſpace not only manifeſt, but odious to all the Neighbour Nations. And firſt thir Kings, among whom alſo the Sons or Grand-children of Ambroſe, were fouly degenerated to all Tyranny and vitious Life. Wherof to hear ſome Particulars out of Gildas, will not be impertinent. They avenge, ſaith he, and they protect; not the Innocent, but the Guilty: They ſwear oft, but perjure; they wage War, but civil and unjuſt War. They puniſh rigorouſly them that rob by the High-way; but thoſe grand Robbers that ſit with them at Table, they honour and reward. They give Alms largly, but in the face of thir Alms-deeds, pile up Wickedneſs to a far higher heap. They ſit in the Seat of Judgment, but go ſeldom by the Rule of Right; neglecting and proudly overlooking the modeſt and harmleſs, but countenancing the audacious, though guilty of abominableſt Crimes; they ſtuff thir Priſons, but with Men committed rather by Circumvention, then any juſt Cauſe. Nothing better were the Clergy, but at the ſame paſs, or rather worſe then when the Saxons came firſt in; unlearned, unapprehenſive, yet impudent; ſuttle Prowlers, Paſtors in Name, but indeed Wolves; intent upon all occaſions, not to feed the Flock, but to pamper and well-line themſelves: not call'd, but ſeiſing on the Minſtry as a Trade, not as a ſpiritual Charge: teaching the People, not by ſound Doctrin, but by evil Example: uſurping the Chair of Peter, but through the blindneſs of thir own worldly Luſts, they ſtumble upon the Seat of Judas: deedly haters of Truth, broachers of Lies: looking on the poor Chriſtian with eyes of Pride and Contempt; but fawning on the wickedeſt rich Men without ſhame: great promoters of other mens Alms, with thir ſet Exhortations; but themſelves contributing ever leaſt: ſlightly touching the many Vices of the Age, but preaching without end thir own Grievances, as don to Chriſt; ſeeking after Preferments and Degrees in the Church, more then after Heav'n; and ſo gain'd, make it thir whole ſtudy how to keep them by any Tyranny. Yet leſt they ſhould be thought things of no uſe in thir eminent Places, they have thir Niceties and trivial Points to keep in aw the ſuperſtitious Multitude; but in true ſaving Knowledg leave them ſtill

ſtill as groſs and ſtupid as themſelves; bunglers at the Scripture, nay, forbidding and ſilencing them that know; but in worldly Matters, practis'd and cunning Shifters; in that only Art and Symony, great Clercs and Maſters, bearing thir heads high, but thir thoughts abject and low. He taxes them alſo as gluttonous, incontinent, and daily Drunkards. And what ſhouldſt thou expect from theſe, poor Laity, ſo he goes on, theſe Beaſts, all Belly? Shall theſe amend thee, who are themſelves laborious in evil doings? Shalt thou ſee with thir Eyes, who ſee right forward nothing but Gain? Leave them rather, as bids our Saviour, leſt ye fall both blindfold into the ſame Perdition. Are all thus? Perhaps not all, or not ſo groſly. But what avail'd it Eli to be himſelf blameleſs, while he conniv'd at others that were abominable? Who of them hath been envi'd for his better Life? who of them hath hated to conſort with theſe, or withſtood thir entring the Miniſtry, or endeavour'd zealouſly thir caſting out? Yet ſom of theſe perhaps by others are legended for great Saints. This was the ſtate of Government, this of Religion among the Britans, in that long calm of Peace, which the fight at Badon-Hill had brought forth. Wherby it came to paſs, that ſo fair a Victory came to nothing. Towns and Cities were not reinhabited, but lay ruin'd and waſt; nor was it long ere Domeſtic War breaking out, waſted them more. For Britain, as at other times, had then alſo ſeveral Kings: Five of whom Gildas, living then in Armorica at a ſafe diſtance, boldly reproves by name; Firſt Conſtantine (fabl'd the Son of Cador, Duke of Cornwal, Arturs half Brother by the Mother's ſide) who then reign'd in Cornwal and Devon, a Tyrannical and Bloody King, polluted alſo with many Adulteries: He got into his Power two young Princes of the Blood Royal, uncertain whether before him in right, or otherwiſe ſuſpected; and after ſolemn Oath giv'n of thir Safety the Year that Gildas wrote, ſlew them with thir two Governors in the Church, and in thir Mother's Arms, through the Abbot's Coap which he had thrown over them, thinking by the reverence of his Veſture to have withheld the Murderer. Theſe are commonly ſuppos'd to be the Sons of Mordred, Arturs Nefew, ſaid to have revolted from his Uncle, giv'n him in a Battel his Death's Wound, and by him after to have bin ſlain. Which things were they true, would much diminiſh the blame of Cruelty in Conſtantine, revenging Artur on the Sons of ſo falſe a Mordred. In another part, but not expreſs'd where, Aurelius Conanus was King: him he charges alſo with Adulteries, and Parricide; Cruelties wors then the former; to be a hater of his Country's Peace, thirſting after Civil War and Prey. His Condition it ſeems was not very proſperous, for Gildas wiſhes him, being now left alone, like a Tree withering in the midſt of a barren Field, to remember the Vanity and Arrogance of his Father, and elder Brethren, who came all to untimely Death in thir Youth. The third reigning in Demetia, or South Wales, was Vortipor, the Son of a good Father; he was, when Gildas wrote, grown old, not in Years only, but in Adulteries; and in governing, full of Falſhood and cruel Actions. In his latter days, putting away his Wife, who di'd in Divorce, he became, if we miſtake not Gildas, inceſtuous with his Daughter. The fourth was Cuneglas, imbru'd in Civil War; he alſo had divorc'd his Wife, and tak'n her Siſter, who had vow'd Widowhood: he was a great Enemy to the Clergy, high-minded, and truſting to his Wealth. The laſt, but greateſt of all in Power, was Maglocune, and greateſt alſo in Wickedneſs: he had driven out, or ſlain, many other Kings or Tyrants, and was call'd the Iſland Dragon, perhaps having his Seat in Angleſey; a profuſe Giver, a great Warrior, and of a goodly Stature. While he was yet young, he overthrew his Uncle, though in the head of a compleat Army, and took from him the Kingdom: Then touch't with remorſe of his doings, not without deliberation, took upon him the profeſſion of a Monk; but ſoon forſook his Vow, and his Wife alſo; which for that Vow he had left, making Love to the Wife of his Brother's Son then living. Who not refuſing the Offer, if ſhe were not rather the firſt that entic'd, found means both to diſpatch her own Husband, and the former Wife of Maglocune, to make her Marriage with him the more unqueſtionable. Neither did he this for want of better Inſtructions, having had the learnedeſt and wiſeſt Man reputed of all Britain, the inſtituter of his Youth. Thus much, the utmoſt that can be learnt by truer Story, of what paſt among the Britains from the time of thir uſeleſs Victory at Badon, to the time that Gildas wrote, that is to ſay, as may be gueſs't, from 527 to 571, is here ſet down altogether; not to be reduc't under any certainty of Years. But now the Saxons, who for the moſt part all this while had bin ſtill, unleſs among themſelves, began afreſh to aſſault them, and ere long to drive them out of all which they yet maintain'd on this ſide Wales. For Cuthulf the Brother of 571. Camden. Keaulin, by a Victory obtain'd at Bedanford, now Bedford, took from them Annal. omn. four good Towns, Liganburgh, Eglesburh, Beſington, now Benſon in Oxford-ſhire, and Igneſham; but outliv'd not many months his good Succeſs. And 577. after ſix Years more, Keaulin, and Cuthwin his Son, gave them a great overthrow at Deorrham in Gloſterſhire, ſlew three of thir Kings, Comail, Condidan, and Farinmaile; and took three of thir chief Cities, Gloceſter, Cirenceſter, and 584. Badenceſter. The Britans notwithſtanding, after ſome ſpace of time, judging to have out-grown thir Loſſes, gather to a head, and encounter Keaulin with Cutha his Son, at Fethanleage; whom valiantly fighting, they ſlew among Huntingd. the thickeſt, and, as is ſaid, forc'd the Saxons to retire. But Keaulin reinforcing the Fight, put them to a main rout; and following his Advantage, took many Towns, and return'd laden with rich Booty.

The Kingdom of Mercia. The laſt of thoſe Saxons who rais'd thir own Achievments to a Monarchy, was Crida, much about this time, firſt founder of the Mercian Kingdom, Huntingd. drawing alſo his Pedigree from Woden. Of whom all to write the ſeveral Matt.Weſtm. Genealogies, though it might be don without long ſearch, were, in my opinion, to encumber the Story with a ſort of barbarous Names, to little purpoſe. This may ſuffice, that of Wodens three Sons, from the eldeſt iſſu'd Malmsb. l. 1. c. 3. Hengiſt, and his Succeſſion; from the ſecond, the Kings of Mercia; from the third, all that reign'd in Weſt-Saxon, and moſt of the Northumbers, of whom Alla was one, the firſt King of Deira; which, after his Death, the Florent. ad ann. Race of Ida ſeiz'd, and made it one Kingdom with Bernicia, uſurping on the Childhood of Edwin, Alla's Son: Whom Ethelric the Son of Ida expel'd.
559. Notwithſtanding others write of him, that from a poor Life, and beyond hope in his old Age, coming to the Crown, he could hardly, by the Acceſs of a Kingdom, have overcom his former obſcurity, had not the Fame of his
588. Son preſerv'd him. Once more the Britans, ere they quitted all on this ſide Annal. omn. the Mountains, forgot not to ſhew ſome Manhood: for meeting Keaulin at 592. Florent. Woden's Beorth, that is to ſay, Woden's Mount in Wiltſhire; whether it were Bed. l. 2. c. 3. by thir own Forces, or aſſiſted by the Angles, whoſe hatred Keaulin had in-Malmſ. cur'd, they ruin'd his whole Army, and chas'd him out of his Kingdom;
Florent. from whence flying, he di'd the next Year in Poverty, who a little before Sax. an. was the moſt potent, and indeed ſole King of all the Saxons on this ſide Humber. But who was chief among the Britans in this Exploit, had bin worth re-membring, whether it were Maglocune, of whoſe Proweſs hath bin ſpok'n, or Teudric King of Glamorgan, whom the Regeſt of Landaff recounts to have bin always victorious in fight; to have reign'd about this time, and at length to have exchang'd his Crown for a Hermitage; till in the Aid of his Son Mouric, whom the Saxons had reduc'd to extremes, taking Arms again, he defeated them at Tinterne by the River Wye; but himſelf receiv'd a mortal Wound. The ſame Year with Keaulin, whom Keola the Son of Cuthulf, *Keau-
593. lin*'s Brother, ſucceeded, Crida alſo the Mercian King deceas'd, in whoſe room
Wibba ſucceeded; and in Northumberland, Ethelfrid, in the room of Ethelric, reigning 24 Years. Thus omitting Fables, we have the view of what with reaſon can be rely'd on for truth, don in Britain ſince the Romans forſook it.
Wherin we have heard the many Miſeries and Deſolations brought by Divine Hand on a perverſe Nation; driv'n, when nothing elſe would reform them, out of a fair Country, into a mountanous and barren Corner, by Strangers and Pagans. So much more tolerable in the Eye of Heav'n is Infidelity pro-feſt, then Chriſtian Faith and Religion diſhonour'd by unchriſtian Works.
Yet they alſo at length renounc'd thir Heatheniſm; which how it came to paſs, will be the Matter next related.

The Fourth Book.

THE Saxons grown up now to ſeven abſolute Kingdoms, and the lateſt of them eſtabliſh't by Succeſſion, finding thir Power arrive well nigh at the utmoſt of what was to be gain'd upon the Britans, and as little fearing to be diſplanted by them, had time now to ſurvey at leaſure one anothers Greatneſs. Which quickly bred among them either Envy or mutual Jealouſies; till the Weſt Kingdom at length grown over powerful, put an end to all the reſt. Mean while, above others, Ethelbert of Kent, who by this time had well rip'nd his young Ambition, with more Ability of Years and Experience in War, what before he attempted to his Loſs, now ſucceſsfully attains; and by degrees brought all the other Monarchies between Kent and Humber to be at his devotion. To which deſign the Kingdom of Weſt-Saxons, being the firmeſt of them all, at that time ſore ſhak'n by thir overthrow at Wodens-beorth, and the Death of Keaulin, gave him no doubt a main Advantage; the reſt yeilded not Subjection, but as he earn'd it by continual Victories. And to win him the more regard abroad, he marries Bertha the French King's Daughter, though a Chriſtian, and with this condition, to have the free exerciſe of her Faith, under the Care and Inſtruction of Letardus a Biſhop, ſent by her Parents along with her; the King notwithſtanding and his People retaining thir own Religion. Beda out of Gildas lays it ſadly to the Britans charge, that they never would voutſafe thir Saxon Neighbours the means of Converſion: but how far to blame they were, and what hope there was of converting in the midſt of ſo much Hoſtility, at leaſt Falſhood, from thir firſt Arrival, is not now eaſy to determin. Howbeit not long after they had the Chriſtian Faith preach'd to them by a Nation more remote, and (as a Report went, accounted old in Beda's time) upon this occaſion.

The Northumbrians had a Cuſtom at that time, and many hunder'd years after not aboliſh't, to ſell thir Children for a ſmall value into any foren Land. Of which number two comly Youths were brought to Rome, whoſe fair and honeſt Countnances invited Gregory Arch-deacon of that City, among others that beheld them, pitying thir condition, to demand whence they were; it was anſwer'd by ſom who ſtood by, that they were Angli of the Province Deira, Subjects to Alla King of Northumberland, and by Religion Pagans. Which laſt Gregory deploring, fram'd on a ſudden this alluſion to the three names he heard; that the Angli ſo like to Angels ſhould be ſnatch't de ira, that is, from the Wrath of God, to ſing Hallelujah: and forthwith obtaining Licenſe of Benedict the Pope, had com and preach't heer among them, had not the Roman People, whoſe Love endur'd not the Abſence of ſo vigilant a Paſtor over them, recal'd him then on his Journey, though but defer'd his pious Intention. For a while after, ſucceeding in the Papal Seat, and now in his fourth Year, admoniſh'd, ſaith Beda, by divine Inſtinct, he ſent Auguſtine, whom he had deſign'd for Biſhop of the Engliſh Nation, and other zealous Monks with him, to preach to them the Goſpel. Who being now on thir way, diſcourag'd by ſom Reports, or thir own carnal Fear, ſent back Auſtin, in the name of all, to beſeech Gregory they might return home, and not be ſent a Journey ſo full of hazard, to a fierce and infidel Nation, whoſe Tongue they underſtood not.

Gregory with pious and Apoſtolic Perſwaſions exhorts them not to ſhrink back from ſo good a Work, but cheerfully to go on in the Strength of Divine Aſſiſtance. The Letter it ſelf yet extant among our Writers of Eccleſiaſtic Story, I omit here, as not profeſſing to relate of thoſe Matters more then what mixes aptly with civil Affairs. The Abbot Auſtin, for ſo he was ordain'd over the reſt, reincourag'd by the Exhortations of Gregory, and his 597. Fellows by the Letter which he brought them, came ſafe to the Ile of Tanet, in number about 40, beſides ſom of the French Nation whom they took along as Interpreters. Ethelbert the King, to whom Auſtin at his Landing had ſent a new and wondrous Meſſage, that he came from Rome to profer Heav'n and eternal Happineſs in the knowledg of another God then the Saxons knew, appoints them to remain where they landed, and Neceſſaries to be provided them, conſulting in the mean time what was to be done. And after certain days coming into the Iland, choſe a place to meet them under the open Sky, poſſeſt with an old perſwaſion, that all Spels, if they ſhould uſe any to deceive him, ſo it were not within doors, would be unavailable. They on the other ſide call'd to his preſence, advancing for thir Standard a Silver Croſs, and the painted Image of our Saviour, came ſlowly forward, ſinging thir ſolemn Litanies:
which wrought in Ethelbert more ſuſpicion perhaps that they us'd Enchantments;
till ſitting down as the King will'd them, they there preach'd to him, and all in that Aſſembly, the tidings of Salvation. Whom having heard attentively, the King thus anſwer'd: Fair indeed and ample are the Promiſes which ye bring, and ſuch things as have the appearance in them of much good; yet ſuch as being new and uncertain, I cannot haſtily aſſent to, quitting the Religion which from my Anceſtors, with all the Engliſh Nation, ſo many years I have retain'd. Nevertheleſs becauſe ye are Strangers, and have endur'd ſo long a Journey, to impart us the knowledg of things, which I perſwade me you believe to be the trueſt and the beſt, ye may be ſure we ſhall not recompence you with any Moleſtation, but ſhall provide rather how we may friendlieſt entertain ye; nor do we forbid whom ye can by preaching gain to your Belief. And accordingly thir Reſidence he allotted them in Doroverne or Canturbury his chief City, and made proviſion for thir maintenance, with free leave to preach thir Doctrin where they pleaſed. By which, and by the example of thir holy Life, ſpent in Prayer, Faſting, and continual Labour in the Converſion of Souls, they won many; on whoſe Bounty and the King's, receiving only what was neceſſary, they ſubſiſted. There ſtood without the City, on the Eaſt-ſide, an ancient Church built in honour of St. Martin, while yet the Romans remain'd heer: in which Bertha the Queen went out uſually to pray: Heer they alſo began firſt to preach, baptize, and 598. openly to exerciſe Divine Worſhip. But when the King himſelf, convinc't by thir good Life and Miracles, became Chriſtian, and was baptized, which came to paſs in the very firſt Year of thir Arrival, then multitudes daily, conforming to thir Prince, thought it honour to be reckon'd among thoſe of his Faith. To whom Ethelbert indeed principally ſhewed his Favour, but compell'd Bed. l. 2. c. 5. none. For ſo he had bin taught by them who were both the Inſtructors and the Authors of his Faith, that Chriſtian Religion ought to be voluntary, not compell'd. About this time Kelwulf the Son of Cutha, Keaulins Brother, Sax. an. Malmſ. reign'd over the Weſt-Saxons, after his Brother Keola or Kelric, and had continual 601. War either with Engliſh, Welch, Picts, or Scots. But Auſtin, whom Bed. l. 1. c. 27. with his Fellows, Ethelbert now had endow'd with a better place for thir Abode in the City, and other Poſſeſſions neceſſary to Livelihood, croſſing into France, was by the Archbiſhop of Arles, at the Appointment of Pope Gregory, ordain'd Archbiſhop of the Engliſh; and returning, ſent to Rome Laurence and Peter, two of his Aſſociates, to acquaint the Pope of his good Succeſs in England, and to be reſolv'd of certain Theological, or rather Levitical Queſtions: with Anſwers to which, not proper in this place, Gregory ſends alſo to the great Work of Converting, that went on ſo happily, a Supply of Labourers, bourers, Mellitus, Juſtus, Paulinus, Rufinian, and many others; who what they were, may be gueſs't by the ſtuff which they brought with them, Veſſels and Veſtments for the Altar, Coaps, Reliques, and for the Archbiſhop Auſtin a Pall to ſay Maſs in: to ſuch a rank Superſtition that Age was grown, though ſom of them yet retaining an Emulation of Apoſtolic Zeal. Laſtly, to Ethelbert they brought a Letter with many Preſents. Auſtin thus exalted to Archiepiſcopal Authority, recover'd from the Ruins and other profane Uſes, a Chriſtian Church in Canturbury built of old by the Romans, which he dedicated by the name of Chriſt's Church, and joyning to it built a ſeat for himſelf and his Succeſſors; a Monaſtery alſo neer the City Eaſtward, where Ethelbert at his Motion built St. Peters, and enrich'd it with great Endowments, to be a place of Burial for the Archbiſhops and Kings of Kent: ſo quickly they ſtep'd up into Fellowſhip of Pomp with Kings. While thus Ethelbert and his Bed. l. 2. c. 34.

People had thir Minds intent, Ethelfrid the Northumbrian King was not leſs buſied in far different Affairs: for being altogether warlike, and covetous of Fame, he more waſted the Britans than any Saxon King before him; winning from them large Territories, which either he made tributary, or planted with his own Subjects. Whence Edan King of thoſe Scots that dwelt in Britain, 603.
jealous of his Succeſſes, came againſt him with a mighty Army, to a place call'd Degſaſtan; but in the fight loſing moſt of his Men, himſelf with a few eſcap'd: only Theobald the King's Brother, and the whole Wing which he commanded, unfortunately cut off, made the Victory to Ethelfrid leſs intire.
Yet from that time no King of Scots in hoſtile manner durſt paſs into Britain for a hunderd and more Years after: and what ſom Years before Kelwulf the Weſt-Saxon is annal'd to have don againſt the Scots and Picts, paſſing through the Land of Ethelfrid a King ſo potent, unleſs in his Aid and Alliance, is not likely. Buchanan writes as if Ethelfrid, aſſiſted by Keaulin whom he miſtitles King of Eaſt-Saxons, had before this time a Battel with Aidan, wherin Cutha Keaulin's Son was ſlain. But Cutha, as is above-written from better Authority, was ſlain in fight againſt the Welch 20 years before. The number of Chriſtians 604.
began now to increaſe ſo faſt, that Auguſtin ordaining Biſhops under Bed. l. 2. c. 3.
him, two of his Aſſiſtants Mellitus and Juſtus ſent them out both to the Work of thir Miniſtry. And Mellitus by preaching converted the Eaſt-Saxons, over whom Sebert the Son of Sleda, by permiſſion of Ethelbert, being born of his Siſter Ricula, then reign'd. Whoſe Converſion Ethelbert to gratulate, built them the great Church of St. Paul in London to be thir Biſhop's Cathedral; as Juſtus alſo had his built at Rocheſter, and both gifted by the ſame King with fair Poſſeſſions. Hitherto Auſtin labour'd well among Infidels, but not with like Commendation ſoon after among Chriſtians. For by means of Ethelbert ſummoning the Britan Biſhops to a place on the edg of Worceſterſhire, call'd from that time Auguſtin's Oke, he requires them to conform with him in the ſame day of celebrating Eaſter, and many other points wherin they differ'd from the Rites of Rome: which when they refus'd to do, not prevailing by Diſpute, he appeals to a Miracle, reſtoring to ſight a blind Man whom the Britans could not cure. At this ſomthing mov'd, though not minded to recede from thir own Opinions without furder Conſultation, they requeſt a ſecond meeting: to which came ſeven Britan Biſhops, with many other lerned Men, eſpecially from the famous Monaſtry of Bangor, in which were ſaid to be ſo many Monks, living all by thir own Labour, that being divided under ſeven Rectors, none had fewer then 300. One Man there was who ſtaid behind, a Hermit by the Life he led, who by his Wiſdom effected more then all the reſt who went: being demanded, for they held him as an Oracle, how they might know Auſtin to be a Man from God, that they might follow him, he anſwer'd, that if they found him meek and humble, they ſhould be taught by him, for it was likelieſt to be the Yoke of Chriſt, both what he bore himſelf, and would have them bear; but if he bore himſelf proudly, that they ſhould not regard him, for he was then certainly not of God. They took his Advice, and haſted to the place of meeting. Whom Auſtin, being already there before them, neither aroſe to meet, nor receiv'd in any brotherly ſort, but ſat all the while pontifically in his Chair. Wherat the Britans, as they were counſel'd by the holy Man, neglected him, and neither harkn'd to his Propoſals of Conformity, nor would acknowledg him for an Archbiſhop:

Spelman. Concil. p. 108. And in name of the reſt, Dinothus, then Abbot of Bangor, is ſaid thus ſagely to have anſwer'd him. As to the Subjection which you require, be thus perſwaded of us, that in the bond of Love and Charity we are all Subjects and Servants to the Church of God, yea to the Pope of Rome, and every good Chriſtian to help them forward, both by Word and Deed, to be the Childern of God: other Obedience then this we know not to be due to him whom you term the Pope; and this Obedience we are ready to give both to him and to every Chriſtian continually. Beſides, we are govern'd under God by the Biſhop of Caerleon, who is to overſee us in ſpiritual Matters. To which Auſtin thus preſaging, ſom ſay menacing, replies, Since ye refuſe to accept of Peace with your Brethren, ye ſhall have War from your Enemies; and ſince ye will not with us preach the Word of Life to whom ye ought, from thir hands ye ſhall receive Death. This, though Writers agree not whether Auſtin ſpake it as his Prophecy, or as his Plot againſt the Britans, fell out accordingly. For Sax. an. Huntingd. 607. many years were not paſt, when Ethelfrid, whether of his own accord, or at the requeſt of Ethelbert, incens'd by Auſtin, with a powerful Hoſt came to Weſtcheſter, then Caer-legion. Where being met by the Britiſh Forces, and both ſides in readineſs to give the onſet, he diſcerns a Company of Men, not habited for War, ſtanding together in a place of ſom Safety; and by them a Squadron arm'd. Whom having lernt upon ſom enquiry to be Prieſts and Monks, aſſembl'd thither after three days faſting, to pray for the good Succeſs of thir Forces againſt him, therfore they firſt, ſaith he, ſhall feel our Swords; for they who pray againſt us, fight heavieſt againſt us by thir Prayers, and are our dangerouſeſt Enemies. And with that turns his firſt Charge upon the Monks: Brocmail the Captain ſet to guard them, quickly turns his back, and leaves above 1200 Monks to a ſudden Maſſacer, wherof ſcarce fifty ſcap'd. But not ſo eaſy work found Ethelfrid againſt another part of Britans that ſtood in arms, whom though at laſt he overthrew, yet with Slaughter nigh as great to his own Souldiers. To excuſe Auſtin of this Bloodſhed, leſt ſom might think it his revengeful Policy, Beda writes that he was dead long before, although if the time of his ſitting Archbiſhop be right com- Malmſ. geſt. pont. l. 1. puted ſixteen years, he muſt ſurvive this Action. Other juſt ground of charging him with this Imputation appears not, ſave what evidently we have Sax. an. from Geffry Monmouth, whoſe weight we know. The ſame year Kelwulf made War on the South-Saxons, bloody, ſaith Huntingdon, to both ſides, but moſt 611. to them of the South: and four years after dying, left the Government of Sax. an. Malmſ. Weſt-Saxons to Kinegils and Cuichelm, the Sons of his Brother Keola. Others, as Florent of Worſter, and Matthew of Weſtminſter, will have Cuichelm Son of 614. Kinegils, but admitted to reign with his Father, in whoſe third year they are Camd. recorded with joynt Forces or Conduct to have fought againſt the Britans in 616. Beandune, now Bindon in Dorſetſhire, and to have ſlain of them above two Sax. an. thouſand. More memorable was the ſecond year following, by the Death of Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian King of Saxons, and no leſs a Favourer of all Civility in that rude Age. He gave Laws and Statutes after the example of Roman Emperors, written with the Advice of his ſageſt Counſellors, but in the Engliſh Tongue, and obſerv'd long after. Wherin his ſpecial care was to puniſh thoſe who had ſtoln ought from Church or Churchman, therby ſhewing how gratefully he receiv'd at thir hands the Chriſtian Faith, Which, he no ſooner dead, but his Son Eadbald took the Courſe as faſt to extinguiſh; not only falling back to Heatheniſm, but that which Heatheniſm was wont to abhor, marrying his Father's ſecond Wife. Then ſoon was perceiv'd what multitudes for fear or countenance of the King had profeſs't Chriſtianity, returning now as eagerly to thir old Religion. Nor ſtaid the Apoſtacy within one Province, but quickly ſpread over to the Eaſt-Saxons; occaſion'd there likewiſe, or ſet forward by the Death of thir Chriſtian King Sebert: whoſe Malmſ. three Sons, of whom two are nam'd Sexted and Seward, neither in his life-time would be brought to Baptiſm, and after his Deceaſe re-eſtabliſh'd the free Exerciſe of Idolatry; nor ſo content, they ſet themſelves in deſpight to do ſom op'n Profanation againſt the other Sacrament. Coming therfore into the Church where Mellitus the Biſhop was miniſtring, they requir'd him in abuſe and ſcorn to deliver to them unbaptiz'd the conſecrated Bread; and him refuſing, drove diſgracefully out of thir Dominion. Who croſs'd forthwith into Kent, where things were in the ſame plight, and thence into France, with Juſtus Biſhop of Rocheſter. But Divine Vengeance defer'd not long the Puniſhment of men ſo impious; for Eadbald, vext with an evil Spirit, fell oft'n into foul fits of Diſtraction; and the Sons of Sebert, in a Fight againſt the Weſt-Saxons, periſh'd with thir whole Army. But Eadbald, within the year, by an extraordinary means became penitent. For when Laurence the Archbiſhop and Succeſſor of Auſtin was preparing to ſhip for France, after Juſtus and Mellitus, the ſtory goes, if it be worth beleeving, that St. Peter, in whoſe Church he ſpent the Night before in watching and praying, appear'd to him, and to make the Viſion more ſenſible, gave him many ſtripes for offering to deſert his Flock; at ſight wherof the King (to whom next Morning he ſhew'd the marks of what he had ſuffer'd, by whom and for what cauſe) relenting and in great fear, diſſolv'd his inceſtuous marriage, and appli'd himſelf to the Chriſtian Faith more ſincerely then before, with all his People. But the Londoners addicted ſtill to Paganiſm, would not be perſwaded to receave again Mellitus thir Biſhop, and to compel them was not in his power. Thus much through all the South was troubl'd in Religion, as much were the 617. North parts diſquieted through Ambition. For Ethelfrid of Bernicia, as was touch't before, having thrown Edwin out of Deira, and join'd that Kingdom to his own, not content to have bereav'd him of his Right, whoſe known vertues and high parts gave cauſe of ſuſpicion to his Enemies, ſends Meſſengers to demand him of Redwald King of Eaſt-Angles; under whoſe Protection, after many years wandring obſcurely through all the Iland, he had plac'd his ſafety. Redwald, though having promis'd all defence to Edwin as to his ſuppliant, yet tempted with continual and large offers of Gold, and not contemning the puiſſance of Ethelfrid, yeilded at length, either to diſpatch him, or to give him into thir hands: but earneſtly exhorted by his Wife, not to betray the Faith and inviolable Law of Hoſpitality and Refuge giv'n, prefers his firſt Malmſ.l.1.c.3. promiſe as the more Religious; nor only refuſes to deliver him, but ſince War was therupon denounc't, determins to be beforehand with the danger; and with a ſudden Army rais'd, ſurpriſes Ethelfrid, little dreaming an Invaſion, and in a Fight near to the Eaſt-ſide of the River Idle, on the Mercian border, now Nottinghamſhire, ſlaies him, diſſipating eaſily thoſe few Forces which Camden. he had got to march out over-haſtily with him; who yet as a teſtimony of his Fortune, not his Valour to be blam'd, ſlew firſt with his own hands, Reiner the Kings Son. His two Sons Oſwald, and Oſwi, by Acca, Edwins Siſter, eſcap'd into Scotland. By this Victory, Redwald became ſo far ſuperior to the other Saxon Kings, that Beda reck'ns him the next after Ella and Ethelbert; who beſides this Conqueſt of the North, had likewiſe all on the hitherſide Humber at his obedience. He had formerly in Kent receav'd Baptiſm, but Bed. l.2.c.15. coming home and perſwaded by his Wife, who ſtill it ſeems was his chief Counſellor to good or bad alike, relaps'd into his old Religion: yet not willing to forgo his new, thought it not the worſt way, leſt perhaps he might err in either, for more aſſurance to keep them both; and in the ſame Temple erected one Altar to Chriſt, another to his Idols. But Edwin, as with more deliberation he undertook, and with more ſincerity retain'd the Chriſtian Profeſſion, ſo alſo in Power and extent of Dominion far exceeded all before him; ſubduing all, ſaith Beda, Engliſh or Britiſh, ev'n to the Iles, then call'd Mevanian, Angleſey, and Man; ſetl'd in his Kingdom by Redwald, he ſought in mariage Edelburga, whom others call Tate, the Daughter of Ethelbert. To whoſe Embaſſadors, Eadbald her Brother made anſwer, that to wed thir Daughter to a Pagan, was not the Chriſtian Law. Edwin repli'd, that to her Religion he would be no hindrance, which with her whole Houſhold ſhe might freely exerciſe. And moreover, that if examin'd it were found the better, he would imbrace it. Theſe ingenuous offers, op'ning ſo fair a way to the advancement of Truth, are accepted, and Paulinus as a ſpiritual Guardian ſent 625. along with the Virgin. He being to that purpoſe made Biſhop by Juſtus, omitted no occaſion to plant the Goſpel in thoſe parts, but with ſmall ſucceſs, till the next year, Cuichelm, at that time one of the two Weſt-Saxon Kings, 626. envious of the greatneſs which he ſaw Edwin growing up to, ſent privily Eumerus a hir'd Sword-man to aſſaſſin him; who under pretence of doing a Meſſage from his Maſter, with a poiſon'd Weapon, ſtabs at Edwin, conferring with him in his Houſe, by the River Derwent in Yorkſhire, on an Eaſter-day; which Lilla one of the Kings Attendants, at the inſtant perceaving, with a Loyalty that ſtood not then to deliberate, abandon'd his whole Body to the blow; which notwithſtanding made paſſage through to the Kings Perſon, with a wound not to be ſlighted. The murderer encompaſs'd now with Swords, and deſperate, fore-revenges his own fall with the Death of another, whom his Poniard reach'd home. Paulinus omitting no opportunity to win the King from misbeleef, obtain'd at length this promiſe from him; that if Chriſt, whom he ſo magnifi'd, would give him to recover of his wound, and victory of his Enemies who had thus aſſaulted him, he would then becom Chriſtian, in pledg wherof he gave his young Daughter Eanfled to be bred up in Religion; who with 12 others of his Family, on the day of Pentecoſt was baptiz'd. And by that time well recover'd of his wound, to puniſh the Authors of ſo foul a Fact, he went with an Army againſt the Weſt-Saxons: whom having quell'd by War, and of ſuch as had conſpir'd againſt him, put ſom to Death, others pardon'd, he return'd home victorious, and from that time worſhip'd no more his Idols, yet ventur'd not raſhly into Baptiſm, but firſt took care to be inſtructed rightly what he learnt, examining and ſtill conſidering with himſelf and others, whom he held wiſeſt; though Boniface the Pope, by large Letters of Exhortation, both to him and his Queen, was not wanting to quicken his beleef. But while he ſtill defer'd, and his deferring might ſeem now to have paſt the maturity of Wiſdom to a faulty lingring, Paulinus by Revelation, as was beleev'd, coming to the knowledg of a Secret, which befel him ſtrangly in the time of his troubles, on a certain day went in boldly to him, and laying his right hand on the head of the King, ask'd him if he remember'd what that ſign meant; the King trembling, and in a maze riſing up, ſtrait fell at his Feet. Behold, ſaith Paulinus, raiſing him from the Ground, God hath deliver'd you from your Enemies, and giv'n you the Kingdom, as you deſir'd: perform now what long ſince you promis'd him, to receave his Doctrin which I now bring you, and the Faith, which if you accept, ſhall to your temporal Felicity, add eternal. The promiſe claim'd of him by Paulinus, how and wherfore made, though ſavouring much of Legend, is thus related. Redwald, as we heard before, dazl'd with the Gold of Ethelfrid, or by his threatning over-aw'd, having promis'd to yield up Edwin, one of his faithful Companions, of which he had ſom few with him in the Court of Redwald, that never ſhrunk from his Adverſity, about the firſt hour of night comes in haſt to his Chamber, and calling him forth for better ſecrecy, reveles to him his danger, offers him his aid to make eſcape; but that courſe not approv'd, as ſeeming diſhonourable without more manifeſt cauſe to begin diſtruſt towards one who had ſo long bin his only refuge, the friend departs. Edwin left alone without the Palace Gate, full of ſadneſs and perplext Thoughts, diſcerns about the dead of Night, a man neither by Countenance nor by Habit to him known, approaching towards him. Who after ſalutation, ask'd him why at this hour, when all others were at reſt, he alone ſo ſadly ſat waking on a cold Stone? Edwin not a little miſdoubting who he might be, ask'd him again, what his ſitting within dores, or without, concern'd him to know? To whom he again, think not that who thou art, or why ſitting heer, or what danger hangs over thee, is to me unknown: But what would you promiſe to that man, who ever would befriend you out of all theſe troubles, and perſwade Redwald to the like? All that I am able, anſwer'd Edwin. And he, What if the ſame man ſhould promiſe to make you greater then any Engliſh King hath bin before you? I ſhould not doubt, quoth Edwin, to be anſwerably gratful. And what if to all this he would inform you, ſaid the other, in a way to Happineſs, beyond what any of your Anceſtors hath known? Would you hark'n to his Counſel? Edwin without ſtopping promis'd he would. And the other laying his Right hand on Edwin's Head, When this Sign, ſaith he, ſhall next befal thee, remember this time of Night, and this Diſcourſe, to perform what thou haſt promis'd; and with theſe words diſappeering, left Edwin much reviv'd, but not leſs fill'd with wonder, who this unknown ſhould be. When ſuddenly the Friend who had bin gon all this while to liſt'n furder what was like to be decreed of Edwin, comes back and joyfully bids him riſe to his repoſe, for that the Kings mind, though for a while drawn aſide, was now fully reſolv'd not only not to betray him, but to defend him againſt all Enemies, as he had promiſ'd. This was ſaid to be the cauſe why Edwin admoniſh'd by the Biſhop of a Sign which had befaln him ſo ſtrangely, and as he thought ſo ſecretly, aroſe to him with that reverence and amazement, as to one ſent from Heav'n, to claim that Promiſe of him which he perceav'd well was due to a Divine Power, that had aſſiſted him in his Troubles. To Paulinus therfore he makes anſwer, that the Chriſtian Belief he himſelf ought by promiſe, and intended to receave; but would confer firſt with his chief Peers and Counſellors, that if they likewiſe could be won, all at once might be baptiz'd. They therfore being ask'd in Council what thir opinion was concerning this new Doctrin, and well perceaving which way the King enclin'd, every one therafter ſhap'd his Reply. The Chief Prieſt ſpeaking firſt, diſcover'd an old grudg he had againſt his Gods, for advancing others in the King's Favour above him thir Chief Prieſt: another hiding his Court-compliance with a grave Sentence, commended the choiſe of certain before uncertain, upon due examination; to like purpoſe anſwer'd all the reſt of his Sages, none op'nly diſſenting from what was likely to be the King's Creed: wheras the preaching of Paulinus could work no ſuch effect upon them, toiling till that time without ſucceſs. Wherupon Edwin renouncing Heatheniſm, became Chriſtian: and the Pagan Prieſt, offring himſelf freely to demoliſh the Altars of his former Gods, made ſome amends for his teaching to adore them. With Edwin, his two Sons Oſfrid and Eanfrid, born to him by Quenburga, 627. Daughter, as ſaith Beda, of Kearle King of Mercia, in the time of his Baniſhment, and with them moſt of the People, both Nobles and Commons, eaſily converted, were baptiz'd; he with his whole Family at York, in a Church haſtily built up of Wood, the multitude moſt part in Rivers. Northumberland thus chriſt'nd, Paulinus croſſing Humber, converted alſo the Province of Lindſey, and Blecca the Governour of Lincoln, with his Houſhold and moſt of that City; wherin he built a Church of Stone, curiouſly wrought, but of ſmall continuance; for the Roof in Beda's time, uncertain whether by neglect or Enemies, was down; the Walls only ſtanding. Mean while in Mercia, Kearle a Kinſman of Wibba, ſaith Huntingdon, not a Son, having long withheld the Kingdom from Penda Wibba's Son, left it now at length to the fiftieth Year of his Age: with whom Kinegils and Cuichelm, the Weſt-Saxon Kings, two Year after, having by that time it ſeems recover'd 629. Strength, ſince the Inrode made upon them by Edwin, fought at Cirenceſter, Saxon. an. then made Truce. But Edwin ſeeking every way to propagate the Faith, which with ſo much deliberation he had receav'd, perſuaded Eorpwald the Son of Redwald, King of Eaſt-Angles, to embrace the ſame belief; willingly 632. or in aw, is not known, retaining under Edwin the name only of a King. Saxon. an. But Eorpwald not long ſurviv'd his Converſion, ſlain in fight by Ricbert a Pagan: wherby the People having lightly follow'd the Religion of thir King, as Florent. Genealog. lightly fell back to thir old Superſtitions for above three Years after: Edwin in the mean while, to his Faith adding Vertue, by the due adminiſtration of Juſtice wrought ſuch Peace over all his Territories, that from Sea to Sea, Man or Woman might have travail'd in ſafety. His care alſo was of Fountains by the way ſide, to make them fitteſt for the uſe of Travellers. And not unmindful of regal State, whether in War or Peace, he had a Royal Banner carried before him. But having reign'd with much honour ſeventeen Years, he was at length by Kedwalla, or Cadwallon, King of the Britans, who with aid of the Mercian Penda had rebell'd againſt him, ſlain in a Battel with his Son Oſfrid, at a place call'd Hethfeild, and his whole Army overthrown or diſperſt in the Year 633. and the 47*th* of his Age, in the Eye of 633. Man worthy a more peaceful end. His Head brought to York, was there buried in the Church by him begun. Sad was this overthrow, both to Church and State of the Northumbrians: for Penda being a Heathen, and the Britiſh King, though in name a Chriſtian, yet in deeds more bloody then the Pagan, nothing was omitted of barbarous Cruelty in the ſlaughter of Sex or Age; Kedwalla threatning to root out the whole Nation, though then newly Chriſtian. For the Britans, and, as Beda ſaith, ev'n to his days, accounted Saxon Chriſtianity no better then Paganiſm, and with them held as little Communion. From theſe Calamities no refuge being left but flight, Paulinus taking with him Ethilburga the Queen and her Children, aided by Baſſus, one of Edwin's Captains, made eſcape by Sea to Eadbald King of Kent: who receaving his Siſter with all kindneſs, made Paulinus Biſhop of Rocheſter, where he ended his days. After Edwin, the Kingdom of Northumberland became divided as before, each rightful Heir ſeiſing his part; in Deira Oſric, the Son of Elfric, Edwin's Uncle, by profeſſion a Chriſtian, and baptiz'd by Paulinus: in Bernicia, Eanfrid, the Son of Ethelfrid; who all the time of Edwin, with his Brother Oſwald, and many of the young Nobility, liv'd in Scotland exil'd, and had bin there taught and baptiz'd. No ſooner had they gott'n each a Kingdom, but both turn'd recreant, ſliding back into thir old Religion; and both were the ſame Year ſlain; Oſric by a ſudden eruption of Kedwalla, whom he in a ſtrong Town had unadviſedly beſieg'd; Eanfrid ſeeking Peace, and inconſideratly with a few ſurrendring himſelf. Kedwalla now rang'd at will 634. through both thoſe Provinces, uſing cruelly his Conqueſt; when Oſwald the Brother of Eanfrid with a ſmall but Chriſtian Army unexpectedly coming on, defeated and deſtroy'd both him and his huge Forces, which he boaſted to be invincible, by a little River running into Tine, near the antient Roman Wall then call'd Deniſburn, the place afterwards Heav'n field, from the Croſs, reported miraculous for Cures, which Oſwald there erected before the Battail, in tok'n of his Faith againſt the great number of his Enemies. Obtaining the Kingdom, he took care to inſtruct again the People in Chriſtianity. Sending therfore to the Scotiſh Elders, Beda ſo terms them, among whom he had receav'd Baptiſm, requeſted of them ſom faithful Teacher, who might again ſettle Religion in his Realm, which the late Troubles had much impar'd; they as readily hearkning to his Requeſt, ſend Aidan a Scotch Monk and Biſhop, but of ſingular Zeal and Meekneſs, with others to aſſiſt him, whom at thir own deſire he ſeated in Lindisfarne, as the Epiſcopal Seat, now

Holy Iland: and being the Son of Ethelfrid, by the Siſter of Edwin, as right Heir, others failing, eaſily reduc'd both Kingdoms of Northumberland as before into one; nor of Edwin's Dominion loſt any part, but enlarg'd it rather;
over all the four Britiſh Nations, Angles, Britans, Picts and Scots, exerciſing Regal Authority. Of his Devotion, Humility, and Alms-deeds, much is ſpok'n; that he diſdain'd not to be the Interpreter of Aidan, preaching in Scotch or bad Engliſh, to his Nobles and Houſhold Servants; and had the Poor continually ſerv'd at his Gate, after the promiſcuous manner of thoſe times: his meaning might be upright, but the manner more antient of privat 635. or of Church-Contribution, is doubtleſs more Evangelical. About this Sax. an. time, the Weſt-Saxons, antiently call'd Geviſſi, by the preaching of Berinus, a Biſhop, whom Pope Honorius had ſent, were converted to the Faith with 636. Kinegils thir King: him Oſwald receav'd out of the Font, and his Daughter in Marriage. The next Year Cuichelm was baptiz'd in Dorcheſter, but liv'd not to the years end. The Eaſt-Angles alſo this year were reclaim'd to the Faith of Chriſt, which for ſom years paſt they had thrown off. But Sigbert the Brother of Eorpwald now ſucceeded in that Kingdom, prais'd for a moſt Chriſtian and Learned Man: who while his Brother yet reign'd, living in France an Exile, for ſom diſpleaſure conceav'd againſt him by Redwald his Father, learn'd there the Chriſtian Faith; and reigning ſoon after, in the ſame inſtructed his People, by the preaching of Felix a Burgundian Biſhop.

640. In the Year 640 Eadbald deceaſing, left to Ercombert his Son by Emma the French King's Daughter, the Kingdom of Kent; recorded the firſt of Engliſh Kings, who commanded through his limits the deſtroying of Idols; laudably, if all Idols without exception; and the firſt to have eſtabliſh'd Lent among us, under ſtrict Penalty, not worth remembring, but only to inform Mat. Weſt. us, that no Lent was obſerv'd here till his time by compulſion: eſpecially being noted by ſom to have fraudulently uſurp'd upon his elder Brother
Ermenred, whoſe right was precedent to the Crown. Oſwald having reign'd
642. eight Years, worthy alſo as might ſeem of longer Life, fell into the ſame fate with Edwin, and from the ſame hand, in a great Battel overcom and ſlain by Camden. Penda, at a place call'd Maſerfeild, now Oſweſtre in Shropſhire, miraculous, as ſaith Beda, after his Death. His Brother Oſwi ſucceeded him; reigning, Bed. l. 3. c.14. though in much trouble, 28 Years; oppos'd either by Penda, or his own Son 643. Alfred, or his Brother's Son Ethilwald. Next Year Kinegils the Weſt-Saxon dying, dying, left his Son Kenwalk in his ſtead, though as yet unconverted. About Sax. an.

this time Sigebert King of Eaſt-Angles having lernt in France, e're his coming to reign, the manner of thir Schools, with the Aſſiſtance of ſom Teachers out of Kent, inſtituted a School heer after the ſame Diſciplin, thought to be the Univerſity of Cambridg then firſt founded: and at length weary of his Kingly Office, betook him to a Monaſtical Life; commending the Care of Government to his Kinſman Egric, who had ſuſtain'd with him part of that Burden before. It happen'd ſom Years after, that Penda made War on the Eaſt-Angles:
they expecting a ſharp Encounter, beſought Sigebert, whom they eſteem'd an expert Leader, with his Preſence to confirm the Souldiery: and him refuſing, carried by force out of the Monaſtery into the Camp; where acting the Monk rather then the Captain, with a ſingle Wand in his hand, he was ſlain with Egric, and his whole Army put to flight. Anna of the Royal Stock, as next in right, ſucceeded; and hath the Praiſe of a vertuous and moſt Chriſtian Prince. But Kenwalk the Weſt-Saxon having marry'd the Siſter 645. of Penda, and divorc'd her, was by him with more appearance of a juſt cauſe Sax. an.
vanquiſh'd in Fight, and depriv'd of his Crown: whence retiring to Anna
King of Eaſt-Angles, after three Years abode in his Court, he there became Chriſtian, and afterwards regain'd his Kingdom. Oſwi in the former Years 648.
of his Reign had ſharer with him, Oſwin Nephew of Edwin, who rul'd in Deira ſeven Years, commended much for his Zeal in Religion, and for Comlineſs of Perſon, with other princely Qualities, belov'd of all. Notwithſtanding which, Diſſentions growing between them, it came to Arms. Oſwin ſeeing himſelf much exceeded in numbers, thought it more Prudence, diſmiſſing his Army, to reſerve himſelf for ſom better occaſion. But committing his Perſon with one faithful Attendant to the Loyalty of Hunwald an Earl, his imagin'd Friend, he was by him treacherouſly diſcover'd, and by Command of Oſwi ſlain. After whom within twelve days, and for Grief of him whoſe 651.
Death he foretold, dy'd Biſhop Aidan, famous for his Charity, Meekneſs, Bede. and Labour in the Goſpel. The Fact of Oſwi was deteſtable to all; which therfore to expiate, a Monaſtery was built in the place where it was don, and Prayers there daily offer'd up for the Souls of both Kings, the Slain and the Slayer. Kenwalk by this time re-inſtall'd in his Kingdom, kept it long, but with various Fortune; for Beda relates him oft-times afflicted by his Enemies Bed. l. 3. c. 7.
with great Loſſes: and in 652, by the Annals, fought a Battel (Civil War 652.
Ethelwerd calls it) at Bradanford by the River Afene; againſt whom, and for what cauſe, or who had the Victory, they write not. Camden names the place Bradford in Wiltſhire, by the River Avon, and Cutbred his neer Kinſman, againſt whom he fought, but cites no Autority; certain it is, that Kenwalk four Years before had giv'n large Poſſeſſions to his Nephew Cutbred, the more unlikely therfore now to have rebell'd.

The next Year Peada, whom his Father Penda, though a Heathen, had for 653.
his princely Vertues made Prince of Middle-Angles, belonging to the Mercians, was with that People converted to the Faith. For coming to Oſwi with requeſt to have in Mariage Alfleda his Daughter, he was deny'd her, but on condition, that he with all his People ſhould receave Chriſtianity. Heering therfore not unwillingly what was preach'd to him of Reſurrection and Eternal Life, much perſuaded alſo by Alfrid the King's Son, who had his Siſter Kyniburg to Wife, he eaſily aſſented, for the Truth's ſake only as he profeſs'd, whether he obtain'd the Virgin or no, and was baptiz'd with all his Followers.
Returning, he took with him four Presbyters to teach the People of his Province; who by thir daily preaching won many. Neither did Penda, though himſelf no Beleever, prohibit any in his Kingdom to heer or beleeve the Goſpel, but rather hated and deſpiſed thoſe, who profeſſing to beleeve, atteſted not thir Faith by good Works; condemning them for miſerable and juſtly to be deſpis'd, who obey not that God in whom they chooſe to beleeve.
How well might Penda this Heathen riſe up in Judgment againſt many pretending Chriſtians, both of his own and theſe days! yet being a Man bred up to War, (as no leſs were others then reigning, and oft-times one againſt another, 654. though both Chriſtians) he warr'd on Anna King of the Eaſt-Angles, Sax. an.
perhaps without cauſe, for Anna was eſteem'd a juſt Man, and at length ſlew him. About this time the Eaſt-Saxons, who, as above hath bin ſaid, had expell'd thir Biſhop Mellitus, and renounc'd the Faith, were by the means of Oſwi thus reconverted. Sigebert, ſurnam'd the ſmall, being the Son of Seward, without other Memory of his Reign, left his Son King of that Province, after him Sigebert the Second, who coming oft'n to viſit Oſwi his great Friend, was by him at ſeveral times fervently diſuaded from Idolatry, and convinc'd at length to forſake it, was there baptiz'd; on his return home taking with him Kedda a laborious Preacher, afterwards made Biſhop; by whoſe teaching, with ſom help of others, the People were again recover'd from Miſbeleef.

But Sigebert ſome Years after, though ſtanding faſt in Religion, was by the Conſpiracy of two Brethren in place neer about him, wickedly murder'd; who being ask'd what mov'd them to do a Deed ſo hainous, gave no other then this barbarous Anſwer; that they were angry with him for being ſo gentle to his Enemies, as to forgive them thir Injuries whenever they beſought him.
Yet his Death ſeems to have hap'nd not without ſom cauſe by him giv'n of Divine Diſpleaſure. For one of thoſe Earls who ſlew him living in unlawful Wedloc, and therfore excommunicated ſo ſeverely by the Biſhop, that no Man might preſume to enter into his Houſe, much leſs to ſit at Meat with him, the King not regarding this Church-Cenſure, went to feaſt with him at his Invitation.
Whom the Biſhop meeting in his Return, though penitent for what he had don, and faln at his feet, touch'd with the Rod in his hand, and angerly thus foretold: Becauſe thou haſt neglected to abſtain from the Houſe of that Excommunicate, in that Houſe thou ſhalt die; and ſo it fell out, perhaps from that Prediction, God bearing witneſs to his Miniſter in the Power of Church Diſciplin, ſpiritually executed, not juridically on the Contemner 655. therof. This Year 655 prov'd fortunate to Oſwi, and fatal to Penda, for Oſwi by the continual Inrodes of Penda having long endur'd much Devaſtation, Bed. l.3. c.16. to the endangering once by Aſſault and Fire Bebbanburg, his ſtrongeſt City, Camd. now Bamborrow-Caſtle, unable to reſiſt him, with many rich Preſents offer'd to buy his Peace. Which not accepted by the Pagan, who intended nothing but Deſtruction to that King, though more then once in Affinity with him, turning Gifts into Vows, he implores Divine Aſſiſtance, devoting, if he were deliver'd from his Enemy, a Child of one year old, his Daughter, to be a Nun, and 12 portions of Land wheron to build Monaſteries. His Vows, as may be thought, found better Succeſs then his profer'd Gifts; for heerupon with his Son Alfrid, gathering a ſmall Power, he encounter'd and diſcomfited the Mercians, Camden. 30 times exceeding his in number, and led on by expert Captains, at a place call'd Loydes, now Leeds in Yorkſhire. Beſides this Ethelwald, the Son of Oſwald, who rul'd in Deira, took part with the Mercians, but in the Fight withdrew his Forces, and in a ſafe place expected the event: with which unſeaſonable Retreat the Mercians, perhaps terrify'd and miſdoubting more Danger, fled; thir Commanders, with Penda himſelf, moſt being ſlain, among whom Edilhere the Brother of Anna, who rul'd after him the Eaſt-Angles, and was the Author of this War; many more flying were drown'd in the River, Mat. Weſt. which Beda calls Winwed, then ſwoln above its Banks. The Death of Penda, who had bin the Death of ſo many good Kings, made general rejoicing, as the Song witneſs'd. At the River Winwed Anna was aveng'd. To Edelhere ſucceeded Ethelwald his Brother, in the Eaſt-Angles; to Sigebert in the Eaſt-Saxons
Bed. l.3. c.22. Suidhelm the Son of Sexbald, ſaith Bede, the Brother of Sigebert, ſaith Malmsbury; he was baptiz'd by Kedda, then reſiding in the Eaſt-Angles, and by Ethelwald the King receav'd out of the Font. But Oſwi in the ſtrength of 658. his late Victory, within three Years after ſubdu'd all Mercia, and of the Pictiſh Sax. an. Nation greateſt part, at which time he gave to Peada his Son in law the Kingdom of South-Mercia, divided from the Northern by Trent. But Peada the
659. Spring following, as was ſaid, by the Treaſon of his Wife the Daughter of Sax. an. Oſwi, marry'd by him for a ſpecial Chriſtian, on the Feaſt of Eaſter, not protected by the holy time, was ſlain. The Mercian Nobles, Immin, Eaba, and Eadbert, throwing off the Government of Oſwi, ſet up Wulfer the other Son of Penda to be thir King, whom till then they had kept hid, and with him adher'd to the Chriſtian Faith. Kenwalk the Weſt-Saxon, now ſettl'd at home, and deſirous to enlarge his Dominion, prepares againſt the Britans, joins Battel with them at Pen in Somerſetſhire, and overcoming, purſues them to Pedridan.
Another Fight he had with them before, at a place call'd Witgeornes- brug, barely mention'd by the Monk of Malmsbury. Nor was it long e're he fell at variance with Wulſer the Son of Penda, his old Enemy, ſcarce yet warm 661.

in his Throne, fought with him at Poſſentesburg, on the Eaſter Holy-days, Sax. an.
and as Ethelwerd ſaith, took him Priſner; but the Saxon Annals, quite otherwiſe, that Wulfer winning the Field, waſted the Weſt-Saxon Country as far as Eskeſdun; nor ſtaying there, took and waſted the Ile of Wight, but cauſing the Inhabitants to be baptiz'd, till then Unbeleevers, gave the Iland to Ethelwald King of South Saxons, whom he had receav'd out of the Font. The Year 664 a Synod of Scotiſh and Engliſh Biſhops, in the preſence of Oſwi and 664.
Alfred his Son, was held at a Monaſtry in thoſe parts, to debate on what day Bed.
Eaſter ſhould be kept; a Controverſy which long before had diſturb'd the Greek and Latin Churches: wherin the Scots not agreeing with the way of Rome, nor yeilding to the Diſputants on that ſide, to whom the King moſt enclin'd, ſuch as were Biſhops heer, reſign'd, and return'd home with thir Diſciples.
Another clerical Queſtion was there alſo much controverted, not ſo ſuperſtitious in my opinion as ridiculous, about the right ſhaving of Crowns.
The ſame Year was ſeen an Eclips of the Sun in May, followed by a ſore Peſtilence beginning in the South, but ſpreading to the North, and over all Ireland Malmſ.
with great Mortality. In which time the Eaſt-Saxons after Swithelm's Deceaſe, being govern'd by Siger the Son of Sigebert the ſmall, and Sebbi of Seward, though both ſubject to the Mercians; Siger and his People unſtedy of Faith, ſuppoſing that this Plague was come upon them for renouncing thir old Religion, fell off the ſecond time to Infidelity. Which the Mercian King Wulfer underſtanding, ſent Jarumannus a faithful Biſhop, who with other his Fellow-labourers, by ſound Doctrin and gentle dealing, ſoon recur'd them of thir ſecond Relaps. In Kent, Ercombert expiring, was ſucceeded by his Son Ecbert. In whoſe fourth Year, by means of Theodore, a learned Greekiſh 668.
Monk of Tarſus, whom Pope Vitalian had ordain'd Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Sax. an.
the Greek and Latin Tongue, with other liberal Arts, Arithmetic, Muſic, Aſtronomy, and the like, began firſt to flouriſh among the Saxons; as did alſo the whole Land, under potent and religious Kings, more then ever before, as Bede affirms, till his own days. Two Years after in Northumberland 670.
dy'd Oſwi, much addicted to Romiſh Rites, and reſolv'd, had his Diſeaſe releas'd Sax. an.
him, to have ended his days at Rome. Ecfrid the eldeſt of his Sons begot in Wedloc, ſucceeded him. After other three Years, Ecbert in Kent deceaſing, 673.
left nothing memorable behind him, but the general ſuſpition to Sax. an.
have ſlain or conniv'd at the Slaughter of his Uncles two Sons, Elbert and Egelbright. In recompence wherof, he gave to the Mother of them part of Tanet, wherin to build an Abbey; the Kingdom fell to his Brother Lothair. Malmſ.
And much about this time, by beſt account it ſhould be, however plac'd in Beda, that Ecfrid of Northumberland having War with the Mercian Wulfer, Bed. l. 4. c. 12.
won from him Lindſey, and the Country therabout. Sebbi having reign'd over the Eaſt-Saxons thirty years, not long before his Death, though long before deſiring, took on him the Habit of a Monk; and drew his Wife at length, though unwilling, to the ſame Devotion. Kenwalk alſo dying, left the Government to Sexburga his Wife, who out-liv'd him in it but one Year, driv'n out, ſaith Mat. Weſt. by the Nobles, diſdaining Female Government. After 675.
whom ſeveral petty Kings, as Beda calls them, for ten Years ſpace divided Bed. l. 4. c. 12.
the Weſt-Saxons; others name two, Eſcwin the Nephew of Kinigils and Sax. an.
Kentwin the Son, not petty by thir Deeds: for Eſcwin fought a Battel with Malmſ.
Wulfer, at Bedanhafde, and about a Year after both deceas'd; but Wulfer not 676.
without a ſtain left behind him, of ſelling the Biſhoprick of London to Wini
the firſt Simoniſt we read of in this Story; Kenwalk had before expell'd him from his Chair at Wincheſter. Ethelred the Brother of Wulfer obtaining next the Kingdom of Mercia, not only recover'd Lindſey, and what beſides in thoſe parts Wulfer had loſt to Ecfrid ſome Years before, but found himſelf ſtrong enough to extend his Arms another way, as far as Kent, waſting that Country without reſpect to Church or Monaſtry, much alſo endamaging the City of Bed. l. 4. c. 12.
Rocheſter, notwithſtanding what Reſiſtance Lothair could make againſt him.
In Auguſt 678 was ſeen a Morning Comet for three Months following, in manner 678.
of a firy Pillar. And the South-Saxons about this time were converted to the Chriſtian Faith, upon this occaſion. Wilfrid Biſhop of the Northumbrians entring into Contention with Ecfrid the King, was by him depriv'd of his 679. Biſhoprick, and long wandring up and down as far as Rome, return'd at length into England; but not daring to approach the North, whence he was baniſh'd, bethought him where he might to beſt purpoſe elſwhere exerciſe his Miniſtry. The South of all other Saxons remain'd yet Heathen; but Edilwalk thir King not long before had bin baptiz'd in Mercia, perſuaded by Bed. l. 4. c. 13. Wulfer, and by him, as hath bin ſaid, receav'd out of the Font. For which Camd. relations ſake he had the Ile of Wight, and a Province of the Meannari adjoining, giv'n him on the Continent about Meanesborow in Hantſhire, which Wulfer had a little before gott'n from Kenwalk. Thether Wilfrid takes his Journey, and with the help of other ſpiritual Labourers about him, in ſhort time planted there the Goſpel. It had not rain'd, as is ſaid, of three Years before in that Country, whence many of the People daily periſh'd by Famin;

till on the firſt day of thir public Baptiſm, ſoft and plentiful Showers deſcending, 681. Sax. an. reſtor'd all abundance to the Summer following. Two Years after this Kentwin the other Weſt-Saxon King above-nam'd, chac'd the Welch Britans, as is chronicl'd without Circumſtance, to the very Sea-ſhoar. But in 683. the Year, by Beda's reckning, 683, Kedwalla a Weſt-Saxon of the Royal Line, Sax. an. (whom the Welch will have to be Cadwallader, laſt King of the Britans) thrown out by Faction, return'd from Baniſhment, and invaded both Kentwin, if then living, or whoever elſe had divided the Succeſſion of Kenwalk, ſlaying in fight Bed. l. 4. c. 15. Edelwalk the South-Saxon, who oppos'd him in thir aid; but ſoon after was repuls'd by two of his Captains, Bertune and Andune, who for a while held Malmſ. the Province in thir Power. But Kedwalla gathering new Force, with the 684. Slaughter of Bertune, and alſo of Edric the Succeſſor of Edelwalk, won the Bed. l. 4. c. 16. Kingdom: but reduc'd the People to heavy Thraldom. Then addreſſing to conquer the Ile of Wight, till that time Pagan, ſaith Beda, (others otherwiſe, as above hath bin related) made a Vow, though himſelf yet unbaptiz'd, to devote the fourth part of that Iland, and the Spoils therof, to holy Uſes.
Conqueſt obtain'd, paying his Vow as then was the Beleef, he gave his fourth to Biſhop Wilfrid, by chance there preſent; and he to Bertwin a Prieſt, his Siſter's Son, with commiſſion to baptize all the vanquiſh'd, who meant to ſave thir Lives. But the two young Sons of Arwald, King of that Iland, met with much more Hoſtility; for they at the Enemies Approach flying out of the Ile, and betray'd where they were hid not far from thence, were led to Kedwalla, who lay then under cure of ſome Wounds receav'd, and by his appointment, after Inſtruction and Baptiſm firſt giv'n them, harſhly put to Death, which the Youths are ſaid above thir Age to have chriſtianly ſuffer'd. In Kent Lothair dy'd this Year of his Wounds receav'd in fight againſt the South-Saxons, led on by Edrick, who deſcending from Ermenred, it ſeems challeng'd the 685. Crown, and wore it, though not commendably, one Year and a half: but Malmſ. coming to a violent Death, left the Land expos'd a Prey either to home-bred Uſurpers, or neighbouring Invaders. Among whom Kedwalla taking advantage from thir civil Diſtempers, and marching eaſily through the South-Saxons, whom he had ſubdu'd, ſorely haraſs'd the Country, untouch'd of a long time by any hoſtile Incurſion. But the Kentiſh Men, all Parties uniting againſt a common Enemy, with joint Power ſo oppos'd him, that he was conſtrain'd to Sax. an. retire back; his Brother Mollo in the flight with 12 Men of his Company, ſeeking Malmſ. ſhelter in a Houſe, was beſet, and therin burnt by the Perſuers: Kedwalla much troubl'd at ſo great a Loſs, recalling and ſoon rallying his diſorder'd 686. Forces, return'd fiercely upon the chacing Enemy; nor could be got out of the Province, till both by Fire and Sword he had aveng'd the Death of his Brother.
687. At length Victred the Son of Ecbert, attaining the Kingdom, both ſettl'd at home all things in Peace, and ſecur'd his Borders from all outward Hoſtilitie.
Bed. While thus Kedwalla diſquieted both Weſt and Eaſt, after his winning the Crown, Ecfrid the Northumbrian, and Ethelred the Mercian, fought a ſore Battel by the River Trent; wherin Elfwin Brother to Ecfrid, a youth of 18 years, much belov'd, was ſlain; and the accident likely to occaſion much more ſhedding of Blood, Peace was happily made by the grave Exhortation of Archbiſhop
Theodore, a pecuniary Fine only paid to Ecfrid, as ſome ſatisfaction for the loſs of his Brothers Life. Another adverſity befel Ecfrid in his Family, by means of Ethildrith his Wife, King Anna's Daughter, who having tak'n him for her Husband, and profeſſing to love him above all other men, perſiſted twelve years in the obſtinat refuſal of his Bed, therby thinking to live the purer Life.

So perverſly then was Chaſtity inſtructed againſt the Apoſtles rule. At length obtaining of him with much importunity her departure, ſhe veild her ſelf a Nun, then made Abbeſs of Ely, dy'd 7 years after the Peſtilence; and might with better warrant have kept faithfully her undertak'n Wedloc, though now canoniz'd St. Audrey of Ely. In the mean while Ecfrid had ſent Bertus with a power to ſubdue Ireland, a harmleſs Nation, ſaith Beda, and ever friendly to the Engliſh; in both which they ſeem to have left a Poſterity much unlike them at this day; miſerably waſted, without regard had to places hallow'd or profane, they betook them partly to thir Weapons, partly to implore divine Aid; and, as was thought, obtain'd it in thir full avengement upon Ecfrid.
For he the next year, againſt the mind and perſuaſion of his ſageſt Friends, and eſpecially of Cudbert a famous Biſhop of that Age, marching unadviſedly againſt the Picts, who long before had bin ſubject to Northumberland, was by them feigning flight, drawn unawares into narrow ſtreights, overtopt with Hills, and cut off with moſt of his Army. From which time, ſaith Bede, military Valour began among the Saxons to decay, nor only the Picts till then peaceable, but ſom part of the Britans alſo recover'd by Arms thir Liberty for many years after. Yet Aldfrid elder, but baſe Brother to Ecfrid, a man ſaid to be learned in the Scriptures, recal'd from Ireland, to which place in his Brothers Reign he had retir'd, and now ſucceeding, upheld with much honour, though in narrower bounds, the reſidue of his Kingdom. Kedwalla having now with great diſturbance of his Neighbours reign'd over the Weſt-Saxons two years, beſides what time he ſpent in gaining it, wearied perhaps with his own turbulence, went to Rome, deſirous there to receave Baptiſm, which till then his worldly Affairs had defer'd, and accordingly, on Eaſter
Day, 689. he was baptiz'd by Sergius the Pope, and his name chang'd to Peter. 689.
All which notwithſtanding, ſurpris'd with a Diſeaſe, he outliv'd not the Ceremony ſo far ſought, much above the ſpace of five Weeks, in the thirtieth year of his Age, and in the Church of St. Peter was there buried, with a large Epitaph upon his Tomb. Him ſucceeded Ina of the Royal Family, and from the time of his coming in, for many years oppreſs'd the Land with like greevances, as Kedwalla had don before him, inſomuch that in thoſe times there was no Biſhop among them. His firſt Expedition was into Kent, to demand ſatisfaction for the burning of Mollo: Victred loth to hazard all for the raſh act of a few, deliver'd up 30 of thoſe that could be found Acceſſory, or as others ſay, pacifi'd Ina with a great ſum of Money. Mean while, at the incitement Malmſ. Sax. An. Ethelwerd. of Ecbert, a devout Monk, Wilbrod a Prieſt eminent for Learning, paſt over Sea, having 12 others in Company, with intent to preach the Goſpel in Germany.
And coming to Pepin Chief Regent of the Franks, who a little before 694.
had conquer'd the hither Friſia, by his Countnance and Protection, promiſe alſo of many Benefits to them who ſhould beleeve, they found the work of Converſion much the eaſier, and Wilbrod the firſt Biſhoprick in that Nation. But two Prieſts, each of them Hewald by name, and for diſtinction ſurnam'd from the colour of thir Hair, the black and the white, by his example, piouſly affected to the Souls of thir Countrymen the old Saxons, at thir coming thether to convert them met with much worſe entertainment. For in the Houſe of a Farmer who had promis'd to convey them, as they deſir'd, to the Governour of that Country, diſcover'd by thir daily Ceremonies to be Chriſtian Prieſts, and the cauſe of thir coming ſuſpected, they were by him and his Heathen Neighbours cruelly butcher'd; yet not unaveng'd, for the Governour enrag'd at ſuch violence offer'd to his Strangers, ſending armed Men ſlew all thoſe Inhabitants, and burnt thir Village. After three years in Mercia, Oſtrid the 697.
Queen, Wife to Ethelred, was kill'd by her own Nobles, as Beda's Epitome records; Florence calls them Southimbrians, negligently omitting the cauſe of ſo ſtrange a fact. And the year following, Berthred a Northumbrian General was 698.
ſlain by the Picts. Ethelred ſeven years after the violent Death of his Queen, 704.
put on the Monk, and reſign'd his Kingdom to Kenred the Son of Wulfer his Brother. The next year, Alfrid in Northumberland dy'd, leaving Oſred a 705.
Child of 8 years to ſucceed him. Four years after which, Kenred having a while 709.
with praiſe govern'd the Mercian Kingdom, went to Rome in the time of Pope

Conſtantine, and ſhorn a Monk ſpent there the reſidue of his daies. Kelred ſucceeded him, the Son of Ethelred, who had reign'd the next before. With Kenred went Offa the Son of Siger, King of Eaſt-Saxons, and betook him to the ſame Habit, leaving his Wife and Native Country; a comely Perſon in the prime of his Youth, much deſir'd of the People; and ſuch his Vertue by 710. report, as might have otherwiſe bin worthy to have reign'd. Ina the Weſt-Saxon
Sax. Annal. one year after fought a Battel, at firſt doubtful, at laſt ſucceſsful, againſt Huntingd. Gerent King of Wales. The next year Bertfrid, another Northumbrian Captain, 711. fought with the Picts, and ſlaughter'd them, ſaith Huntingdon, to the full Bed. Epit. avengment of Ecfrids Death. The fourth year after, Ina had another doubtful
715. and cruel Battel at Wodnesburgh in Wiltſhire, with Kelred the Mercian, who
Sax. an. dy'd the year following a lamentable Death: for as he ſat one day feaſting
Sax. an. with his Nobles, ſuddenly poſſeſs'd with an evil Spirit, he expir'd in deſpair, Huntingd. as Boniface Archbiſhop of Ments, an Engliſh man, who taxes him for a defiler of 716. Nuns, writes by way of Caution to Ethelbald his next of Kin, who ſucceeded him.
Oſred alſo a young Northumbrian King, ſlain by his Kindred in the 11*th* of his Reign, for his vitious Life and Inceſt committed with Nuns, was by Kenred ſucceeded and aveng'd; he reigning two years, left Oſric in his room. In 718. whoſe 7*th* year, if Beda calculate right, Victred King of Kent deceas'd, having
L. 5. c. 9. reign'd 34 years, and ſom part of them with Suebhard, as Beda teſtifies.
725. He left behind him three Sons, Ethelbert, Eadbert, and Alric his Heirs. Three 728. years after which, appear'd two Comets about the Sun, terrible to behold, the one before him in the Morning, the other after him in the Evening, for the ſpace of two Weeks in January, bending thir blaze toward the North, at which time the Saracens furiouſly invaded France, but were expell'd ſoon after with great overthrow. The ſame year in Northumberland, Oſric dying or ſlain, Bed. l. 5. c. 24. adopted Kelwulf the Brother of Kenred his Succeſſor, to whom Beda dedicates his ſtory; but writes this only of him, that the beginning, and the proceſs of his Reign met with many adverſe Commotions, wherof the event was then doubtfully expected. Mean while Ina ſeven years before, having ſlain Kenwulf, to whom Florent gives the addition of Clito, giv'n uſually to none but of the Blood Royal, and the fourth year after overthrown and ſlain Albright another Clito, driv'n from Taunton to the South-Saxons for aid, vanquiſh't alſo the Eaſt-Angles in more then one Battel, as Malmsbury writes, but not the year; whether to expiate ſo much Blood, or infected with the contagious humour of thoſe times, Malmsbury ſaith, at the perſuaſion of Ethelburga his Wife, went to Rome, and there ended his days; yet this praiſe left behind him, to have made good Laws, the firſt of Saxon that remain extant to this day, and to his Kinſman Edelard bequeath'd the Crown, no leſs then the whole Monarchy of England and Wales. For Ina, if we beleeve a digreſſion in the Laws of Edward Confeſſor, was the firſt King crown'd of Engliſh and Britiſh, ſince the Saxons entrance; of the Britiſh by means of his ſecond Wife, ſom way related to Cadwallader laſt King of Wales, which I had not noted being unlikely, Bede. but for the place where I found it. After Ina, by a ſurer Author, Ethelbald
731. King of Mercia commanded all the Provinces on this ſide Humber, with thir Kings: the Picts were in League with the Engliſh, the Scots peaceable within thir bounds, and of the Britans part were in thir own Government, part ſubject to the Engliſh. In which peaceful ſtate of the land, many in Northumberland, both Nobles and Commons, laying aſide the exerciſe of Arms, betook them to the Cloiſter: and not content ſo to do at home, many in the days of Ina, Clerks and Laics, Men and Women, haſting to Rome in Herds, thought themſelves no where ſure of Eternal Life, till they were cloiſter'd there. Thus repreſenting the ſtate of things in this Iland, Beda ſurceas'd to write. Out of whom chiefly hath bin gather'd ſince the Saxons arrival, ſuch as hath bin deliver'd, a ſcatterd ſtory pickt out heer and there, with ſom trouble and tedious work from among his many Legends of Viſions and Miracles; toward the latter end ſo bare of civil matters, as what can be thence collected may ſeem a Calendar rather then a Hiſtory, tak'n up for the moſt part with ſucceſſion of Kings, and computation of years, yet thoſe hard to be reconcil'd with the Saxon Annals. Thir actions we read of, were moſt commonly Wars, but for what cauſe wag'd, or by what Councils carried on, no care was had to let us know; wherby thir Strength and Violence we underſtand, ſtand, of thir Wiſdom, Reaſon, or Juſtice, little or nothing, the reſt Super-ſtition and monaſtical Affectation; Kings one after another leaving thir Kingly Charge, to run thir Heads fondly into a Monks Cowle: which leaves us uncertain whether Beda was wanting to his matter, or his matter to him. Yet from hence to the Daniſh Invaſion it will be worſe with us, deſtitute of Beda.

Left only to obſcure and blockiſh Chronicles; whom Malmsbury, and Huntingdon (for neither they nor we had better Authors of thoſe times) ambitious to adorn the Hiſtory, make no ſcruple oft-times, I doubt, to interline with conjectures and ſurmiſes of thir own; them rather then imitate, I ſhall chooſe to repreſent the truth naked, though as lean as a plain Journal. Yet William of Malmsbury muſt be acknowledg'd, both for ſtile and judgment, to be by far the beſt Writer of them all: but what labour is to be endur'd turning over Volumes of rubbiſh in the reſt, Florence of Worſter, Huntingdon, Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, Matthew of Weſtminſter, and many others of obſcurer note, with all thir Monachiſms, is a penance to think. Yet theſe are our only Regiſters, tranſcribers one after another for the moſt part, and ſomtimes worthy enough for the things they regiſter. This travail rather then not know at once what may be known of our antient ſtory, ſifted from fables and impertinencies, I voluntarily undergo; and to ſave others, if they pleaſe, the like unpleaſing labour; except thoſe who take pleaſure to be all thir Life time raking in the Foundations of old Abbies and Cathedrals. But became Monk in Lindisfarne, yet none of the ſevereſt, for he brought thoſe 738.

Monks from Milk and Water, to Wine and Ale; in which Doctrin no doubt Malmſ.
but they were ſoon docil, and well might, for Kelwulf brought with him good Proviſion, great Treaſure and revenues of Land, recited by Simeon, yet all under pretence of following (I uſe the Authors words) poor Chriſt, by voluntary Poverty: no marvel then if ſuch applauſe were giv'n by Monkiſh Writers to Kings turning Monks, and much cunning perhaps us'd to allure them.
To Eadbert his Uncles Son, he left the Kingdom, whoſe Brother Ecbert, Arch-which was the laſt but one of his Life. Huntingdon, as his manner is to comment upon the annal Text, makes a terrible deſcription of that Fight between Cutbred and Ethelbald, and the Proweſs of Ethelhun, at Beorford, but ſo affectedly, for a long time had faithfully ſerv'd, and now diſſuaded him from incenſing Huntingd. the People by ſuch Tyrannical Practices. Thence flying for ſafety into Huntingd. Andrew's Wood, forſak'n of all, he was at length ſlain by the Swineherd of Cumbran in revenge of his Maſter, and Kinwulf who had undoubted right 756. to the Crown, joyfully ſaluted King. The next year Eadbert the Northumbrian and took by ſurrender the City Alcluith, now Dunbritton in Lennox, from the Britans of Cumberland; and ten days after, the whole Army periſh'd about Camd. Niwanbirig, but to tell us how, he forgets. In Mercia, Ethelbald was ſlain at 757. a place call'd Secandune, now Seckington in Warwicſhire, the year following, Sax. an. Epit. Bed. in a bloody fight againſt Cuthred, as Huntingdon ſurmiſes, but Cuthred was Sim. Dun. dead two or three years before; others write him murder'd in the night by his own Guard, and the Treaſon, as ſom ſay, of Beornred, who ſucceeded him; but ere many Months, was defeated and ſlain by Offa. Yet Ethelbald ſeems not without cauſe, after a long and proſperous Reign, to have fall'n by a violent Death; not ſhaming on the vain confidence of his many Alms, to commit Uncleaneſs with conſecrated Nuns, beſides Laic Adulteries, as the Arch-biſhop of Ments in a Letter taxes him and his Predeceſſor, and that by his Example moſt of his Peers did the like; which adulterous doings he foretold him were likely to produce a ſlothful Off-ſpring, good for nothing but

758. to be the ruin of that Kingdom, as it fell out not long after. The next Year
Oſmund, according to Florence, ruling the South-Saxons, and Switbred the Eaſt, Eadbert in Northumberland, following the ſteps of his Predeceſſor, got him
Sim. Dun. into a Monk's Hood; the more to be wonder'd, that having reign'd worthily Eccleſ. l. 2. 21 Years, with the love and high eſtimation of all, both at home and abroad, able ſtill to govern, and much entreated by the Kings his Neighbours, not to lay down his Charge, with offer on that condition to yeild up to him part of thir own Dominion, he could not be mov'd from his Reſolution, but relinquiſh'd 759. his Regal Office to Oſwulf his Son; who at the years end, though without juſt cauſe, was ſlain by his own Servants. And the year after dy'd Ethelbert, 762. Son of Victred, the ſecond of that name in Kent. After Oſwulf, Ethelwald, Sim. Dun. Mat. Weſt. otherwiſe call'd Mallo, was ſet up King; who in his third Year had a great Battel at Eldune, by Melros, ſlew Oſwin a great Lord, rebelling, and gain'd 765. the Victory. But the third year after, fell by the treachery of Alcred, who Sim. Dun. aſſum'd his place. The fourth Year after which, Cataracta an antient and 769. fair City in Yorkſhire, was burnt by Arnred a certain Tyrant, who the ſame year came to like end. And after five years more, Alcred the King, depos'd 774. Sim. Dun. and forſak'n of all his People, fled with a few, firſt to Bebba, a ſtrong City of thoſe parts, thence to Kinot King of the Picts. Ethelred the Son of Mollo, was crown'd in his ſtead. Mean while Offa the Mercian, growing powerful, had ſubdu'd a neighbouring People by Simeon, call'd Heſtings; and fought ſucceſfully this year with Alric King of Kent, at a place call'd Ottanford: the Annals alſo ſpeak of wondrous Serpents then ſeen in Suſſex. Nor had Kinwulf the Weſt-Saxon giv'n ſmall proof of his Valour in ſeveral Battels againſt 775. Sax. an. the Welch heretofore; but this year 775, meeting with Offa, at a place call'd Beſington, was put to the worſe, and Offa won the Town for which they contended. In Northumberland, Ethelred having cauſ'd three of his Nobles, 778. Aldwulf, Kinwulf and Ecca, treacherouſly to be ſlain by two other Peers, Sim. Dun. was himſelf the next year driv'n into Baniſhment, Elfwald the Son of Oſwulf ſucceeding in his place, yet not without civil Broils; for in his ſecond year 780.

Osbald and Athelheard, two Noblemen, raiſing Forces againſt him, routed Sim. Dun.
Bearne his General, and purſuing, burnt him at a place call'd Seletune. I am ſenſible how weariſom it may likely be to read of ſo many bare and reaſonleſs Actions, ſo many names of Kings one after another, acting little more then mute Perſons in a Scene: what would it be to have inſerted the long Bead-roll of Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Abbeſſes, and thir doings, neither to Religion profitable, nor to Morality, ſwelling my Authors each to a voluminous Body, by me ſtudiouſly omitted; and left as thir Propriety, who have a mind to write the Eccleſiaſtical matters of thoſe Ages; neither do I care to wrincle the ſmoothneſs of Hiſtory with rugged names of places unknown, better harp'd at in Camden, and other Chorographers. Six years therfore paſs'd over in ſilence, as wholly of ſuch Argument, bring us to 786.
relate next the unfortunate end of Kinwulf the Weſt-Saxon; who having Ethelwerd. Malmſ.
laudably reign'd about 31 years, yet ſuſpecting that Kineard Brother of Sigebert the former King, intended to uſurp the Crown after his Deceaſe, or revenge his Brother's Expulſion, had commanded him into Baniſhment; but he lurking Sax. an.
here and there on the Borders with a ſmall Company, having had intelligence that Kinwulf was in the Country therabout, at Merantun, or Merton Camd.
in Surrey, at the Houſe of a Woman whom he lov'd, went by night and beſet the place. Kinwulf over-confident either of his Royal Preſence, or perſonal Valour, iſſuing forth with the few about him, runs feirſly at Kineard, and wounds him ſore, but by his Followers hem'd in, is kill'd among them.
The report of ſo great an Accident ſoon running to a place not far off, where many more Attendants awaited the King's return, Oſric and Wivert, two Earls, haſted with a great number to the Houſe, where Kineard and his Fellows yet remain'd. He ſeeing himſelf ſurrounded, with fair words and promiſe of great Gifts, attempted to appeaſe them; but thoſe rejected with diſdain, fights it out to the laſt, and is ſlain with all but one or two of his Retinue, which were nigh a hundred. Kinwulf was ſucceeded by Birthric, being both deſcended of Kerdic the Founder of that Kingdom. Not better 788.
was the end of Elfwald in Northumberland, two years after ſlain miſerably by Sim. Dun.
the Conſpiracy of Siggan, one of his Nobles, others ſay of the whole People Malmſ.

year driv'n out, left his Seat vacant to Ethelred Son of Mollo, who after ten years of Baniſhment (Impriſonment, ſaith Alcuin) had the Scepter put again Sim. Dun. into his hand. The third year of Birthric King of Weſt-Saxons, gave beginning 789.
from abroad to a new and fatal revolution of Calamity on this Land.
For three Daniſh Ships, the firſt that had bin ſeen here of that Nation arriving in the Weſt, to viſit theſe, as was ſuppos'd, Foren Merchants, the Kings Gatherer of Cuſtoms taking Horſe from Dorcheſter, found them Spies and Enemies. For being commanded to come and give account of thir lading at the King's Cuſtom Houſe, they ſlew him and all who came with him; as an earneſt of the many Slaughters, Rapines, and Hoſtilities, which they return'd not long after to commit over all the Iland. Of this Daniſh firſt arrival, Pontan. l. 3.
and on a ſudden worſe then hoſtile Aggreſſion, the Daniſh Hiſtory far otherwiſe relates, as if thir landing had bin at the mouth of Humber, and thir ſpoilful march far into the Country; though ſoon repell'd by the Inhabitants, they haſted back as faſt to thir Ships: But from what Cauſe, what Reaſon of State, what Authority or publick Council the Invaſion proceeded, makes not mention, and our wonder yet the more, by telling us that Sigefrid then King in Denmark, and long after, was a Man ſtudious more of Peace and Quiet then of warlike Matters. Theſe therfore ſeem rather to have Pontan. l. 4.

the principal Church of York, and after by command of Ethelred, cruelly Camden. put to death at Wonwaldremere, a Village by the great Pool in Lancaſhire, now 792. call'd Winandermere. Nor was the third year leſs bloody; for Oſred, who
Sim. Dun. not liking a ſhav'n Crown, had deſir'd Baniſhment and obtain'd it, returning Sim. Dun. from the Ile of Man with ſmall Forces, at the ſecret but deceitful call of certain Eccleſ. l. 2. Nobles, who by Oath had promis'd to aſſiſt him, was alſo tak'n, and by Ethelred dealt with in the ſame manner; who the better to avouch his Cruelties, therupon married Elfled the Daughter of Offa: for in Offa was found as little Faith or Mercy. He the ſame Year having drawn to his Palace Ethelbrite King of Eaſt-Angles, with fair Invitations to marry his Daughter, caus'd him to be there inhoſpitably beheaded, and his Kingdom wrongfully ſeis'd, by the wicked Counſel of his Wife, ſaith Mat. Weſt. annexing therto a long unlikely Tale. For which violence and bloodſhed to make Atonement, with Friers at leaſt, he beſtows the Reliques of St. Alban, in a ſhrine 793. of Pearl and Gold. Far worſe it far'd the next year with Reliques in Sim. Dun. Lindisfarne; where the Danes landing, pillag'd that Monaſtry, and of Fryers kill'd ſom, carried away others Captive, ſparing neither Prieſt nor Lay: which many ſtrange Thunders and firy Dragons, with other impreſſions in the Air ſeen frequently before, were judg'd to foreſignify. This year Alric third Son of Victred ended in Kent his long Reign of 34 years:
with him ended the Race of Hengiſt: thenceforth whomſoever Wealth or Faction advanc'd, took on him the name and ſtate of a King. The Saxon Annals of 784. name Ealmund then reigning in Kent; but that conſiſts not with the time of Alric, and I find him no where elſe mention'd. The year
794. following was remarkable for the Death of Offa the Mercian, a ſtrenuous Malmſ. and ſuttle King; he had much intercourſe with Charles the Great, at firſt Enmity, to the interdicting of Commerce on either ſide, at length much Amity and firm League, as appears by the Letter of Charles himſelf yet extant, procur'd by Alcuin a learned and prudent Man, though a Monk, whom the Kings of England in thoſe days had ſent Orator into France, to maintain good Correſpondence between them and Charles the Great. He granted, ſaith Huntingdon, a perpetual Tribute to the Pope out of every Aſſer. Men. Houſe in his Kingdom, for yeilding perhaps to tranſlate the Primacy of Sim. Dun. Canterbury to Lichfeild in his own Dominion. He drew a Trench of wondrous length between Mercia and the Britiſh Confines, from Sea to Sea.
Ecferth the Son of Offa, a Prince of great hope, who alſo had bin crown'd nine years before his Father's Deceaſe, reſtoring to the Church what his Father had ſeis'd on, yet within four Months by a Sickneſs ended his Reign; and to Kenulf next in right of the ſame Progeny bequeath'd his Kingdom.
Mean while the Daniſh Pirats who ſtill waſted Northumberland, ventring on ſhoar to ſpoil another Monaſtry at the mouth of the River Don, were aſſail'd by the Engliſh, thir chief Captain ſlain on the place; then returning to Sea, were moſt of them ſhip-wrack'd; others driv'n again on ſhoar, were put all to the Sword. Simeon attributes this thir Puniſhment to the power of St. Cudbert, offended with them for the rifling of his Covent.
796. Two years after this, dy'd Ethelred twice King, but not exempted Sim. Dun. at laſt from the fate of many his Predeceſſors, miſerably ſlain by his People, ſome ſay deſervedly, as not inconſcious with them who train'd Oſred to his ruin. Osbald a Nobleman exalted to the Throne, and in leſs then a Month, deſerted and expell'd, was forc'd to fly at laſt from Lindisfarne by Sea to the Pictiſh King, and dy'd an Abbot. Eardulf, whom Ethelred ſix years before had commanded to be put to death at Ripun, before the Abbey-Gate, dead as was ſuppos'd, and with ſolemn Dirge carried into the Church, after midnight found there alive, I read not how, then baniſh'd, now recal'd, was in York created King. In Kent, Ethelbert or Pren, whom the Annals call Eadbright (ſo different they often are one from another, both in timing and in naming) by ſom means having uſurp'd Regal Power, after two years Reign contending with Kenulf the Mercian, was by him tak'n Priſ'ner, and ſoon after out of pious Commiſeration let go: but not receav'd of his own, what became of him, Malmsbury leaves in doubt. Simeon writes, that Kenulf commanded to put out his Eyes, and lop off his hands; but whether the Sentence were executed or not, is left as much in doubt by his want of Expreſſion. The ſecond

Year after this, they in Northumberland who had conſpir'd againſt Ethelred, 798.

rators at laſt flying, Eardulf return'd with Victory. The ſame year London, with a great multitude of her Inhabitants, by a ſudden Fire was conſum'd.
The year 800 made way for great Alteration in England, uniting her ſeven 800.
Kingdoms into one, by Ecbert the famous Weſt-Saxon; him Birtbric dying childleſs left next to reign, the only Surviver of that Linage, deſcended from Inegild the Brother of King Ina. And according to his Birth liberally bred, Malmſ.
he began early from his Youth to give ſignal hopes of more then ordinary worth growing up in him; which Birtbric fearing, and with all his juſter Title to the Crown, ſecretly ſought his Life, and Ecbert perceaving, fled to Offa
the Mercian: but he having married Eadburg his Daughter to Birtbric, eaſily gave ear to his Embaſſadors coming to require Ecbert: He again put to his Sax. an.
ſhifts, eſcap'd thence into France; but after three years Baniſhment there, which perhaps contributed much to his Education, Charles the Great then reigning, he was call'd over by the publick Voice (for Birtbric was newly dead) and with general Applauſe created King of Weſt-Saxons. The ſame day Ethelmund at Kinneresford paſſing over with the Worceſterſhire Men, was met by Weolſtan another Nobleman with thoſe of Wiltſhire, between whom happ'nd a great fray, wherin the Wiltſhire Men overcame, but both Dukes were ſlain, no reaſon of thir Quarrel writt'n; ſuch bickerings to recount met oft'n in theſe our Writers, what more worth is it then to chronicle the Wars of Kites or Crows flocking and fighting in the Air? The Year following Ear- 801.

cretly to contrive his Death. It fortun'd that the King her Husband lighting on a Cup which ſhe had temper'd, not for him, but for one of his great Favourites, whom ſhe could not harm by accuſing, ſip'd therof only, and in a while after ſtill pining away, ended his days; the Favourite drinking deeper, found ſpeedier the Operation. She fearing to be queſtion'd for theſe Facts, with what Treaſure ſhe had, paſs'd over Sea to Charles the Great, whom with rich Gifts coming to his Preſence, the Emperor courtly receav'd with this pleaſant Propoſal: Chooſe Eadburga, which of us two thou wilt, me or my Son (for his Son ſtood by him) to be thy Husband. She no Diſſembler of what ſhe lik'd beſt, made eaſy Anſwer: Were it in my choice, I ſhould chooſe of the two your Son rather, as the younger Man. To whom the Emperour, between jeſt and earneſt, Hadſt thou choſen me, I had beſtow'd on thee my Son; but ſince thou haſt chos'n him, thou ſhalt have neither him nor me.
Neverthele ſs he aſſign'd her a rich Monaſtery to dwell in as Abbeſs; for that Life it may ſeem ſhe choſe next to profeſs: but being a while after detected of Unchaſtity with one of her Followers, ſhe was commanded to depart thence;
from that time wandring poorly up and down with one Servant, in Pavia a City of Italy, ſhe finiſh'd at laſt in beggery her ſhameful Life. In the year 805 805.
Cutbred, whom Kenulf the Mercian had, inſtead of Pren, made King in Kent, Malmſ.

not how this can ſtand with the Sequel of Story out of better Authors: Much Sim. Dun. 808.
leſs that which Buchanan relates, the year following, of Achaius King of Scots, Mat. Weſt.
who having reign'd 32 years, and dying in 809, had formerly aided (but in 8 9.
what year of his Reign tells not) Hungus King of Picts with 10000 Scots, againſt Athelſtan a Saxon or Engliſh-man, then waſting the Pictiſh Borders; that Hungus by the aid of thoſe Scots, and the help of St. Andrew thir Patron, in a Viſion by night, and the appearance of his Croſs by day, routed the aſtoniſh'd Engliſh, and ſlew Athelſtan in fight. Who this Athelſtan was, I believe no Man knows; Buchanan ſuppoſes him to have been ſom Daniſh Commander, on whom King Alured or Alfred had beſtow'd Northumberland; but of this I find no Footſtep in our antient Writers; and if any ſuch thing were done in the time of Alfred, it muſt be little leſs then 100 years after: this Athelſtan therfore, and this great Overthrow, ſeems rather to have bin the fancy of Sim. Dun. ſom Legend then any warrantable Record. Mean while Ecbert having with ſubduing both. In Mercia, Kenulf the 6th year after having reign'd with great Praiſe of his religious Mind and Vertues both in Peace and War, deceas'd.

819. His Son Kenelm, a Child of ſeven Years, was committed to the care Sax. an. of his elder Siſter Quendrid; who with a female Ambition aſpiring to the Malmſ. Crown, hir'd one who had the charge of his Nurture to murder him, led into a woody place upon pretence of hunting. The Murder, as is reported, was miraculouſly reveal'd; but to tell how, by a Dove dropping a writt'n Note on the Altar at Rome, is a long Story, told, though out of order, by Malmsbury, and under the year 821 by Mat. Weſt. where I leave it to be ſought by ſuch as are more credulous then I wiſh my Readers. Only the Note was to this purpoſe:

Low in a Mead of Kine under a Thorn,
Of Head bereft, li'th poor Kenelm King-born.

820. Keolwulf the Brother of Kenulf, after one Year's Reign was driv'n out by Ingulf. one Bernulf an Uſurper: who in his third Year, uncertain whether invading
823. or invaded, was by Ecbert, though with great Loſs on both ſides, overthrown
Sax. an. and put to flight at Ellandune or Wilton: yet Malmsbury accounts this Battel fought in 806, a wide difference, but frequently found in thir Computations.
Bernulf thence retiring to the Eaſt-Angles, as part of his Dominion by the late ſeiſure of Offa, was by them met in the Field and ſlain: but they doubting what the Mercians might do in revenge hereof, forthwith yielded themſelves both King and People to the Sovrantie of Ecbert. As for the Kings of Eaſt-Angles, our Annals mention them not ſince Ethelwald; him ſucceeded his Florent. Brother's Sons, as we find in Malmsbury, Aldulf (a good King, well acquainted Genealog. with Bede) and Elwold who left the Kingdom to Beorn, he to Ethelred the Bed. l. 2. c. 15. Father of Ethelbrite, whom Offa perfidiouſly put to Death. Simeon and Hoveden, in the Year 749, write that Elfwald King of Eaſt-Angles dying, Humbeanna and Albert ſhar'd the Kingdom between them; but where to inſert this among the former Succeſſions is not eaſy, nor much material: after Ethelbrite, none is nam'd of that Kingdom till thir ſubmitting now to Ecbert: he from this Victory againſt Bernulf ſent part of his Army under Ethelwulf his Son, with Alſtan Biſhop of Shirburn, and Wulferd a Chief Commander, into Kent. Who finding Baldred there reigning in his 18th Year, overcame and drove him over the Thames; wherupon all Kent, Surrey, Suſſex, and laſtly Eſſex, with her King Switbred, became ſubject to the Dominion of Ecbert.
Neither were theſe all his Exploits of this Year, the firſt in order ſet down in Saxon Annals, being his Fight againſt the Devonſhire Welch, at a place call'd Camd. Gafulford, now Camelford in Cornwal. Ludiken the Mercian, after two years
825. preparing to avenge Bernulf his Kinſman on the Eaſt-Angles, was by them Ingulf. with his five Conſuls, as the Annals call them, ſurpris'd and put to the Sword:
and Withlaf his Succeſſor firſt vanquiſh'd, then upon Submiſſion with all Mercia, made tributary to Ecbert. Mean while the Northumbrian Kingdom of it ſelf was fall'n to ſhivers; thir Kings one after another ſo oft'n ſlain by the People, no Man daring, though never ſo ambitious, to take up the Scepter which many had found ſo hot, (the only effectual cure of Ambition that I have read) for the ſpace of 33 Years after the Death of Ethelred Son of Mollo, as Malmsbury writes, there was no King: many Noblemen and Prelats were fled the Country. Which Miſ-rule among them the Danes having underſtood, ofttimes from thir Ships entring far into the Land, infeſted thoſe Parts with wide Depopulation, waſting Towns, Churches, and Monaſteries, for they were yet Heathen: The Lent before whoſe coming, on the North-ſide of St. Peter's Church in York, was ſeen from the Roof to rain Blood. The Cauſes of theſe Calamities, and the Ruin of that Kingdom, Alcuin, a learned Monk living in thoſe

thoſe days, attributes in ſeveral Epiſtles, and well may, to the general Ignorance and Decay of Lerning, which crept in among them after the Death of Beda, and of Ecbert the Archbiſhop; thir neglect of breeding up Youth in the Scriptures, the ſpruce and gay Apparel of thir Preiſts and Nuns, diſcovering thir vain and wanton minds: examples are alſo read, ev'n in Beda's days, of thir wanton deeds: thence Altars defil'd with Perjuries, Cloiſters violated with Adulteries, the Land polluted with Blood of thir Princes, civil Diſſentions among the People, and finally all the ſame Vices which Gildas alleg'd of old to have ruin'd the Britans. In this eſtate Ecbert, who had now conquer'd all the South, finding them in the year 827, (for he was march'd thether with an Army to compleat his Conqueſt of the whole Iland) no wonder if they ſubmitted themſelves to the Yoke without Reſiſtance, Eandred thir King becoming tributary. Thence turning his Forces the Year following, he ſubdu'd more throughly what remain'd of North-Wales. 827. 828. Mat. Weſt.

THE HISTORY OF BRITAIN.

The Fifth Book.

THE ſum of things in this Iland, or the beſt part therof, reduc't now under the Power of one man, and him one of the worthieſt, which as far as can be found in good Authors, was by none attain'd at any time heer before unleſs in Fables, men might with ſome reaſon have expected, from ſuch union, peace and plenty, greatneſs, and the flouriſhing of all eſtates and degrees: but far the contrary fell out ſoon after, invaſion, ſpoil, deſolation, ſlaughter of many, ſlavery of the reſt, by the forcible landing of a fierce Nation; Danes commonly call'd, and ſomtimes Dacians by others, the ſame with Normans; as barbarous as the Saxons themſelves were at firſt reputed, and much more, for the Saxons firſt invited came hither to dwell; theſe unſent for, unprovok'd, came only to deſtroy. Calviſius. But if the Saxons, as is above related, came moſt of them from Jutland and Anglen, a part of Denmark, as Daniſh writers affirm, and that Danes and Normans are the ſame; then in this Invaſion, Danes drove out Danes, thir own Poſterity. Pontan. Hiſt. Dan. And Normans afterwards, none but antienter Normans. Which invaſion perhaps, had the Heptarchie ſtood divided as it was, had either not bin attempted, or not uneaſily reſiſted; while each Prince and People, excited by thir neereſt concernments, had more induſtriouſly defended thir own bounds, then depending on the neglect of a deputed Governour, ſent oft-times from the remote reſidence of a ſecure Monarch. Though as it fell out in thoſe troubles, the leſſer Kingdoms revolting from the Weſt-Saxon yoke, and not aiding each other, too much concern'd with thir own ſafety, it came to no better paſs; while ſeverally they ſought to repel the danger nigh at hand, rather then jointly to prevent it far off. But when God hath decreed ſervitude on a ſinful Nation, fitted by thir own Vices for no condition but ſervile, all Eſtates of Government are alike unable to avoid it. God had purpos'd to puniſh our inſtrumental puniſhers, though now Chriſtians, by other Heathen, according to his Divine retaliation; Invaſion for invaſion, ſpoil for ſpoil, deſtruction for deſtruction. The Saxons were now full as wicked as the Britans were at thir arrival, brok'n with Luxury and Sloth, either ſecular or ſuperſtitious; for laying aſide the exerciſe of Arms, and the ſtudy of all vertuous Knowledg, ſom betook them to over-worldly or vitious practice, others to religious idleneſs and ſolitude, which brought forth nothing but vain and deluſive Viſions; eaſily perceav'd ſuch by thir commanding of things, either not belonging to the Goſpel, or utterly forbidden, Ceremonies, Reliques, Monaſteries, Maſſes, Idols, add to theſe oſtentation of Alms, got ofttimes by rapine and oppreſſion, or intermixt with violent and luſtful deeds, ſomtimes prodigally beſtow'd as the expiation of Cruelty and Bloodſhed. What longer ſuffering could there be, when Religion it ſelf grew ſo void of ſincerity, and the greateſt ſhews of Purity were impur'd?

ECBERT.

Ecbert in full hight of Glory, having now enjoy'd his Conqueſt ſeven peaceful years, his victorious Army long ſince diſbanded, and the exerciſe of Arms perhaps laid aſide, the more was found unprovided againſt a ſudden ſtorm of Danes from the Sea, who landing in the 32*d* of his Reign, waſted 832.
Shepey in Kent. Ecbert the next Year, gathering an Army, for he had heard Sax. an.
of thir arrival in 35 Ships, gave them Battel by the River Carr in Dorſetſhire; 833.
the event wherof was, that the Danes kept thir Ground, and encamp'd where Sax. an.
the Field was fought; two Saxon Leaders, Dudda and Oſmund, and two Biſhops, as ſom ſay, were there ſlain. This was the only check of Fortune we read of, that Ecbert in all his time receav'd. For the Danes returning two 835.
years after with a great Navy, and joining Forces with the Corniſh, who had Sax. an.
enter'd League with them, were overthrown and put to flight. Of theſe Invaſions Pontan. Hiſt.
againſt Ecbert, the Daniſh Hiſtory is not ſilent; whether out of thir Dan. l. 4. own Records or ours, may be juſtly doubted: for of theſe times at home, I find them in much uncertainty, and beholden rather to Out-landiſh Chronicles then any Records of thir own. The Victor Ecbert, as one who had done enough, ſeaſonably now, after proſperous ſucceſs, the next year with glory 836.
ended his daies, and was buried at Wincheſter. Sax. an.

ETHELWOLF.

Ethelwolf the Son of Ecbert ſucceeded, by Malmsbury deſcrib'd a man of mild Nature, not inclin'd to War, or delighted with much Dominion; that therfore contented with the antient Weſt-Saxon bounds, he gave to Ethelſtan his Brother, or Son, as ſom write, the Kingdom of Kent and Eſſex. Matt. Weſt.
But the Saxon Annaliſt, whoſe Autority is elder, ſaith plainly, that both theſe Countries and Suſſex, were bequeath'd to Ethelſtan by Ecbert his Father. The unwarlike diſpoſition of Ethelwolf gave encouragement no doubt, and eaſier entrance to the Danes, who came again the next year with 33 Ships; but 837.
Wulfheard, one of the Kings chief Captains, drove them back at Southamton Sax. an.
with great ſlaughter; himſelf dying the ſame year, of Age, as I ſuppoſe, for he ſeems to have bin one of Ecberts old Commanders, who was ſent with Ethelwolf to ſubdue Kent. Ethelhelm another of the King's Captains, with the Dorſetſhire men, had at firſt like ſucceſs againſt the Danes at Portſmouth; but they reinforcing ſtood thir Ground, and put the Engliſh to rout. Worſe was the ſucceſs of Earl Herebert at a place call'd Mereſwar, ſlain with the moſt part of his Army. The year following in Lindſey alſo, Eaſt-Angles, and Kent, much 838.
miſchief was don by thir landing; where the next year, embold'nd by ſucceſs, Sax. an.
they came on as far as Canterbury, Rocheſter, and London it ſelf, with no 839.
leſs cruel Hoſtility: and giving no reſpit to the peaceable mind of Ethelwolf, Sax. an.
they yet return'd with the next year in 35 Ships, fought with him, as before 840.
with his Father, at the River Carr, and made good thir Ground. In Northumberland, Sax. an.
his Son Ethelred driv'n out in his fourth year, and ſucceeded by Readwulf, who Mat. Weſt.
ſoon after his Coronation haſting forth to Battel againſt the Danes at *Alvethel*i, 844.
fell with the moſt part of his Army; and Ethelred like in fortune to the former Ethelred, was re-exalted to his Seat. And to be yet further like him in Fate, was ſlain the fourth year after. Osbert ſucceeded in his room. But more ſoutherly, the Danes next year after met with ſom ſtop in the full courſe of 845.
thir outragious inſolences. For Earnulf with the men of Somerſet, Alſtan the Sax. an.
Biſhop, and Oſric with thoſe of Dorſetſhire, ſetting upon them at the Rivers mouth of Pedridan, ſlaughter'd them in great numbers, and obtain'd a juſt Victory.
This repulſe quel'd them, for ought we hear, the ſpace of ſix years; then alſo 851.
renewing thir Invaſion with little better ſucceſs. For Keorle an Earl, aided with Sax. an.
the Forces of Devonſhire, aſſaulted and overthrew them at Wigganbeorch with Aſſer.
great Deſtruction; as proſperouſly were they fought with the ſame Year at Sandwich, by King Ethelſtan, and Ealker his General, thir great Army defeated, and nine of thir Ships tak'n, the reſt driv'n off; however to ride out the Winter on that ſhoar, Aſſer ſaith, they then firſt winter'd in Shepey Ile.

Hard it is, through the bad expreſſion of theſe Writers, to define this Fight, whether by Sea or Land; Hoveden terms it a Sea-fight. Nevertheleſs with Huntingd. Mat. Weſt. 50 Ships (Aſſer and others add 300) they enter'd the mouth of Thames, and made Excurſions as far as Canterbury and London, and as Ethelwerd writes, deſtroy'd both; of London, Aſſer ſignifies only that they pillag'd it. Bertulf alſo the Mercian, Succeſſor of Withlaf, with all his Army they forc'd to fly, and him beyond the Sea. Then paſſing over Thames with thir Powers into Surrey, and the Weſt-Saxons, and meeting there with King Ethelwolf and Ethelbald his Son, at a place call'd Ak-Lea, or Oke-Lea, they receav'd a total Defeat with memorable Slaughter. This was counted a lucky Year to England, 853. Sax. an. Aſſer. and brought to Ethelwolf great Reputation. Burhed therfore, who after Bertulf held of him the Mercian Kingdom, two years after this, imploring his Aid againſt the North-Welch, as then troubleſom to his Confines, obtain'd it of him in Perſon, and therby reduc'd them to Obedience. This don, Ethelwolf ſent his Son Alfrid a Child of five years, well accompanied to Rome, whom Leo the Pope both conſecrated to be King afterwards, and adopted to be his Son; at home Ealker with the Forces of Kent, and Huda with thoſe of Surrey, fell on the Danes at thir landing in Tanet, and at firſt put them back; but the ſlain and drown'd were at length ſo many on either ſide, as left the loſs equal on both: which yet hinder'd not the Solemnity of Malmſ. a Marriage at the Feaſt of Eaſter, between Burhed the Mercian, and Ethelſwida King Ethelwolf's Daughter. 854. Sax. an. Howbeit the Danes next year winter'd again in Shepey. Whom Ethelwolf, not finding Human Health ſufficient to reſiſt, growing daily upon him, in hope of Divine Aid, regiſter'd in a Book, and dedicated to God the tenth part of his own Lands, and of his whole Kingdom, eas'd of all Impoſitions, but converted to the maintenance of Maſſes and Pſalms weekly to be ſung for the proſpering of Ethelwolf and his Captains, as appears at large by the Patent it ſelf, in William of Malmsbury. Aſſer ſaith, he did it for the redemption of his Soul, and the Soul of his Anceſtors. After which, as having don ſom great matter to ſhew himſelf at Rome, and be applauded of the Pope, he takes a long and cumberſom Journey 855. Aſſer. thether with young Alfrid again, and there ſtays a Year, when his place requir'd him rather here in the field againſt Pagan Enemies left wintring in his Land. Yet ſo much Manhood he had, as to return thence no Monk; and in his way home took to Wife Judith Daughter of Charles the bald, King of Aſſer. France. But ere his return, Ethelbald his eldeſt Son, Alſtan his truſty Biſhop, and Enulf Earl of Somerſet conſpir'd againſt him; thir Complaints were, that he had tak'n with him Alfrid his youngeſt Son to be there inaugurated King, and brought home with him an out-landiſh Wife; for which they endeavour'd to deprive him of his Kingdom. The diſturbance was expected to bring forth nothing leſs then War: but the King abhorring civil Diſcord, after many Conferences tending to Peace, condeſcended to divide the Kingdom with his Son; Diviſion was made, but the matter ſo carried, that the Eaſtern and worſt part was malignly afforded to the Father: The Weſtern and beſt giv'n to the Son, at which many of the Nobles had great Indignation, offring to the King thir utmoſt Aſſiſtance for the recovery of all; whom he peacefully diſſuading, ſat down contented with his Portion aſſign'd. In the Eaſt-Angles, Edmund lineal from the antient ſtock of thoſe Kings, a Youth of 14 Years only, but of great hopes, was with conſent of all but his own 857. crown'd at Burie. About this time, as Buchanan relates, the Picts, who not long before had by the Scots bin driv'n out of thir Country, part of them coming to Oſbert and Ella, then Kings of Northumberland, obtain'd Aid againſt Donaldus the Scotiſh King, to recover thir antient Poſſeſſion. Oſbert, who in Perſon undertook the Expedition, marching into Scotland, was at firſt put to a Retreat; but returning ſoon after on the Scots, over-ſecure of thir ſuppos'd Victory, put them to flight with great ſlaughter, took Pris'ner thir King, and purſu'd his Victory beyond Sterlin-bridg. The Scots unable to reſiſt longer, and by Embaſſadors entreating Peace, had it granted them on theſe conditions: the Scots were to quit all they had poſſeſs'd within the Wall of Severus: the limits of Scotland were beneath Sterlin-bridg to be the River Forth, and on the other ſide, Dunbritton Frith; from that time ſo call'd of the Britiſh then ſeated in Cumberland, who had join'd with Oſbert in this Action, and ſo far extended on that ſide the Britiſh Limits. If this be true, as the Scotch Writers themſelves witneſs (and who would think them fabulous to the diſparagement of thir own Country?) how much wanting have bin our Hiſtorians to thir Country's Honour, in letting paſs unmention'd an Exploit ſo memorable, by them remembred and atteſted, who are wont ofter to extenuate then to amplifie aught don in Scotland by the Engliſh? Donaldus on theſe conditions releas'd, ſoon after dies; according to Buchanan, in 858. Ethelwolf Chief King in England, had the year before ended his Life, and was buried as his Father at Wincheſter. He was from his Youth Mat. Weſt. much addicted to Devotion; ſo that in his Father's time he was ordain'd Biſhop of Wincheſter; and unwillingly, for want of other legitimate Iſſue, ſucceeded him in the Throne; managing therfore his greateſt Affairs by the Activity of two Biſhops, Alſtan of Sherburne, and Swithine of Wincheſter. But Alſtan is noted of Covetouſneſs and Oppreſſion, by William of Malmſbury; Malmſ. the more vehemently no doubt for doing ſom notable damage to that Suithune. Monaſtery. The ſame Author writes, that Ethelwolf at Rome, paid a Tribute Sigon. de to the Pope, continu'd to his days. However he were facil to his Son, regn. Ital. l. 5. and ſeditious Nobles, in yeilding up part of his Kingdom, yet his Queen he treated not the leſs honourably, for whomſoever it diſpleas'd. The Weſt-Saxons Aſſer. had decreed ever ſince the time of Eadburga, the infamous Wife of Birthric, that no Queen ſhould ſit in State with the King, or be dignifi'd with the Title of Queen. But Ethelwolf permitted not that Judith his Queen ſhould loſe any point of Regal State by that Law. At his Death, he divided the Kingdom between his two Sons, Ethelbald, and Ethelbert; to the younger Kent, Eſſex, Surrey, Suſſex, to the elder all the reſt; to Peter and Paul certain Revenues yearly, for what uſes let others relate, who write alſo his Pedigree, from Son to Father, up to Adam.

ETHELBALD, and ETHELBERT.

Ethelbald, unnatural and diſloyal to his Father, fell juſtly into another, Aſſer. though contrary Sin, of too much love to his Father's Wife; and whom at Malmſ. firſt he oppos'd coming into the Land, her now unlawfully marrying, he takes Sim. Dun. into his Bed; but not long enjoying, dy'd at three years end, without doing 860. aught more worthy to be remember'd; having reign'd two Years with Sax. an. his Father, impiouſly uſurping, and three after him, as unworthily inheriting. And his hap was all that while to be unmoleſted by the Danes; not of Divine Favour doubtleſs, but to his greater Condemnation, living the more ſecurely his inceſtuous Life. Huntingdon on the other ſide much praiſes Ethelbald, and writes him buried at Sherburn, with great ſorrow of the People, who miſs'd him long after. Mat. Weſt. ſaith, that he repented of his Inceſt with Judith, and diſmiſs'd her: but Aſſer an Eye-witneſs of thoſe times, mentions no ſuch thing.

ETHELBERT alone.

Ethelbald by Death remov'd, the whole Kingdom came rightfully to Ethelbert his next Brother. Who though a Prince of great Vertue and no blame, had as ſhort a Reign allotted him as his faulty Brother, nor that ſo peaceful; once or twice invaded by the Danes. But they having landed in the Weſt with a great Army, and ſack't Wincheſter, were met by Oſric Earl of Southampton, and Ethelwolf of Barkſhire, beat'n to thir Ships, and forc't to leave thir Booty. Five Years after, about the time of his Death, they ſet foot 865. again in Tanet; Sax. an. the Kentiſhmen wearied out with ſo frequent Alarms, came to agreement with them for a certain Sum of Money; but ere the Peace could be ratifi'd, and the Money gather'd, the Danes impatient of delay by a ſudden Eruption in the night, ſoon waſted all the Eaſt of Kent. Mean while or ſomthing before, Ethelbert deceaſing was buried as his Brother at Sherburn.

ETHELRED.

866. E*thelred* the third, Son of Ethelwolf, at his firſt coming to the Crown was
Sax. an. entertain'd with a freſh Invaſion of Danes, led by Hinguar and Hubba, Huntingd. two Brothers, who now had got footing among the Eaſt-Angles; there they winter'd, and coming to terms of Peace with the Inhabitants, furniſh'd themſelves of Horſes, forming by that means many Troops with Riders of thir own: Theſe Pagans, Aſſer ſaith, came from the River Danubius. Fitted thus 867. for a long Expedition, they ventur'd the next Year to make thir way over Sax. an. Land and over Humber, as far as York, them they found to thir hands imbroil'd in civil Diſſentions; thir King Osbert they had thrown out, and Ella Leader of another Faction choſen in his room; who both, though late, admoniſh'd by thir common danger, towards the years end with united Powers made head againſt the Danes and prevail'd; but perſuing them over-eagerly Aſſer. into York, then but ſlenderly wall'd, the Northumbrians were every where ſlaughter'd, both within and without; thir Kings alſo both ſlain, thir City burnt, ſaith Malmsbury, the reſt as they could made thir Peace, over-run and vanquiſh'd as far as the River Tine, and Egbert of Engliſh Race appointed King over them. Bromton no antient Author (for he wrote ſince Mat. Weſt.) nor of much credit, writes a particular cauſe of the Danes coming to York: that Bruern a Nobleman, whoſe Wife King Osbert had raviſh'd, call'd in Hinguar and Hubba to revenge him. The Example is remarkable if the Truth were as 868. evident. Thence victorious, the Danes next year enter'd into Mercia towards Nottingham, where they ſpent the Winter. Burhed then King of that Country, unable to reſiſt, implores the Aid of Ethelred and young Alfred his Brother; they aſſembling thir Forces and joining with the Mercians about Aſſer. Nottingham, offer Battel: the Danes not daring to come forth, kept themſelves within that Town and Caſtle, ſo that no great Fight was hazarded there; at length the Mercians weary of long Suſpence, enter'd into Conditions of Peace with thir Enemies. After which the Danes returning back to 869. York, made thir Abode there the ſpace of one Year, committing, ſom ſay, Sim. Dun. many Cruelties. Thence imbarking to Lindſey, and all the Summer deſtroying
870. that Country, about September they came with like Fury into Keſteven, Ingulf. another part of Lincolnſhire, where Algar the Earl of Howland, now Holland, with his Forces, and two hunderd ſtout Souldiers belonging to the Abbey of Croiland, three hunderd from about Boſton, Morcard Lord of Brunne, with his numerous Family, well train'd and arm'd: Oſgot Governour of Lincoln with 500 of that City, all joining together, gave Battel to the Danes, ſlew of them a great multitude, with three of thir Kings, and perſu'd the reſt to thir Tents; but the Night following Gothrun, Baſeg, Osketil, Halfden, and Hamond, five Kings, and as many Earls, Frena, Hinguar, Hubba, Sidroc the elder and younger, coming in from ſeveral parts with great Forces and Spoils, great part of the Engliſh began to ſlink home. Nevertheleſs Algar with ſuch as forſook him not, all next day in order of Battel facing the Danes, and ſuſtaining unmov'd the brunt of thir Aſſaults, could not with-hold his Men at laſt from perſuing their counterfited Fight; wherby op'nd and diſorder'd, they fell into the Snare of thir Enemies, ruſhing back upon them. Algar and thoſe Captains fore-nam'd with him, all reſolute Men, retreating to a Hill ſide, and ſlaying of ſuch as follow'd them, manifold thir own number, dy'd at length upon heaps of dead which they had made round about them. The Danes thence paſſing on into the Country of Eaſt-Angles, rifl'd and burnt the Monaſtery of Elie, overthrew Earl Wulketul with his whole Army, and lodg'd out the Winter at Thetford; where King Edmund aſſailing them, was with his whole Army put to flight, himſelf tak'n, bound to a ſtake, and ſhot to 871. Death with Arrows, his whole Country ſubdu'd. The next year with great Sax. an. Supplies, ſaith Huntingdon, bending thir march toward the Weſt-Saxons, the only People now left in whom might ſeem yet to remain Strength or Courage likely to oppoſe them, they came to Reading, fortify'd there between the two Rivers of Thames and Kenet, and about three days after ſent out Wings of Aſſer. Horſe under two Earls to forage the Country; but Ethelwulf Earl of Barkſhire, at Englefeild a Village nigh, encounter'd them, ſlew one of thir Earls, and

and obtain'd a great Victory. Four days after came the King himſelf and his Brother Alfred with the main Battail; and the Danes iſſuing forth, a bloody Fight began, on either ſide great Slaughter, in which Earl Ethelwulf loſt his Life; but the Danes loſing no ground, kept thir place of ſtanding to the end. Neither did the Engliſh for this make leſs haſt to another Conflict at Eſceſdune or Aſhdown, four days after, where both Armies with thir whole Force on either ſide met. The Danes were imbattail'd in two great Bodies, the one led by Baſcai and Halfden, thir two Kings, the other by ſuch Earls as were appointed; in like manner the Engliſh divided thir Powers, Ethelred the King ſtood againſt thir Kings; and though on the lower ground, and coming later into the Battail from his Oriſons, gave a fierce Onſet, wherin Baſcai (the Daniſh Hiſtory names him Ivarus the Son of Regnerus) was ſlain. Alfred was plac'd againſt the Earls, and beginning the Battail ere his Brother came into the Field, with ſuch Reſolution charg'd them, that in the ſhock moſt of them were ſlain; they are nam'd Sidroc elder and younger, Osbern, Frean, Harald; at length in both Diviſions, the Danes turn thir backs; many thouſands of them cut off, the reſt perſu'd till night. So much the more it may be wonder'd to hear next in the Annals, that the Danes 14 days after ſuch an Overthrow fighting again with Ethelred and his Brother Alfred at Baſing, under Conduct, ſaith the Daniſh Hiſtory, of Agnerus and Hubbo, Brothers of the ſlain Ivarus, ſhould obtain the Victory; eſpecially ſince the new Supply of Danes mention'd by Aſſer, arriv'd after this Action. Pontan. Hiſt. Dan. l. 4. But after two Months the King and his Brother fought with them again at Mertun, in two Squadrons as before, in which Fight hard it is to underſtand who had the better; ſo darkly do the Saxon Annals deliver thir meaning with more then wonted Infancy. Yet theſe I take (for Aſſer is heer ſilent) to be the Chief Fountain of our Story, the Ground and Baſis upon which the Monks later in time gloſs and comment at thir pleaſure. Nevertheleſs it appears, that on the Saxon part, not Heamund the Biſhop only, but many valiant Men loſt thir Lives. This Fight was follow'd by a heavy Summer Plague; wherof, as is thought, Camden. King Ethelred dy'd in the fifth of his Reign, and was buried at Winburne, where his Epitaph inſcribes that he had his Deaths Wound by the Danes, according to the Daniſh Hiſtory 872. Of all theſe terrible Landings and Devaſtations by the Danes, from the days of Ethelwolf till thir two laſt Battels with Ethelred, or of thir Leaders, whether Kings, Dukes, or Earls, the Daniſh Hiſtory of beſt credit ſaith nothing; ſo little Wit or Conſcience it ſeems they had to leave any Memory of thir brutiſh rather then manly Actions; unleſs we ſhall ſuppoſe them to have com, as above was cited out of Aſſer, from Danubius, rather then from Denmark, more probably ſome barbarous Nation of Pruſſia, or Livonia, not long before ſeated more Northward on the Baltic Sea.

ALFRED.

Alfred the fourth Son of Ethelwolf, had ſcarſe perform'd his Brothers Obſequies, and the Solemnity of his own Crowning, when at the Months end in haſt with a ſmall Power he encounter'd the whole Army of Danes at Wilton, and moſt part of the day foil'd them; but unwarily following the Chaſe, gave others of them the advantage to rally; who returning upon him now weary, remain'd Maſters of the Field. This year, as is affirm'd in the Annals, nine Battels had bin fought againſt the Danes on the South-ſide of Thames, beſides innumerable Excurſions made by Alfred and other Leaders; one King, nine Earls were fall'n in fight, ſo that weary on both ſides at the years end, League or Truce was concluded. 872. Sax. an. Yet next year the Danes took thir March to London, now expos'd to thir Prey, there they winter'd, and thether came the Mercians to renue Peace with them. The year following they rov'd back to the parts beyond Humber, but winter'd at Torkſey in Lincolnſhire, where the Mercians now the third time made Peace with them. 873. Sax. an. Camd. Notwithſtanding which, removing thir Camp to Rependune in Mercia, now Repton upon Trent in Darbyſhire, and there wintring, they conſtrain'd Burhed the King to fly into foren parts, making ſeiſure of his Kingdom, he running 874. Sax. an. the direct way to Rome; with better reaſon then his Anceſtors, dy'd there, and was buried in a Church by the Engliſh School. His Kingdom the Danes farm'd out to Kelwulf, one of his Houſhold Servants or Officers, with condi-

875. tion to be reſign'd them when they commanded. From Rependune they diſ-Sax. an. lodg'd, Hafden thir King leading part of his Army Northward, winter'd by the River Tine, and ſubjecting all thoſe quarters, waſted alſo the Picts and Britiſh beyond: but Guthrun, Oskitell, and Anwynd, other three of thir Kings, moving from Rependune, came with a great Army to Grantbrig, and remain'd there a whole year. But Alfred that Summer purpoſing to try his Fortune with a Fleet at Sea (for he had found that the want of Shipping and neglect of Navigation had expos'd the Land to theſe Piracies) met with ſeven Daniſh Rovers, took one, the reſt eſcaping; an acceptable Succeſs from ſo ſmall a beginning: for the Engliſh at that time were but little experienc'd in Sea-Af-876. fairs. The next years firſt motion of the Danes was towards Warham-Caſtle, Sax. an. where Alfred meeting them, either by Policy, or thir doubt of his Power;
Ethelwerd ſaith, by Money brought them to ſuch terms of Peace, as that they Florent. ſwore to him upon a hallow'd Bracelet, others ſay upon certain Reliques (a ſolemn Oath it ſeems which they never voutſaf'd before to any other Nation) forthwith to depart the Land: but falſifying that Oath, by night with all the Florent. Horſe they had (Aſſer ſaith, ſlaying all the Horſemen he had) ſtole to Exeter, and there winter'd. In Northumberland Hafden thir King began to ſettle, to divide the Land, to till, and to inhabit. Mean while they in the Weſt who were march'd to Exeter, enter'd the City, courſing now and then to Warham;
877. but thir Fleet the next year ſailing or rowing about the Weſt, met with ſuch Sax. an. a Tempeſt neer to Swanſwich or Gnavewic, as wrack'd 120 of thir Ships, and left the reſt eaſy to be maſter'd by thoſe Gallies which Alfred had ſet there to Aſſer. guard the Seas, and ſtreit'n Exeter of Proviſion. He the while beleagering them in the City, now humbl'd with the loſs of thir Navy, (two Navies, ſaith Aſſer, the one at Gnavewic, the other at Swanwine) diſtreſs'd them ſo, as that they gave him as many Hoſtages as he requir'd, and as many Oaths, to keep thir covnanted Peace, and kept it. For the Summer coming on, they departed into Mercia, wherof part they divided amongſt themſelves, part 878. left to Kelwulf thir ſubſtituted King. The Twelftide following, all Oaths Sax. an. forgott'n, they came to Chippenham in Wiltſhire, diſpeopling the Countries round, diſpoſſeſſing ſom, driving others beyond the Sea; Alfred himſelf with a ſmall Company was forc'd to keep within Woods and Fenny Places, and for ſom time all alone, as Florent ſaith, ſojourn'd with Dunwulf a Swine-herd, made afterwards for his Devotion and Aptneſs to Learning Biſhop of Win- Sim. Dun. cheſter. Hafden and the Brother of Hinguar coming with 23 Ships from North- Wales, where they had made great ſpoil, landed in Devonſhire, nigh to a ſtrong Caſtle nam'd Kinwith; where by the Gariſon iſſuing forth unexpectedly, Aſſer. they were ſlain with 12 hunderd of thir Men. Mean while the King about Eaſter, not deſpairing of his Affairs, built a Fortreſs at a place call'd Athelney in Somerſetſhire, therin valiantly defending himſelf and his Followers, frequently ſallying forth. The 7*th* Week after he rode out to a place call'd Ec- bryt-ſtone in the Eaſt part of Selwood: thether reſorted to him with much Gratulation the Somerſet and Wiltſhire Men, with many out of Hamſhire, ſom of whom a little before had fled thir Country; with theſe marching to Ethan- Camden. dune, now Edindon in Wiltſhire, he gave Battel to the whole Daniſh Power, and put them to flight. Then beſeiging thir Caſtle, within fourteen days took it. Malmsbury writes, that in this time of his Receſs, to go a Spy into the Daniſh Camp, he took upon him with one Servant the Habit of a Fidler; by this means gaining acceſs to the King's Table, and ſomtimes to his Bed-Chamber, got knowledg of thir Secrets, thir careleſs encamping, and therby this opportunity of aſſailing them on a ſudden. The Danes by this Misfortune brok'n, gave him more Hoſtages, and renu'd thir Oaths to depart out of his Kingdom. Thir King Gytro or Gotbrun offer'd willingly to receave Baptiſm, Camd. and accordingly came with 30 of his Friends to a place call'd Aldra or Aulre, neer to Athelney, and were baptiz'd at Wedmore; where Alfred receav'd him out of the Font, and nam'd him Athelſtan. After which they abode with him 879. 12 days, and were diſmiſs'd with rich Preſents. Wherupon the Danes re-
Sax. an. mov'd next year to Cirenceſter, thence peaceably to the Eaſt-Angles; which Alfred, as ſom write, had beſtow'd on Gotbrun to hold of him; the Bounds wherof may be read among the Laws of Alfred. Others of them went to Fulham on the Thames, and joining there with a great Fleet newly com into the River, thence paſs'd over into France and Flanders, both which they enter'd ſo far conquering or waſting, as witneſs'd ſufficiently, that the French and Flemiſh were no more able then the Engliſh, by Policy or Proweſs, to keep off that Daniſh Inundation from thir Land.

Alfred thus rid of them, and intending for the future to prevent thir landing;
three years after (quiet the mean while) with more Ships and better provided, 882.
puts to Sea, and at firſt met with four of theirs, wherof two he took, Sax. an.
throwing the men over-board, then with two others, wherin were two of thir Princes, and took them alſo, but not without ſom loſs of his own. After three years another Fleet of them appear'd on theſe Seas, ſo huge that one part 885.
thought themſelves ſufficient to enter upon Eaſt-France, the other came to Rocheſter, Sax. an.
and beleaguer'd it, they within ſtoutly defending themſelves till Alfred with great Forces, coming down upon the Danes, drove them to thir Ships, leaving for haſt all thir Horſes behind them. The ſame year Alfred ſent a Fleet toward the Eaſt-Angles, then inhabited by the Danes, which at the mouth Sim. Dun. of Stour, meeting with 16 Daniſh Ships, after ſom fight took them all, and ſlew all the Souldiers aboard; but in thir way home lying careleſs, were overtak'n by another part of that Fleet, and came off with loſs: wherupon perhaps thoſe Danes who were ſettl'd among the Eaſt-Angles, erected with new hopes, violated the Peace which they had ſworn to Alfred, who ſpent the next year in repairing London, (beſeiging, ſaith Huntingdon) much ruin'd and unpeopl'd 886.
by the Danes; the Londoners, all but thoſe who had bin led away Captive, Sax. an.
ſoon return'd to thir Dwellings, and Ethred Duke of Mercia, was by the Sim. Dun.
King appointed thir Governour. But after 13 years reſpit of Peace, another 893.
Daniſh Fleet of 250 Sail, from the Eaſt part of France arriv'd at the mouth of Sax. an.
a River in Eaſt Kent, call'd Limen, nigh to the great Wood Andred, famous for length and bredth; into that Wood they drew up thir Ships four mile from the Rivers mouth, and built a Fortreſs. After whom Haeſten with another Daniſh Fleet of 80 Ships, entring the mouth of Thames, built a Fort at Middleton, the former Army remaining at a place call'd Apeltre. Alfred perceiving this, took of thoſe Danes who dwelt in Northumberland, a new Oath of Fidelity, and of thoſe in Eſſex Hoſtages, leſt they ſhould join, as they were wont, with thir Countrymen newly arriv'd. And by the next year having 894.
got together his Forces, between either Army of the Danes encamp'd ſo as Sax. an.
to be ready for either of them, who firſt ſhould happ'n to ſtir forth; Troops of Horſe alſo he ſent continually abroad, aſſiſted by ſuch as could be ſpar'd from ſtrong places, wherever the Countries wanted them, to encounter foraging parties of the Enemy. The King alſo divided ſomtimes his whole Army, marching out with one part by turns, the other keeping intrencht. In concluſion rowling up and down, both ſides met at Farnham in Surrey; where the Danes by Alfreds Horſe Troops were put to flight, and croſſing the Thames to a certain Iland neer Coln in Eſſex, or as Camden thinks, by Colebrook, were beſeig'd there by Alfred till Proviſion fail'd the beſeigers, another part ſtaid behind with thir King wounded. Mean while Alfred preparing to reinforce the ſeige in Colney, the Danes of Northumberland breaking Faith, came by Sea to the Eaſt-Angles, and with a hundred Ships coaſting Southward, landed in Devonſhire, and beſeig'd Exeter; thether Alfred haſted with his Powers, except a Squadron of Welch that came to London: with whom the Citizens marching forth to Beamflet, where Haeſten the Dane had built a ſtrong Fort, and left a Gariſon, while he himſelf with the main of his Army was enter'd far into the Country, luckily ſurpriſe the Fort, maſter the Gariſon, make prey of all they find there; thir Ships alſo they burnt or brought away with good Booty, and many Priſners, among whom the Wife and two Sons of Heaſten were ſent to the King, who forthwith ſet them at liberty. Wherupon Heaſten gave Oath of Amity and Hoſtages to the King; he in requital, whether freely or by agreement, a ſum of Money. Nevertheleſs without regard of Faith giv'n, while Alfred was buſied about Exeter, joining with the other Daniſh
Army, he built another Caſtle in Eſſex at Shoberie, thence marching Weſtward by the Thames, aided with the Northumbrian and Eaſt-Angliſh Danes, they came at length to Severn, pillaging all in thir way. But, Ethred, Ethelm, and

Ethelnoth, the Kings Captains, with united Forces pitch'd nigh to them at Buttingtun, Camden. on the Severn Bank in Montgomery-ſhire, the River running between, and there many Weeks attended; the King mean while blocking up the Danes who beſeig'd Exeter, having eat'n part of thir Horſes, the reſt urg'd with Hunger broke forth to thir fellows, who lay encampt on the Eaſt-ſide of the River, and were all there diſcomfited with ſom loſs of valiant men on the Kings party; the reſt fled back to Eſſex and thir Fortreſs there. Then Laf, one of thir Leaders, gather'd before Winter a great Army of Northumbrian and Eaſt Angliſh Danes, who leaving thir Money, Ships, and Wives with the Eaſt-Angles, and marching day and night, ſat down before a City in the Weſt call'd Wirheal neer to Cheſter, and took it ere they could be overtak'n. The Engliſh after two daies Seige, hopeleſs to diſlodg them, waſted the Country round to cut off from them all Proviſion, and departed. Soon after which,
895. next year, the Danes no longer able to hold Wirheal, deſtitute of Vittles, Sax. an. enter'd North-Wales; thence lad'n with Spoils, part return'd into Northumberland, others to the Eaſt-Angles as far as Eſſex, where they ſeiz'd on a ſmall Iland call'd Mereſig. And heer again the Annals record them to beſeige Exeter, Sim. Dun. but without coherence of ſenſe or ſtory. Others relate to this purpoſe, Florent. that returning by Sea from the Seige of Exeter, and in thir way landing on the Coaſt of Suſſex, they of Chiceſter ſallied out and ſlew of them many hunderds, taking alſo ſome of thir Ships. The ſame year they who poſſeſs'd Mereſig, intending to winter therabout, drew up thir Ships, ſom into the Thames, others into the River Lee, and on the Bank therof built a Caſtle twenty miles from London; to aſſault which the Londoners aided with other 896. Forces march'd out the Summer following, but were ſoon put to flight, loſing Sax. an. four of the Kings Captains. Huntingdon writes quite the contrary, that theſe four were Daniſh Captains, and the overthrow theirs: but little Credit is to be plac'd in Huntingdon ſingle. For the King therupon with his Forces, lay encamp't neerer the City, that the Danes might not infeſt them in time of Harveſt; in the mean time, ſuttlely deviſing to turn Lee-ſtream ſeveral waies, wherby the Daniſh Bottoms were left on dry Ground: which they ſoon perceaving, march'd over Land to Quatbrig on the Severn, built a Fortreſs, and winter'd there; while thir Ships left in Lee, were either brok'n or brought away by the Londoners; but thir Wives and Children they had left in ſafety 897. with the Eaſt-Angles. The next year was Peſtilent, and beſides the common Sax. an. ſort took away many great Earls, Kelmond in Kent, Brithulf in Eſſex, Wulfred in Hamſhire, with many others; and to this evil the Danes of Northumberland and Eaſt-Angles ceas'd not to endamage the Weſt-Saxons, eſpecially by ſtealth, robbing on the South-ſhoar in certain long Gallies. But the King cauſing to be built others twice as long as uſually were built, and ſome of 60 or 70 Oars higher, ſwifter and ſteddier then ſuch as were in uſe before either with Danes or Friſons, his own Invention, ſom of theſe he ſent out againſt ſix Daniſh Pirats, who had don much harm in the Ile of Wight, and parts adjoining.
The bickering was doubtful and intricate, part on the Water, part on the Sands; not without loſs of ſom eminent men on the Engliſh ſide.
The Pirats at length were either ſlain or taken, two of them ſtranded; the men brought to Wincheſter, where the King then was, were executed by his command; one of them eſcap'd to the Eaſt-Angles, her men much wounded:
the ſame year not fewer then twenty of thir Ships periſh'd on the South Coaſt with all thir men. And Rollo the Dane or Norman landing heer, as *Matt.
Weſt.* writes, though not in what part of the Iland, after an unſucceſsful fight againſt thoſe Forces which firſt oppos'd him, ſail'd into France and conquer'd the Country, ſince that time called Normandy. This is the ſum of what paſs'd in three years againſt the Danes, returning out of France, ſet down ſo perplexly by the Saxon Annaliſt, ill-gifted with utterance, as with much ado can be underſtood ſomtimes what is ſpok'n, whether meant of the Danes, or of the Saxons. After which troubleſom time, Alfred enjoying three years of Peace, by him ſpent, as his manner was, not idely or voluptuouſly, but in all vertuous emploiments both of Mind and Body, becoming a Prince of his Renown, 900. ended his daies in the year 900, the 51*ſt* of his Age, the 30*th* of his Aſſer. Reign, and was buried regally at Wincheſter; he was born at a place call'd
Wanading in Barkſhire, his Mother Oſburga the Daughter of Oſlac the Kings

Cup-bearer, a Goth by Nation, and of noble Deſcent. He was of Perſon comlier then all his Brethren, of pleaſing Tongue and graceful Behaviour, ready Wit and Memory; yet through the fondneſs of his Parents towards him, had not bin taught to read till the twelfth year of his Age; but the great deſire of Learning which was in him, ſoon appear'd by his conning of Saxon Poems day and night, which with great attention he heard by others repeated. He was beſides excellent at Hunting, and the new Art then of Hawking, but more exemplary in Devotion, having collected into a Book certain Prayers and Pſalms, which he carried ever with him in his Boſom to uſe on all occaſions. He thirſted after all liberal Knowledg, and oft complain'd that in his Youth he had no Teachers, in his middle Age ſo little vacancy from Wars and the cares of his Kingdom; yet leaſure he found ſomtimes, not only to learn much himſelf, but to communicate therof what he could to his People, by tranſlating Books out of Latin into Engliſh, Oroſius, Boethius, Beda's Hiſtory and others; permitted none unlern'd to bear Office, either in Court or Common-wealth. At twenty years of Age not yet reigning, he took to Wife Egelſwitha the Daughter of Ethelred a Mercian Earl. The extremities which befel him in the ſixt of his Reign, Neothan Abbot told him, were juſtly com upon him for neglecting in his younger days the Complaints of ſuch as injur'd and oppreſs'd repair'd to him, as then ſecond Perſon in the Kingdom, for Redreſs; which neglect were it ſuch indeed, were yet excuſable in a Youth, through jollity of mind unwilling perhaps to be detain'd long with ſad and ſorrowful Narrations; but from the time of his undertaking Regal charge, no man more patient in hearing cauſes, more inquiſitive in examining, more exact in doing Juſtice, and providing good Laws, which are yet extant; more ſevere in puniſhing unjuſt Judges or obſtinate Offenders. Theeves eſpecially and Robbers, to the terror of whom in croſs waies were hung upon a high Poſt certain Chains of Gold, as it were daring any one to take them thence; ſo that Juſtice ſeem'd in his daies not to flouriſh only, but to triumph: no man then he more frugal of two pretious things in mans life, his Time and his Revenue; no man wiſer in the diſpoſal of both. His time, the day, and night, he diſtributed by the burning of certain Tapours into three equal Portions; the one was for Devotion, the other for public or private Affairs, the third for bodily refreſhment; how each hour paſt, he was put in mind by one who had that Office. His whole annual Revenue, which his firſt care was ſhould be juſtly his own, he divided into two equal parts; the firſt he imploi'd to ſecular uſes, and ſubdivided thoſe into three, the firſt to pay his Souldiers, Houſhold-Servants and Guard, of which divided into three Bands, one attended monthly by turn; the ſecond was to pay his Architects and Workmen, whom he had got together of ſeveral Nations; for he was alſo an elegant Builder, above the Cuſtom and conceit of Engliſhmen in thoſe days; the third he had in readineſs to releive or honour Strangers according to thir worth, who came from all parts to ſee him, and to live under him. The other equal part of his yearly Wealth he dedicated to religious uſes, thoſe of four ſorts; the firſt to releive the Poor, the ſecond to the building and maintenance of two Monaſteries, the third of a School, where he had perſwaded the Sons of many Noblemen to ſtudy ſacred Knowledg and liberal Arts, ſom ſay at Oxford; the fourth was for the relief of Foren Churches, as far as India to the ſhrine of St. Thomas, ſending thether Sigelm Biſhop of Sherburn, who both return'd ſafe, and brought with him many rich Gems and Spices; gifts alſo and a Letter he receav'd from the Patriarch of Jeruſalem; ſent many to Rome, and for them receav'd reliques. Thus far, and much more might be ſaid of his noble mind which render'd him the miror of Princes; his Body was diſeas'd in his Youth with a great ſoreneſs in the Seige, and that ceaſing of it ſelf, with another inward pain of unknown cauſe, which held him by frequent fits to his dying day; yet not diſinabl'd to ſuſtain thoſe many glorious Labours of his Life both in Peace and War.

Malmſ.

EDWARD the Elder.

Malmſ. EDward the Son of Alfred ſucceeded, in Learning not equal, in Power and extent of Dominion ſurpaſſing his Father. The beginning of his Reign Huntingd. had much diſturbance by Ethelwald an ambitious young Man, Son of the King's Uncle, or Couſin German, or Brother, for his Genealogy is variouſly deliver'd.
901. He vainly avouching to have equal right with Edward of Succeſſion Sax. an. to the Crown, poſſeſs'd himſelf of Winburn in Dorſet, and another Town diverſly nam'd, giving out that there he would live or die; but encompaſs'd with the King's Forces at Badbury a place nigh, his Heart failing him, he ſtole out by night, and fled to the Daniſh Army beyond Humber. The King ſent after him, but not overtaking, found his Wife in the Town, whom he had married out of a Nunnery, and commanded her to be ſent back thither.
902. About this time the Kentiſh Men, againſt a multitude of Daniſh Pirats, fought proſperouſly at a place call'd Holme, as Hoveden records. Ethelwald aided by
905. Northumbrians with Shipping, three Years after, ſailing to the Eaſt-Angles, Sax. an. perſwaded the Danes there to fall into the King's Territory, who marching with him as far as Crecklad, and paſſing the Thames there, waſted as far beyond as they durſt venture, and lad'n with Spoils return'd home. The King with his Powers making ſpeed after them, between the Dike and Ouſe, ſuppos'd to be Suffolk and Cambridgſhire, as far as the Fens Northward, laid waſt all before him. Thence intending to return, he commanded that all his Army ſhould follow him cloſe without delay; but the Kentiſh Men, though oft'n call'd upon, lagging behind, the Daniſh Army prevented them, and join'd Battel with the King: where Duke Sigulf and Earl Sigelm, with many other of the Nobles were ſlain; on the Danes part, Eoric thir King, and Ethelwald
the Author of this War, with others of high note, and of them greater number, but with great ruin on both ſides; yet the Danes kept in thir Power the burying of thir ſlain. Whatever follow'd upon this Conflict, which we read 907. not, the King two years after with the Danes, both of Eaſt-Angles and Sax. an. Northumberland, concluded Peace, which continu'd three Years, by whomſoever
910. brok'n: for at the end therof King Edward raiſing great Forces out Sax. an. of Weſt-Sex and Mercia, ſent them againſt the Danes beyond Humber; where ſtaying five weeks, they made great ſpoil and ſlaughter. The King offer'd 911. them terms of Peace, but they rejecting all, enter'd with the next year into
Sax. an. Mercia, rendring no leſs Hoſtility then they had ſuffer'd; but at Tetnal in Staffordſhire, ſaith Florent, were by the Engliſh in a ſet Battel overthrown.
King Edward then in Kent, had got together of Ships about a hundred Sail, others gon Southward came back and met him. The Danes now ſuppoſing that his main Forces were upon the Sea, took liberty to rove and plunder up Ethelwerd. and down, as hope of prey led them, beyond Severn. The King gueſſing what might imbold'n them, ſent before him the lighteſt of his Army to entertain them; then following with the reſt, ſet upon them in thir return over Cantbrig in Gloſterſhire, and ſlew many thouſands, among whom Ecwils, Hafden, and Hinguar thir Kings, and many other harſh Names in Huntingdon; the place alſo of this fight is variouſly writt'n by Ethelwerd and Florent, call'd 912. Wodensfeild. The year following Ethred Duke of Mercia, to whom Alfred Sax. an. had giv'n London, with his Daughter in Marriage; now dying, King Edward reſum'd that City, and Oxford, with the Countries adjoining, into his own 913. hands, and the year after, built, or much repair'd by his Souldiers, the Sax. an. Town of Hertford on either ſide Lee; and leaving a ſufficient number at the work, march'd about middle Summer, with the other part of his Forces into Eſſex, and encamp'd at Maldon, while his Souldiers built Witham; where a good part of the Country, ſubject formerly to the Danes, yeilded themſelves 917. to his Protection. Four years after ( Florent allows but one year ) the Sax. an. Danes from Leiſter and Northampton, falling into Oxfordſhire, committed much Rapine, and in ſom Towns therof great ſlaughter; while another party waſting Hertfordſhire, met with other Fortune; for the Country-People inur'd now to ſuch kind of Incurſions, joining ſtoutly together, fell upon the Spoilers, and recover'd thir own Goods, with ſom Booty from thir Enemies.
About the ſame time Elfled the King's Siſter ſent her Army of Mercians into Wales,

Wales, who routed the Welch, took the Caſtle of Bricnam-mere by Brecknock, Huntingd.
and brought away the King's Wife of that Country with other Pris'ners. Camden.
Not long after ſhe took Derby from the Danes, and the Caſtle by a ſharp Aſſault. But the year enſuing brought a new Fleet of Danes to Lidwic in Devonſhire, under two Leaders, Otter and Roald; who ſailing thence Weſtward 918. about the Land's end, came up to the mouth of Severn; there landing Sax. an.
waſted the Welch Coaſt, and Irchenfeild part of Herefordſhire; where they took Kuneleac a Britiſh Biſhop, for whoſe Ranſom King Edward gave forty Pound: but the Men of Hereford and Gloſterſhire aſſembling, put them to flight; ſlaying Roald and the Brother of Otter, with many more, perſu'd them to a Wood, and there beſet compell'd them to give Hoſtages of preſent departure.
The King with his Army ſat not far off, ſecuring from the South of Severn to Avon; ſo that op'nly they durſt not, by night they twice ventur'd to land; but found ſuch welcom, that few of them came back; the reſt anchor'd by a ſmall Iland where many of them famiſh'd; then ſailing to a place call'd Deomed, they croſs'd into Ireland. The King with his Army went to Buckingham, ſtaid there a month, and built two Caſtles or Forts on either Bank of Ouſe ere his departing; and Turkitel a Daniſh Leader, with thoſe of Bedford and Northampton, yeilded him ſubjection. Wherupon the next year 919.
he came with his Army to the Town of Bedford, took poſſeſſion therof, Sax. an.
ſtaid there a month, and gave order to build another part of the Town, on the South-ſide of Ouſe. Thence the year following went again to Maldon, repair'd and fortifi'd the Town. Turkitel the Dane having ſmall hope to 920. Sax. an.
thrive heer, where things with ſuch prudence were manag'd againſt his Intereſt, got leave of the King, with as many Voluntaries as would follow him, to paſs into France. Early the next year King Edward re-edifi'd Tovecheſter, now Torcheſter; and another City in the Annals call'd Wigingmere. Mean 921. Sax. an.
while the Danes of Leiſter and Northamptonſhire, not liking perhaps to be neighbour'd with ſtrong Towns, laid ſiege to Torcheſter; [but they within repelling the Aſſault one whole day till Supplies came] quitted the Siege by night; and perſu'd cloſe by the beſieg'd, between Birnwud and Ailsbury were ſurpriz'd, many of them made Pris'ners, and much of thir Baggage loſt. Other of the Danes at Huntingdon, aided from the Eaſt-Angles, finding that Caſtle not commodious, left it, and built another at Temsford, judging that place more opportune from whence to make thir Excurſions; and ſoon after went forth with deſign to aſſail Bedford: but the Gariſon iſſuing out, ſlew a great part of them, the reſt fled. After this a greater Army of them gather'd out of Mercia and the Eaſt-Angles, came and beſieg'd the City call'd Wigingmere a whole day; but finding it defended ſtoutly by them within, thence alſo departed, driving away much of thir Cattel: wherupon the Engliſh from Towns and Cities round about joining Forces, laid Siege to the Town and Caſtle of Temsford, and by aſſault took both; ſlew thir King with Toglea a Duke, and Mannan his Son an Earl, with all the reſt there found; who choſe to die rather then yeild. Encourag'd by this, the Men of Kent, Surrey, and part of Eſſex, enterpriſe the Siege of Colcheſter, nor gave over till they won it, ſacking the Town and putting to Sword all the Danes therin, except ſom who eſcap'd over the Wall. To the ſuccour of theſe, a great number of Danes inhabiting Ports and other Towns in the Eaſt-Angles, united thir Force; but coming too late, as in revenge beleagured Maldon; but that Town alſo timely reliev'd, they departed, not only fruſtrate of thir Deſign, but ſo hotly perſu'd, that many thouſands of them loſt thir Lives in the flight. Forthwith King Edward with his Weſt-Saxons went to Paſsham upon Ouſe, there to guard the Paſſage, while others were building a Stone Wall about Torcheſter; to him there Earl Thurfert, and other Lord
Danes, with thir Army therabout as far as Weolud, came and ſubmitted.
Wherat the King's Souldiers joyfully cry'd out to be diſmiſs't home: therfore with another part of them he enter'd Huntingdon, and repair'd it, where Breaches had bin made; all the People therabout returning to Obedience.
The like was don at Colncheſter by the next remove of his Army; after which both Eaſt and Weſt-Angles, and the Daniſh Forces among them, yeilded to the King, ſwearing Allegiance to him both by Sea and Land: the Army alſo of Danes at Grantbrig, ſurrendring themſelves, took the ſame Oath. The Summer

922. Sax. an. mer following he came with his Army to Stamford, built a Caſtle there on the South-ſide of the River, where all the People of thoſe quarters acknowledg'd him Supreme. During his Abode there, Elfled his Siſter, a martial Woman, who after her Husband's Death would no more marry, but gave her ſelf to public Affairs, repairing and fortifying many Towns, warring ſomtimes, dy'd at Tamworth the cheif Seat of Mercia, wherof by Gift of Alfred her Father, ſhe was Lady or Queen; wherby that whole Nation became obedient to King Edward, as did alſo North-Wales, with Howel, Cledaucus, and Jeothwell, thir Kings. Thence paſſing to Nottingham, he enter'd and repair'd the Town, plac'd there part Engliſh, part Danes, and receav'd Fealty from 923. Sax. an. all in Mercia of either Nation. The next Autumn, coming with his Army into Cheſhire, he built and fortify'd Thelwel; and while he ſtaid there, call'd another Army out of Mercia, which he ſent to repair and fortify Mancheſter. 924. Sax. an. About Midſummer following he march'd again to Nottingham, built a Town over againſt it on the South-ſide of that River, and with a Bridg join'd them both; thence journied to a place call'd Bedecanwillan in Pictland; there alſo built and fenc'd a City on the Borders, where the King of Scots did him honour as to his Sovran, together with the whole Scotiſh Nation; the like did Reginald and the Son of Eadulf, Daniſh Princes, with all the Northumbrians, both Engliſh and Danes. The King alſo of a People therabout call'd Streatgledwalli, (the North-Welch, as Camden thinks, of Strat-Cluid in Denbighſhire, perhaps rather the Britiſh of Cumberland) did him homage, and not unde- Buch. l. 6. ſerv'd. For Buchanan himſelf confeſſes, that this King Edward with a ſmall number of Men compar'd to his Enemies, overthrew in a great Battel the whole united Power both of Scots and Danes, ſlew moſt of the Scotiſh Nobility, and forc'd Malcolm, whom Conſtantine the Scotch King had made General, and deſign'd Heir of his Crown, to ſave himſelf by flight ſore wounded. Of the Engliſh he makes Athelſtan the Son of Edward chief Leader; and ſo far ſeems to confound Times and Actions, as to make this Battel the ſame with that fought by Athelſtan about 24 years after at Bruneford, againſt Anlaf and Conſtantine, wherof hereafter. But here Buchanan takes occaſion to inveigh againſt the Engliſh Writers, upbraiding them with Ignorance, who af- Buch. l. 6. firm Athelſtan to have bin ſupreme King of Britain, Conſtantine the Scotiſh King with others to have held of him: and denies that in the Annals of Marianus Scotus, any mention is to be found therof; which I ſhall not ſtand much to contradict, for in Marianus, whether by Surname or by Nation Scotus, will be found as little mention of any other Scotiſh Affairs, till the time of King Dunchad ſlain by Machetad, or Mackbeth, in the year 1040. which gives cauſe of ſuſpition, that the Affairs of Scotland before that time were ſo obſcure as to be unknown to thir own Countryman, who liv'd and wrote his Chronicle 925. Sax. an. Huntingd. Mat. Weſt. not long after. But King Edward thus nobly doing, and thus honour'd, the year following dy'd at Farendon; a Builder and Reſtorer ev'n in War, not a Deſtroyer of his Land. He had by ſeveral Wives many Children; his eldeſt Daughter Edgith he gave in Marriage to Charles King of France, Grandchild of Charles the Bald above-mention'd; of the reſt in place convenient. His Laws are yet to be ſeen. He was buried at Wincheſter, in the Monaſtery by Alfred his Father. And a few days after him dy'd Ethelwerd his eldeſt Son, the Heir of his Crown. He had the whole Iland in ſubjection, yet ſo as petty Sim. Dun. Kings reign'd under him. In Northumberland, after Ecbert whom the Danes had ſet up, and the Northumbrians yet unruly under thir Yoke, at the end of ſix years had expell'd, one Ricſig was ſet up King, and bore the name three years; then another Ecbert, and Guthred; the latter, if we beleeve Legends, of a Servant made King by command of St. Cudbert, in a Viſion; and enjoyn'd by another Viſion of the ſame Saint, to pay well for his Royalty many Lands and Privileges to his Church and Monaſtery. But now to the Storie.

ATHELSTAN.

A*Thelſtan*, next in Age to Ethelward his Brother, who deceas'd untimely few days before, though born of a Concubin, yet for the great appearance of many Vertues in him, and his Brethren being yet under Age, was exalted to the Throne at Kingſton upon Thames, and by his Father's laſt Will, 926.
ſaith Malmsbury, yet not without ſom oppoſition of one Alfred and his Accomplices; who not liking he ſhould reign, had conſpir'd to ſeiſe on him after his Father's Death, and to put out his Eyes. But the Conſpirators diſcoof thir Kings, took poſſeſſion of York; Sitric, who ſom years before had ſlain Sim. Dun.

the War. Simeon calls him Gudfrid a Britiſh King, whom Athelſtan this year drove out of his Kingdom; and perhaps they were both one, the name and time not much differing, the place only miſtak'n. Malmsbury differs in the name alſo, calling him Aldulf a certain Rebel. Them alſo I wiſh as much miſtak'n, who write that Athelſtan, jealous of his younger Brother Edwin's towardly Vertues, leaſt added to the right of Birth, they might ſom time or other call in queſtion his illegitimate Precedence, caus'd him to be drown'd in 933.

threw himſelf over-board; the Servant more patient, got to Land and reported the Succeſs. But this Malmsbury confeſſes to be ſung in old Songs, not read in warrantable Authors: and Huntingdon ſpeaks as of a ſad Accident to Athelſtan, that he loſt his Brother Edwin by Sea; far the more credible, in that Athelſtan, as is writt'n by all, tenderly lov'd and bred up the reſt of his Brethren, of whom he had no leſs cauſe to be jealous. And the year follow- 934.

cauſe of this Expedition, ſaith Malmsbury, was to demand Gudfert the Son of

Eugenius King of Cumberland, at a place call'd Dacor or Dacre in that Shire, the bloodieſt Fight, ſay Authors, that ever this Iland ſaw: to deſcribe which the Saxon Annaliſt wont to be ſober and ſuccinct, whether the ſame or another Writer, now labouring under the weight of his Argument, and over-charg'd, runs on a ſudden into ſuch extravagant Fanſies and Metaphors, as bare him quite beſide the Scope of being underſtood. Huntingdon, though himſelf peccant enough in this kind, tranſcribes him word for word as a Paſtime to his Readers. I ſhall only ſum up what of him I can attain, in uſual Language. The Battel was fought eagerly from Morning till Night; ſom fell of King Edward's old Army, try'd in many a Battel before; but on the other ſide great multitudes, the reſt fled to thir Ships. Five Kings, and ſeven of Anlaf's chief Captains, were ſlain on the place, with Froda a Norman Leader; Conſtantine eſcap'd home, but loſt his Son in the Fight, if I underſtand my Author; Anlaf by Sea to Dublin, with a ſmall Remainder of his great Hoaſt. Malmsbury relates this War, adding many Circumſtances after this manner: That Anlaf joining with Conſtantine and the whole Power of Scotland, beſides thoſe which he brought with him out of Ireland, came on far Southwards, till Athelſtan who had retir'd on ſet purpoſe to be the ſurer of his Enemies, encloſ'd from all Succour and Retreat, met him at Bruneford. Anlaf perceaving the Valour and Reſolution of Athelſtan, and miſtruſting his own Forces, though numerous, reſolv'd firſt to ſpy in what poſture his Enemies lay: and imitating perhaps what he heard attempted by King Alfred the Age before, in the habit of a Muſician, got acceſs by his Lute and Voice to the King's Tent, there playing both the Minſtrel and the Spy: then towards Evening diſmiſs'd, he was obſerv'd by one who had bin his Souldier, and well knew him, viewing earneſtly the King's Tent, and what Approaches lay about it, then in the Twilight to depart. The Souldier forthwith acquaints the King, and by him blam'd for letting go his Enemy, anſwer'd, that he had giv'n firſt his military Oath to Anlaf, whom if he had betray'd, the King might ſuſpect him of like treaſonous Mind towards himſelf; which to diſprove, he adviſ'd him to remove his Tent a good diſtance off; and ſo don, it happ'nd that a Biſhop with his Retinue coming that Night to the Army, pich'd his Tent in the ſame place from whence the King had remov'd. Anlaf coming by night as he had deſign'd, to aſſault the Camp, and eſpecially the King's Tent, finding there the Biſhop in ſtead, ſlew him with all his Followers. Athelſtan took the Alarm, and as it ſeems, was not found ſo unprovided, but that the day now appearing, he put his Men in order, and maintain'd the Fight till Evening; wherin Conſtantine himſelf was ſlain with five other Kings, and twelve Earls, the Annals were content with ſev'n, in the reſt not diſagreeing. Ingulf Abbot of Croyland, from the Autority of Turketul a principal Leader in this Battel, relates it more at large to this effect: That Athelſtan above a Mile diſtant from the place where Execution was don upon the Biſhop and his Supplies, alarm'd at the noiſe, came down by break of day upon Anlaf and his Army, overwatch'd and wearied now with the Slaughter they had made, and ſomthing out of order, yet in two main Battels. The King therfore in like manner dividing, led the one part conſiſting moſt of West Saxons, againſt Anlaf with his Danes and Iriſh, committing the other to his Chancellor Turketul, with the Mercians and Londoners, againſt Conſtantine and his Scots. The ſhowr of Arrows and Darts over-paſs'd, both Battels attack'd each other with a cloſe and terrible Ingagement, for a long ſpace neither ſide giving ground. Till the Chancellor Turketul, a Man of great Stature and Strength, taking with him a few Londoners of ſelect Valour, and Singin who led the Worſterſhire Men, a Captain of undaunted Courage, broke into the thickeſt, making his way firſt through the Picts and Orkeners, then through the Cumbrians and Scots, and came at length where Conſtantine himſelf fought, unhors'd him, and us'd all means to take him alive; but the Scots valiantly defending thir King, and laying load upon Turketul, which the Goodneſs of his Armour well endur'd, he had yet bin beat'n down, had not Singin his faithful Second at the ſame time ſlain Conſtantine; which once known, Anlaf and the whole Army betook them to flight, wherof a huge multitude fell by the Sword. This Turketul not long after leaving worldly Affairs, became Abbot of Croyland, which at his own coſt he had repair'd from Daniſh Ruins, and left there this Memorial of his former Actions. Athelſtan with his Brother Edmund victorious, thence turning into Wales, with much more eaſe vanquiſh'd Ludwal the King, and poſſeſt his Land. But Malmsbury writes, that commiſerating human chance, as he diſplac'd, ſo he reſtor'd both him and Conſtantine to thir Regal State; for the Surrender of King Conſtantine hath bin above ſpok'n of. However the Welch did him homage at the City of Hereford, and cov'nanted yearly payment of Gold 20 pound, of Silver 300, of Oxen 25 thouſand, beſides hunting Dogs and Hawks. He alſo took Exeter from the Corniſh Britans, who till that time had equal Right there with the Engliſh, and bounded them with the River Tamar, as the other Britiſh with Wey. Thus dreaded of his Enemies, and renown'd far and neer, three years after he dy'd at Gloſter, and was buried with many Trophies at Malmsbury, where he had caus'd to be laid his two Coſin Germans, Elwin and Ethelſtan, both both ſlain in the Battel againſt Anlaf. He was 30 years old at his coming to the Crown, mature in Wiſdom from his Childhood, comly of Perſon and Behaviour; ſo that Alfred his Grandfather in bleſſing him was wont to pray he might live to have the Kingdom, and put him yet a Child into Souldiers Habit. He had his breeding in the Court of Elfled his Aunt, of whoſe vertues more then female we have related, ſufficient to evince that his Mother, though ſaid to be no wedded Wife, was yet ſuch of parentage and worth, as the Royal Line diſdain'd not, though the Song went in Malmsburies days (for it ſeems he refus'd not the autority of Ballats for want of better) that his Mother was a Farmers Daughter, but of excellent Feature; who dreamt one night ſhe brought forth a Moon that ſhould enlight'n the whole Land: which the Kings Nurſe hearing of, took her home and bred up Courtly; that the King coming one day to viſit his Nurſe, ſaw there this Damſel, lik'd her, and by earneſt Suit prevailing, had by her this famous Athelſtan, a bounteous, juſt and affable King, as Malmsbury ſets him forth; nor leſs honour'd abroad by Foren Kings, who ſought his Friendſhip by great gifts or Affinity; that Harold King of Noricum ſent him a Ship whoſe Prow was of Gold, Sails Purple, and other Golden things, the more to be wonder'd at, ſent from Noricum, whether meant Norway or Bavaria, the one place ſo far from ſuch ſuperfluity of Wealth, the other from all Sea: the Embaſſadors were Helgrim and Offrid, who found the King at York. His Siſters he gave in marriage to greateſt Princes, Elgif to Otho Son of Henry the Emperour, Egdith to a certain Duke about the Alpes, Edgiv to Ludwic King of Aquitain, ſprung of Charles the Great, Ethilda to Hugo King of France, who ſent Aldulf Son of Baldwin Earl of Flanders to obtain her. From all theſe great Suitors, eſpecially from the Emperor and King of France, came rich Preſents, Horſes of excellent breed, gorgeous Trappings and Armour, Reliques, Jewels, Odors, Veſſels of Onyx, and other precious things, which I leave poetically deſcrib'd in Malmsbury, tak'n, as he confeſſes, out of an old Verſifier, ſom of whoſe Verſes he recites. The only blemiſh left upon him, was the expoſing of his Brother Edwin, who diſavow'd by Oath the Treaſon wherof he was accus'd, and implor'd an equal hearing. But theſe were Songs, as before hath bin ſaid, which add alſo, that Athelſtan, his anger over, ſoon repented of the Fact, and put to Death his Cup-bearer, who had induc't him to ſuſpect and expoſe his Brother, put in mind by a word falling from the Cup-bearers own mouth, who ſlipping one day as he bore the Kings Cup, and recovring himſelf on the other Leg, ſaid aloud fatally, as to him it prov'd, one Brother helps the other. Which words the King laying to heart, and pondering how ill he had done to make away his Brother, aveng'd himſelf firſt on the adviſer of that Fact, took on him ſeven years Penance, and as Mat. Weſt. ſaith, built two Monaſteries for the Soul of his Brother. His Laws are extant among the Laws of other Saxon Kings to this day.

EDMVND.

EDmund not above 18 years old ſucceeded his Brother Athelſtan, in Courage not inferiour. For in the ſecond of his Reign he freed Mercia of the Danes that remain'd there, and took from them the Cities of Lincoln, Nottingham, Stamford, Darby, and Leiſter, where they were plac'd by King Edward, but it ſeems gave not good proof of thir Fidelity. Simeon writes that Anlaf ſetting forth from York, and having waſted Southward as far as Northampton, was met by Edmund at Leiſter; but that ere the Battails join'd, Peace was made between them by Odo and Wulſtan the two Archbiſhops, with Converſion of Anlaf; for the ſame year Edmund receav'd at the Font-ſtone this or another Anlaf, as ſaith Huntingdon, not him ſpoken of before, who dy'd this year (ſo uncertain they are in the ſtory of theſe times alſo) and held Reginald another King of the Northumbers, while the Biſhop confirm'd him: thir Limits were divided North and South by Watlingſtreet. But ſpiritual Kindred little avail'd to keep Peace between them, whoever gave the cauſe; for we read him two years after driving Anlaf (whom the Annals now firſt call the Son of Sitric) and Suthfrid Son of Reginald out of Northumberland, taking the whole Country into ſubjection. Edmund the next year haras'd Cumberland, then

But the year after he himſelf by ſtrange accident came to an untimely Death, Feaſting with his Nobles on St. Auſtin's Day at Puclekerke in Gloſterſhire, to celebrat the memory of his firſt converting the Saxons. He ſpi'd Leof a noted Theef, whom he had baniſh'd, ſitting among his Gueſts; whereat tranſported with too much vehemence of ſpirit, though in a juſt cauſe, riſing from the Table he ran upon the Theef, and catching his Hair, pull'd him to the Ground. The Theef who doubted from ſuch handling no leſs then his Death intended, thought to die not unreveng'd; and with a ſhort Dagger ſtrook the King, who ſtill laid at him, and little expected ſuch Aſſaſſination, mortally into the Breſt. The matter was don in a moment, ere men ſet at Table could turn them, or imagin at firſt what the ſtir meant, till perceaving the King deadly wounded, they flew upon the Murderer and hew'd him to peeces; who like a wild Beaſt at abay, ſeeing himſelf ſurrounded, deſperatly laid about him, wounding ſom in his fall. The King was buried at Glaſton, wherof Dunſtan was then Abbot; his Laws yet remain to be ſeen among the Laws of other Saxon Kings.

EDRED.

EDred the third Brother of Athelſtan, the Sons of Edmund being yet but Children, next reign'd, not degenerating from his worthy Predeceſſors, and crown'd at Kingſton. Northumberland he throughly ſubdu'd, the Scots without refuſal ſwore him Allegiance; yet the Northumbrians, ever of doubtful Faith, ſoon after choſe to themſelves one Eric a Dane. Huntingdon ſtill haunts us with this Anlaf (of whom we gladly would have bin rid) and will 950. Sim. Dun. have him before Eric recal'd once more and reign four years, then again put to his ſhifts. But Edred entring into Northumberland, and with ſpoils returning, Eric the King fell upon his Rear. Edred turning about, both ſhook off the Enemy, and prepar'd to make a ſecond inroad: which the Northumbrians Hoved. dreading rejected Eric, ſlew Amancus the Son of Anlaf, and with many Preſents appeaſing Edred, ſubmitted again to his Government; nor from that time had Kings, but were govern'd by Earls, of whom Oſulf was the firſt. 953. Sim. Dun. About this time Wulſtan Archbiſhop of York, accus'd to have ſlain certain men of Thetford in revenge of thir Abbot whom the Townſmen had ſlain, was committed by the King to cloſe Cuſtody; but ſoon after enlarg'd, was reſtor'd to his place. Malmsbury writes, that his Crime was to have conniv'd at the re-955. Sim. Dun. volt of his Countrymen: but King Edred two years after ſickning in the flowr of his Youth, dy'd much lamented, and was buried at Wincheſter.

EDWI.

Ethelwerd. EDwi the Son of Edmund now com to Age, after his Uncle Edred's Death took on him the Government, and was crown'd at Kingſton. His lovely Perſon ſirnam'd him the Fair, his actions are diverſly reported, by Huntingdon not thought illaudable. But Malmsbury and ſuch as follow him write far Matt. Weſt. otherwiſe, that he married, or kept as Concubine, his neer Kinſwoman, ſom ſay both her and her Daughter; ſo inordinatly giv'n to his pleaſure, that on the very day of his Coronation, he abruptly withdrew himſelf from the Company of his Peers, whether in Banquet or Conſultation, to ſit wantoning in the Chamber with this Algiva, ſo was her name, who had ſuch Power over him. Wherat his Barons offended, ſent Biſhop Dunſtan, the boldeſt among them, to requeſt his return: he going to the Chamber, not only interrupted his dalliance, and rebuk'd the Lady, but taking him by the hand, between force 956. and perſuaſion brought him back to his Nobles. The King highly diſpleas'd, and inſtigated perhaps by her who was ſo prevalent with him, not long after ſent Dunſtan into Baniſhment, caus'd his Monaſtery to be rifl'd, and became an Enemy to all Monks and Fryers. Wherupon Odo Archbiſhop of Canterbury pronounc'd a ſeparation or Divorce of the King from Algiva. But that which moſt incited William of Malmsbury againſt him, he gave that Monaſtery to be dwelt in by ſecular Prieſts, or, to uſe his own phraſe, made it a ſtable of Clerks; at length theſe Affronts don to the Church were ſo reſented by the People, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted from him, and ſet up

Edgar his Brother, leaving to Edwi the Weſt-Saxons only, bounded by the Hoved.
River Thames; with Grief wherof, as is thought, he ſoon after ended his daies, 957.
and was buried at Wincheſter. Mean while Elfſin Biſhop of that place after the Saxon. an.
Death of Odo, aſcending by Simony to the Chair of Canterbury, and going to 958.
Rome the ſame year for his Pall, was froz'n to Death in the Alps. Mat. Weſt.

EDGAR.

EDgar by his Brothers Death, now King of all England at 16 years of Age, 959.
call'd home Dunſtan out of Flanders, where he liv'd in Exile. This King Malmſ.
had no War all his Reign; yet always well prepar'd for War, govern'd the Kingdom in great Peace, Honour, and Proſperity, gaining thence the Sirname of Peaceable, much extoll'd for Juſtice, Clemency, and all Kingly Vertues, the more ye may be ſure, by Monks, for his building ſo many Monaſteries; Mat. Weſt.
as ſom write, every year one: for he much favour'd the Monks againſt ſecular Prieſts, who in the time of Edwi had got poſſeſſion in moſt of thir Covents.
His care and wiſdom was great in guarding the Coaſt round with ſtout Ships to the number of 3600, Mat. Weſt. reck'ns them 4800, divided into four Squadrons, to ſail to and fro about the four quarters of the Land, meeting each other; the firſt of 1200 ſail from Eaſt to Weſt, the ſecond of as many from Weſt to Eaſt, the third and fourth between North and South; himſelf in the Summer time with his Fleet. Thus he kept out wiſely the force of Strangers, and prevented Foren War; but by thir too frequent reſort hither in time of Peace, and his too much favouring them, he let in thir Vices unaware.
Thence the People, ſaith Malmsbury, learnt of the outlandiſh Saxons rudeneſs, of the Flemiſh daintineſs and ſoftneſs; of the Danes Drunk'neſs;
though I doubt theſe Vices are as naturally homebred heer as in any of thoſe Countries. Yet in the Winter and Spring time he uſually rode the Circuit as a Judg Itinerant through all his Provinces, to ſee Juſtice well adminiſter'd, and the Poor not oppreſs'd. Theeves and Robbers he rooted almoſt out of the Land, and wild Beaſts of prey altogether; enjoining Ludwal King of Wales to pay the yearly Tribute of 300 Wolves, which he did for two years together, till the third year no more were to be found, nor ever after; but his Laws may be read yet extant. Whatever was the cauſe, he was not crown'd till the 30*th* of his Age, but then with great ſplendor and magnificence at the City of Bath, in the Feaſt of Pentecoſt. This year dy'd Swarling a Monk of 973.
Croyland, in the 142*d* year of his Age, and another ſoon after him in the 115*th* Sax. an.
in that fenny and watriſh Air, the more remarkable. King Edgar the next Ingulf.
year went to Cheſter, and ſummoning to his Court there all the Kings that held 974.
of him, took Homage of them: thir names are Kened King of Scots, Malcolm Sax. an.
of Cumberland, Maccuſe of the Iles, five of Wales, Dufwal, Huwal, Grifith, Jacob, Judethil; theſe he had in ſuch aw, that going one day into a Gally, he caus'd them to take each man his Oar, and row him down the River Dee, while he himſelf ſat at the Stern; which might be don in merriment, and eaſily obei'd; if with a ſerious brow, diſcover'd rather vain glory, and inſulting haughtineſs, then moderation of Mind. And that he did it ſeriouſly triumphing, appears by his words then utter'd, that his Succeſſors might then glory to be Kings of England, when they had ſuch honour don them. And perhaps the Divine Power was diſpleas'd with him for taking too much honour to himſelf;
ſince we read that the year following he was tak'n out of this Life by 975.
Sickneſs in the highth of his glory and the prime of his Age, buried at Glaſton
Abby. The ſame year, as Matt. Weſt. relates, he gave to Kened the Scotiſh King, many rich Preſents, and the whole Country of Laudian, or Lothien, to hold of him on condition that he and his Succeſſors ſhould repair to the Engliſh Court at high Feſtivals when the King ſat crown'd; gave him alſo many lodging Places by the way, which till the days of Henry the ſecond, were ſtill held by the Kings of Scotland. He was of Stature not tall, of Body ſlender, yet ſo well made, that in ſtrength he choſe to contend with ſuch as were thought ſtrongeſt, and diſlik'd nothing more then that they ſhould ſpare him for reſpect or fear to hurt him. Kened King of Scots then in the Court of Edgar, ſitting one day at Table, was heard to ſay jeſtingly among his Servants, he wonder'd how ſo many Provinces could be held in ſubjection by ſuch a little dapper man: his words were brought to the Kings Ear; he ſends for Kened as about ſom private buſineſs, and in talk drawing him forth to a ſecret place, takes from under his Garment two Swords which he had brought with him, gave one of them to Kened; and now ſaith he, it ſhall be try'd which ought to be the ſubject; for it is ſhameful for a King to boaſt at Table, and ſhrink in Fight. Kened much abaſh'd fell preſently at his Feet, and beſought him to pardon what he had ſimply ſpok'n, no way intended to his diſhonour or diſparagement; wherwith the King was ſatisfi'd. Camden in his deſcription of Ireland, cites a Charter of King Edgar, wherin it appears he had in ſubjection all the Kingdoms of the Iles as far as Norway, and had ſubdu'd the greateſt part of Ireland with the City of Dublin: but of this other Writers make no mention. In his youth having heard of Elfrida, Daughter to Ordgar Duke of Devonſhire, much commended for her Beauty, he ſent Earl Athelwold, whoſe Loyalty he truſted moſt, to ſee her; intending, if ſhe were found ſuch as anſwer'd report, to demand her in marriage. He at the firſt view tak'n with her preſence, diſloyally, as it oft happens in ſuch Emploiments, began to ſue for himſelf; and with conſent of her Parents obtain'd her. Returning therfore with ſcarſe an ordinary commendation of her Feature, he eaſily took off the Kings mind, ſoon diverted another way. But the matter coming to light how Athelwold had foreſtal'd the King, and Elfrida's Beauty more and more ſpok'n of, the King now heated not only with a relapſe of Love, but with a deep ſenſe of the abuſe, yet diſſembling his diſturbance, pleaſantly told the Earl, what day he meant to com and viſit him and his fair Wife. The Earl ſeemingly aſſur'd his welcom, but in the mean while acquainting his Wife, earneſtly adviſ'd her to deform her ſelf what ſhe might, either in dreſs or otherwiſe, leſt the King whoſe amorous inclination was not unknown, ſhould chance to be attracted. She who by this time was not ignorant, how Athelwold had ſtep'd between her and the King, againſt his coming arraies her ſelf richly, uſing whatever art ſhe could deviſe might render her the more amiable; and it took effect. For the King inflam'd with her Love the more for that he had bin ſo long defrauded and rob'd of her, reſolv'd not only to recover his intercepted right, but to puniſh the interloper of his deſtind Spouſe; and appointing with him as was uſual, a day of Hunting, drawn aſide in a Foreſt, now call'd Harewood, ſmote him through with a Dart. Som cenſure this act as cruel and tyrannical, but conſider'd well, it may be judg'd more favourably, and that no man of ſenſible Spirit but in his place, without extraordinary perfection, would have don the like: for next to Life what worſe Treaſon could have bin committed againſt him? It chanc'd that the Earls baſe Son coming by upon the Fact, the King ſternly ask'd him how he lik'd this Game; he ſubmiſly anſwering, that whatſoever pleas'd the King, muſt not diſpleaſe him; the King return'd to his wonted temper, took an affection to the Youth, and ever after highly favour'd him, making amends in the Son for what he had don to the Father. Elfrida forthwith he took to Wife, who to expiate her former Husbands Death, tho therin ſhe had no hand, cover'd the place of his Bloodſhed with a Monaſtery of Nuns to ſing over him. Another fault is laid to his charge, no way excuſable, that he took a Virgin Wilfrida by force out of the Nunnery, where ſhe was plac'd by her Friends to avoid his perſuit, and kept her as his Concubin; but liv'd not obſtinatly in the Offence; for ſharply reprov'd by Dunſtan, he ſubmitted to ſeven years Penance, and for that time to want his Coronation: but why he had it not before is left unwritt'n. Another Storie there goes of Edgar, fitter for a Novel then a Hiſtorie; but as I find it in Malmsbury, ſo I relate it. While he was yet unmarried, in his youth he abſtain'd not from Women, and coming on a day to Andover, caus'd a Dukes Daughter there dwelling, reported rare of Beauty, to be brought to him. The Mother not daring flatly to deny, yet abhorring that her Daughter ſhould be ſo deflour'd, at fit time of Night ſent in her Attire, one of her waiting Maids: a Maid it ſeems not unhanſom nor unwitty; who ſuppli'd the place of her young Lady. Night paſs't, the Maid going to riſe, but Daylight ſcarce yet appearing, was by the King askt why ſhe made ſuch haſt; ſhe anſwer'd, to do the work which her Lady had ſet her; at which the King wondring, and with much ado ſtaying her to unfold the Riddle, for he took her to be the Dukes Daughter, ſhe falling at his Feet beſought him, that ſince at the command of her Lady ſhe came to his Bed, and was enjoy'd by him, he would be pleas'd in recompence to ſet her free from the hard ſervice of her Miſtreſs. The King a while ſtanding in a ſtudy whether he had beſt be angry or not, at length turning all to a Jeſt, took the Maid away with him, advanc'd her above her Lady, lov'd her, and accompanied with her only, till he married Elfrida. Theſe only are his faults upon record, rather to be wonder'd how they were ſo few, and ſo ſoon left, he coming at 16 to the Licence of a Scepter; and that his Vertues were ſo many and ſo mature, he dying before the Age wherin wiſdom can in others attain to any ripeneſs: however with him dy'd all the Saxon glory. From henceforth nothing is to be heard of but thir decline and ruin under a double Conqueſt, and the Cauſes foregoing; which not to blur or taint the praiſes of thir former actions and liberty well defended, ſhall ſtand ſeverally related, and will be more then long enough for another Book.

THE HISTORY OF BRITAIN.

The Sixth Book.

EDWARD the Younger.

E*Dward* the eldeſt Son of Edgar by Egelfleda his firſt Wife, the Daughter of Duke Ordmer, was according to right and his Father's Will, plac'd in the Throne; Elfrida his ſecond Wife, and her Faction only repining, who labour'd to have had her Son Ethelred a Child of ſeven years, prefer'd before him; that ſhe under that pretence might have rul'd all. Mean while Comets were ſeen in Heav'n, portending not Famin only, which follow'd the next year, but the troubl'd State of the whole Realm not long after to enſue. The Troubles begun in Edwi's days, between Monks and Secular Prieſts, now reviv'd and drew on either ſide many of the Florent. Sim. Dun. Nobles into Parties. For Elfere Duke of the Mercians, with many other Peers, corrupted as is ſaid with Gifts, drove the Monks out of thoſe Monaſteries where Edgar had plac'd them, and in thir ſtead put Secular Prieſts with thir Wives. But Ethelwin Duke of Eaſt-Angles, with his Brother Elfwold, and Earl Britnoth oppos'd them, and gathering an Army defended the Abbies of Eaſt-Angles from ſuch Intruders. To appeaſe theſe Tumults, a Synod was call'd at Wincheſter, and nothing there concluded, a general Councel both of Nobles and Prelats was held at Caln in Wiltſhire, where while the diſpute was hot, but chiefly againſt Dunſtan, the room wherin they ſat fell upon thir heads, killing ſom, maiming others, Dunſtan only eſcaping upon a Beam that fell not, and the King abſent by reaſon of his tender Age. This Accident quieted the Controverſie, and brought both parts to hold with Dunſtan and the Monks. Mean while the King addicted to a Religious Life, and of a mild Spirit, ſimply permitted all things to the ambitious Will of his Stepmother and her Son Ethelred: to whom ſhe, diſpleas'd that the name only of King was wanting, practis'd thenceforth to remove King Edward out of the way; which in this manner ſhe brought about. Edward on a day wearied with hunting, thirſty and alone, while his Attendance follow'd the Dogs, hearing that Ethelred and his Mother lodg'd at Corveſgate (Corfe Caſtle, ſaith Camden, in the Ile of Purbeck) innocently went thether. She with all ſhew of kindneſs welcoming him, commanded Drink to be brought forth, for it ſeems he lighted not from his Horſe; and while he was drinking, caus'd one of her Servants, privately before inſtructed, to ſtab him with a Poinard. The poor Youth who little expected ſuch Unkindneſs there, turning ſpeedily the Reins, fled bleeding; till through loſs of Blood falling from his Horſe, and expiring, yet held with one foot in the Stirrop, he was dragg'd along the way, trac'd by his Blood, and buried without honour at Werham, having reign'd about three Years: but the place of his Burial not long after grew 978. famous for Miracles. After which by Duke Elfer (who, as Malmsbury ſaith, M. Inſ. had a hand in his Death) he was royally interr'd at Skepton or Shaftsbury.

The Murdreſs Elfrida at length repenting, ſpent the reſidue of her days in Sorrow and great Penance.

ETHELRED.

E*Thelred* ſecond Son of Edgar by Elfrida (for Edmund dy'd a Child) his 979.
Brother Edward wickedly remov'd, was now next in right to ſucceed, and Malmſ.
accordingly crown'd at Kingſton: reported by ſom, fair of Viſage, comly of Perſon, elegant of Behaviour; but the Event will ſhew that with many ſluggiſh Florent. and ignoble Vices he quickly ſham'd his out-ſide; born and prolong'd a Sim. Dun.
fatal miſchief of the People, and the ruin of his Country; wherof he gave early ſigns from his firſt Infancy, bewraying the Font and Water while the Biſhop was baptizing him. Wherat Dunſtan much troubl'd, for he ſtood by and ſaw it, to them next him broke into theſe words, By God and God's Mother this Boy will prove a Sluggard. Another thing is writt'n of him in his Childhood; which argu'd no bad nature, that hearing of his Brother Edward's cruel Death, he made loud lamentation; but his furious Mother offended therwith, and having no Rod at hand, beat him ſo with great Wax Candles, that he hated the ſight of them ever after. Dunſtan though unwilling ſet the Crown upon his head; but at the ſame time foretold op'nly, as is reported, the great Evils that were to com upon him and the Land, in Avengment of his Brother's innocent Blood. And about the ſame time, one Sim. Dun.
midnight, a Cloud ſomtimes bloody, ſomtimes firy, was ſeen over all England;
and within three Years the Daniſh Tempeſt, which had long ſurceaſt, 982.
revolv'd again upon this Iland. To the more ample relating wherof, the Malmſ.
Daniſh Hiſtory, at leaſt thir lateſt and diligenteſt Hiſtorian, as neither from the firſt landing of Danes, in the Reign of Weſt-Saxon Brithric, ſo now again from firſt to laſt, contributes nothing; buſied more then anough to make out the bare Names and Succeſſions of thir uncertain Kings, and thir ſmall Actions at home: unleſs out of him I ſhould tranſcribe what he takes, and I better may, from our own Annals; the ſurer, and the ſadder witneſſes of thir doings here, not glorious, as they vainly boaſt, but moſt inhumanly barbarous. For the Danes well underſtanding, that England had now a ſlothful King to thir Eadmer.
wiſh, firſt landing at Southampton from ſeven great Ships, took the Town, Florent.
ſpoil'd the Country, and carried away with them great Pillage; nor was Devonſhire and Cornwall uninfeſted on the ſhore; Pirats of Norway alſo harried Hoved.
the Coaſt of Weſt-cheſter: and to add a worſe Calamity, the City of London Sim. Dun.
was burnt, caſually or not, is not writt'n. It chanc'd four years after, that Hoved.
Ethelred beſeig'd Rocheſter, ſom way or other offended by the Biſhop therof. 986.
Dunſtan not approving the Cauſe, ſent to warn him that he provoke not Malmſ. Ingulf.
St. Andrew the Patron of that City, nor waſt his Lands; an old craft of the Clergy to ſecure thir Church Lands, by entailing them on ſom Saint; the King not hark'ning, Dunſtan on this condition that the Seige might be rais'd, ſent him a hundred Pound, the Mony was accepted and the Seige diſſolv'd.
Dunſtan reprehending his Avarice, ſent him again this word, becauſe thou haſt reſpected Mony more then Religion, the Evils which I foretold ſhall the ſooner com upon thee; but not in my days, for ſo God hath ſpok'n. The 987.
next year was calamitous, bringing ſtrange Fluxes upon Men, and Murren upon Malmſ.
Cattel. Dunſtan the year following dy'd, a ſtrenuous Biſhop, zealous without 988.
dread of Perſon, and for ought appears, the beſt of many Ages, if he Malmſ. buſied not himſelf too much in Secular Affairs. He was Chaplain at firſt to King Athelſtan, and Edmund who ſucceeded, much imploy'd in Court Affairs, till envi'd by ſom who laid many things to his charge, he was by Edmund forbidd'n the Court, but by the earneſt Mediation, ſaith Ingulf, of Turketul the Chancellor, receav'd at length to favour, and made Abbot of Glaſton; laſtly by Edgar and the general Vote, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury. Not long after his Death, the Danes arriving in Devonſhire were met by Goda Lieutenant of that Country, and Strenwold a valiant Leader, who put back the Danes, but with loſs of thir own Lives. The third year following, under 991.
the Conduct of Juſtin and Guthmund the Son of Steytan, they landed and Sim. Dun.
ſpoil'd Ipſwich, fought with Britnoth Duke of the Eaſt-Angles about Maldon, where they ſlew him; the ſlaughter elſe had bin equal on both ſides. Theſe and the like Depredations on every ſide the Engliſh not able to reſiſt, by Counſel of Siric then Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and two Dukes, Ethelward and Alfric, it was thought beſt for the preſent to buy that with Silver which they could not gain with thir Iron; and ten thouſand Pound was paid to the Danes for Peace. Which for a while contented; but taught them the ready 993. way how eaſieſt to com by more. The next year but one they took by Storm Sim. Dun. and rifl'd Bebbanburg an antient City nigh Durham: ſailing thence into the mouth of Humber, they waſted both ſides therof, Yorkſhire and Lindſey, burning and deſtroying all before them. Againſt theſe went out three Noblemen, Frana, Frithegiſt, and Godwin; but being all Danes by the Father's ſide, willingly began flight, and forſook thir own Forces betray'd to the Enemy.

Florent. No leſs Treachery was at Sea; for Alfric the Son of Elfer Duke of Mercia, Huntingd. whom the King for ſom Offence had baniſh'd, but now recal'd, ſent from London with a Fleet to ſurpriſe the Danes, in ſom place of diſadvantage, gave them over night intelligence therof, then fled to them himſelf; which his Fleet, ſaith Florent, perceaving, perſu'd, took the Ship, but miſs'd of his Perſon;
the Londoners by chance grapling with the Eaſt-Angles made them fewer, 994. ſaith my Author, by many thouſands. Others ſay, that by this notice of Sim. Dun. Alfric, the Danes not only eſcap'd, but with a greater Fleet ſet upon the Engliſh, took many of thir Ships, and in triumph brought them up the Thames, intending to beſiege London: for Anlaf King of Norway, and Swane of Denmark, at the head of theſe, came with 94 Gallies. The King for this Treaſon of Alfric, put out his Sons Eyes; but the Londoners both by Land and Water, ſo valiantly reſiſted thir Beſiegers, that they were forc'd in one day with great loſs to give over. But what they could not on the City, they wreck'd themſelves on the Countries round about, waſting with Sword and Fire all Eſſex, Kent, and Suſſex. Thence horſing thir Foot, diffus'd far wider thir outragious Incurſions, without mercy either to Sex or Age. The Malmſ. ſlothful King, inſtead of Warlike Oppoſition in the field, ſends Embaſſadors to treat about another Payment; the Sum promis'd was now ſixteen thouſand Pound; till which paid, the Danes winter'd at Southampton; Ethelred inviting Malmſ. Anlaf to com and viſit him at Andover: where he was royally entertain'd, ſom ſay baptiz'd, or confirm'd, adopted Son by the King, and diſmiſs't Huntingd. with great Preſents, promiſing by Oath to depart and moleſt the Kingdom no more; which he perform'd, but the Calamity ended not ſo, for after ſom intermiſſion of thir Rage for three years, the other Navy of Danes ſailing
997. about to the Weſt, enter'd Severn, and waſted one while South Wales, then Sim. Dun. Cornwall and Devonſhire, till at length they winter'd about Taviſtoc. For it were an endleſs work to relate how they wallow'd up and down to every particular place, and to repeat as oft what Devaſtations they wrought, what 998. Deſolations left behind them, eaſie to be imagin'd. In ſum, the next year Sim. Dun. they afflicted Dorſetſhire, Hamſhire, and the Ile of Wight; by the Engliſh many Reſolutions were tak'n, many Armies rais'd, but either betray'd by the falſhood, or diſcourag'd by the weakneſs of thir Leaders, they were put to rout, or disbanded themſelves. For Souldiers moſt commonly are as thir Commanders, without much odds of Valor in one Nation or other, 999. only as they are more or leſs wiſely diſciplin'd and conducted. The following
Sim. Dun. year brought them back upon Kent, where they enter'd Medway, and beſieg'd Rocheſter; but the Kentiſh Men aſſembling, gave them a ſharp Encounter, yet that ſuffic'd not to hinder them from doing as they had don in other places. Againſt theſe Depopulations, the King levied an Army; but the unskilful Leaders not knowing what to do with it when they had it, did but drive out time, burd'ning and impoveriſhing the People, conſuming the public Treaſure, and more emboldning the Enemy, then if they had ſat quiet 1000. at home. What cauſe mov'd the Danes next year to paſs into Normandy, is Sim. Dun. not recorded; but that they return'd thence more outragious then before.
Mean while the King, to make ſom diverſion, undertakes an Expedition both by Land and Sea into Cumberland, where the Danes were moſt planted; there and in the Ile of Man, or, as Camden ſaith, Angleſey, imitating his Enemies in ſpoiling and unpeopling. The Danes from Normandy, arriving in 1001. the River Ex, laid ſiege to Exeter; but the Citizens, as thoſe of London, Sim. Dun. valorouſly defending themſelves, they wreck'd thir Anger, as before, on the Villages round about. The Country People of Somerſet and Devonſhire aſſembling themſelves at Penho, ſhew'd thir readineſs, but wanted a Head; and beſides, being then but few in number, were eaſily put to flight; the Enemy plundring all at will, with loaded Spoils paſs'd into the Ile of Wight; from whence all Dorſetſhire, and Hamſhire, felt again thir Fury. The Saxon Annals write, that before thir coming to Exeter, the Hamſhire Men had a bickering with them, wherin Ethelward the King's General was ſlain, adding other things 1002.

hardly to be underſtood, and in one ancient Copy; ſo end. Ethelred, whom Sim. Dun.
no Adverſity could awake from his ſoft and ſluggiſh Life, ſtill coming by the worſe at fighting, by the advice of his Peers not unlike himſelf, ſends one of his gay Courtiers, though looking loftily, to ſtoop baſely and propoſe a third Tribute to the Danes: they willingly hark'n, but the ſum is enhaunc't now to 24 thouſand Pound, and paid; the Danes therupon abſtaining from Hoſtility. But the King to ſtrengthen his Houſe by ſome potent Affinity, marries Emma, whom the Saxons call Elgiva, Daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy. With him Ethelred formerly had War or no good Correſpondence, Malmſ. as appears by a Letter of Pope John the 15*th*, who made Peace between them about eleven years before; puft up now with his ſuppos'd acceſs Calviſ.
of ſtrength by this Affinity, he caus'd the Danes all over England, though Florent.
now living peaceably, in one day perfidiouſly to be maſſacred, both Men, Huntingd.
Women, and Children; ſending privat Letters to every Town and City, wherby they might be ready all at the ſame hour; which till the appointed time (being the 9*th* of July) was conceal'd with great ſilence, and perform'd Calviſius.
with much Unanimity; ſo generally hated were the Danes. Mat. Weſt.
writes, that this Execution upon the Danes was ten years after; that Huna one of Ethelred's Chief Captains, complaining of the Daniſh Inſolencies in time of Peace, thir Pride, thir raviſhing of Matrons and Virgins, incited the King to this Maſſacer, which in the madneſs of Rage made no difference of innocent or nocent. Among theſe, Gunhildis the Siſter of Swane was not ſpar'd, though much deſerving not Pity only, but all Protection:
ſhe with her Husband Earl Palingus, coming to live in England, and receaving Chriſtianity, had her Husband and young Son ſlain before her face, her ſelf then beheaded, foretelling and denouncing that her Blood would coſt England and if it were don by him afterwards, it ſeems to contradict the County, and of Hamſhire, came together in great numbers with reſolution ſtoutly to oppoſe him; but Alfric thir General, whoſe Son's Eyes the King had lately put out, madly thinking to revenge himſelf on the King, by ruining his own Country, when he ſhould have order'd his Battel, the Enemy being at hand, fain'd himſelf tak'n with a vomiting; wherby his Army in great diſcontent, deſtitute of a Commander, turn'd from the Enemy: who ſtreight morning left it flaming. Ulfketel hearing this, commanded ſom to go and break, or burn his Ships; but they not daring or neglecting, he in the mean while with what ſecreſie and ſpeed was poſſible, drawing together his Forces, went out againſt the Enemy, and gave them a fierce Onſet retreating to thir Ships; but much inferiour in number, many of the chief Eaſt-Angles there loſt thir Lives. Nor did the Danes com off without great ſlaughter of thir the Land. But the Summer following, another great Fleet of Danes enter'd 1006.

the Port of Sandwich, thence pour'd out over all Kent and Suſſex, made Prey of what they found. The King levying an Army out of Mercia, and the Weſt-Saxons, took on him for once the Manhood to go out and face them; but they who held it ſafer to live by Rapine, then to hazard a Battel, ſhifting lightly from place to place, fruſtrated the ſlow motions of a heavy Camp, following thir wonted courſe of Robbery, then running to thir Ships. Thus all Autumn they wearied out the King's Army, which gon home to winter, they carried all thir Pillage to the Ile of Wight, and there ſtaid till Chriſtmaſs; at which time the King being in Shropſhire, and but ill imploi'd (for by the procurement of Edric, he caus'd, Florent. as is thought, Alfhelm a noble Duke, treacherouſly to be ſlain, and the Eyes of his two Sons to be put out) they came forth again, over-running Hamſhire, and Barkſhire, as far as Reading and Wallingford: thence to Aſhdune, and other places therabout, neither known nor of tolerable pronuntiation; and returning by another way, found many of the People in Arms by the River Kenet; but making thir way through, they got ſafe with vaſt booty to thir Ships. 1007. The King and his Courtiers wearied out with thir laſt Summers jaunt Sim. Dun. after the nimble Danes to no purpoſe, which by proof they found too toilſom for thir ſoft Bones, more us'd to Beds and Couches, had recourſe to thir laſt and only remedy, thir Cofers; and ſend now the fourth time to buy a diſhonorable Peace, every time ſtill dearer, not to be had now under 36 thouſand Pound (for the Danes knew how to milk ſuch eaſy Kine) in name of Tribute and Expences: which out of the People over all England, already half beggerd, was extorted and paid. About the ſame time Ethelred advanc'd Edric, ſurnam'd Streon, from obſcure Condition to be Duke of Mercia, and marry Edgitha the Kings Daughter. The cauſe of his advancement, Florent of Worſter, and Mat. Weſt. attribute to his great Wealth, gott'n by fine Policies and a plauſible Tongue: he prov'd a main acceſſory to the ruin of England, as 1008. his actions will ſoon declare. Ethelred the next year ſomwhat rowſing him- Sim. Dun. ſelf, ordain'd that every 310 Hides (a Hide is ſo much Land as one Plow can ſufficiently till) ſhould ſet out a Ship or Gallie, and every nine Hides find a Corſlet and Head-peice: new Ships in every Port were built, vittl'd, fraught with ſtout Mariners and Souldiers, and appointed to meet all at Sandwich. A man might now think that all would go well; when ſuddenly a new miſchief ſprung up, diſſention among the great ones; which brought all this diligence to as little ſucceſs as at other times before. Bithric the Brother of Edric, falſly accus'd Wulnoth a great Officer ſet over the South-Saxons, who fearing the potencie of his Enemies, with 20 Ships got to Sea, and practis'd Piracy on the Coaſt. Againſt whom, reported to be in a place where he might be eaſily ſurpriz'd, Bithric ſets forth with 80 Ships; all which driv'n back by a Tempeſt and wrackt upon the ſhoar, were burnt ſoon after by Wulnoth. Diſheartn'd with this misfortune, the King returns to London, the reſt of his Navy after him; and all this great preparation to nothing. Wherup- 1009. on Turkill, a Daniſh Earl, came with a Navy to the Ile of Tanet, and in Au- Sim. Dun. guſt a far greater, led by Heming and Ilaf join'd with him. Thence coaſting to Sandwich, and landed, they went onward and began to aſſault Canterbury; but the Citizens and Eaſt Kentiſhmen, coming to compoſition with them for three thouſand Pound, they departed thence to the Ile of Wight, robbing and burning by the way. Againſt theſe the King levies an Army through all the Land, and in ſeveral Quarters places them nigh the Sea, but ſo unskilfully or unſucceſsfully, that the Danes were not therby hinder'd from exerciſing thir wonted Robberies. It happ'nd that the Danes one day were gon up into the Country far from thir Ships; the King having notice therof, thought to intercept them in thir return; his men were reſolute to overcom or die, time and place advantagious; but where Courage and Fortune was not wanting, there wanted Loyalty among them. Edric with ſuttle Arguments that had a ſhew of deep Policy, diſputed and perſwaded the ſimplicity of his fellow Counſellors, that it would be beſt conſulted at that time to let the Danes paſs without ambuſh or interception. The Danes where they expected danger, finding none, paſs'd on with great joy and booty to thir Ships. After this, ſailing about Kent, they lay that Winter in the Thames, forcing Kent and Eſſex to Contribution, oft-times attempting the City of London, but repuls't as oft to thir great loſs. Spring begun, leaving thir Ships, they paſs'd through Chiltern 1010.

at Stanes, join'd with them on the South into one Body, and enrich't with great Spoils, came back through Surrey to thir Ships; which all the Lent-time they repair'd. After Eaſter ſailing to the Eaſt-Angles they arriv'd at Ipſwich, and came to a place call'd Ringmere, where they heard that Vlfketell with his Forces lay, who with a ſharp encounter ſoon entertain'd them; but his men at length giving back, through the ſuttlety of a Daniſh Servant among them who began the flight, loſt the Field; though the men of Cambridgſhire ſtood to it valiantly. In this Battel Ethelſtan the Kings Son in Law, with many other Noblemen, were ſlain; wherby the Danes without more reſiſtance, three Months together had the ſpoiling of thoſe Countries and all the Fens, burnt Thetford and Grantbrig, or Cambridg; thence to a Hilly place not far off, call'd by Huntingdon Baleſham, by Camden Gogmagog Hills, and the Villages therabout they turn'd thir Fury, ſlaying all they met ſave one Man, who getting up into a Steeple, is ſaid to have defended himſelf againſt the whole Daniſh Army. They therfore ſo leaving him, thir Foot by Sea, thir Horſe by Land through Eſſex, return'd back laden to thir Ships left in the Thames. But many daies paſs'd not between, when ſallying again out of thir Ships as out of

Northamton, ranſacking the Country round; then as to freſh Paſture betook them to the Weſt-Saxons, and in like ſort harraſing all Wiltſhire, return'd, as I ſaid before, like wild Beaſts or rather Sea-Monſters to thir Water-ſtables, accompliſhing by Chriſtmaſs the Circuit of thir whole years good Deeds; an unjuſt and inhuman Nation, who receaving or not receaving Tribute where none was owing them, made ſuch deſtruction of Mankind, and rapine of thir Livelyhood, as is a miſery to read. Yet here they ceas'd not; for the next year repeating 1011.

from his Tenants, is permitted till the next Sunday to conſider; then hal'd then thruſt forth deliver him to be pelted with Stones; till one Thrum a converted Dane, pitying him half dead, to put him out of Pain, with a pious impiety, at one ſtroak of his Ax on the head diſpatch'd him. His Body was carried to London, and there buried, thence afterward remov'd to Canterbury.

By this time the Tribute paid, and Peace ſo oft'n violated ſworn again by the Danes, they diſpers'd thir Fleet; forty five of them, and Turkill thir Chief ſtaid at London with the King, ſwore him Allegeance to defend his Land againſt all Strangers, on condition only to be fed and cloth'd by him. But this voluntary friendſhip of Turkill was thought to be deceitful, that ſtaying under this pretence he gave intelligence to Swane, when moſt it would be ſeaſonable to com. In July therfore of the next year, King Swane arriving at 1013.

From whom he commanded Horſes and Proviſion for his Army, taking with him beſides Bands and Companies of thir choiceſt Men; and committing to his Son Canute the care of his Fleet and Hoſtages, he marches towards the South Mercians, commanding his Souldiers to exerciſe all Acts of Hoſtility; with the Terror wherof fully executed, he took in few days the City of Oxford, then Wincheſter; thence tending to London, in his haſty paſſage over the Thames, without ſeeking Bridg or Ford, loſt many of his Men. Nor was his Expedition againſt London proſperous; for aſſaying all means by force or wile to take the City, wherin the King then was, and Turkill with his Danes, he was ſtoutly beat'n off as at other times. Thence back to Wallingford and Bath, directing his Courſe, after uſual havoc made, he ſat a while and refreſh'd his Army. There Ethelm an Earl of Devonſhire, and other great Officers in the Weſt, yeilded him Subjection. Theſe things flowing to his Wiſh, he betook him to his Navy, from that time ſtil'd and accounted King of England, if a Tyrant, ſaith Simeon, may be call'd a King. The Londoners alſo ſent him Hoſtages, and made thir Peace, for they fear'd his Fury. Ethelred thus reduc'd to narrow Compaſs, ſent Emma his Queen, with his two Sons had by her, and all his Treaſure, to Richard the 2*d* her Brother, Duke of Normandy; himſelf with his Daniſh Fleet abode ſom while at Greenwich, then ſailing to the Ile of Wight, paſs'd after Chriſtmas into Normandy; where he was honourably receav'd at Roan by the Duke, though known to have born himſelf churliſhly and proudly towards

Sim. Dun. by an appearing Shape of St. Edmund arm'd, whoſe Church at Bury he had
Mat. Weſt. threat'nd to demoliſh; but the Authority herof relies only upon the Legend of St. Edmund. After his Death the Daniſh Army and Fleet made his Son Canute thir King; but the Nobility and States of England ſent Meſſengers to Ethelred, declaring that they prefer'd none before thir Native Sovran, if he would promiſe to govern them better then he had done, and with more Clemency. Wherat the King rejoicing, ſends over his Son Edward with Embaſſadors to court both high and low, and win thir Love, promiſing largly to be thir mild and devoted Lord, to conſent in all things to thir Will, follow thir Counſel, and whatever had been don or ſpok'n by any Man againſt him, freely to pardon, if they would loyally reſtore him to be thir King. To this the People cheerfully anſwer'd, and Amity was both promis'd and confirm'd on both ſides. An Embaſſy of Lords is ſent to bring back the King honourably; he returns in Lent, and is joyfully receav'd of the People, marches with a ſtrong Army againſt Canute; who having got Horſes and join'd with the Men of Lindſey, was preparing to make ſpoil in the Countries adjoining; but by Ethelred unexpectedly coming upon him, was ſoon driv'n to his Ships, and his Confederats of Lindſey left to the Anger of thir Country-men, executed without Mercy both by Fire and Sword. Canute in all haſt ſailing back to Sandwich, took the Hoſtages giv'n to his Father from all parts of England, and with ſlit Noſes, Ears cropt, and Hands chop'd off, ſetting them aſhore, departed into Denmark. Yet the People were not diſburd'nd, for the King rais'd out of them 30 thouſand Pound to pay his Fleet of Danes at Greenwich. To theſe Evils the Sea in October paſs'd his Bounds, overwhelming many

Sim. Dun. lowing an Aſſembly being at Oxford, Edric of Streon having invited two Noblemen, Sigeferth and Morcar, the Sons of Earngrun of Seav'nburg, to his Lodging, ſecretly murder'd them: the King, for what cauſe is unknown, ſeis'd thir Eſtates, and caus'd Algith the Wife of Sigeferth to be kept at Maidulfſburg, now Malmſbury; whom Edmund the Prince there married againſt his Father's Mind, then went and poſſeſs'd thir Lands, making the People there ſubject to him. Mat. Weſt. ſaith, that theſe two were of the Danes who had ſeated themſelves in Northumberland, ſlain by Edric under colour of Treaſon laid to thir charge. They who attended them without, tumulting at the Death of thir Maſters, were beat'n back; and driv'n into a Church, defending themſelves were burnt there in the Steeple. Mean while Canute returning from Denmark with a great Navy, 200 Ships richly gilded and adorn'd, well fraught with Arms and all Proviſion; and, which Encomium Emmæ mentions not, two other Kings, Lachman of Sweden, Olav of Norway, arriv'd at Sandwich; and, as the ſame Author then living writes, ſent out Spies to diſcover what Reſiſtance on Land was to be expected; who return'd with certain Report, that a great Army of Engliſh was in readineſs to oppoſe them. Turkill, who upon the arrival of theſe Daniſh Powers kept Faith no longer with the Engliſh, but joining now with Canute, as it were to reingratiate himſelf after his Revolt, whether real or complotted, councel'd him (being yet young) not to land, but leave to him the Management of this firſt Battel; the King aſſented, and he with the Forces which he had brought, and part of thoſe which arriv'd with Canute, landing to thir Wiſh, encounter'd the Engliſh, though double in number, at a place call'd Scoraſtan, and was at firſt beaten back with much Loſs. But at length animating his Men with Rage only and Deſpair, obtain'd a clear Victory, which won him great Reward and Poſſeſſions from Canute. But of this Action no other Writer makes mention. From Sandwich therfore ſailing about to the River Frome, and there landing, over all Dorſet, Somerſet and Wiltſhire, he ſpread waſtful Hoſtility. The King lay then ſick at Coſham in this County; though it may ſeem ſtrange how he could lie ſick there in the midſt of his Enemies. Howbeit Edmund in one part, and Edric of Streon in another, rais'd Forces by themſelves; but ſo ſoon as both Armies were united, the Traytor Edric being found to practice againſt the Life of Edmund, he remov'd with his Army from him; wherof the Enemy took great Advantage. Edric eaſily enticing the 40 Ships of Danes to ſide with him, revolted to Canute; the Weſt-Saxons alſo gave Pledges, and furniſh'd him with Horſes. By which means the Year enſuing, he with Edric the Traitor paſſing the Thames at Creclad, about Twelftide, enter'd into Mercia, and eſpecially Warwicſhire, depopulating all Places in thir way. Againſt theſe Prince Edmund, for his Hardineſs call'd Ironſide, gather'd an Army; but the Mercians refus'd to fight unleſs Ethelred with the Londoners came to aid them; and ſo every man return'd home. After the Feſtival Edmund gathering another Army, beſought his Father to com with the Londoners, and what Force beſides he was able; they came with great Strength gott'n together, but being com, and in a hopeful way of good Succeſs, it was told the King, that unleſs he took the better heed, ſom of his own Forces would fall off and betray him. The King daunted with this perhaps cunning Whiſper of the Enemy, diſbanding his Army, returns to London. Edmund betook him into Northumberland, as ſom thought to raiſe freſh Forces; but he with Earl Vthred on the one ſide, and Canute with Edric on the other, did little elſe but waſt the Provinces; Canute to conquer them, Edmund to puniſh them who ſtood neuter: for which cauſe Stafford, Shropſhire, and Leſterſhire, felt heavily his hand; while Canute, who was ruining the more Southern Shires, at length march'd into Northumberland; which Edmund hearing, diſmiſs'd his Forces and came to London. Vthred the Earl haſted back to Northumberland, and finding no other Remedy, ſubmitted himſelf with all the Northumbrians, giving Hoſtages to Canute. Nevertheleſs by his Command or Connivence, and the hand of one Turebrand a Daniſh Lord, Vthred was ſlain, and Iric another Dane made Earl in his ſtead. This Vthred Son of Walteof, as Simeon writes, in his Treatiſe of the Siege of Durham, in his Youth obtain'd a great Victory againſt Malcolm Son of Kened King of Scots, who with the whole Power of his Kingdom was fall'n into Northumberland, and laid ſeige to Durham. Walteof the old Earl unable to reſiſt, had ſecur'd himſelf in Bebbanburg, a ſtrong Town; but Vthred gathering an Army rais'd the Siege, ſlew moſt of the Scots, thir King narrowly eſcaping, and with the Heads of thir ſlain fix'd upon Poles beſet round the Walls of Durham. The Year of this Exploit Simeon cleers not, for in 969, and in the Reign of Ethelred, as he affirms, it could not be. Canute by another way returning Southward, joyful of his Succeſs, before Eaſter came back with all the Army to his Fleet. AFter the Deceaſe of Ethelred, they of the Nobility who were then at London, together with the Citizens, choſe Edmund his Son (not by Emma, but a former Wife the Daughter of Earl Thored) in his Father's room; but the Archbiſhops, Abbots, and many of the Nobles aſſembling together, elected Canute; and coming to Southampton where he then remain'd, renounc'd before him all the Race of Ethelred, and ſwore him Fidelity: he alſo ſwore to them, in Matters both religious and ſecular, to be thir faithful Lord. But Edmund with all ſpeed going to the Weſt-Saxons, was joyfully receav'd of them as thir King, and of many other Provinces by thir Example. Mean while Canute about mid May came with his whole Fleet up the River to London; then cauſing a great Dike to be made on Surrey-ſide, turn'd the Stream, and drew his Ships thether Weſt of the Bridg; then begirting the City with a broad and deep Trench, aſſail'd it on every ſide; but repulſt as before by the valorous Defendants, and in deſpair of Succeſs at that time, leaving part of his Army for the Defence of his Ships, with the reſt ſped him to the Weſt-Saxons, ere Edmund could have time to aſſemble all his Powers: who yet with ſuch as were at hand invoking Divine Aid, encounter'd the Danes at Pen by Gillingham in Dorſetſhire, and put him to flight. After Midſummer, encreaſt with new Forces, he met with him again at a Place call'd Sheraſtan, now Sharſtan; but Edric, Almar, and Algar, with the Hamſhire and Wiltſhire Men, then ſiding with the Danes, he only maintain'd the Fight, obſtinately fought on both ſides, till Night and Weærineſs parted them. Day-light returning renu'd the Conflict, wherin the Danes appearing inferiour, Edric to diſhart'n the Engliſh cuts off the Head of one Oſmer, in Countnance and Hair ſomwhat reſembling the King, and holding it up, cries aloud to the Engliſh, that Edmund being ſlain, and this his Head, it was time for them to fly; which Fallacy Edmund perceaving, and op'nly ſhewing himſelf to his Souldiers, by a Spear thrown at Edric, that miſſing him yet ſlew one next him, and through him another behind, they recover'd heart, and lay ſore upon the Danes till Night parted them as before: for ere the third Morn, Canute ſenſible of his Loſs, march'd away by ſtealth to his Ships at London, renuing there his Leagre. Som would have this Battel at Sheraſtan the ſame with that at Scoraſtan before mention'd, but the circumſtance of time permits not that, having bin before the landing of Canute, this a good while after, as by the proceſs of things appears. From Sheraſtan or Sharſtan Edmund return'd to the Weſt-Saxons, whoſe Valour Edric fearing, leſt it might prevail againſt the Danes, ſought Pardon of his Revolt, and obtaining it, ſwore Loyalty to the King, who now the third time coming with an Army from the Weſt-Saxons to London, rais'd the Siege, chaſing Canute and his Danes to thir Ships. Then after two days paſſing the Thames at Branford, and ſo coming on thir backs, kept them ſo turn'd, and obtain'd the Victory: then returns again to his Weſt Saxons, and Canute to his Seige, but ſtill in vain; riſing therfore thence, he enter'd with his Ships a River then call'd Arenne; and from the Banks therof waſted Mercia; thence thir Horſe by Land, thir Foot by Ship came to Medway. Edmund in the mean while with multiply'd Forces out of many Shires croſſing again at Branford, came into Kent, ſeeking Canute; encounter'd him at Otford, and ſo defeated, that of his Horſe, they who eſcap'd fled to the Ile of Sheppey; and a full Victory he had gain'd, had not Edric ſtill the Traytor by ſome Wile or other detain'd his perſuit: and Edmund who never wanted Courage, heer wanted Prudence to be ſo miſled, ever after forſak'n of his wonted Fortune. Canute croſſing with his Army into Eſſex, thence waſted Mercia worſe then before, and with heavy Prey return'd to his Ships: them Edmund with a collected Army perſuing, overtook at a place call'd Aſſandune or Aſſeshill, now Aſhdown in Eſſex; the Battel on either ſide was fought with great Vehemence; but perfidious Edric perceaving the Victory to incline towards Edmund, with that part of the Army which was under him, fled, as he had promis'd Canute, and left the King over-match'd with Numbers: By which Deſertion the Engliſh were overthrown, Duke Alfric, Duke Godwin, and Ulſketel the valiant Duke of Eaſt-Angles, with a great part of the Nobility ſlain, ſo as the Engliſh of a long time had not receav'd a greater blow. Yet after a while Edmund, not abſurdly call'd Ironſide, preparing to try again his Fortune in another field, was hinder'd by Edric and others of his Faction, adviſing him to make Peace and divide the Kingdom with Canute. To which Edmund over- Camd. rul'd, a Treaty appointed, and Pledges mutually giv'n, both Kings met together at a place call'd Deorhirſt in Gloſterſhire; Edmund on the Weſt-ſide of Severn, Canute on the Eaſt with thir Armies, then both in Perſon wafted into an Iland, at that time call'd Olanege, now Alney in the midſt of the River; Camd. ſwearing Amity and Brotherhood, they parted the Kingdom between them. Then interchanging Arms and the Habit they wore, aſſeſſing alſo what Pay ſhould be allotted to the Navy, they departed each his way. Concerning this interview and the cauſe therof, others write otherwiſe; Malmsbury, that Edmund grieving at the loſs of ſo much Blood ſpilt for the Ambition only of two Men ſtriving who ſhould reign, of his own accord ſent to Canute, offering him ſingle Combat, to prevent in thir own cauſe the effuſion of more Blood then thir own; that Canute, though of Courage anough, yet not unwiſely doubting to adventure his Body of ſmall Timber, againſt a Man of Iron ſides, refus'd the Combat, offering to divide the Kingdom. This Offer pleaſing both Armies, Edmund was not difficult to conſent; and the deciſion was, that he as his Hereditary Kingdom ſhould rule the Weſt-Saxons, and all the South, Canute the Mercians, and the North. Huntingdon follow'd by Mat. Weſt. relates, that the Peers on every ſide wearied out with continual Warfare, and not refraining to affirm op'nly, that they two who expected to reign ſingly, had moſt reaſon to fight ſingly, the Kings were content; the Iland was thir Liſts, the Combat Knightly; till Knute finding himſelf too weak, began to parle, which ended as is ſaid before. After which the Londoners bought thir Peace of the Danes, and permitted them to winter in the City. But King Edmund about the Feaſt of St. Andrew, unexpectedly deceas'd at London, and was buried neer to Edgar his Grandfather at Glaſton. The cauſe of his ſo ſudden death is uncertain; common Fame, ſaith Malmsbury, lays the Gilt therof upon Edric, who to pleaſe Canute, allur'd with promiſe of Reward two of the King's Privy Chamber, though at firſt abhorring the Fact, to aſſaſſinate him at the Stool, by thruſting a ſharp Iron into his hinder parts. Huntingdon, and Mat. Weſt. relate it don at Oxford by the Son of Edric, and ſomthing vary in the manner, not worth recital. Edmund dead, Canute meaning to reign ſole King of England, calls to him all the Dukes, Barons, and Biſhops of the Land, cunningly demanding of them who were Witneſſes what agreement was made between him and Edmund dividing the Kingdom, whether the Sons and Brothers of Edmund were to govern the Weſt-Saxons after him, Canute living? They who underſtood his meaning, and fear'd to undergo his Anger, timorouſly anſwer'd, that Edmund they knew had left no part therof to his Sons or Brethren, living or dying; but that he intended Canute ſhould be thir Guardian, till they came to age of reigning. Simeon affirms, that for fear or hope of Reward they atteſted what was not true: notwithſtanding which he put many of them to death not long after.

Canute having thus ſounded the Nobility, and by them underſtood, receav'd thir Oath of Fealty, they the pledg of his bare hand, and Oath from the Daniſh Nobles; wherupon the Houſe of Edmund was renounc't, and Canute crown'd. Then they enacted, that Edwi Brother of Edmund, a Prince of great hope, ſhould be baniſh'd the Realm. But Canute not thinking himſelf ſecure while Edwi liv'd, conſulted with Edric how to make him away; who told him of one Ethelward a decay'd Nobleman, likelieſt to do the work. Ethelward ſent for, and tempted by the King in privat with largeſt Rewards, but abhorring in his mind the deed, promis'd to do it when he ſaw his opportunity; and ſo ſtill defer'd it. But Edwi afterwards receav'd into favour as a ſnare, was by him or ſom other of his falſe Friends, Canute contriving it, the

This King, as appears, ended better than he began; for though he ſeems to have had no hand in the Death of Ironſide, but deteſted the Fact, and bringing the Murderers, who came to him in hope of great Reward, forth among his Courtiers, as it were to receave thanks, after they had op'nly related the manner of thir killing him, deliver'd them to deſerved Puniſhment, yet he ſpar'd Edric whom he knew to be the prime Author of that deteſtable Fact; till willing to be rid of him, grown importune upon the confidence of his Merits, and upbraided by him that he had firſt relinquiſh'd, then extinguiſh'd Edmund for his ſake; angry to be ſo upbraided, therfore ſaid he with a chang'd Countenance, Traitor to God and to me, thou ſhalt die; thine own mouth accuſes thee to have ſlain thy Maſter my Confederate Brother, and the Lord's Anointed. Wherupon although preſent and privat Execution Malmſ.
was in rage don upon Edric, yet he himſelf in cool Blood ſcrupl'd not to make away the Brother and Children of Edmund, who had better right to be the Lord's Anointed here then himſelf. When he had obtain'd in England what he deſir'd, no wonder if he ſought the love of his conquer'd Subjects for the love of his own Quiet, the maintainers of his Wealth and State for his own profit. For the like reaſon he is thought to have married Emma, and that Richard Duke of Normandy her Brother might the leſs care what became of Elfred and Edward, her Sons by King Ethelred. He commanded to be obſerv'd the antient Saxon Laws, call'd afterwards the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, not that he made them, but ſtrictly obſerv'd them. His Letter from Rome profeſſes, if he had don aught amiſs in his youth, through negligence or want of due temper, full reſolution with the help of God to make amends, by governing juſtly and piouſly for the future; charges and adjures all his Officers and Vicounts, that neither for fear of him, or favour of any Perſon, or to enrich the King, they ſuffer Injuſtice to be don in the Land; commands his Treaſurers to pay all his Debts ere his return home, which was by Denmark, to compoſe Matters there; and what his Letter profeſs'd, he perform'd all his Life after. But it is a fond conceit in many great ones, and pernicious in the end, to ceaſe from no Violence till they have attain'd the utmoſt of thir Ambitions and Deſires; then to think God appeas'd by thir ſeeking to bribe him with a ſhare however large of thir ill-gott'n Spoils, and then laſtly to grow zealous of doing right, when they have no longer need to do wrong. Howbeit Canute was famous through Europe, and much honour'd of Conrade the Emperour, then at Rome, with rich Gifts and many Grants of what he there demanded for the freeing of Paſſages from Toll and Cuſtom. I muſt not omit one remarkable Action don by him, as Huntingdon reports it, with great ſcene of Circumſtance, and emphatical Expreſſion, to ſhew the ſmall Power of Kings in reſpect of God; which, unleſs to Court-Paraſites, needed no ſuch laborious Demonſtration. He caus'd his Royal Seat to be ſet on the ſhoar, while the Tide was coming in; and with all the ſtate that Royalty could put into his Countenance, ſaid thus to the Sea: Thou Sea belongſt to me, and the Land wheron I ſit is mine; nor hath any one unpuniſh't reſiſted my Commands: I charge thee come no furder upon my Land, neither preſume to wet the Feet of thy Sovran Lord. But the Sea, as before, came rowling on, and without Reverence both wet and daſh'd him. Wherat the King quickly riſing, wiſh'd all about him to behold and conſider the weak and frivolous Power of a King, and that none indeed deſerv'd the Name of a King, but he whoſe eternal Laws both Heav'n, Earth, and Sea obey. A Truth ſo evident of it ſelf, as I ſaid before, that unleſs to ſhame his Court-Flatterers who would not elſe be convinc't, Canute needed not to have gon wet-ſhod home: The beſt is, from that time forth he never would wear a Crown, eſteeming Earthly Royalty contemptible and vain.

Harold for his ſwiftneſs ſurnam'd Harefoot, the Son of Canute by Algiva of Northamton (though ſom ſpeak doubtfully as if ſhe bore him not, but had him of a Shoo-makers Wife, as Swane before of a Prieſt; others of a Maid-Servant, to conceal her barrenneſs) in a great Aſſembly at Oxford, was by Duke Leofric and the Mercians, with the Londoners, according to his Fathers Teſtament, elected King; but without the Regal Habiliments, which Ælnot the Archbiſhop having in his Cuſtody, refus'd to deliver up, but to the Sons of Emma, for which Harold ever after hated the Clergy; and (as the Clergy are wont thence to infer) all Religion. Godwin Earl of Kent, and the Weſt-Saxons with him ſtood for Hardecnute. Malmsbury ſaith, that the conteſt was between Dane and Engliſh; that the Danes, and Londoners grown now in a manner Daniſh, were all for Hardecnute: but he being then in Denmark, Harold prevail'd, yet ſo as that the Kingdom ſhould be divided between them; the Weſt and South part reſerv'd by Emma for Hardecnute, till his return. But Harold once advanc't into the Throne, baniſh'd Emma his Mother-in-law, ſeis'd on his Fathers Treaſure at Wincheſter, and there remain'd. Emma not holding it ſafe to abide in Normandy while Duke William the Baſtard was yet under Age, retir'd to Baldwin Earl of Flanders. In the mean while Elfred and Edward Sons of Ethelred, accompanied with a ſmall number of Norman Souldiers in a few Ships, coming to viſit thir Mother Emma not yet departed the Land, and perhaps to ſee how the People were inclin'd to reſtore them thir right, Elfred was ſent for by the King then at London; but in his way met at Guilford by Earl Godwin, who with all ſeeming friendſhip entertain'd him, was in the Night ſurpris'd and made Priſner, moſt of his Company put to various ſorts of cruel Death, decimated twice over; then brought to London, was by the King ſent bound to Ely, had his Eyes put out by the way, and deliver'd to the Monks there, dy'd ſoon after in thir Cuſtody. Malmsbury gives little credit to this ſtory of Elfred, as not chronicl'd in his time, but rumour'd only. Which Emma however hearing, ſent away her Son Edward, who by good hap accompanied not his Brother, with all ſpeed into Normandy. But the Author of Encomium Emmæ, who ſeems plainly (though nameleſs) to have been ſom Monk, yet liv'd, and perhaps wrote within the ſame Year when theſe things were don; by his relation differing from all others, much aggravates the cruelty of Harold, that he not content to have practis'd in ſecret (for openly he durſt not) againſt the life of Emma, ſought many treacherous ways to get her Son within his Power; and reſolv'd at length to forge a Letter in the name of thir Mother, inviting them into England, the Copy of which Letter he produces written to this purpoſe.

Emma in name only Queen, to her Sons Edward and Elfred imparts motherly Salutation. While we ſeverally bewail the Death of our Lord the King, moſt dear Sons, and while daily ye are depriv'd more and more of the Kingdom your Inheritance; I admire what Counſel ye take, knowing that your intermitted delay is a daily ſtrengthning to the Reign of your Vſurper, who inceſſantly goes about from Town to City, gaining the Chief Nobles to his party, either by gifts, prayers, or threats. But they had much rather one of you ſhould reign over them, then to be held under the power of him who now over-rules them. I entreat therfore that one of you com to me ſpeedily, and privatly; to receive from me wholſom Counſel, and to know how the buſineſs which I intend ſhall be accompliſht. By this Meſſenger preſent, ſend back what you determin. Farewel, as dear both as my own Heart.

Theſe Letters were ſent to the Princes then in Normandy, by expreſs Meſſengers, with preſents alſo as from thir Mother; which they joyfully receiving, return word by the ſame Meſſengers, that one of them will be with her ſhortly; naming both the time and place. Elfred therfore the younger (for ſo it was thought beſt) at the appointed time, with a few Ships and ſmall numbers about him appearing on the Coaſt, no ſooner came aſhore but fell into the ſnare of Earl Godwin, ſent on purpoſe to betray him; as above was related. Emma greatly ſorrowing for the loſs of her Son, thus cruelly made away, fled immediatly with ſom of the Nobles her faithfulleſt Adherents into Flanders, had her dwelling aſſign'd at Bruges by the Earl; where having remain'd about two years, ſhe was viſited out of Denmark by Hardecnute her 1039. Son; and he not long had remain'd with her there, when Harold in England, Sim. Dun. having don nothing the while worth memory, ſave the taxing of every Port Huntingdon. at 8 Marks of Silver to 16 Ships, dy'd at London, ſom ſay at Oxford, and was 1040. buried at Wincheſter. Sim. Dun. After which, moſt of the Nobility, both Danes and Engliſh now agreeing, Malmſ. ſend Embaſſadors to Hardecnute ſtill at Bruges with his Mother, entreating him to com and receave as his right the Scepter, who before Midſomer came with 60 Ships, and many Souldiers out of Denmark.

HARDECNVTE.

Hardecnute receav'd with acclamation, and ſeated in the Throne, firſt call'd to mind the injuries don to him or his Mother Emma in the time of Harold; ſent Alfric Arch-biſhop of York, Godwin and others, with Troud his Executioner to London, commanding them to dig up the Body of King Harold, and throw it into a Ditch; but by a ſecond order, into the Thames. Whence tak'n up by a Fiſherman, and convei'd to a Church-yard in London belonging to the Danes, it was enterr'd again with honour. This don he levied a ſore Tax, that eight Marks to every Rower, and twelve to every Officer in his Fleet ſhould be paid throughout England: by which time they who were ſo forward to call him over, had anough of him; for he, as they thought, had too much of theirs. After this he call'd to account Godwin Earl of Kent, and Leving Biſhop of Worſter, about the Death of Elfred his half Brother, which Alfric the Archbiſhop laid to thir charge; the King depriv'd Leving of his Biſhoprick, and gave it to his accuſer: but the year following, pacifi'd with a round ſum reſtor'd it to Leving. Godwin made his Peace by a Malmſ. ſumptuous preſent, a Gally with a gilded Stem bravely rigg'd, and 80 Souldiers in her, every one with Bracelets of Gold on each Arm, weighing 16 Ounces, Helmet, Corſlet, and Hilts of his Sword gilded; a Daniſh Curtax liſted with Gold or Silver, hung on his left Shoulder, a Shield with boſs and nails gilded in his left hand, in his right a Launce; beſides this, he took his Oath before the King, that neither of his own Councel or Will, but by the command of Harold he had don what he did, to the putting out Elfreds Eyes. The like Oath took moſt of the Nobility for themſelves, or in his behalf. The next year Hardecnute ſending his Houſecarles, ſo they call'd his Officers, 1041. to gather the Tribute impos'd; two of them rigorous in thir Office, were Sim. Dun. ſlain at Worſter by the People; wherat the King enrag'd, ſent Leofric Duke of Mercia, and Seward of Northumberland, with great Forces and Commiſſion to ſlay the Citizens, rifle and burn the City, and waſt the whole Province. Affrighted with ſuch news, all the People fled: the Countrymen whether they could, the Citizens to a ſmall Iland in Severn, call'd Beverege, which they fortifi'd and defended ſtoutly till Peace was granted them, and freely to return home. But thir City they found ſack't and burnt; wherwith the King was appeas'd. This was commendable in him, however cruel to others, that toward his half Brethren, though Rivals of his Crown, he ſhew'd himſelf always tenderly affection'd; as now towards Edward, who without fear came to him out of Normandy, and with unfeigned kindneſs receav'd, remain'd ſafely and honourably in his Court. But Hardecnute the year following, at a Feaſt 1042. wherin Oſgod a great Daniſh Lord gave his Daughter in marriage at Lamberth, Sim. Dun. to Prudon another potent Dane, in the midſt of his Mirth, ſound and healthful to ſight, while he was drinking fell down ſpeechleſs, and ſo dying, was buried at Wincheſter beſide his Father. He was it ſeems a great lover of good chere; ſitting at Table four times a day, with great variety of Diſhes and ſuperfluity to all Comers. Wheras, ſaith Huntingdon, in our time Princes in thir Houſes made but one meal a day. He gave his Siſter Gunildis, a Virgin of rare Beauty, in marriage to Henry the Alman Emperour; and to ſend her forth pompouſly, all the Nobility contributed thir Jewels and richeſt Ornaments. But it may ſeem a wonder that our Hiſtorians, if they deſerve that name, ſhould in a matter ſo remarkable, and ſo neer thir own time, ſo much differ. Huntingdon relates, againſt the credit of all other records, that Hardecnute thus dead, the Engliſh rejoycing at this unexpected riddance of the Daniſh Yoke, ſent over to Elfred the Elder Son of Emma by King Ethelred, of whom we heard but now, that he dy'd Priſner at Ely, ſent thether by Harold ſix year before; that he came now out of Normandy, with a great number of men, to receave the Crown; that Earl Godwin aiming to have his Daughter Queen of England by marrying her to Edward a ſimple Youth, for he thought Elfred of a higher Spirit then to accept her, perſuaded the Nobles that Elfred had brought over too many Normans, had promis'd them Land heer, that it was not ſafe to ſuffer a warlike and ſuttle Nation to take root in the Land, that theſe were to be ſo handl'd as none of them might dare for the future to flock hither, upon pretence of relation to the King: therupon by common conſent of the Nobles, both Elfred and his Company were dealt with as was above related; that they then ſent for Edward out of Normandy, with Hoſtages to be left there of thir faithful intentions to make him King, and thir deſires not to bring over with him many Normans; that Edward at thir call came then firſt out of Normandy; wheras all others agree that he came voluntarily over to viſit Hardecnute, as is before ſaid, and was remaining then in Court at the time of his Death. For Hardecnute dead, ſaith Malmsbury, Edward doubting greatly his own ſafety, determin'd to rely wholly on the advice and favour of Earl Godwin; deſiring therfore by Meſſengers to have privat ſpeech with him, the Earl a while deliberated: at laſt aſſenting, Prince Edward came, and would have fall'n at his feet; but that not permitted, told him the danger wherin he thought himſelf at preſent, and in great perplexity beſought his help to convey him ſom whether out of the Land. Godwin ſoon apprehending the fair occaſion that now as it were prompted him how to advance himſelf and his Family, cherfully exhorted him to remember himſelf the Son of Ethelred, the Grandchild of Edgar, right Heir to the Crown, at full Age; not to think of flying but of reigning, which might eaſily be brought about if he would follow his Counſel; then ſetting forth the Power and Authority which he had in England, promis'd it ſhould be all his to ſet him on the Throne, if he on his part would promiſe and ſwear to be for ever his Friend, to preſerve the honour of his Houſe, and to marry his Daughter. Edward, as his neceſſity then was, conſented eaſily, and ſwore to whatever Godwin requir'd. An Aſſembly of States therupon met at Gillingham, where Edward pleaded his right; and by the powerful influence of Godwin was accepted. Others, as Brompton, with no probability write, that Godwin at this time was fled into Denmark, for what he had don to Elfred, return'd and ſubmitted himſelf to Edward then King, was by him charg'd openly with the Death of Elfred, and not without much ado, by the interceſſion of Leofric and other Peers, receav'd at length into favour.

Clapa, out of the Realm. Swane over-powr'd by Magnus, ſent the next year 1047.
to entreat aid of King Edward; Godwin gave counſel to ſend him 50 Ships Sim. Dun. fraught with Souldiers; but Leofric and the general voice gainſaying, none were ſent. The next year Harold Harvager King of Norway ſending Embaſſadors, 1048. made Peace with King Edward; but an Earthquake at Worſter and Darby, Sim. Dun.
Peſtilence and Famin in many places, much leſſen'd the enjoyment therof. 1049.
The next year Henry the Emperour diſpleas'd with Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Sim. Dun. had ſtreitn'd him with a great Army by Land; and ſending to King Edward, deſir'd him with his Ships to hinder what he might, his eſcape by Sea. The King therfore with a great Navy coming to Sandwich, there ſtaid till the Emperour came to an agreement with Earl Baldwin. Mean while Swane Son of Earl Godwin, who not permitted to marry Edgiva the Abbeſs of Cheſter by him deflour'd, had left the Land, came out of Denmark with 8 Ships, feigning a deſire to return into the Kings favour; and Beorn his Couſin German, who commanded part of the King's Navy, promis'd to intercede that his Earldom might be reſtor'd him. Godwin therfore and Beorn with a few Ships, the reſt of the Fleet gon home, coming to Pevenſey (but Godwin ſoon departing thence in perſuit of 29 Daniſh Ships who had got much booty on the Coaſt of Eſſex, and periſh'd by Tempeſt in thir return) Swane with his Ships coms to Beorn at Pevenſey, guilefully requeſts him to ſail with him to Sandwich, and reconcile him to the King, as he had promis'd. Beorn miſtruſting no evil where he intended good, went with him in his Ship attended by three only of his Servants:
but Swane ſet upon barbarous Cruelty, not reconciliation with the King, took Beorn now in his power and bound him; then coming to Dertmouth, ſlew and buried him in a deep Ditch. After which, the men of Haſtings took ſix of his Ships, and brought them to the King at Sandwich; with the other two he eſcap'd into Flanders, ther remaining till Aldred Biſhop of Worſter by earneſt mediation wrought his Peace with the King. About this time King Edward ſent to Pope Leo, deſiring abſolution from a Vow which he Malmſ. had made in his younger years, to take a journey to Rome, if God vouchſaf'd him to reign in England; the Pope diſpenc'd with his Vow, but not without the expence of his Journey giv'n to the Poor, and a Monaſtery built or reedifi'd to St. Peter; who in a Viſion to a Monk, as is ſaid, choſe Weſtminſter, which King Edward thereupon rebuilding endow'd with large Privileges and Revenues. The ſame year, ſaith Florent of Worſter, certain Iriſh Pirats with 36 Ships enter'd the mouth of Severn, and with the aid of Griffin Prince of South-Wales, did ſom hurt in thoſe parts: then paſſing the River Wye, burnt Dunedham, and ſlew all the Inhabitants they found. Againſt whom Aldred Biſhop of Worſter, with a few out of Gloſter and Herefordſhire, went out in haſt: but Griffin to whom the Welch and Iriſh had privily ſent Meſſengers, came down upon the Engliſh with his whole Power by night, and early in the Morning ſuddenly aſſaulting them, ſlew many, and put the reſt to flight. The next year but one, King Edward remitted the Daniſh Tax which had continu'd 1051.
38 years heavy upon the Land ſince Ethelred firſt paid it to the Danes, and Sim. Dun.
what remain'd therof in his Treaſury he ſent back to the Owners: but through Ingulf. imprudence laid the foundation of a far worſe miſchief to the Engliſh; while ſtudying gratitude to thoſe Normans, who to him in Exile had bin helpful, he call'd them over to public Offices heer, whom better he might have repaid out of his privat Purſe; by this means exaſperating either Nation one againſt the other, and making way by degrees to the Norman Conqueſt. Robert a Monk of that Country, who had bin ſerviceable to him there in time of need, he made Biſhop, firſt of London, then of Canterbury; William his Chaplain Biſhop of Dorcheſter. Then began the Engliſh to lay aſide thir own antient Cuſtoms, and in many things to imitate French manners, the great Peers to ſpeak French in thir Houſes, in French to write thir Bills and Letters, as a great peece of Gentility, aſham'd of thir own: a preſage of thir ſubjection ſhortly to that People, whoſe Faſhions and Language they affected ſo ſlaviſhly. But that which gave beginning to many Troubles enſuing, happ'nd this Year, and Malmſ. upon this occaſion. Euſtace Earl of Boloign, Father of the famous Godfrey who won Jeruſalem from the Saracens, and Husband to Goda the King's Siſter, having bin to viſit King Edward, and returning by Canterbury to take Ship at Dover, one of his Harbingers inſolently ſeeking to lodg by force in a Houſe there, provok'd ſo the Maſter therof, as by chance or heat of Anger to kill him. The Count with his whole Train going to the Houſe where his Servant had bin kill'd, ſlew both the Slayer and eighteen more who defended him. But the Townſmen running to Arms, requited him with the Slaughter of twenty one more of his Servants, wounded moſt of the reſt; he himſelf with one or two hardly eſcaping, ran back with Clamour to the King; whom ſeconded by other Norman Courtiers, he ſtirr'd up to great Anger againſt the Citizens of Canterbury. Earl Godwin in haſt is ſent for, the Cauſe related, and much aggravated by the King againſt that City, the Earl commanded to raiſe Forces, and uſe the Citizens therof as Enemies. Godwin ſorry to ſee Strangers more favour'd of the King then his native People, anſwer'd, that it were better to ſummon firſt the chief Men of the Town into the King's Court, to charge them with Sedition, where both Parties might be heard, that not found in fault they might be acquitted; if otherwiſe, by Fine or loſs of Life might ſatisfy the King whoſe Peace they had brok'n, and the Count whom they had injur'd; till this were don refuſing to proſecute with hoſtile Puniſhment them of his own County unheard, whom his Office was rather to defend. The King diſpleas'd with his Refuſal, and not knowing how to compel him, appointed an Aſſembly of all the Peers to be held at Gloſter, where the Matter might be fully try'd; the Aſſembly was full and frequent according to Summons: but Godwin miſtruſting his own Cauſe, or the Violence of his Adverſaries, with his two Sons, Swane and Harold, and a great Power gather'd out of his own and his Sons Earldoms, which contein'd moſt of the South-Eaſt and Weſt Parts of England, came no furder then Beverſtan, giving out that thir Forces were to go againſt the Welch, who intended an Irruption into Herefordſhire; and Swane under that pretence lay with part of his Army therabout. The Welch underſtanding this Device, and with all diligence clearing themſelves before the King, left Godwin detected of falſe Accuſation in great hatred to all the Aſſembly. Leofric therfore and Siward, Dukes of great Power, the former in Mercia, the other in all Parts beyond Humber, both ever faithful to the King, ſend privily with ſpeed to raiſe the Forces of thir Provinces. Which Godwin not knowing, ſent boldly to King Edward, demanding Count Euſtace and his Followers, together with thoſe Boloignians, who, as Simeon writes, held a Caſtle in the Juriſdiction of Canterbury. The King, as then having but little Force at hand, entertain'd him a while with Treaties and Delays, till his ſummon'd Army drew nigh, then rejected his Demands. Godwin thus match'd, commanded his Sons not to begin Fight againſt the King; begun with, not to give ground. The King's Forces were the Flower of thoſe Counties whence they came, and eager to Sim. Dun. fall on: But Leofric and the wiſer ſort deteſting Civil War, brought the Matter to this accord, that Hoſtages giv'n on either ſide, the whole Cauſe ſhould be again debated at London. Thether the King and Lords coming with thir Army, ſent to Godwin and his Sons, (who with thir Powers were com as far as Southwark) commanding thir appearance unarm'd with only 12 Attendants, and that the reſt of thir Souldiers they ſhould deliver over to the King. They to appear without Pledges before an adverſe Faction deny'd; but to diſmiſs thir Souldiers refuſ'd not, nor in ought elſe to obey the King as far as might ſtand with Honour, and the juſt regard of thir Safety. This Anſwer not pleaſing the King, an Edict was preſently iſſu'd forth, that Godwin and his Sons within five days depart the Land. He who perceav'd now his Numbers to diminiſh, readily obey'd, and with his Wife and three Sons, Toſti, Swane, and Gyrtha, with as much Treaſure as thir Ship could carry, embarking at Thorney, ſail'd into Flanders to Earl Baldwin, whoſe Daughter Judith Toſti had married: for Wulnod his fourth Son was then Hoſtage to the King in Normandy; his other two, Harold and Leofwin, taking Ship at Briſtow, in a Veſſel that lay ready there belonging to Swane, paſs'd into Ireland. King Edward perſuing his Diſpleaſure, divorc'd his Wife Edith Earl Godwin's Daughter, ſending her deſpoil'd of all her Ornaments to Warewel with one waiting Maid, to be kept in cuſtody by his Siſter the Abbeſs there. His reaſon of ſo doing Malmſ.

was as harſh as his Act, that ſhe only, while her neereſt Relations were in Baniſhment, might not, though innocent, enjoy eaſe at home. After this,
William Duke of Normandy with a great number of Followers coming into England, was by King Edward honorably entertain'd and led about the Cities and Caſtles, as it were to ſhew him what ere long was to be his own, (though at that time, ſaith Ingulf, no mention therof paſs'd between them) then after ſom time of his Abode here, preſented richly and diſmiſs'd, he return'd home. The next Year Queen Emma dy'd, and was buried at Wincheſter. 1052.
The Chronicle attributed to John Bromton a Yorkſhire Abbot, but rather of Sim. Dun.
ſom nameleſs Author living under Edward the 3d or later, reports that the Year before, by Robert the Archbiſhop ſhe was accus'd both of conſenting to the Death of her Son Alfred, and of preparing Poyſon for Edward alſo; laſtly of too much Familiarity with Alwin Biſhop of Wincheſter: that to approve her Innocence, praying over-night to St. Swithun, ſhe offer'd to paſs blindfold between certain Plowſhares red hot, according to the Ordalian Law, which without harm ſhe perform'd; that the King therupon receav'd her to Honour, and from her and the Biſhop, Penance for his Credulity; that the Archbiſhop aſham'd of his Accuſation, fled out of England: which beſides the Silence of antienter Authors (for the Biſhop fled not till a Year after) brings the whole Story into ſuſpicion, in this more probable, if it can be prov'd, that in memory of this Deliverance from the nine burning Plowſhares, Queen Emma gave to the Abbey of S. Swithune nine Mannors, and Biſhop Alwin other nine. About this time Griffin Prince of South-Wales waſted Herefordſhire; to oppoſe whom the People of that Country, with many Normans, gariſon'd in the Caſtle of Hereford, went out in Arms, but were put to the worſe, many ſlain, and much Booty driv'n away by the Welch. Soon after which Harold and Leofwin, Sons of Godwin, coming into Severn with many Ships, in the Confines of Somerſet and Dorſetſhire, ſpoil'd many Villages, and reſiſted by thoſe of Somerſet and Devonſhire, ſlew in a Fight more then 30 of thir principal Men, many of the common ſort, and return'd with much Booty to thir Fleet. King Edward on the other ſide made ready above 60 Malmſ.
Ships at Sandwich well ſtor'd with Men and Proviſion, under the Conduct of Odo and Radulf two of his Norman Kindred, enjoining them to find out Godwin, whom he heard to be at Sea. To quick'n them, he himſelf lay on Shipboard, oft-times watch'd and ſail'd up and down in ſearch of thoſe Pirats.
But Godwin, whether in a Miſt, or by other Accident, paſſing by them, arriv'd in another part of Kent, and diſperſing ſecret Meſſengers abroad, by fair Words allur'd the chief Men of Kent, Suſſex, Surrey, and Eſſex, to his Party; which News coming to the King's Fleet at Sandwich, they haſted to find him out; but miſſing of him again, came up without effect to London.
Godwin advertis'd of this, forthwith ſail'd to the Ile of Wight; where at length his two Sons Harold and Leofwin finding him, with thir united Navy lay on the Coaſt, forbearing other Hoſtility then to furniſh themſelves with freſh Victual from Land as they needed. Thence as one Fleet they ſet forward to Sandwich, uſing all fair means by the way to encreaſe thir Numbers both of Mariners and Soldiers. The King then at London, ſtartl'd at theſe Tidings, gave ſpeedy order to raiſe Forces in all parts which had not revolted from him; but now too late, for Godwin within a few days after with his Ships or Gallies came up the River Thames to Southwark, and till the Tide return'd had Conference with the Londoners; whom by fair Speeches, for he was held a good Speaker in thoſe times, he brought to his bent. The Tide returning, and none upon the Bridg hindring, he row'd up in his Gallies along the South Bank; where his Land-Army, now com to him, in array of Battel ſtood on the ſhore: then turning toward the North ſide of the River, where the King's Gallies lay in ſom readineſs, and Land-forces alſo not far off, he made ſhew as offring to fight; but they underſtood one another, and the Soldiers on either ſide ſoon declar'd thir Reſolution not to fight Engliſh againſt Engliſh.
Thence coming to Treaty, the King and the Earl reconcil'd, both Armies were diſſolv'd, Godwin and his Sons reſtor'd to thir former Dignities, except Swane, who touch'd in Conſcience for the ſlaughter of Beorn his Kinſman, was gon barefoot to Jeruſalem, and returning home, dy'd by Sickneſs or Saracens in Lycia; his Wife Edith, Godwin's Daughter, King Edward took to him again, dignify'd as before. Then were the Normans, who had don many unjuſt things under the King's Authority, and giv'n him ill Counſel againſt his People, baniſh'd the Realm, ſom of them not blamable permitted to ſtay. Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, William of London, Ulf of Lincoln, all Normans, hardly eſcaping with thir Followers, got to Sea. The Archbiſhop went with his Complaint to Rome; but returning, dy'd in Normandy at the ſame Monaſterie from whence he came. Oſbern and Hugh ſurrender'd thir Caſtles, and by permiſſion of Leofric paſs'd through his Counties with thir Normans to 1053. Sim. Dun. Macbeth King of Scotland. The Year following Rheſe Brother to Griffin, Prince of South Wales, who by Inrodes had don much damage to the Engliſh, tak'n at Bulendun, was put to death by the King's Appointment, and his Head brought to him at Gloſter. The ſame Year at Wincheſter, on the ſecond holyday of Eaſter, Earl Godwin ſitting with the King at Table, ſunk down ſuddenly in his Seat as dead: his three Sons Harold, Toſti, and Gyrtha, forthwith carried him into the King's Chamber, hoping he might revive: but the Malady had ſo ſeis'd him, that the fifth day after he expir'd. The Normans who hated Godwin give out, ſaith Malmsbury, that mention happ'ning to be made of Elfred, and the King therat looking ſowrly upon Godwin, he to vindicate himſelf, utter'd theſe words, Thou, O King, at every mention made of thy Brother Elfred, look'ſt frowningly upon me: but let God not ſuffer me to ſwallow this Morſel, if I be guilty of ought don againſt his Life or thy Advantage; that after theſe Words, choak'd with the Morſel tak'n, he ſunk down and recover'd not. His firſt Wife was the Siſter of Canute, a Woman of much Infamy for the Trade ſhe drove of buying up Engliſh Youths and Maids to ſell in Denmark, wherof ſhe made great gain; but e're long was 1054. Sim. Dun. ſtruck with Thunder, and dy'd. The Year enſuing, Siward Earl of Northumberland, with a great number of Horſe and Foot, attended alſo by a ſtrong Fleet at the King's Appointment, made an Expedition into Scotland, vanquiſh't the Tyrant Macbeth, ſlaying many thouſands of Scots with thoſe Normans that went thether, and plac'd Malcolm Son of the Cumbrian King in his ſtead; yet not without loſs of his own Son, and many other both Engliſh and Danes. Huntingd. Told of his Son's Death, he ask'd whether he receav'd his Deaths Wound before or behind? when it was anſwer'd before, I am glad, ſaith he; and ſhould not elſe have thought him, though my Son, worthy of Burial. In the mean while King Edward being without Iſſue to ſucceed him, ſent Aldred Biſhop of Wincheſter with great Preſents to the Emperor, entreating him to prevail with the King of Hungary, that Edward the remaining Son of his Brother 1055. Sim. Dun. Edmund Ironſide might be ſent into England. Siward but one Year ſurviving his great Victory, dy'd at York; reported by Huntingdon a Man of Giant like Stature; and by his own Demeanour at point of Death manifeſted, of a rough and meer ſouldierly Mind. For much diſdaining to die in bed by a Diſeaſe, not in the Field fighting with his Enemies, he caus'd himſelf compleatly arm'd, and weapon'd with Battel-ax and Shield to be ſet in a Chair, whether to fight with Death, if he could be ſo vain, or to meet him (when far other Weapons and Preparations were needful) in a martial Bravery; but true Fortitude glories not in the feats of War, as they are ſuch, but as they ſerve to end War ſooneſt by a victorious Peace. His Earldom the King beſtow'd on Toſti the Son of Earl Godwin: and ſoon after in a Convention held at London, baniſh'd without viſible cauſe, Huntingdon ſaith for Treaſon, Algar the Son of Leofric, who paſſing into Ireland, ſoon return'd with eighteen Ships to Griffin Prince of South Wales, requeſting his Aid againſt King Edward. He aſſembling his Powers, enter'd with him into Herefordſhire; whom Radulf a timorous Captain, Son to the King's Siſter, not by Euſtace, but a former Husband, met two Miles diſtant from Hereford; and having hors'd the Engliſh who knew better to fight on foot, without ſtroke he with his French and Normans beginning to fly, taught the Engliſh by his example. Griffin and Algar following the Chaſe, ſlew many, wounded more, enter'd Hereford, ſlew ſeven Canons defending the Minſter, burnt the Monaſterie and Reliques, then the City; killing ſom, leading captive others of the Citizens, return'd with great Spoils; wherof King Edward having notice, gather'd a great Army at

Gloſter under the Conduct of Harold now Earl of Kent, who ſtrenuouſly purſuing
Griffin enter'd Wales, and encamp'd beyond Straddale. But the Enemy flying before him farther into the Country, leaving there the greater part of his Army with ſuch as had charge to fight, if occaſion were offer'd, with the reſt he return'd, and fortifi'd Hereford with a Wall and Gates. Mean while Griffin and Algar dreading the Diligence of Harold, after many Meſſages to and fro, concluded a Peace with him. Algar diſcharging his Fleet with Pay at Weſt-Cheſter, came to the King, and was reſtor'd to his Earldom. But Griffin with breach of Faith, the next year ſet upon Leofgar the Biſhop of Hereford 1056.
and his Clerks then at a place call'd Glaſtbrig, with Agelnoth Vicount of Sim. Dun.
the Shire, and ſlew them; but Leofric, Harold, and King Edward, by force, as is likelieſt, though it be not ſaid how, reduc'd him to Peace. The next Year Edward Son of Edmund Ironſide, for whom his Uncle King Edward had 1057. ſent to the Emperour, came out of Hungary, deſign'd Succeſſor to the Crown; Sim. Dun.
but within a few days after his coming dy'd at London, leaving behind him Edgar Atheling his Son, Margaret and Chriſtina his Daughters. About the ſame time alſo dy'd Earl Leofric in a good old Age, a Man of no leſs Vertue then Power in his time, religious, prudent, and faithful to his Country, happily wedded to Godiva a Woman of great Praiſe. His Son Algar found leſs favour 1058.
with King Edward, again baniſh'd the Year after his Father's Death; but he Sim. Dun. again by the Aid of Griffin and a Fleet from Norway, maugre the King, ſoon recover'd his Earldom. The next Year Malcolm King of Scots coming to viſit 1059.
King Edward, was brought on his way by Toſti the Northumbrian Earl, to Sim. Dun.
whom he ſwore Brotherhood: yet the next Year but one, while Toſti was 1061.
gon to Rome with Aldred Archbiſhop of York for his Pall, this ſworn Brother Sim. Dun. taking advantage of his Abſence, roughly haraſs'd Northumberland. The Year paſſing to an end without other matter of moment, ſave the frequent Inrodes and Robberies of Griffin, whom no Bonds of Faith could reſtrain, King Edward ſent againſt him after Chriſtmas Harold now Duke of Weſt-Saxons, 1062.
with no great body of Horſe, from Gloſter, where he then kept his Court; Sim. Dun.
whoſe coming heard of, Griffin not daring to abide, nor in any part of his Land holding himſelf ſecure, eſcap'd hardly by Sea, ere Harold coming to Rudeland, burnt his Palace and Ships there, returning to Gloſter the ſame day.
But by the middle of May ſetting out with a Fleet from Briſtow, he ſail'd about 1063.
the moſt part of Wales, and met by his Brother Toſti with many Troops of Sim. Dun.
Horſe, as the King had appointed, began to waſt the Country; but the Welch giving Pledges, yeilded themſelves, promis'd to becom tributary, and baniſh Griffin thir Prince; who lurking ſomwhere, was the next Year tak'n and ſlain by Griffin Prince of North Wales; his Head with the Head and 1064.
Tackle of his Ship ſent to Harold, by him to the King, who of his Gentleneſs Sim. Dun.
made Blechgent and Rithwallon or Rivallon his two Brothers Princes in his ſtead; they to Harold in behalf of the King ſwore Fealty and Tribute. Yet the next Year Harold having built a fair Houſe at a place call'd Portaſcith in Monmouthſhire, 1065.
and ſtor'd it with Proviſion, that the King might lodg there in time of Sim. Dun.
hunting, Caradoc the Son of Griffin ſlain the Year before, came with a number Camd.
of Men, ſlew all he found there, and took away the Proviſion. Soon after which the Northumbrians in a Tumult at York beſet the Palace of Toſti thir Earl, ſlew more then 200 of his Souldiers and Servants, pillag'd his Treaſure, and put him to fly for his Life. The cauſe of this Inſurrection they alleg'd to be, for that the Queen Edith had commanded, in her Brother Toſti's behalf, Goſpatric a Noble-man of that Country to be treacherouſly ſlain in the King's Court; and that Toſti himſelf the Year before with like Treachery had caus'd to be ſlain in his Chamber Gamel and Ulf, two other of thir Noble Men, beſides his intolerable Exactions and Oppreſſions. Then in a manner the whole Country coming up to complain of thir Grievances, met with Harold at Northamton, whom the King at Toſti's Requeſt had ſent to pacify the Northumbrians; but they laying op'n the Cruelty of his Government, and thir own Birth-right of Freedom not to endure the Tyranny of any Governour whatſoever, with abſolute Refuſal to admit him again, and Harold hearing Reaſon, all the Accomplices of Toſti were expell'd the Earldom. He himſelf baniſh'd the Realm, went into Flanders; Morcar the Son of Algar made Earl in his ſtead. Huntingdon tells another Cauſe of Toſti's Baniſhment, that one day at Windſor, while Harold reach'd the Cup to King Edward, Toſti envying to ſee his younger Brother in greater favour then himſelf, could not forbear to run furiouſly upon him, catching hold of his Hair; the ſcuffle was ſoon parted by other Attendants ruſhing between, and Toſti forbidd'n the Court. He with continu'd fury riding to Hereford, where Harold had many Servants, preparing an Entertainment for the King, came to the Houſe and ſet upon them with his Followers; then lopping off Hands, Arms, Legs of ſom, Heads of others, threw them into Butts of Wine, Meath, or Ale, which were laid in for the King's drinking: and at his going away charg'd them to ſend him this word, that of other freſh Meats he might bring with him to his Farm what he pleas'd, but of Sous he ſhould find plenty provided ready for him: that for this barbarous Act the King pronounc'd him baniſh'd; that the Northumbrians taking advantage at the King's Diſpleaſure and Sentence againſt him, roſe alſo to be reveng'd of his Cruelties don to themſelves. But this no way agrees, for why then ſhould Harold or the King ſo much labour with the Northumbrians to re-admit him, if he were a baniſh'd Man for his Crimes don before?

Malmſ.

About this time it happ'nd that Harold putting to Sea one day for his pleaſure, in a Fiſher Boat, from his Mannor at Boſeham in Suſſex, caught with a Tempeſt too far off Land, was carried into Normandy; and by the Earl of Pontiew, on whoſe Coaſt he was driv'n, at his own requeſt brought to Duke William; who entertaining him with great Courteſie, ſo far won him, as to promiſe the Duke by Oath of his own accord, not only the Caſtle of Dover then in his tenure, but the Kingdom alſo after King Edward's Death to his utmoſt endeavour, therupon betrothing the Duke's Daughter then too young for marriage, and departing richly preſented. Others ſay, that King Edward himſelf after the Death of Edward his Nephew, ſent Harold thether on purpoſe to acquaint Duke William with his intention to bequeath him his Kingdom: but Malmsbury accounts the former Story to be the truer.

Leges Ed. Conf. Tit. Lex Noricor.

Ingulf writes, that King Edward now grown old, and perceaving Edgar his Nephew both in Body and Mind unfit to govern, eſpecially againſt the Pride and Inſolence of Godwin's Sons, who would never obey him; Duke William on the other ſide of high Merit, and his Kinſman by the Mother, had ſent Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to acquaint the Duke with his purpoſe, not long before Harold came thether. The former part may be true, that King Edward upon ſuch Conſiderations had ſent one or other; but Archbiſhop Robert was fled the Land, and dead many years before. Eadmer and Simeon write, that Harold went of his own accord into Normandy, by the King's Permiſſion or Connivance, to get free his Brother Wulnod and Nephew Hacun the Son of Swane, whom the King had tak'n Hoſtages of Godwin, and ſent into Normandy; that King Edward foretold Harold, his Journey thether would be to the detriment of all England and his own Reproach; that Duke William then acquainted Harold, how Edward ere his coming to the Crown had promis'd, if ever he attain'd it, to leave Duke William Succeſſor after him. Laſt of theſe Matthew Paris writes, that Harold to get free of Duke William, affirm'd his coming thether not to have been by accident or force of Tempeſt, but on ſet purpoſe, in that privat manner to enter with him into ſecret Confederacy: ſo variouſly are theſe things reported.

1066.
Sim. Dun.

After this King Edward grew ſickly, yet as he was able kept his Chriſtmas at London, and was at the Dedication of St. Peter's Church in Weſtminſter, which he had rebuilt; but on the Eve of Epiphany, or Twelfſtide, deceas'd much lamented, and in the Church was entomb'd. That he was harmleſs and ſimple, is conjectur'd by his words in anger to a Peaſant who had croſs'd his Game (for with hunting and hawking he was much delighted) by God and God's Mother, ſaid he, I ſhall do you as ſhrewd a turn if I can; obſerving that Law-Maxim, the beſt of all his Succeſſors, that the King of England can do no Wrong. The ſoftneſs of his Nature gave growth to Factions of thoſe about him, Normans eſpecially and Engliſh; theſe complaining that Robert the Archbiſhop was a ſower of Diſſention between the King and his People, a Traducer of the Engliſh; the other ſide, that Godwin and his Sons bore themſelves arrogantly and proudly towards the King, uſurping to themſelves equal ſhare in the Government; oft-times making ſport with his ſimplicity, that through thir Power in the Land, they made no ſcruple to kill Men of whoſe Inheritance they took a liking, and ſo to take Poſſeſſion. The truth is, that Godwin and his Sons did many things boiſtrouſly and violently, much againſt the King's mind; which not able to reſiſt, he had, as ſom ſay, his Wife Edith Godwin's Daughter in ſuch Averſation, as in bed never to have touch'd her; whether for this cauſe or miſtak'n Chaſtity, not commendable; to enquire further is not material. His Laws held good and juſt, and long after deſir'd by the Engliſh of thir Norman Kings, are yet extant. He is ſaid to be at Table not exceſſive, at Feſtivals nothing puft up with the coſtly Robes he wore, which his Queen with curious Art had woven for him in Gold. He was full of Alms-deeds, and exhorted the Monks to like Charity. He is ſaid to be the firſt Engliſh Kings that cur'd the Diſeaſe call'd thence the King's Evil; yet Malmsbury blames them who attribute that Cure to his Royalty, not to his Sanctity; ſaid alſo to have cur'd certain blind Men with the Water wherin he hath waſh'd his hands. A little before his Death, lying ſpeechleſs two days, the third day after a deep ſleep, he was heard to pray, that if it were a true Viſion, not an Illuſion which he had ſeen, God would give him ſtrength to utter it, otherwiſe not. Then he related how he had ſeen two devout Monks, whom he knew in Normandy, to have liv'd and dy'd well, who appearing told him they were ſent Meſſengers from God to foretel, that becauſe the great ones of England, Dukes, Lords, Biſhops, and Abbots, were not Miniſters of God but of the Devil, God had deliver'd the Land to thir Enemies; and when he deſir'd that he might reveal this Viſion, to the end they might repent, it was anſwer'd, they neither will repent, neither will God pardon them: at this relation others trembling, Stigand the Simonious Archbiſhop, whom Edward much to blame had ſuffer'd many years to ſit Primat in the Church, is ſaid to have laugh'd, as at the feaveriſh Dream of a doting old Man; but the Event prov'd it true.

HAROLD Son of Earl Godwin.

Harold, whether by King Edward a little before his Death ordain'd Succeſſor to the Crown, as Simeon of Durham, and others affirm; or by the prevalence of his Faction, excluding Edgar the right Heir, Grandchild to Edmund Ironſide, as Malmsbury and Huntingdon agree, no ſooner was the Funeral of King Edward ended, but on the ſame day was elected and crown'd King: and no ſooner plac'd in the Throne, but began to frame himſelf by all manner of Compliances to gain Affection, endeavour'd to make good Laws, repeal'd bad, became a great Patron to Church and Church-men, courteous and affable to all reputed good, a hater of evil Doers, charg'd all his Officers to puniſh Thieves, Robbers, and all diſturbers of the Peace, while he himſelf by Sea and Land labour'd in the defence of his Country: ſo good an actor is Ambition. In the mean while a blazing Star, ſeven mornings together, about the end of April, was ſeen to ſtream terribly, not only over England, but other parts of the World; foretelling heer, as was thought, the great Changes approaching: plainlieſt prognoſticated by Elmer a Monk of Malmsbury, who could not foreſee, when time was, the breaking of his own Legs for ſoaring too high. He in his youth ſtrangely aſpiring, had made and fitted Wings to his Hands and Feet; with theſe on the top of a Tower, ſpread out to gather Air, he flew more then a Furlong; but the Wind being too high, came fluttering down, to the maiming of all his Limbs; yet ſo conceited of his Art, that he attributed the cauſe of his fall to the want of a Tail, as Birds have, which he forgot to make to his hinder parts. This Story, though ſeeming otherwiſe too light in the midſt of a ſad Narration, yet for the ſtrangeneſs therof, I thought worthy anough the placing as I found it plac'd in my Author. But to digreſs no farder, Toſti the King's Brother coming from Flanders, full of Envy at his younger Brother's advancement to the Crown, reſolv'd what he might to trouble his Reign; forcing therfore them of Wight Ile to Contribution, he ſail'd thence to Sandwich, committing Piracies on the Coaſt between. Harold then reſiding at London, with a great number of Ships drawn together, and of Horſe Troops by Land, prepares in Perſon for Sandwich: wherof Toſti having notice, directs his courſe with 60 Ships towards Lindſey, taking with him all the Seamen he found willing or unwilling: where he burnt many Villages, and ſlew many of the Inhabitants; but Edwin the Mercian Duke, and Morcar his Brother, the Northumbrian Earl, with thir Forces on either ſide, ſoon drove him out of the Country. Who thence betook him to Malcolm the Scotiſh King, and with him abode the whole Summer. About the ſame time Duke William ſending Embaſſadors to admoniſh Harold of his Promiſe and Oath, to aſſiſt him in his Plea to the Kingdom, he made anſwer, that by the death of his Daughter betroth'd to him on Eadmer. that Condition, he was abſolv'd of his Oath; or not dead, he could not take her now an outlandiſh Woman, without conſent of the Realm; that it was preſumptuouſly don, and not to be perſiſted in, if without conſent or knowledg of the States, he had ſworn away the right of the Kingdom; that what he ſwore was to gain his Liberty, being in a manner then his Priſner; that it was unreaſonable in the Duke to require or expect of him the forgoing of a Kingdom, confer'd upon him with univerſal favour and acclamation of the People: to this flat denial he added contempt, ſending the Meſſengers back, ſaith Matthew Paris, on maim'd Horſes. The Duke thus contemptuouſly put off, addreſſes himſelf to the Pope, ſetting forth the Juſtice of his cauſe, which Harold, whether through haughtineſs of mind, or diſtruſt, or that the ways to Rome were ſtop'd, ſought not to do. Duke William, beſides the Promiſe and Oath of Harold, alleg'd that King Edward by the advice of Seward, Godwin himſelf, and Stigand the Archbiſhop, had giv'n him the right of Succeſſion, and had ſent him the Son and Nephew of Godwin, pledges of the Gift; the Pope ſent to Duke William, after this demonſtration of his right, a conſecrated Banner. Wherupon he having with great care and choice got an Army of tall and ſtout Souldiers, under Captains of great skill and mature Age, came in Auguſt to the Port of St. Valerie. Mean while Harold from London coms to Sandwich, there expecting his Navy; which alſo coming, he ſails to the Ile of Wight; and having heard of Duke William's preparations and readineſs to invade him, kept good watch on the Coaſt, and Foot Forces every where in fit places to guard the ſhoar. But ere the middle of September, Proviſion failing when it was moſt needed, both Fleet and Army return home. When on a ſudden, Malmſ. Matt. Paris. Harold Harvager King of Norway, with a Navy of more then 500 great Ships, (others leſs'n them by two hundred, others augment them to a thouſand) appears at the mouth of Tine; to whom Earl Toſti with his Ships came as was agreed between them; whence both uniting, ſet ſail with all ſpeed and enter'd the River Humber. Thence turning into Ouſe, as far as Rical, landed, and won York by aſſault. At theſe tidings Harold with all his Power haſts thetherward; but ere his coming, Edwin and Morcar at Fulford by York, on the North ſide of Ouſe, about the Feaſt of St. Matthew had giv'n them Battel; ſucceſsfully at firſt, but over-born at length with numbers; and forc'd to turn thir backs, more of them periſh'd in the River, then in the Fight. The Norwegians taking with them 500 Hoſtages out of York, and leaving there 150 of thir own, retir'd to thir Ships. But the fifth day after, King Harold with a great and well appointed Army, coming to York, and at Stamford-Bridg, or Battel-Bridg on Darwent, Camden. aſſailing the Norwegians, after much bloodſhed on both ſides, cut off the greateſt part of them with Harvager thir King, and Toſti his own Brother. But Olave the Kings Son, and Paul Earl of Orkney, left with many Souldiers to guard the Ships, ſurrendring themſelves with Hoſtages and Oath given never to return as Enemies, he ſuffer'd freely to depart with 20 Ships and the ſmall remnant of thir Malmſ. Army. One man of the Norwegians is not to be forgott'n, who with incredible valour keeping the Bridg a long hour againſt the whole Engliſh Army, with his ſingle reſiſtance delai'd thir Victory; and ſcorning offer'd Life, till in the end no man daring to graple with him, either dreaded as too ſtrong, or contemn'd as one deſperate, he was at length ſhot dead with an Arrow; and by his fall open'd the paſſage of perſuit to a compleat Victory. Wherwith Harold lifted up in mind, and forgetting now his former ſhews of popularitie, defrauded his Souldiers thir due and well deſerved ſhare of the Spoils. While theſe things thus paſt in Northumberland, Duke William lay ſtill at St. Valerie; his Ships were ready, but the Wind ſerv'd not for many days; which put the Souldiery into much diſcouragement and murmur, taking this for an unlucky ſign of thir ſucceſs; at laſt the Wind came favourable, the Duke firſt under ſail awaited the reſt at Anchor, till all coming forth, the whole Fleet of 900

Ships with a proſperous gale arriv'd at Haſtings. At his going out of the Boat by a ſlip falling on his hands, to correct the Omen, a Souldier ſtanding by ſaid aloud, that thir Duke had taken poſſeſſion of England. Landed, he reſtrein'd his Army from waſt and ſpoil, ſaying, that they ought to ſpare what was thir own. But theſe are things related of Alexander and Cæſar, and I doubt thence borrow'd by the Monks to inlay thir Story. The Duke for 15 days after landing kept his men quiet within the Camp, having taken the Caſtle of Haſtings, or built a Fortreſs there. Harold ſecure the while, and proud of his new Victory, thought all his Enemies now under foot: but ſitting jollily at dinner, news is brought him, that Duke William of Normandy with a great multitude of Horſe and Foot, Slingers and Archers, beſides other choice Auxiliaries which he had hir'd in France, was arriv'd at Pevenſey. Harold who had expected him all the Summer, but not ſo late in the year as now it was, for it was October, with his Forces much diminiſh't after two ſore conflicts, and the departing of many others from him diſcontented, in great haſt marches to London. Thence not tarrying for ſupplies which were on thir way towards him, hurries into Suſſex (for he was always in haſt ſince the day of his Coronation) and ere the third part of his Army could be well put in order, finds the Duke about 9 mile from Haſtings, and now drawing nigh, ſent ſpies before him to ſurvey the ſtrength and number of his Enemies: them diſcover'd ſuch, the Duke cauſing to be led about, and after well fill'd with Meat and drink ſent back. They not over-wiſe, brought word that the Dukes Army were moſt of them Prieſts; for they ſaw thir Faces all over ſhav'n; the Engliſh then uſing to let grow on thir upper-lip large Muſtachio's, as did antiently the Britans. The King laughing anſwer'd, that they were not Prieſts, but valiant and hardy Souldiers. Therfore ſaid Girtha his Brother, a youth of noble courage and underſtanding above his Age, Forbear thou thy ſelf to fight, who art obnoxious to Duke William by Oath, let us unſworn undergo the hazard of Battel, who may juſtly fight in the defence of our Country; thou reſerv'd to fitter time, maiſt either reunite us flying, or revenge us dead. The King not hark'ning to this, leſt it might ſeem to argue fear in him or a bad cauſe, with like reſolution rejected the offers of Duke William ſent to him by a Monk before the Battel, with this only anſwer haſtily deliver'd, Let God judg between us. The offers were theſe, that Harold would either lay down the Scepter, or hold it of him, or try his Title with him by ſingle Combat in ſight of both Armies, or refer it to the Pope. Theſe rejected, both ſides prepar'd to fight the next morning, the Engliſh from ſinging and drinking all Night, the Normans from confeſſion of thir Sins and communion of the Hoſt. The Engliſh were in a ſtreit diſadvantagious place, ſo that many diſcourag'd with thir ill ordering, ſcarce having room where to ſtand, ſlip'd away before the onſet, the reſt in cloſe order with thir Battel-Axes and Shields, made an impenetrable Squadron: the King himſelf with his Brothers on foot ſtood by the Royal Standard, wherin the figure of a man fighting was inwov'n with Gold and pretious Stones. The Norman Foot, moſt Bowmen, made the formoſt Front, on either ſide Wings of Horſe ſomwhat behind. The Duke arming, and his Corſlet giv'n him on the wrong ſide, ſaid pleaſantly, The ſtrength of my Dukedom will be turn'd now into a Kingdom. Then the whole Army ſinging the Song of Rowland, the remembrance of whoſe Exploits might hart'n them, imploring laſtly Divine help, the Battel began; and was fought ſorely on either ſide: but the main body of Engliſh Foot by no means would be brok'n, till the Duke cauſing his men to feign flight, drew them out with deſire of purſuit into open diſorder, then turn'd ſuddenly upon them ſo routed by themſelves, which wrought thir overthrow; yet ſo they dy'd not unmanfully, but turning oft upon thir Enemies, by the advantage of an upper ground, beat them down by heaps, and fill'd up a great Ditch with thir Carcaſſes. Thus hung the Victory wavering on either ſide, from the third hour of day to Evening; when Harold having maintain'd the Fight with unſpeakable Courage and perſonal Valour, ſhot into the Head with an Arrow, fell at length, and left his Souldiers without heart longer to withſtand the unwearied Enemy. With Harold fell alſo his two Brothers, Leofwin, and Girtha, with them greateſt part of the Engliſh Nobility. His Body lying dead, a Knight or Souldier wounding on the Thigh, was by the Duke preſently turn'd out of Military Service. Of Normans and

French were ſlain no ſmall number; the Duke himſelf alſo that day not a little hazarded his Perſon, having had three choice Horſes kill'd under him. Victory obtain'd, and his dead carefully buried, the Engliſh alſo by permiſſion, he ſent the Body of Harold to his Mother without Ranſom, though ſhe offer'd very much to redeem it, which having receav'd ſhe buried at Waltham, in a Church built there by Harold. In the mean while, Edwin and Morcar, who had withdrawn themſelves from Harold, hearing of his Death, came to London; ſending Aldgith the Queen thir Siſter with all ſpeed to Weſt-Cheſter. Aldred Archbiſhop of York, and many of the Nobles, with the Londoners would have ſet up Edgar the right Heir, and prepar'd themſelves to fight for him; but Morcar and Edwin not liking the choice, who each of them expected to have been choſ'n before him, withdrew thir Forces and return'd home. Duke William contrary to his former reſolution, if Florent of Worſter, and they who follow him ſay true, waſting, burning, and ſlaying all in his way, or rather, as ſaith Malmsbury, not in hoſtile but in regal manner, came up to London, met at Barcham by Edgar, with the Nobles, Biſhops, Citizens, and at length Edwin and Morcar, who all ſubmitted to him, gave Hoſtages, and ſwore Fidelity, he to them promis'd peace and defence; yet permitted his men the while to burn and make prey. Coming to London with all his Army, he was on Chriſmaſs day ſolemnly crown'd in the great Church at Weſtminſter, by Aldred Archbiſhop of York, having firſt given his Oath at the Altar in preſence of all the People, to defend the Church, well govern the People, maintain right Law, prohibit Rapine and unjuſt Judgment. Thus the Engliſh while they agreed not about the choice of thir native King, were conſtrein'd to take the Yoke of an outlandiſh Conqueror. With what minds and by what courſe of Life they had fitted themſelves for this ſervitude, William of Malmsbury ſpares not to lay op'n. Not a few years before the Normans came, the Clergy, though in Edward the Confeſſors daies, had loſt all good Literature and Religion, ſcarſe able to read and underſtand thir Latin Service: he was a miracle to others who knew his Grammar. The Monks went clad in fine Stuffs, and made no difference what they eat; which though in it ſelf no fault, yet to thir Conſciences was irreligious. The great men given to gluttony and diſſolute Life, made a prey of the common People, abuſing thir Daughters whom they had in ſervice, then turning them off to the Stews; the meaner ſort tipling together night and day, ſpent all they had in Drunk'neſs, attended with other Vices which effeminate mens minds. Whence it came to paſs, that carried on with fury and raſhneſs more then any true fortitude or ſkill of War, they gave to William thir Conqueror ſo eaſy a Conqueſt. Not but that ſom few of all ſorts were much better among them; but ſuch was the generality. And as the long ſuffering of God permits bad men to enjoy proſperous daies with the good, ſo his ſeverity oft times exempts not good men from thir ſhare in evil times with the bad.

If theſe were the Cauſes of ſuch miſery and thraldom to thoſe our Anceſtors, with what better cloſe can be concluded, then here in fit ſeaſon to remember this Age in the midſt of her ſecurity, to fear from like Vices without amendment the Revolution of like Calamities?

They not over-wiſe, brought word that the Dukes Army were moſt of them Prieſts; for they ſaw thir Faces all over ſhav'n; the Engliſh then uſing to let grow on thir upper-lip large Muſtachio's, as did antiently the Britans. The King laughing anſwer'd, that they were not Prieſts, but valiant and hardy Souldiers. Therfore ſaid Girtha his Brother, a youth of noble courage and underſtanding above his Age, Forbear thou thy ſelf to fight, who art obnoxious to Duke William by Oath, let us unſworn undergo the hazard of Battel, who may juſtly fight in the defence of our Country; thou reſerv'd to fitter time, maiſt either reunite us flying, or revenge us dead. The King not hark'ning to this, leſt it might ſeem to argue fear in him or a bad cauſe, with like reſolution rejected the offers of Duke William ſent to him by a Monk before the Battel, with this only anſwer haſtily deliver'd, Let God judg between us. The offers were theſe, that Harold would either lay down the Scepter, or hold it of him, or try his Title with him by ſingle Combat in ſight of both Armies, or refer it to the Pope. Theſe rejected, both ſides prepar'd to fight the next morning, the Engliſh from ſinging and drinking all Night, the Normans from confeſſion of thir Sins and communion of the Hoſt. The Engliſh were in a ſtreit diſadvantagious place, ſo that many diſcourag'd with thir ill ordering, ſcarce having room where to ſtand, ſlip'd away before the onſet, the reſt in cloſe order with thir Battel-Axes and Shields, made an impenetrable Squadron: the King himſelf with his Brothers on foot ſtood by the Royal Standard, wherin the figure of a man fighting was inwov'n with Gold and pretious Stones. The Norman Foot, moſt Bowmen, made the formoſt Front, on either ſide Wings of Horſe ſomwhat behind. The Duke arming, and his Corſlet giv'n him on the wrong ſide, ſaid pleaſantly, The ſtrength of my Dukedom will be turn'd now into a Kingdom. Then the whole Army ſinging the Song of Rowland, the remembrance of whoſe Exploits might hart'n them, imploring laſtly Divine help, the Battel began; and was fought ſorely on either ſide: but the main body of Engliſh Foot by no means would be brok'n, till the Duke cauſing his men to feign flight, drew them out with deſire of purſuit into open diſorder, then turn'd ſuddenly upon them ſo routed by themſelves, which wrought thir overthrow; yet ſo they dy'd not unmanfully, but turning oft upon thir Enemies, by the advantage of an upper ground, beat them down by heaps, and fill'd up a great Ditch with thir Carcaſſes. Thus hung the Victory wavering on either ſide, from the third hour of day to Evening; when Harold having maintain'd the Fight with unſpeakable Courage and perſonal Valour, ſhot into the Head with an Arrow, fell at length, and left his Souldiers without heart longer to withſtand the unwearied Enemy. With Harold fell alſo his two Brothers, Leofwin, and Girtha, with them greateſt part of the Engliſh Nobility. His Body lying dead, a Knight or Souldier wounding on the Thigh, was by the Duke preſently turn'd out of Military Service. Of Normans and French were ſlain no ſmall number; the Duke himſelf alſo that day not a little hazarded his Perſon, having had three choice Horſes kill'd under him. Victory obtain'd, and his dead carefully buried, the Engliſh alſo by permiſſion, he ſent the Body of Harold to his Mother without Ranſom, though ſhe offer'd very much to redeem it, which having receav'd ſhe buried at Waltham, in a Church built there by Harold. In the mean while, Edwin and Morcar, who had withdrawn themſelves from Harold, hearing of his Death, came to London; ſending Aldgith the Queen thir Siſter with all ſpeed to Weſt-Cheſter. Aldred Archbiſhop of York, and many of the Nobles, with the Londoners would have ſet up Edgar the right Heir, and prepar'd themſelves to fight for him; but Morcar and Edwin not liking the choice, who each of them expected to have been choſ'n before him, withdrew thir Forces and return'd home. Duke William contrary to his former reſolution, if Florent of Worſter, and they who follow him ſay true, waſting, burning, and ſlaying all in his way, or rather, as ſaith Malmsbury, not in hoſtile but in regal manner, came up to London, met at Barcham by Edgar, with the Nobles, Biſhops, Citizens, and at length Edwin and Morcar, who all ſubmitted to him, gave Hoſtages, and ſwore Fidelity, he to them promiſ'd peace and defence; yet permitted his men the while to burn and make prey. Coming to London with all his Army, he was on Chriſmaſs day ſolemnly crown'd in the great Church at Weſtminſter, by Aldred Archbiſhop of York, having firſt given his Oath at the Altar in preſence of all the People, to defend the Church, well govern the People, maintain right Law, prohibit Rapine and unjuſt Judgment. Thus the Engliſh while they agreed not about the choice of thir native King, were conſtrein'd to take the Yoke of an outlandiſh Conqueror. With what minds and by what courſe of Life they had fitted themſelves for this ſervitude, William of Malmsbury ſpares not to lay op'n. Not a few years before the Normans came, the Clergy, though in Edward the Confeſſors daies, had loſt all good Literature and Religion, ſcarſe able to read and underſtand thir Latin Service: he was a miracle to others who knew his Grammar. The Monks went clad in fine Stuffs, and made no difference what they eat; which though in it ſelf no fault, yet to thir Conſciences was irreligious. The great men given to gluttony and diſſolute Life, made a prey of the common People, abuſing thir Daughters whom they had in ſervice, then turning them off to the Stews; the meaner ſort tipling together night and day, ſpent all they had in Drunk'neſs, attended with other Vices which effeminate mens minds. Whence it came to paſs, that carried on with fury and raſhneſs more then any true fortitude or skill of War, they gave to William thir Conqueror ſo eaſy a Conqueſt. Not but that ſom few of all ſorts were much better among them; but ſuch was the generality. And as the long ſuffering of God permits bad men to enjoy proſperous daies with the good, ſo his ſeverity oft times exempts not good men from thir ſhare in evil times with the bad.

If theſe were the Cauſes of ſuch miſery and thraldom to thoſe our Anceſtors, with what better cloſe can be concluded, then here in fit ſeaſon to remember this Age in the midſt of her ſecurity, to fear from like Vices without amendment the Revolution of like Calamities?

The Preface.

ALthough it be a certain Truth that they who undertake a Religious Cauſe need not care to be Men-pleaſers; yet becauſe the ſatisfaction of tender and mild Conſciences is far different from that which is call'd Men-pleaſing, to ſatisfy ſuch, I ſhall adreſſe my ſelf in few words to give notice before hand of ſomething in this Book, which to ſome Men perhaps may ſeeme offenſive, that when I have render'd a lawfull reaſon of what is done, I may truſt to have ſav'd the labour of defending or excuſing hereafter. We all know that in private or perſonall Injuries, yea in publique Sufferings for the cauſe of Chriſt, his Rule and Example teaches us to be ſo far from a readineſs to ſpeak evil, as not to anſwer the reviler in his Language, though never ſo much provok't: Yet in the detecting, and convincing of any notorious Enemie to Truth and his Countries Peace, eſpecially that is conceited to have a voluble and ſmart fluence of Tongue, and in the vain confidence of that, and out of a more tenacious cling to worldly reſpects, ſtands up for all the reſt to juſtifie a long Uſurpation and convicted Pſeudepiſcopy of Prelates, with all their Ceremonies, Liturgies, and Tyrannies which God and Man are now ready to explode and hiſſe out of the Land; I ſuppoſe, and more then ſuppoſe, it will be nothing diſagreeing from Chriſtian Meekeneſs, to handle ſuch a one in a rougher Accent, and to ſend home his Haughtineſſe well beſpurted with his owne Holy-water. Nor to do thus are we unautoritied either from the morall Precept of SALOMON, to anſwer him thereafter that prides him in his Folly; nor from the example of Chriſt, and all his Followers in all Ages, who in the refuting of thoſe that reſiſted ſound Doctrine, and by ſubtile Diſſimulations corrupted the minds of Men, have wrought up their zealous Souls into ſuch vehemencies, as nothing could be more killingly ſpoken: for who can be a greater enemy to Mankind, who a more dangerous deceiver, then he who defending a traditional Corruption uſes no common Arts, but with a wily Stratagem of yeelding to the time a greater part of his Cauſe, ſeeming to forgo all that Man's Invention hath done therein, and driven from much of his bold in Scripture; yet leaving it hanging by a twin'd Threed, not from Divine Command, but from Apoſtolical Prudence or Aſſent; as if he had the ſurety of ſome rouling Trench, creeps up by this meanes to his relinquiſh't fortreſſe of Divine Authority again, and ſtill hovering betweene the Confines of that which he dares not bee openly, and that which he will not be ſincerely, traines on the eaſie Chriſtian inſenſibly within the cloſe ambuſhment of worſt Errors, and with a ſlye ſhuffle of counterfeit Principles, chopping and changing till hee have glean'd all the good ones out of their Minds, leaves them at laſt, after a ſlight reſemblance of ſweeping and garniſhing, under the ſevenfold poſſeſſion of a deſperate Stupidity. And therefore they that love the Soules of Men, which is the deareſt love, and ſtirs up the nobleſt jealouſie, when they meet with ſuch Colluſion, cannot be blam'd though they bee tranſported with the zeale of Truth to a well heated fervencie; eſpecially, ſeeing they which thus offend againſt the Souls of their Brethren, do it with delight to their great Gaine, eaſe, and advancement in this World; but they that ſeek to diſcover and oppoſe their falſe trade of Deceiving, do it not without a ſad and unwilling Anger, not without many Hazards; but without all private and perſonall ſpleene, and without any thought of earthly Reward, when as this very courſe they take ſtopps their hopes of aſcending above a lowly and unenviable pitch in this Life. And although in the ſerious uncaſing of a grand Impoſture (for to deale plainly with you Readers, Prelatry is no better) there be mixt here and there ſuch a grim laughter, as may appear at the ſame time in an auſtere Viſage, it cannot be taxt of Levity or Inſolence: for even this veine of laughing (as I could produce out of grave Authors) hath oft-times a ſtrong and ſinewy force in teaching and confuting; nor can there be a more proper object of Indignation and Scorne together, then a falſe Prophet taken in the greateſt, deareſt and moſt dangerous cheat, the cheat of Souls: in the diſcloſing whereof, if it be harmfull to be angry, and withall to caſt a lowring Smile, when the propereſt Object calls for both, it will be long enough ere any be able to ſay, why thoſe two moſt rationall faculties of humane intellect, Anger and Laughter, were firſt ſeated in the breſt of Man. Thus much (Readers) in favour of the ſofter ſpirited Chriſtian, for other exceptioners there was no thought taken. Only if it be ask't, why this cloſe and ſuccinct manner of coping with the Adverſary was rather choſen, this was the reaſon chiefly, that the ingenuous Reader, without further amuſing himſelf in the Labyrinth of controverſall Antiquity, may come to the ſpeedieſt way to ſee the Truth vindicated, and Sophiſtry taken ſhort at the firſt falſe bound. Next, that the Remonſtrant himſelf, as oft as hee pleaſes to be frolick, and brave it with others, may find no gain of Money, and may learn not to inſult in ſo bad a Cauſe. But now he begins.

SECT. I.

Pag. 1. Remonſtrant. My ſingle Remonſtrance is encountred with a plurall Adverſary.

Anſwere. Did not your ſingle Remonſtrance bring along with it a hot ſent of your more then ſingular Affection to ſpirituall Pluralities, your ſingleneſſe would be leſſe ſuſpected with all good Chriſtians then it is.

Remonſt. Their Names, Perſons, Qualities, Numbers, I care not to know.

Anſw. Their Names are knowne to the all-knowing Power above; and in the meane while doutleſſe they wreck not whether you or your Nomenclator know them or not.

Remonſt. But could they ſay my name is Legion, for we are many.

Anſw. Wherefore ſhould you begin with the Devils Name, deſcanting upon the number of your Opponents? wherefore that conceit of Legion with a by-wipe? Was it becauſe you would have Men take notice how you eſteeme them, whom through all your Booke ſo bountifully you call your Brethren? we had not thought that Legion could have furniſht the Remonſtrant with ſo many Brethren.

Remonſt. My cauſe, yea Gods, would bid me meet them undiſmai'd, &c.

Anſw. Ere a foot furder we muſt bee content to hear a preambling boaſt of your Valour, what a St. Dunſtane you are to encounter Legions, either Infernall or Humane.

Remonſt. My cauſe, yea Gods.

Anſw. What Gods? unleſſe your Belly, or the God of this World be hee? Shew us any one point of your Remonſtrance that do's not more concern Superiority, Pride, Eaſe, and the Belly, then the Truth and Glory of God, or the Salvation of Soules.

Remonſt. My cauſe, yea Gods, would bid me meet them undiſmai'd, and to ſay with holy David, though an Hoaſt, &c.

Anſw. Doe not think to perſwade us of your undaunted Courage, by miſapplying to your ſelf the words of holy David; we know you feare, and are in an Agonie at this preſent, leſt you ſhould loſe that ſuperfluity of Riches and Honour which your party uſurp. And whoſoever covets, and ſo earneſtly labours to keep ſuch an incumbring ſurcharge of earthly things, cannot but have an Earth-quake ſtill in his Bones. You are not arm'd Remonſtrant, nor any of your Band; you are not dieted, nor your Loynes girt for ſpiritual Valour, and Chriſtian Warfare, the luggage is too great that followes your Camp; your hearts are there, you march heavily: How ſhall we think you have not carnall Fear, while we ſee you ſo ſubject to carnal Deſires?

Pag. 2. Remonſt. I do gladly fly to the Barre.

Anſw. To the Barre with him then. Gladly you ſay. We beleeve you as gladly as your whole Faction wiſh't, and long'd for the aſſembling of this Parliament, as gladly as your Beneficiaries the Prieſts came up to anſwer the complaints and outcries all of the Shires.

Remonſt. The Areopagi? who were thoſe? truly my Maſters, I had thought this had been the name of the Place, not of the Men.

Anſw. A ſoar-Eagle would not ſtoope at a Flye; but ſure ſome Pedagogue ſtood at your Elbow, and made it itch with this parlous Criticiſme; they urg'd you with a Decree of the ſage and ſevere Judges of Athens, and you cite them to appear for certaine Paragogicall Contempts, before a capricious Pædantie of hot-liver'd Grammarians. Miſtake not the matter courteous Remonſtrant, they were not making Latines; if in dealing with an outlandiſh Name, they thought it beſt not to ſcrew the Engliſh Mouth to a harſh forreigne Termination, tion, ſo they kept the radicall word, they did no more than the eleganteſt Authors among the Greeks, Romans, and at this day the Italians in ſcorne of ſuch a ſervility uſe to doe. Remember how they mangle our Britiſh Names abroad; what treſpaſſe were it, if we in requitall ſhould as much neglect theirs? and our learned Chaucer did not ſtick to doe ſo, writing Semyramus for Semiramis, Amphiorax for Amphiaraus, K. Sejes for K. Ceyx the husband of Alcyone, with many other names ſtrangely metamorphis'd from true Orthography, if he had made any account of that in theſe kind of words.

Remon. Leſt the World ſhould think the Preſſe had of late forgot to ſpeak any Language other then libellous, this honeſt Paper hath broken through the throng.

At the beginning of his Remonſtrance.

Anſ. Mince the matter while you will, it ſhew'd but green practiſe in the Lawes of diſcreet Rhethorique to blurt upon the eares of a judicious Parliament with ſuch a preſumptuous and over-weening Proem: but you doe well to be the Sewer of your owne meſſe.

Remon. That which you miſcall the Preface, was a too juſt complaint of the ſhamfull number of Libells.

Anſ. How long is it that you and the Prelaticall Troop have bin in ſuch diſtaſt with Libells? ask your Lyſimachus Nicanor what defaming Invectives have lately flown abroad againſt the Subjects of Scotland, and our poore expulſed Brethren of New-England, the Prelates rather applauding then ſhewing any diſlike: and this hath bin ever ſo, in ſo much, that Sir Francis Bacon in one of his Diſcourſes complaines of the Biſhops uneven hand over theſe Pamflets, confining thoſe againſt Biſhops to darkneſſe, but licenſing thoſe againſt Puritans to be utter'd openly, though with the greater miſchiefe of leading into contempt the exerciſe of Religion in the perſons of ſundry Preachers, and diſgracing the higher matter in the meaner perſon.

Anſ. Wee know where the ſhoo wrings you, you fret, and are gall'd at the quick, and O what a Death it is to the Prelates to be thus un-viſarded, thus uncas'd, to have the Periwigs pluck't off that cover your Baldneſſe, your inſide Nakedneſſe thrown open to publick view! The Romans had a time once every year, when their Slaves might freely ſpeake their minds; 'twere hard if the free-borne People of England, with whom the voyce of Truth for theſe many yeares, even againſt the Proverb, hath not bin heard but in corners, after all your Monkiſh Prohibitions, and expurgatorious Indexes, your Gags and Snaffles, your proud Imprimaturs not to be obtain'd without the ſhallow ſurview, but not ſhallow hand of ſome mercenary, narrow ſoul'd, and illitterate Chaplain; when liberty of ſpeaking, then which nothing is more ſweet to Man, was girded, and ſtraight-lac't almoſt to a broken-winded Tizzick, if now at a good time, our time of Parliament, the very Jubily, and Reſurrection of the State, if now the conceal'd, the aggreev'd, and long perſecuted Truth, could not be ſuffer'd ſpeak; and though ſhe burſt out with ſome efficacy of words, could not be excus'd after ſuch an injurious ſtrangle of ſilence, nor avoyde the cenſure of Libelling, 'twere hard, 'twere ſomething pinching in a Kingdome of free Spirits. Some Princes, and great Statiſts, have thought it a prime piece of neceſſary Policy to thruſt themſelves under diſguiſe into a popular throng, to ſtand the night long under eaves of houſes, and low windows, that they might hear every where the free utterances of privat Breſts, and amongſt them find out the precious gemme of Truth, as amongſt the numberleſſe pibbles of the ſhoar; whereby they might be the abler to diſcover, and avoyde that deceitful and cloſe coutcht evil of Flattery that ever attends them, and miſleads them, and might ſkilfully know how to apply the ſeveral Redreſſes to each Malady of State, without truſting the diſloyal Information of Paraſites and Sycophants: whereas now this permiſſion of free writing, were there no good elſe in it, yet at ſome times thus licenc't, is ſuch an unripping, ſuch an Anatomie of the ſhieſt and tendereſt particular Truths, as makes not only the whole Nation in many points the wiſer, but alſo preſents and carries home to Princes, and Men moſt remote from vulgar Concourſe, ſuch a full inſight of every lurking Evil, or reſtrained Good among the Commons, as that they ſhall not need hereafter in old Cloaks, and falſe Beards, to ſtand to the courteſy of a night-walking Cudgeller for eaves dropping, nor to accept quietly as a Perfume, the over-head emptying of ſome ſalt Lotion. Who could be angry therefore but thoſe that are guilty, with theſe free-ſpoken and plain-harted Men that are the Eyes of their Country, and the Proſpective-glaſſes of their Prince? But theſe are the Nettlers, theſe are the blabbing Bookes that tell, though not halfe your fellows feats. You love toothleſſe Satyrs; let me inform you, a toothleſſe Satyr is as improper as a toothed ſleekſtone, and as bulliſh.

Remon. I beſeech you Brethren ſpend your Logick upon your own workes.

Anſ. The peremptory Analyſis that you call it, I beleeve will be ſo hardy as once more to unpinne your ſpruce faſtidious Oratory, to rumple her laces, her frizzles, and her bobins, tho ſhe wince, and fling never ſo peeviſhly.

Pag. 4. Remon. Thoſe verbal Exceptions are but light froth, and will ſink alone.

Anſ. O rare ſuttlety, beyond all that Cardan ever dream't of! when I beſeech you, will light things ſink? when will light froth ſink alone? Here in your phraſe, the ſame day that heavy plummets will ſwimme alone. Truſt this Man, Readers, if you pleaſe, whoſe Divinity would reconcile England with Rome, and his Philoſophy make friends nature with the Chaos, ſine pondere habentia pondus.

Remon. That ſcum may be worth taking off which followes.

Anſ. Spare your Ladle, Sir, it will be as bad as the Biſhops foot in the broth; the ſcum will be found upon your own Remonſtrance.

Remon. I ſhall deſire all indifferent eyes to judg whether theſe Men do not endeavour to caſt unjuſt envy upon me.

Anſ. Agreed.

Remon. I had ſaid that the civil Polity as in general Notion, hath ſometimes varied, and that the Civil came from Arbitrary Impoſers; theſe gracious Interpreters would needs draw my words to the preſent and particular Government of our Monarchy.

Anſ. And deſervedly have they don ſo; take up your Logick elſe and ſee: Civil Politie, ſay you, hath ſometimes varied, and came from Arbitrary Impoſers; what Propoſition is this? Biſhop Downam in his Dialecticks will tell you it is a general Axiome, though the univerſal Particle be not expres't, and you your ſelfe in your Defence ſo explaine in theſe words as in general notion. Hence is juſtly inferr'd, he that ſaies civil Polity is arbitrary, ſaies that the civil Polity of England is Arbitrary. The Inference is undeniable, a theſi ad hypotheſin, or from the general to the particular, an evincing Argument in Logick.

Pag. 5. Remon. Brethren, whiles yee deſire to ſeeme Godly, learne to be leſſe malitious.

Anſ. Remonſtrant, till you have better learnt your Principles of Logick, take not upon you to be a Doctor to others.

Remon. God bleſſe all good Men from ſuch Charity.

Anſ. I never found that Logical Maxims were uncharitable before, yet ſhould a Jury of Logicians paſſe upon you, you would never be ſav'd by the Book.

Remon. And our ſacred Monarchy from ſuch Friends.

Anſ. Adde, as the Prelates.

Remon. If Epiſcopacy have yoked Monarchy, it is the Inſolence of the Perſons, not the fault of the Calling.

Anſw. It was the fault of the Perſons, and of no Calling; we doe not count Prelatry a Calling.

Pag. 6. Remon. The Teſtimony of a Pope (whom theſe Men honor highly).

Anſ. That ſlanderous Inſertion was doubtles a pang of your incredible Charity, the want whereof you lay ſo often to their charge; a kind token of your favour lapt up in a parentheſis, a piece of the Clergy benevolence layd by to maintain the Epiſcopal broile, whether the 1000 Horſe or no, time will diſcover: for certainly had thoſe Cavaliers come on to play their parts, ſuch a ticket as this of highly honouring the Pope, from the hand of a Prelate, might have bin of ſpecial uſe and ſafety to them that had car'd for ſuch a ranſom.

Remon. And what ſaies Antichriſt?

Anſ. Ask your Brethren the Prelates that hold Intelligence with him, ask not us. But is the Pope Antichriſt now? good newes! take heed you be not ſhent for this, for 'tis verily thought, that had this Bill bin put in againſt him in your laſt Convocation, he would have bin clear'd by moſt voices.

Remon. Any thing ſerves againſt Epiſcopacy.

Anſ. See the frowardneſſe of this Man, he would perſwade us that the Succeſſion and divine Right of Biſhopdom hath bin unqueſtionable through all Ages; yet when they bring againſt him Kings, they were irreligious; Popes, they are Antichriſt. By what Æra of Computation, through what Faery Land, would the Man deduce this perpetual bead-roul of uncontradicted Epiſcopacy? The Pope may as well boaſt his ungainſaid Authority to them that will believe that all his Contradicters were either irreligious or heretical.

Remonſt. If the Biſhops, ſaith the Pope, be declar'd to be of divine Right, they would be exempted from regal Power; and if there might be this danger in thoſe Kingdoms, why is this enviouſly upraided to thoſe of ours? who do gladly profeſſe, &c. Pag. 7.

Anſw. Becauſe your diſſever'd Principles were but like the mangl'd pieces of a gaſh't Serpent, that now begun to cloſe, and grow together Popiſh againe. Whatſoever you now gladly profeſſe out of fear, we know what your drifts were when you thought your ſelves ſecure.

Remonſt. It is a foul ſlander to charge the name of Epiſcopacy with a Faction, for the Fact imputed to ſome few.

Anſw. The more foul your Faction that hath brought a harmleſſe name into obloquie, and the Fact may juſtly be imputed to all of yee that ought to have withſtood it, and did not.

Remonſt. Fie Brethren! are yee the Presbyters of the Church of England, and dare chalenge Epiſcopacy of Faction?

Anſw. Yes, as oft as Epiſcopacy dares be factious.

Remonſt. Had you ſpoken ſuch a word in the time of holy Cyprian, what had become of you?

Anſw. They had neither bin hal'd into your Gehenna at Lambeth, nor ſtrappado'd with an Oath ex officio by your Bow-men of the Arches: and as for Cyprian's time, the cauſe was farre unlike, he indeed ſucceeded into an Epiſcopacy that began then to prelatize; but his perſonal Excellence like an Antidote overcame the malignity of that breeding Corruption which was then a Diſeaſe that lay hid for a while under ſhew of a full and healthy Conſtitution, as thoſe hydropick humors not diſcernable at firſt from a fair and juicy fleſhineſſe of body, or that unwonted ruddy colour which ſeems graceful to a cheek otherwiſe pale; and yet ariſes from evil cauſes, either of ſome inward obſtruction or inflammation, and might deceav the firſt Phiſicians till they had learnt the ſequell, which Cyprians dayes did not bring forth; and the Prelatiſm of Epiſcopacy which began then to burgeon and ſpread, had as yet, eſpecially in famous Men, a fair, though a falſe imitation of flouriſhing.

Remonſt. Neither is the wrong leſſe to make application of that which was moſt juſtly charged upon the practiſes and combinations of libelling Separatiſts, whom I deſervedly cenſur'd, &c. Pag. 8.

Anſw. To conclude this Section, our Remonſtrant we ſee is reſolv'd to make good that which was formerly ſaid of his Book, that it was neither humble, nor a Remonſtrance, and this his Defence is of the ſame complexion. When he is conſtrain'd to mention the notorious violence of his Clergy attempted on the Church of Scotland, he ſlightlie termes it a Fact imputed to ſome few; but when he ſpeakes of that which the Parliament voutſafes to name the City Petition, which I, ſaith he, (as if the State had made him publick Cenſor) deſervedly cenſur'd. And how? as before for a tumultuarie and underhand way of procured Subſcriptions, ſo now in his Defence more bitterly, as the practizes and combinations of libelling Separatiſts, and the miſzealous Advocates thereof juſtly to be branded for Incendiaries. Whether this be for the honour of our cheif City to be noted with ſuch an Infamie for a Petition, which not without ſome of the Magiſtrates, and great numbers of ſober and conſiderable Men, was orderly, and meekly preſented, although our great Clarks think that theſe Men, becauſe they have a Trade, (as Chriſt himſelfe, and St. Paul had) cannot therefore attaine to ſome good meaſure of knowledge, and to a reaſon of their Actions, as well as they that ſpend their youth in loitering, bezzling, and harlotting, their Studies in unprofitable Queſtions and barbarous Sophiſtry, their middle Age in Ambition and Idleneſſe, their old Age in Avarice, Dotage, and Diſeaſes: and whether this reflect not with a Contumely upon the Parliament it ſelf, which thought this Petition worthy, not only of receaving, but of voting to a Commitment, after it had bin advocated, and mov'd for by ſome honourable and learned Gentlemen of the Houſe, to be cal'd a Combination of libelling Separatiſts, and the Advocates thereof to be branded for Incendiaries; whether this appeach not the Judgement and Approbation of the Parliament, I leave to equall Arbiters.

SECT. 2.

Remonſt. After the overflowing of your Gall, you deſcend to Liturgy and Epiſcopacy.

Anſw. The overflow being paſt, you cannot now in your owne Judgement impute any bitterneſſe to their following Diſcourſes.

Pag. 9. Remonſt. Dr. Hall, whom you name, I dare ſay for honors ſake.

Anſw. Y' are a merry Man, Sir, and dare ſay much.

Remonſt. And why ſhould I not ſpeake of Martyrs, as the Authors and Uſers of this holy Liturgie?

Anſw. As the Authors? the Tranſlators you might perhaps have ſaid: for Edward the Sixt, as Hayward hath written in his Story, will tell you upon the word of a King, that the Order of the Service, and the uſe thereof in the Engliſh Tongue, is no other then the old Service was, and the ſame words in Engliſh which were in Latine, except a few things omitted, ſo fond, that it had been a ſhame to have heard them in Engliſh; theſe are his words: whereby we are left uncertaine who the Author was, but certain that part of the work was eſteem'd ſo abſurd by the Tranſlators thereof, as was to be aſham'd of in Engliſh. O but the Martyrs were the Refiners of it, for that only is left you to ſay. Admit they were, they could not reſine a Scorpion into a Fiſh, though they had drawn it, and rinc't it with never ſo cleanly Cookery, which made them fall at variance among themſelves about the uſe either of it, or the Ceremonies belonging to it.

Remonſt. Slight you them as you pleaſe, we bleſſe God for ſuch Patrons of our good Cauſe.

Anſw. O Benedicite! Qui color ater erat, nunc eſt contrarius atro. Are not theſe they which one of your Biſhops in print ſcornfully termes the Foxian Confeſſors? Are not theſe they whoſe Acts and Monuments are not only ſo contemptible, but ſo hatefull to the Prelates, that their Story was almoſt come to be a prohibited Book, which for theſe two or three Editions hath crept into the World by ſtealth, and at times of advantage, not without the open Regret and Vexation of the Biſhops, as many honeſt Men that had to do in ſetting forth the Book will juſtifie? And now at a dead lift for your Liturgies you bleſſe God for them: out upon ſuch Hypocriſie.

Pag. 10. Remonſt. As if wee were bound to make good every word that falls from the mouth of every Biſhop.

Anſw. Your Faction then belike is a ſubtile Janus, and has two faces: your bolder face to ſet forward any Innovations or Scandalls in the Church, your cautious and wary face to diſavow them if they ſucceed not, that ſo the fault may not light upon the Function, leſt it ſhould ſpoil the whole Plot by giving it an irrecoverable wound. Wherefore els did you not long agoe, as a good Biſhop ſhould have done, diſclaim and proteſt againſt them? wherefore have you ſate ſtill, and comply'd and hood-winkt, till the generall Complaints of the Land have ſqueez'd you to a wretched, cold and hollow-hearted Confeſſion of ſome prelaticall Riots both in this and other places of your Booke? Nay what if you ſtill defend them as followes?

Remonſt. If a Biſhop have ſaid that our Liturgie hath bin ſo wiſely and charitably fram'd as that the Devotion of it yeeldeth no cauſe of offence to a very Popes eare.

Anſw. O new and never-heard of Supererogative heighth of Wiſdome and Charity in our Liturgie! is the Wiſdome of God or the charitable framing of Gods Word otherwiſe inoffenſive to the Popes eare, then as hee may turne it to the working of his miſterious Iniquitie? A little pulley would have ſtretch't your wiſe and charitable frame it may be three inches further, that the Devotion of it might have yeelded no cauſe of offence to the very Devils eare, and that had beene the ſame wiſdome and charity ſurmounting to the higheſt degree. For Antichriſt wee know is but the Devil's Vicar, and therefore pleaſe him with your Liturgie, and you pleaſe his Maiſter.

Remon. Would you thinke it requiſite that we ſhould chide and quarrell when we ſpeake to the God of Peace?

Anſ. Fie, no Sir, but forecaſt our Prayers ſo that Sathan and his Inſtruments may take as little exception againſt them as may be, leſt they ſhould chide and quarrell with us.

Remon. It is no little advantage to our Cauſe and Piety, that our Liturgy is taught to ſpeak ſeveral Languages for uſe and example.

Anſ. The Language of Aſhdod is one of them, and that makes ſo many Engliſh-men have ſuch a ſmattering of their Philiſtian Mother. And indeed our Liturgie hath run up and downe the world like an Engliſh gallopping Nun proffering her ſelf, but wee heare of none yet that bids money for her.

Remon. As for that ſharp Cenſure of learned Mr. Calvin, it might well have beene forborne by him in aliena Republica.

Anſ. Thus this untheologicall Remonſtrant would divide the individuall Catholick Church into ſeverall Republicks: know therefore that every worthy Paſtor of the Church of Chriſt hath univerſall right to admoniſh over all the world within the Church; nor can that care be alien'd from him by any diſtance or diſtinction of Nation, ſo long as in Chriſt all Nations and Languages are as one houſhold.

Remon. Neither would you thinke it could become any of our greateſt Divines to meddle with his charge. Pag. 11.

Anſ. It hath ill become 'em indeed to meddle ſo maliciouſly, as many of them have done, though that patient and Chriſtian City hath borne hitherto all their profane ſcoffes with ſilence.

Remon. Our Liturgie paſt the Judgment of no leſſe reverent heads then his owne.

Anſ. It brib'd their Judgment with worldly ingagements, and ſo paſt it.

Remon. As for that unparallel'd diſcourſe concerning the antiquity of Liturgies; I cannot help your wonder, but ſhall juſtifie mine owne aſſertion.

Anſ. Your Juſtification is but a miſerable ſhifting off thoſe teſtimonies of the ancienteſt Fathers alledg'd againſt you, and the authority of ſome Synodal Canons, which are no warrant to us. Wee profeſſe to decide our Controverſies only by the Scriptures, but yet to repreſſe your vain glory, there will be voluntarily beſtow'd upon you a ſufficient conviction of your novelties out of ſucceeding antiquity.

Remon. I cannot ſee how you will avoide your owne contradiction, for I demand, is this order of praying and adminiſtration ſet, or no? if it be not ſet, how is it an order? and if it be a ſet order both for matter and form. Pag. 12.

Anſ. Remove that Form, leſt you tumble over it, while you make ſuch haſt to clap a contradiction upon others.

Remon. If the formes were merely Arbitrary, to what uſe was the preſcription of an order?

Anſw. Nothing will cure this Man's Underſtanding but ſome familiar and kitching Phyſick, which, with pardon, muſt for plainneſs ſake be adminiſter'd to him. Call hither your Cook. The order of Breakfaſt, Dinner, and Supper, anſwer me, is it ſet or no? Set. Is a Man therefore bound in the morning to potcht Eggs and Vinegar, or at noon to Brawn or Beef, or at night to freſh Sammon, and French Kickſhoes? may he not make his meales in order, though he be not bound to this or that viand? doubtleſs the neat finger'd Artiſt will anſwer yes, and help us out of this great Controverſy without more trouble. Can we not underſtand an order in Church Aſſemblies of praying, reading, expounding, and adminiſtring, unleſs our Praiers be ſtill the ſame Crambe of words?

Remonſt. What a poore exception is this, that Liturgies were compos'd by ſome particular Men?

Anſw. It is a greater preſumption in any particular Men to arrogate to themſelves that which God univerſally gives to all his Miniſters. A Miniſter that cannot be truſted to pray in his own words without being chew'd to, and feſcu'd to a formal injunction of his Roteleſſon, ſhould as little be truſted to preach, beſides the vain babble of praying over the ſame things immediately again; for there is a large difference in the repetition of ſome pathetical Ejaculation rays'd out of the ſuddain earneſtneſs and vigour of the inflam'd Soul, (ſuch as was that of Chriſt in the Garden) from the continual reherſal of our dayly oriſons; which if a Man ſhall kneel down in a morning and ſay over, and preſently in another part of the Room kneel down again, and in other words ask but ſtill for the ſame things as it were out of one Inventory, I cannot ſee how he will eſcape that heatheniſh Battologie of multiplying words, which Chriſt himſelf that has the putting up of our Praiers, told us would not be acceptable in Heaven. Well may Men of eminent Guifts ſet forth as many forms, and helps to Praier as they pleaſe; but to impoſe them upon Miniſters lawfully call'd, and ſufficiently tri'd, as all ought to be ere they be admitted, is a ſupercilious Tyranny, impropriating the Spirit of God to themſelves.

Pag. 13. Remon. Do we abridge this liberty by ordaining a publick form?

Anſ. Your Biſhops have ſet as fair to do it as they durſt for that old Phariſaical fear that ſtill dogs them, the fear of the People; though you will ſay you are none of thoſe, ſtill you would ſeem not to have joyn'd with the worſt, and yet keep alooff off from that which is beſt. I would you would either mingle, or part: moſt true it is what Savanarola complaines, that while hee endeavour'd to reforme the Church, his greateſt Enemies were ſtill theſe lukewarm ones.

Remon. And if the Lord's Praier be an ordinary, and ſtinted form, why not others?

Anſ. Becauſe there be no other Lords that can ſtint with like Authority.

Pag. 14. Remon. If Juſtin Martyr ſaid that the Inſtructer of the People prai'd (as they falſly turn it) according to his ability.

Anſ. ὅση δύναμις ἀυτῳ will be ſo render'd to the World's end by thoſe that are not to learn Greek of the Remonſtrant, and ſo Langus renders it to his face, if he could ſee; and this ancient Father mentions no Antiphonies, or Reſponſories of the People heer, but the only plain acclamation of Amen.

Remon. The inſtructer of the People prai'd according to his ability 'tis true, ſo do ours, and yet we have a Liturgy, and ſo had they.

Anſ. A quick come off. The Ancients us'd Pikes and Targets, and therefore Guns and Great Ordnance, becauſe wee uſe both.

Remon. Neither is this liberty of powring out our ſelves in our Praiers ever the more impeach't by a publicke form.

Anſ. Yes the time is taken up with a tedious number of Liturgicall Tautologies, and Impertinencies.

Pag. 16. Remon. The words of the Councell are full and affirmative.

Anſ. Set the grave Councels up upon their ſhelves again, and ſtring them hard, leſt their various and jangling opinions put their leavs into a flutter. I ſhall not intend this hot ſeaſon to bid you the Baſe through the wide and duſty champaine of the Councels, but ſhall take counſel of that which counſel'd them, Reaſon: and although I know there is an obſolet reprehenſion now at your Tongue's end, yet I ſhall be bold to ſay that Reaſon is the gift of God in one Man as well as in a thouſand; by that which wee have taſted already of their Ceſterns, wee may find that Reaſon was the only thing, and not any divine Command that mov'd them to enjyne ſet forms of Liturgy. Firſt leſt any thing in general might be miſſaid in their publick Prayers through ignorance, or want of care, contrary to the Faith: and next, leſt the Arians, and Pelagians in particular ſhould infect the People by their hymns, and formes of Praier. By the leave of theſe ancient Fathers, this was no ſolid prevention of ſpredding Hæreſy, to debarre the Miniſters of God the uſe of their nobleſt talent, Praier in the Congregation, unleſſe they had forbid the uſe of Sermons, and Lectures too, but ſuch as were ready made to their hands as our Homelies; or elſe he that was heretically diſpos'd, had as fair an opportunity of infecting in his diſcours, as in his Praier or hymn. As inſufficiently, and to ſay truth, as imprudently did they provide by their contrived Liturgies, leſt any thing ſhould be erroneouſly praid through ignorance, or want of care in the Miniſters. For if they were careleſſe, and ignorant in their Praiers, certainly they would be more careleſſe in their preaching, and yet more careleſſe in watching over their Flock; and what preſcription could reach to bound them in both theſe? What if Reaſon, now illuſtrated by the word of God, ſhall be able to produce a better prevention then theſe Councells have left us againſt hereſie, ignorance or want of care in the Miniſtry, that ſuch wiſdome and diligence be us'd in the education of thoſe that would be Miniſters, and ſuch ſtrict and ſerious examination to be undergon ere their admiſſion, as Saint Paul to Timothy ſets down at large, and then they need not carry ſuch an unworthy ſuſpicion over the Preachers of God's word, as to tutor their unſoundneſſe with the Abcie of a Liturgy, or to diet their ignorance, and want of care, with the limited draught of a Mattin, and even ſong drench. And this may ſuffice after all your laborſome ſcrutinie of the Councels.

Pag. 17. Remon. Our Saviour was pleas'd to make uſe in the celebration of his laſt and heavenly Banket both of the faſhions, and words which were uſual in the Jewiſh Feaſts.

Anſ. What he pleas'd to make uſe of, does not juſtify what you pleaſe to force.

Remon. The ſet forms of Praier at the Mincha.

Anſ. Wee will not buy your Rabbinical fumes, wee have one that calls us to buy of him pure Gold tri'd in the fire.

Remon. In the Samaritan Chronicle.

Anſ. As little do wee eſteem your Samaritan trumpery, of which People Chriſt himſelfe teſtifies, Yee worſhip you know not what.

Pag. 18. Remon. They had their ſeverall Songs.

Anſ. And ſo have wee our ſeverall Pſalmes for ſeverall occaſions, without gramercy to your Liturgy.

Pag. 19. Remon. Thoſe forms which wee have under the names of Saint James, &c. though they have ſome interſertions which are plainly ſpurious, yet the ſubſtance of them cannot be taxt for other than holy and ancient.

Anſ. Setting aſide the odde coinage of your phraſe, which no mintmaiſter of Language would allow for ſterling, that a thing ſhould be taxt for no other then holy, and ancient, let it be ſuppos'd the ſubſtance of them may ſavour of ſomething holy or ancient, this is but the matter; the forme, and the end of the thing may yet render it either ſuperſtitious, fruitleſſe, or impious, and ſo worthy to be rejected. The Garments of a Strumpet are often the ſame materially, that cloath a chaſt Matron, and yet ignominious for her to weare; the ſubſtance of the Tempters words to our Saviour were holy, but his drift nothing leſſe.

Remon. In what ſenſe we hold the Roman a true Church, is ſo clear'd that this iron is too hot for their fingers.

Anſ. Have a care it be not the iron to ſear your own Conſcience.

Pag. 23. Remon. Ye need not doubt but that the alteration of the Liturgie will be conſidered by wiſer heads then your owne.

Anſ. We doubt it not, becauſe we know your head lookes to be one.

Remon. Our Liturgie ſymbolizeth not with Popiſh Maſſe, neither as Maſſe nor as Popiſh.

Anſ. A pretty ſlip-skin conveyance to ſift Maſſe into no Maſſe, and Popiſh into not Popiſh; yet ſaving this paſſing fine ſophiſticall boulting hutch, ſo long as ſhe ſymbolizes in forme, and pranks her ſelfe in the weeds of Popiſh Maſſe, it may be juſtly fear'd ſhee provokes the jealouſie of God, no otherwiſe then a Wife affecting whoriſh attire kindles a diſturbance in the eye of her diſcerning Husband.

Pag. 24. Remon. If I find Gold in the Channel, ſhall I throw it away becauſe it was ill laid?

Anſ. You have forgot that Gold hath been anathematiz'd for the idolatrous uſe; and to eat the good creatures of God once offer'd to Idols, is in Saint Paul's account to have fellowſhip with Devils, and to partake of the Devil's Table. And thus you throttle your ſelf with your own Similies.

Remon. If the Devils confeſt the Son of God, ſhall I diſclaim that truth?

Anſ. You ſifted not ſo clean before, but you ſhuffle as foulely now; as if there were the like neceſſity of confeſſing Chriſt, and uſing the Liturgie: wee do not diſclaime that truth; becauſe we never beleev'd it for his teſtimonie, but wee may well reject a Liturgie which had no being that wee can know of, but from the corrupteſt times: if therefore the Devil ſhould be given never ſo much to Prayer, I ſhould not therefore ceaſe from that Duty, becauſe I learn't it not from him; but if he would commend to me a new Pater noſter, though never ſo ſeeming holy, hee ſhould excuſe me the forme which was his, but the matter, which was none of his, he could not give me, nor I be ſaid to take it from him. 'Tis not the goodneſſe of matter therefore which is not, nor can be ow'd to the Liturgie, that will bear it out, if the form, which is the Eſſence of it, be fantaſtick and ſuperſtitious, the End ſiniſter, and the Impoſition violent.

Remonſt. Had it beene compoſed into this frame on purpoſe to bring Papiſts to our Churches.

Anſw. To bring them to our Churches? alas what was that? unleſs they had beene firſt fitted by Repentance, and right Inſtruction. You'l ſay, the Word was there preach't which is the means of Converſion; you ſhould have given ſo much honour then to the Word preach't, as to have left it to God's working without the interloping of a Liturgy baited for them to bite at.

Remon. The Project had been charitable and gracious.

Anſw. It was Phariſaicall, and vain-glorious, a greedy deſire to win Proſelites by conforming to them unlawfully; like the deſire of Tamar, who to raiſe up Seed to her Husband, ſate in the common Road dreſt like a Curtezan, and he that came to her committed Inceſt with her. This was that which made the old Chriſtians Paganize, while by their ſcandalous and baſe conforming to Heatheniſme they did no more, when they had done thir utmoſt, but bring ſome Pagans to Chriſtianize; for true Chriſtians they neither were themſelves, nor could make other ſuch in this faſhion.

Pag. 25. Remonſt. If there be found ought in Liturgie that may indanger a Scandall, it is under carefull hands to remove it.

Anſw. Such careful hands as have ſhowne themſelves ſooner bent to remove and expell the Men from the Scandals, then the Scandals from the Men, and to loſe a Soule rather than a Sillable or a Surplice.

Remonſt. It is idoliz'd they ſay in England, they mean at Amſterdam.

Anſw. Be it Idoliz'd therefore where it will, it is only Idolatriz'd in England.

Remonſt. Multitudes of People they ſay diſtaſt it; more ſhame for thoſe that have ſo miſtaught them.

Anſw. More ſhame for thoſe that regard not the troubling of God's Church with things by themſelves confeſt to be indifferent, ſince true Charity is afflicted, and burns at the offence of every little one. As for the Chriſtian multitude which you affirme to be ſo miſtaught, it is evident enough, though you would declaime never ſo long to the contrarie, that God hath now taught them to deteſt your Liturgie and Prelacie; God who hath promiſ'd to teach all his Children, and to deliver them out of your hands that hunt and worry their Soules: hence is it that a Man ſhall commonly find more ſavoury knowledge in one Lay-man, than in a dozen of Cathedrall Prelates; as we read in our Saviour's time that the common people had a reverent eſteem of him, and held him a great Prophet, whilſt the gowned Rabbies, the incomparable, and invincible Doctors were of opinion that hee was a Friend of Beelzebub.

Pag. 26. Remonſt. If the multitude diſtaſt wholſome Doctrine, ſhall we to humor them abandon it?

Anſw. Yet again! as if there were the like neceſſity of ſaving Doctrine, and arbitrary if not unlawfull, or inconvenient Liturgie: who would have thought a Man could have thwackt together ſo many incongruous Similitudes, had it not been to defend the motley incoherence of a patch'd Miſſal?

Remonſt. Why did not other Churches conform to us? I may boldly ſay ours was, and is the more noble Church.

Anſw. O Laodicean, how vainly and how carnally doſt thou boaſt of nobleneſſe, and precedency! more Lordly you have made our Church indeed, but not more noble.

Pag. 27. Remonſt. The ſecond quære is ſo weak, that I wonder it could fall from the Pens of Wiſemen.

Anſw. Y'are but a bad Fencer, for you never make a proffer againſt another Man's weakneſſe; but you leave your owne ſide alwayes open: mark what follows.

Remonſt. Brethren, can yee thinke that our Reformers had any other Intentions then all other the Founders of Liturgies, the leſt part of whoſe care was the help of the Miniſters weakneſſe ?

Anſw. Do you not perceive the noiſe you have brought your ſelfe into whilſt you were ſo briefe to taunt other Men with weakneſſe ? is it cleane out of your mind what you cited from among the Councels; that the principal ſcope of thoſe Liturgie-Founders was to prevent either the malice or the weakneſſe of the Miniſters, their malice of infuſing Hereſie in their formes of Prayer ; their weakneſs, leſt ſomething might be compoſed by them through ignorance or want of care contrary to the Faith ? Is it not now rather to be wondred that ſuch a weakneſſe could fall from the Pen of ſuch a wiſe Remonſtrant Man ? Pag. 12

Remonſt. Their maine drift was the help of the Peoples Devotion, that they knowing before the matter that ſhould be ſued for.

Anſw. A ſollicitous care, as if the People could be ignorant of the matter to be pray'd for ; ſeeing the heads of publick Prayer are either ever conſtant, or very frequently the ſame.

Remonſt. And the words wherewith it ſhould be cloth'd, might be the more prepar'd, and be ſo much the more intent, and leſſe diſtracted.

Anſw. As for the words, it is more to be fear'd leſt the ſame continually ſhould make them careleſſe or ſleepie, then that varietie on the ſame knowne Subject ſhould diſtract ; variety (as both Muſick and Rhetorick teacheth us) erects and rouſes an Auditory, like the Maiſterfull running over many Cords and Diviſions; whereas if Men ſhould ever be thumming the Drone of one plaine Song, it would be a dull Opiat to the moſt wakeful attention.

Remonſt. Tell me, is this Liturgie good or evil ? Pag. 30.

Anſw. It is evill : repaire the Acheloian horne of your Dilemma how you can, againſt the next puſh.

Remonſt. If it be evill, it is unlawfull to be us'd.

Anſw. We grant you, and we finde you have not your Salve about you.

Remonſt. Were the Impoſition amiſſe, what is that to the People ?

Anſw. Not a little, becauſe they bear an equall part with the Prieſt in many places, and have their Cues and Verſets as well as he.

Remonſt. The ears and hearts of our people looke for a ſettl'd Liturgie. Pag. 31.

Anſw. You deceive your ſelfe in their ears and hearts, they looke for no ſuch matter.

Remonſt. The like anſwer ſerves for Homelies, ſurely were they enjoyn'd to all, &c.

Anſw. Let it ſerve for them that will bee ignorant, we know that Hayward their owne Creature writes that for defect of Preachers, Homilies were appointed to bee read in Churches, while Edw. 6. reigned.

Remonſt. Away then with the Booke whilſt it may be ſupply'd with a more profitable nonſence. Pag. 32.

Anſw. Away with it rather, becauſe it will bee hardly ſupply'd with a more unprofitable nonſence, then is in ſome paſſages of it to be ſeene.

SECT. 3.

Remonſt. Thus their Cavills concerning Liturgie are vaniſh't. Pag. 32.

Anſw. You wanted but Hey-paſſe to have made your tranſition like a myſticall Man of Sturbridge. But for all your ſleight of hand, our juſt exceptions againſt Liturgie are not vaniſht, they ſtare you ſtill in the face.

Remonſt. Certainly had I done ſo, I had beene no leſſe worthy to bee ſpit upon for my ſaucy uncharitableneſſe, then they are now for their uncharitable falſhood.

Anſw. We ſee you are in choler, therefore till you coole a while we turne us to the ingenuous Reader. See how this Remonſtrant would inveſt himſelfe conditionally with all the Rheume of the Towne, that he might have ſufficient to beſpaul his Brethren. They are accus'd by him of uncharitable falſhood, whereas their only Crime hath beene, that they have too credulouſly thought him, if not an over-logicall, yet a well-meaning Man ; but now wee find him either groſly deficient in his Principles of Logick, or elſe purpoſely bent to delude the Parliament with equivocal Sophiſtry, ſcattering among his Periods ambiguous words, whoſe interpretation he will afterwards diſpence according to his pleaſure, laying before us univerſall Propoſitions, and then thinks when he will to pinion them with a limitation: for ſay Remonſtrant.

Remonſt. Epiſcopall Government is cry'd down abroad by either weak or factious Perſons.

Anſw. Chooſe you whether you will have this Propoſition prov'd to you to be ridiculous, or ſophiſticall, for one of the two it muſt be. Step againe to Biſhop Downam your Patron, and let him gently catechiſe you in the grounds of Logick, he will ſhew you that this Axiom, Epiſcopall Government is cry'd down abroad by either weak or factious Perſons, is as much as to ſay, they that cry down Epiſcopacy abroad, are either weak or factious Perſons. He will tell you that this Axiom containes a Diſtribution, and that all ſuch Axioms are general; and laſtly, that the Diſtribution in which any part is wanting, or abundant, is faulty, and fallacious. If therefore diſtributing by the adjuncts of Faction, and weakens the Perſons that decry Epiſcopacy, you made your diſtribution imperfect for the nonce, you cannot but be guilty of fraud intended toward the honourable Court, to whom you wrote. If you had rather vindicate your honeſty, and ſuffer in your want of Art, you cannot condemn them of uncharitable falſhood, that attributed to you more skill then you had, thinking you had beene able to have made a diſtribution, as it ought to be, generall, and full; and ſo any Man would take it, the rather as being accompanied with that large word ( Abroad ) and ſo take againe either your manifeſt leſing, or manifeſt ignorance.

Pag. 34. Remonſt. Now come theſe brotherly Slanderers.

Anſw. Goe on diſſembling Joab, as ſtill your uſe is, call Brother and ſmite; call Brother and ſmite, till it bee ſaid of you, as the like was of Herod, a Man had better be your Hog then your Brother.

Remonſt. Which never came within the verge of my thoughts.

Anſw. Take a Metaphor or two more as good, the Precinct, or the Dioceſſe of your thoughts.

Remonſt. Brethren, if you have any remainders of Modeſty or Truth, cry God mercy.

Anſw. Remonſtrant, if you have no ground-worke of Logick, or plain-dealing in you, learne both as faſt as you can.

Remonſt. Of the ſame ſtraine is their witty deſcant of my confoundednes.

Anſw. Speak no more of it, it was a fatall word, that God put into your mouth when you began to ſpeak for Epiſcopacy, as boding confuſion to it.

Pag. 35. Remonſt. I am ſtill, and ſhall ever be thus ſelf-confounded, as confidently to ſay that hee is no peaceable, and right affected Son of the Church of England, that doth not wiſh well to Liturgie, and Epiſcopacie.

Anſw. If this be not that ſaucie uncharitableneſſe, with which in the foregoing Page you voluntarily inveſted your ſelfe with thought to have ſhifted it off, let the Parliament judge who now themſelves are deliberating whether Liturgie, and Epiſcopacy be to be well wiſh't to, or not.

Remonſt. This they ſay they cannot but rank amongſt my notorious —— ſpeak out Maſters, I would not have that word ſtick in your Teeth, or in your Throat.

Anſw. Take your Spectacles, Sir, it ſticks in the Paper, and was a pectorall Roule wee prepar'd for you to ſwallow down to your Heart.

Pag. 36. Remonſt. Wanton Wits muſt have leave to play with their own ſterne.

Remonſt. P. 18. Remonſt. As for that forme of Epiſcopall Government, ſurely could thoſe looke with my Eyes, they would ſee cauſe to be aſhamed of this their injurious miſconceit.

Anſw. We muſt call the Barber for this wiſe Sentence; one Mr. Ley the other day writ a Treatiſe of the Sabbath, and in his Preface puts the wiſedome of Balaam's Aſſe upon one of our Biſhops, bold Man for his labour; but we ſhall have more reſpect to our Remonſtrant, and liken him to the Aſſes Maiſter, though the Story ſays he was not ſo quick-ſighted as his Beaſt. Is not this Balaam the Son of Beor, the Man whoſe Eyes are open, that ſaid to the Parliament ſurely could thoſe looke with my Eyes; boaſt not of your Eyes, 'tis fear'd you have Balaam's Diſeaſe, a pearle in your Eye, Mammon's Præſtriction.

Remon. Alas we could tell you of China, Japan, Peru, Braſil, New England, Virginia, and a thouſand others that never had any Biſhops to this day. Pag. 37.

Anſw. O do not foile your Cauſe thus, and trouble Ortelius; we can help you, and tell you where they have bin ever ſince Conſtantine's time at leaſt, in a place call'd Mundus alter & idem, in the ſpacious and rich Countries of Crapulia, Pamphagonia, Yuronia, and in the Dukedome of Orgilia, and Variana, and their Metropolis of Ucalegonium. It was an overſight that none of your prime Antiquaries could think of theſe venerable Monuments to deduce Epiſcopacy by; knowing that Mercurius Britannicus had them forth-comming.

Sect. 4.

Remon. Hitherto they have flouriſh't, now I hope they will ſtrike.

Anſw. His former tranſition was in the Faire about the Jugglers, now he is at the Pageants among the Whifflers.

Remon. As if Arguments were Almanacks. Pag. 43.

Anſw. You will find ſome ſuch as will prognoſticate your Date, and tell you that after your long Summer Solſtice, the Æquator calls for you, to reduce you to the ancient and equal Houſe of Libra.

Remon. Truely, Brethren, you have not well taken the heighth of the Pole.

Anſw. No marvell, there be many more that doe not take well the heighth of your Pole; but will take better the declination of your Altitude.

Remon. Hee that ſaid I am the Way, ſaid that the old Way was the good Way. Pag. 44.

Anſw. He bids ask of the old Paths, or for the old Ways, where or which is the good Way; which implies, that all old Wayes are not good, but that the good Way is to be ſearcht with diligence among the old Wayes, which is a thing that wee doe in the oldeſt Records we have, the Goſpell. And if others may chance to ſpend more time with you in canvaſſing later Antiquity, I ſuppoſe it is not for that they ground themſelves thereon; but that they endeavour by ſhewing the corruptions, incertainties, and diſagreements of thoſe Volumes, and the eaſineſs of erring, or overſlipping in ſuch a boundleſſe and vaſt ſearch, if they may not convince thoſe that are ſo ſtrongly perſwaded thereof; yet to free ingenuous Minds from that over-awfull Eſteeme of thoſe more ancient then truſty Fathers, whom Cuſtome and fond Opinion, weake Principles, and the neglect of ſounder and ſuperior Knowledge hath exalted ſo high as to have gain'd them a blind Reverence; whoſe Books in bigneſſe, and number ſo endleſſe, and immeſurable, I cannot think that either God or Nature, either divine or humane Wiſdome, did ever meane ſhould bee a rule or reliance to us in the deciſion of any weighty and poſitive Doctrine: For certainly every Rule and Inſtrument of neceſſary Knowledge that God hath given us, ought to bee ſo in proportion, as may bee weilded and manag'd by the Life of Man, without penning him up from the duties of humane Society; and ſuch a rule and inſtrument of Knowledge perfectly is the Holy Bible. But hee that ſhall bind himſelfe to make Antiquity his Rule, if hee read but part, beſides the difficulty of choyce, his Rule is deficient, and utterly unſatisfying; for there may bee other Writers of another mind which he hath not ſeene; and if hee undertake all, the length of Mans Life cannot extend to give him a full and requiſite knowledge of what was done in Antiquity. Why doe wee therefore ſtand worſhipping and admiring this unactive and liveleſſe Coloſſus, that like a carved Gyant terribly menacing to children and weaklings, lifts up his Club, but ſtrikes not, and is ſubject to the muting of every Sparrow? If you let him reſt upon his Baſis, hee may perhaps delight the Eyes of ſome with his huge and mountainous Bulk, and the quaint Workmanſhip of his maſſie Limbs: but if yee go about to take him in pieces, yee marre him; and if you thinke, like Pigmees, to turne and wind him whole as hee is, beſides your vain Toile and Sweat, he may chance to fall upon your own Heads. Go therefore, and uſe all your Art, apply your Sledges, your Levers, and your Iron crows, to heave and hale your mighty Polyphem of Antiquity to the deluſion of Novices, and unexperienc't Chriſtians. We ſhall adhere cloſe to the Scriptures of God, which hee hath left us as the juſt and adequate meaſure of Truth, fitted and proportion'd to the diligent ſtudy, memory, and uſe of every faithfull Man, whoſe every part conſenting and making up the harmonious Symmetry of compleat Inſtruction, is able to ſet out to us a perfect Man of God, or Biſhop throughly furniſh't to all the good Works of his Charge: and with this Weapon, without ſtepping a foot further, wee ſhall not doubt to batter and throw down your Nebuchadnezzar's image, and crumble it like the chaffe of the Summer-threſhing Floores, as well as the Gold of thoſe Apoſtolick Succeſſors that you boaſt of, as your Conſtantinian Silver, together with the Iron, the Braſſe, and the Clay of thoſe muddy and ſtrawy Ages that follow. 2 Tim. 3. 16, 17.

Pag. 45. Remonſt. Let the boldeſt forehead of them all deny that Epiſcopacie hath continued thus long in our Iland, or that any till this Age contradicted it.

Anſw. That bold Forehead you have cleanly put upon your ſelf, 'tis you who deny that any till this Age contradicted it; no forehead of ours dares do ſo much: you have row'd your ſelfe fairly between the Scylla and Charibdis, either of impudence or nonſence, and now betake you to whether you pleaſe.

Remon. As for that ſupply of acceſſory Strength which I not begg.

Anſw. Your whole Remonſtrance does nothing elſe but begg it, and your fellow-Prelates do as good as whine to the Parliament for their Fleſh-pots of Egypt, making ſad Orations at the Funerall of your dear Prelacie, like that doubtie Centurion Afranius in Lucian; who to imitate the noble Pericles in his Epitaphian Speech, ſtepping up after the Battel to bewaile the ſlaine Severianus, falls into a pittifull Condolement, to think of thoſe coſtly Suppers, and drinking Banquets which he muſt now taſte of no more; and by then he had done, lack'd but little to lament the dear-loved Memory, and calamitous loſſe of his Capon and whitebroth.

Remon. But raiſe and evince from the light of Nature, and the rules of juſt Policie, for the continuance of thoſe things which long Uſe, and many Lawes have firmely eſtabliſh't as neceſſary and beneficial.

Anſw. Open your Eyes to the light of Grace, a better guide then Nature. Look upon the mean Condition of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, without that acceſſory ſtrength you take ſuch paines to raiſe from the light of Nature and Policie: take Divine Counſell, Labour not for the things that periſh; you would be the ſalt of the Earth, if that ſavour be not found in you: doe not thinke much that the time is now come to throw you out, and tread you under foot: Hark how S. Paul, writing to Timothy, informs a true Biſhop; Biſhops (ſaith he) muſt not be greedy of filthy lucre; and having food and raiment, let us bee therewith content: but they (ſaith he, meaning more eſpecially in that place Biſhops) that will be rich, fall into temptation, and a ſnare, and into many fooliſh and hurtful Luſts, which drowne Men in deſtruction, and perdition: for the love of Money is the root of all evil, which while ſome coveted after, they have erred from the Faith. How can wee therefore expect ſound Doctrine, and the ſolution of this our Controverſie from any covetous and honour-hunting Biſhop that ſhall plead ſo ſtiffly for theſe things? while St. Paul thus exhorts every Biſhop; But thou O man of God flee theſe things. As for the juſt Policie, that long Uſe and Cuſtome, and thoſe many Lawes which you ſay have conferr'd theſe Benefits upon you; it hath been nothing elſe but the ſuperſtitious Devotion of Princes and great Men that knew no better, or the baſe importunity of begging Friers, haunting and haraſſing the deathbeds of Men departing this Life, in a blind and wretched Condition of hope to merit Heaven for the building of Churches, Cloyſters, and Covents. The moſt of your vaunted Poſſeſſions, and thoſe proud Endowments that yee as ſinfully waſt, what are they but the black revennues of Purgatorie, the price of abuſed and murder'd Souls, the damned Simony of Trentals, and Indulgences to mortall Sin? how can ye chooſe but inherit the Curſe that goes along with ſuch a Patrimony? Alas! if there be any releaſement, any mitigation, or more tolerable being for the Soules of our miſguided Anceſtors; could wee imagine there might be any recovery to ſome degree of eaſe left for as many of them as are loſt, there cannot bee a better way then to take the misbeſtowed Wealth which they were cheated of, from theſe our Prelates, who are the true Succeſſors of thoſe that popt them into the other World, with this conceit of meriting by their Goods, which was their finall undoing; and to beſtow their beneficent Gifts upon Places and meanes of Chriſtian Education, and the faithfull labourers in Gods Harveſt, that may inceſſantly warn the poſterity of Dives, leſt they come where their miſerable Fore-father was ſent by the couſenage and miſleading of avaritious and worldly Prelates.

Remon. It will ſtand long enough againſt the battry of their paper-pellets.

Anſw. That muſt be try'd with a ſquare Cap in the Counſell, and if pellets will not doe, your owne Canons ſhall be turn'd againſt you.

Remon. They cannot name any Man in this Nation that ever contradicted Epiſcopacie, till this preſent Age.

Anſw. What an over-worne and bedrid Argument is this, the laſt refuge ever of old falſhood, and therefore a good ſigne I truſt that your Caſtle cannot hold out long. This was the plea of Judaiſme, and Idolatry againſt Chriſt and his Apoſtles, of Papacie againſt Reformation; and perhaps to the frailty of Fleſh and Blood in a Man deſtitute of better enlight'ning, may for ſome while bee pardonable: for what ha's fleſhly apprehenſion other to ſubſiſt by then Succeſſion, Cuſtome, and Viſibility; which onely hold, if in his weakneſſe and blindneſſe he be loath to loſe, who can blame? but in a Proteſtant Nation that ſhould have throwne off theſe tatter'd Rudiments long agoe, after the many ſtrivings of Gods Spirit, and our fourſcore Years vexation of him in this our Wilderneſſe ſince Reformation began, to urge theſe rotten Principles, and twit us with the preſent Age, which is to us an age of ages wherein God is manifeſtly come downe among us, to doe ſome remarkable good to our Church or State, is as if a Man ſhould taxe the renovating and re-ingendring Spirit of God with Innovation, and that new Creature for an upſtart noveltie; yea the new Jeruſalem, which without your admired linke of Succeſſion deſcends from Heaven, could not ſcape ſome ſuch like cenſure. If you require a further anſwer, it will not misbecome a Chriſtian to bee either more magnanimous, or more devout then Scipio was; who in ſtead of other anſwer to the frivolous accuſations of Petilius the Tribune, This day Romans (ſaith he) I fought with Hanibal proſperouſly; let us all goe and thank the Gods that gave us ſo great a Victory: in like manner will we now ſay, not caring otherwiſe to anſwer this un-Proteſtant-like Objection; in this Age, Brittains God hath reform'd his Church after many hundred yeers of Popiſh corruption; in this Age hee hath freed us from the intolerable yoke of Prelats, and Papall Diſcipline; in this Age he hath renewed our Proteſtation againſt all thoſe yet remaining dregs of Superſtition. Let us all goe, every true proteſted Brittain throughout the three Kingdoms, and render thanks to God the Father of Light and fountaine of heavenly Grace, and to his ſon CHRIST our Lord; leaving this Remonſtrant and his Adherents to their owne deſignes, and let us recount even here without delay, the patience and long ſuffering that God hath us'd towards our blindneſſe and hardnes time after time. For he being equally neere to his whole Creation of Mankind, and of free power to turne his benefick and fatherly regard to what Region or Kingdome he pleaſes, hath yet ever had this Iland under the ſpecial indulgent eye of his Providence: and pittying us the firſt of all other Nations, after he had decreed to purify and renew his Church that lay wallowing in Idolatrous Pollutions, ſent firſt to us a healing Meſſenger to touch ſoftly our ſores, and carry a gentle hand over our Wounds: he knockt once and twice and came again, opening our drouſie Eye-lids leaſurely by that glimmering light which Wicklef, and his followers diſpers't; and ſtill taking off by degrees the inveterat ſcales from our nigh periſht ſight, purg'd alſo our deaf Ears, and prepar'd them to attend his ſecond warning Trumpet in our Grandſires dayes. How elſe could they have been able to have receiv'd the ſudden aſſault of his reforming Spirit, warring againſt humane Principles, and carnal ſenſe, the pride of Fleſh that ſtill cry'd up Antiquity, Cuſtome, Canons, Counſels and Laws, and cry'd down the Truth for Noveltie, Schiſme, Profaneneſs and Sacriledge: when as we that have liv'd ſo long in abundant Light, beſides the ſunny reflection of all the neighbouring Churches, have yet our Hearts rivetted with thoſe old Opinions, and ſo obſtructed and benumm'd with the ſame fleſhly reaſonings, which in our Forefathers ſoone melted and gave way, againſt the morning beam of Reformation. If God had left undone this whole worke ſo contrary to Fleſh and Blood, till theſe times; how ſhould wee have yeelded to his heavenly Call, had wee been taken, as they were, in the ſtarknes of our Ignorance; that yet after all theſe ſpiritual Preparatives and Purgations, have our earthly ly Apprehenſions ſo clamm'd, and furr'd with the old Levin. O if we freeze at noone after their earely Thaw, let us feare leſt the Sunne for ever hide himſelfe, and turne his orient ſteps from our ingratefull Horizon, juſtly condemn'd to be eternally benighted. Which dreadful Judgement, O thou the ever-begotten Light and perfect Image of the Father, intercede, may never come upon us, as we truſt thou haſt; for thou haſt open'd our difficult and ſad times, and given us an unexpected breathing after our long Oppreſſions; thou haſt done Juſtice upon thoſe that tyranniz'd over us, while ſome Men waver'd and admir'd a vain ſhadow of Wiſdome in a Tongue nothing ſlow to utter Guile, though thou haſt taught us to admire onely that which is good, and to count that onely praiſe-worthy which is grounded upon thy divine Precepts. Thou haſt diſcover'd the plots, and fruſtrated the hopes of all the wicked in the Land, and put to ſhame the Perſecutors of thy Church; thou haſt made our falſe Prophets to be found a lie in the ſight of all the People, and chac'd them with ſudden Confuſion and Amazement before the redoubled brightneſſe of thy deſcending Cloud, that now covers thy Tabernacle. Who is there that cannot trace thee now in thy beamy Walke through the midſt of thy Sanctuary, amidſt thoſe golden Candleſticks, which have long ſuffer'd a dimneſſe amongſt us through the violence of thoſe that had ſeiz'd them, and were more taken with the mention of their Gold then of their ſtarry Light; teaching the Doctrine of Balaam, to caſt a ſtumbling-block before thy ſervants, commanding them to eat things ſacrifiz'd to Idols, and forcing them to Fornication. Come therefore, O thou that haſt the ſeven Starres in thy right hand, appoint thy choſen Prieſts according to their Orders and Courſes of old, to miniſter before thee, and duely to dreſſe and powre out the conſecrated Oyle into thy holy and ever-burning Lamps. Thou haſt ſent out the ſpirit of prayer upon thy Servants over all the Land to this effect, and ſtirr'd up their vowes as the ſound of many waters about thy Throne. Every one can ſay, that now certainly thou haſt viſited this Land, and haſt not forgotten the utmoſt corners of the Earth, in a time when Men had thought that thou waſt gone up from us to the fartheſt end of the Heavens, and hadſt left to doe marvellouſly among the ſons of theſe laſt Ages. O perfect and accompliſh thy glorious Acts; for Men may leave their Works unfiniſht, but thou art a God, thy Nature is Perfection: ſhouldſt thou bring us thus far onward from Egypt to deſtroy us in this Wilderneſſe, though wee deſerve; yet thy great Name would ſuffer in the rejoycing of thine Enemies, and the deluded hope of all thy Servants. When thou haſt ſettl'd Peace in the Church, and righteous Judgement in the Kingdome, then ſhall all thy Saints addreſſe their voyces of Joy, and triumph to thee, ſtanding on the ſhoare of that red Sea into which our Enemies had almoſt driven us. And he that now for haſte ſnatches up a plain ungarniſh't Preſent as a Thanke-offering to thee, which could not bee deferr'd in regard of thy ſo many late deliverances wrought for us one upon another, may then perhaps take up a Harp, and ſing thee an elaborate Song to Generations. In that day it ſhall no more bee ſaid as in ſcorne, this or that was never held ſo till this preſent Age, when Men have better learnt that the times and ſeaſons paſſe along under thy feet, to goe and come at thy bidding: and as thou didſt dignifie our Fathers dayes with many Revelations above all the fore-going Ages, ſince thou tookſt the Fleſh; ſo thou canſt vouchſafe to us (though unworthy) as large a portion of thy Spirit as thou pleaſeſt; for who ſhall prejudice thy all-governing Will? ſeeing the power of thy Grace is not paſt away with the primitive times, as fond and faithleſſe Men imagine, but thy Kingdome is now at hand, and thou ſtanding at the doore. Come forth out of thy Royall Chambers, O Prince of all the Kings of the Earth, put on the viſible Roabes of thy imperiall Majeſty, take up that unlimited Scepter which thy Almighty Father hath bequeath'd thee; for now the voyce of thy Bride calls thee, and all Creatures ſigh to bee renew'd.

SECT. 5.

Remon. Neglect not the Gift which was given thee by Prophecie, and by laying on the hands of Presbytery.

Anſw. The Engliſh Tranſlation expreſſes the Article (the), and renders it the Presbytery, which you doe injury to omitt.

Remonſtrance.

Which I wonder yee can ſo preſſe, when Calvin himſelf takes it of the Office, and not of the Men. Pag. 50.

Anſwer.

You think then you are fairly quit of this proofe, becauſe Calvin interprets it for you, as if we could be put off with Calvins name, unleſſe we be convinc't with Calvins reaſon; the word ϖρεσβυτέριον is a collective Nowne ſignifying a certain number of Men in one order, as the word Privy Councell with us, and ſo Beza interprets, that knew Calvins mind doubtleſſe, with whom he liv'd. If any amongſt us ſhould ſay the Privy Councell ordain'd it, and thereby conſtraine us to underſtand one Mans Authoritie, ſhould we not laugh at him? And therefore when you have us'd all your cramping Irons to the Text, and done your utmoſt to cramme a Presbyterie into the skin of one Perſon, 'twill bee but a piece of frugall nonſenſe. But if your meaning bee with a violent Hyperbaton to tranſpoſe the Text, as if the words lay thus in order, neglect not the gift of Presbyterie; this were a conſtruction like a Harquebuze ſhot over a file of words twelve deep, without authority to bid them ſtoop, or to make the word Gift like the River Mole in Surrey to runne under the bottome of a long line, and ſo ſtart up to governe the word Presbyterie, as in immediate Syntaxis, a device ridiculous enough to make good that old wives tale of a certaine Queene of England that ſunk at Charing-croſſe, and roſe up at Queene-hithe. No marvell though the Prelates bee a troubleſome Generation, and which way ſoever they turne them, put all things into a foule diſcompoſure, when to maintaine their domineering they ſeeke thus to rout and diſ-aray the wiſe and well-couch't order of Saint Pauls owne words, uſing either a certain textuall Riot to chop off the hands of the word Presbyterie, or els a like kind of Simony to clap the word Gift betweene them. Beſides, if the verſe muſt be read according to this tranſpoſition, μὴ ἀμέλει τȣ̃ ἐν σοὶ χαρίσματος τȣ̃ πρεσβυτερίȣ, it would be improper to call Ordination χάρισμα, when as it is rather onely χειριασμα, an outward Teſtimony of Approbation, unleſs they will make it a Sacrament as the Papiſts doe: But ſurely the Prelates would have Saint Pauls words rampe one over another, as they uſe to clime into their Livings and Biſhopricks.

Remonſtrance.

Neither need wee give any other ſatisfaction to the point, then from Saint Paul himſelfe, 2 Timoth. 1. 6. Stirre up the gift of God which is in thee by the impoſition of my hands; mine, and not others.

Anſwer.

Y' are too quick; this laſt place is to bee underſtood by the former, as the Law of Method, which beares chiefe ſway in the Art of teaching, requires, that cleareſt and plaineſt Expreſſions bee ſet formoſt, to the end they may enlighten any following Obſcurity; and wherefore wee ſhould not attribute a right method to the teachablenesse of Scripture, there can be no reaſon given: to which Method, if wee ſhall now goe contrarie, beſides the breaking of a Logicall Rule, which the Remonſtrant hitherto wee ſee hath made little account of, we ſhall alſo put a manifeſt Violence and Impropriety upon a knowne word againſt his common ſignification, in binding a collective to a ſingular Perſon. But if we ſhall, as Logicke (or indeed Reaſon) inſtructs us, expound the latter place by the former cited, and underſtand, (by the Impoſition of my hands) that is, of mine cheifly as an Apoſtle, with the joynt Authority and Aſſiſtance of the Presbyterie, there is nothing more ordinary or kindly in Speech then ſuch a Phraſe as expreſſes onely the Chiefe in any Action, and underſtands the reſt. So that the Impoſition of Saint Pauls hands, without more expreſſion in this place, cannot exclude the joynt Act of the Presbyterie affirm'd by the former Text.

Remonſtrance.

Pag. 76. In the meane while ſee Brethren how you have with Simon fiſht all night, and caught nothing.

Anſwer.

If we fiſhing with Simon the Apoſtle can catch nothing, ſee what you can catch with Simon Magus; for all his hooks and fiſhing Implements he bequeath'd among you.

SECT. 13.

Remonſtrance.

Wee doe againe profeſſe, that if our Biſhops challenge any other Power then was delegated to, and required of Timothy and Titus, wee ſhall yeeld them uſurpers.

Anſwer.

Ye cannot compare an ordinary Biſhop with Timothy, who was an extraordinary Man, foretold and promis'd to the Church by many Prophecies, and his name joyn'd as collaterall with Saint Paul, in moſt of his Apoſtolick Epiſtles, even where hee writes to the Biſhops of other Churches, as thoſe in Philippi. Nor can you prove out of the Scripture that Timothy was Biſhop of any particular place; for that wherein it is ſaid in the third Verſe of the firſt Epiſtle: As I beſought thee to abide ſtill at Epheſus, will be ſuch a gloſſe to prove the conſtitution of a Biſhop by, as would not onely be not ſo good as a Burdeaux gloſſe; but ſcarſe be receiv'd to varniſh a Viſard of Modona. All that can bee gather'd out of holy Writ concerning Timothy is, that he was either an Apoſtle, or an Apoſtles extraordinary Vice-gerent, not confin'd to the charge of any place. The like may bee ſaid of Titus, (as thoſe words import in the 5. verſe) that he was for that cauſe left in Creet, that he might ſupply or proceed to ſet in order that which Saint Paul in Apoſtolick manner had begun, for which hee had his particular Commiſſion, as thoſe words ſound, (as I had appointed thee.) So that what hee did in Creet, cannot ſo much be thought the exerciſe of an ordinary Function, as the direction of an inſpired mouth. No leſſe alſo may be gather'd from the 2 Cor. 8. 23.

Remonſtrance.

You deſcend to the Angels of the ſeven Aſian Churches, your ſhift is, that the Angell is heere taken collectively, not individually.

Anſwer.

That the Word is collective appeares plainly, Revel. 2.

Firſt, Becauſe the Text it ſelfe expounds it ſo; for having ſpoken all the while as to the Angell, the ſeventh Verſe concludes that this was ſpoken to the Churches. Now if the Spirit conclude collectively, and kept the ſame Tenor all the way, for we ſee not where he particularizes; then certainly hee muſt begin collectively, elſe the Conſtruction can bee neither Grammatticall nor Logicall.

Secondly, If the word Angell be individuall, then are the faults attributed to him individuall: but they are ſuch as for which God threatens to remove the Candleſtick out of his place, which is as much as to take away from that Church the Light of his Truth: and wee cannot thinke he would doe ſo for one Biſhops fault. Therefore thoſe faults muſt be underſtood collective, and by conſequence the ſubject of them collective.

Thirdly, An Individuall cannot branch it ſelfe into Subindividuals; but this word Angel doth in the tenth Verſe. Feare none of thoſe things which thou ſhalt ſuffer; behold the Devill ſhall caſt ſome of you into priſon. And the like from other places of this and the following Chapter may be obſerved. Therefore it is no individuall word, but a collective.

Fourthly, In the 24. Verſe this word Angel is made capable of a Pronoune plurall, which could not bee, unleſſe it were a Collective. As for the ſuppoſed Manuſcript of Tecla, and two or three other Copies that have expung'd the Copulative, wee cannot preferre them before the more receiv'd reading, and wee hope you will not againſt the Tranſlation of your Mother the Church of England, that paſt the reviſe of your chiefeſt Prelates: Beſides this, you will lay an unjuſt cenſure upon the much-praiſed Biſhop of Thyatira, and reckon him among thoſe that had the Doctrine of Jeſabel, when the Text ſayes, he onely ſuffer'd her. Whereas, if you will but let in a charitable conjunction, as wee know your ſo much call'd-for Charity will not deny, then you plainly acquit the Biſhop, if you comprehend him in the name of Angel, otherwiſe you leave his caſe very doubtfull.

Remonſtrance.

Pag. 105. Thou ſuffereſt thy Wife JESABEL: was ſhe Wife to the whole Company, or to one Biſhop alone?

Anſwer.

Not to the whole Company doubtles, for that had bin worſe then to have bin the Levites Wife in Gibeab: but heere among all thoſe that conſtantly read it otherwiſe, whom you trample upon, your good Mother of England is downe againe in the throng, who with the reſt reads it, that Woman Jeſabel: but ſuppoſe it were Wife, a Man might as well interpret that word figuratively, as her name Jeſabel no Man doubts to be a borrow'd Name.

Remonſtrance.

Pag. 111. Yet what makes this for a Dioceſan Biſhop? much every way.

Anſwer.

No more then a ſpeciall Endorſement could make to puffe up the Foreman of a Jury. If wee deny you more precedence, then as the Senior of any Society, or deny you this priority to bee longer then annuall. Prove you the contrary from hence, if you can. That you thinke to doe from the title of eminence, Angel: alas your wings are too ſhort. 'Tis not Ordination nor Juriſdiction that is Angelicall, but the heavenly Meſſage of the Goſpell, which is the Office of all Miniſters alike; in which ſenſe
Mat. 11. John the Baptiſt is call'd an Angel, which in Greeke ſignifies a Meſſenger, as oft as it is meant by a Man, and might be ſo render'd heere without treaſon to the Hierarchy; but that the whole Booke ſoares to a prophetick pitch in Types, and Allegories. Seeing then the reaſon of this borrow'd Name is meerly to ſignifie the preaching of the Goſpel, and that this preaching equally appertaines to the whole Miniſtery; hence may bee drawn a fifth argument, that if the reaſon of this borrowed name Angel be equally collective, and communicative to the whole preaching Miniſtry of the place, then muſt the name be collectively and communicatively taken; but the reaſon, that is to ſay, the office of preaching and watching over the Flock is equally collective and communicative: Therefore the borrow'd name it ſelf is to be underſtood as equally collective and communicative to the whole preaching Miniſtery of the place. And if you will contend ſtill for a Superiority in one perſon, you muſt ground it better then from this metaphor, which you may now deplore as the Axe-head that fell into the water, and ſay, Alas Maſter, for it was borrow'd, unleſs you have as good a faculty to make Iron ſwim, as you had to make light froth ſink.

Remonſt. What is, if this be not Ordination and Juriſdiction? Pag. 124.

Anſw. Indeed in the Conſtitution, and founding of a Church, that ſome Men inſpir'd from God ſhould have an extraordinary calling to appoint, to order and diſpoſe, muſt needs be. So Moſes, though himſelfe no Prieſt, ſanctify'd, and ordain'd Aaron and his Sons; but when all needful things be ſet and regulated by the Writings of the Apoſtles, whether it be not a meer folly to keep up a ſuperiour degree in the Church onely for Ordination and Juriſdiction, it will be no hurt to debate a while. The Apoſtles were the Builders, and, as it were, the Architects of the Chriſtian Church; Wherein conſiſted their Excellence above ordinary Miniſters? a Prelate would ſay in commanding, in controuling, in appointing, in calling to them, and ſending from about them to all Countryes their Biſhops and Archbiſhops as their Deputies, with a kind of Legantine Power. No, no, vaine Prelates, this was but as the Scaffolding of a new Edifice which for the time muſt board, and overlooke the higheſt Battlements; but if the Structure once finiſh't, any Paſſenger ſhould fall in love with them, and pray that they might ſtill ſtand, as being a ſingular Grace, and ſtrengthning to the Houſe, who would otherwiſe thinke, but that the Man were preſently to be laid hold on, and ſent to his Friends and Kindred? The Eminence of the Apoſtles conſiſted in their powerful preaching, their unwearied labouring in the Word, their unquenchable Charity, which above all earthly reſpects like a working flame, had ſpun up to ſuch a height of pure deſire, as might be thought next to that Love which dwells in God to ſave Souls; which, while they did, they were contented to be the Off-ſcouring of the World, and to expoſe themſelves willingly to all Afflictions, perfecting thereby their hope through patience to a Joy unſpeakable. As for Ordination, what is it, but the laying on of hands, an outward ſigne or ſymbol of Admiſſion? It creates nothing, it conferrs nothing; it is the inward Calling of God that makes a Miniſter, and his own painful ſtudy and diligence that manures and improves his miniſteriall Gifts. In the Primitive times, many before ever they had receiv'd Ordination from the Apoſtles, had done the Church noble ſervice, as Apollos and others. It is but an orderly forme of receiving a Man already fitted, and committing to him a particular charge; the imployment of preaching is as holy; and farr more excellent, the care alſo and judgment to be us'd in the winning of Soules, which is thought to be ſufficient in every worthy Miniſter, is an Ability above that which is requir'd in Ordination: For many may be able to judge who is fit to be made a Miniſter, that would not be found fit to be made Miniſters themſelves; as it will not be deny'd that he may be the competent Judge of a neat Picture, or elegant Poem, that cannot limne the like. Why therefore wee ſhould conſtitute a ſuperiour Order in the Church to performe an Office which is not onely every Miniſter's Function, but inferiour alſo to that which he has a confeſt right to; and why this Superiority ſhould remaine thus uſurp'd, ſome wiſe Epimenides tell us. Now for Juriſdiction this deare Saint of the Prelates, it will be beſt to conſider, firſt, what it is: That Soveraigne Lord, who in the diſcharge of his holy Anointment from God the Father, which made him ſupreame Biſhop of our Soules, was ſo humble as to ſay, Who made me a Judge, or a Divider over yee? hath taught us that a Church-mans Juriſdiction is no more but to watch over his Flock in ſeaſon, and out of ſeaſon, to deal by ſweet and efficacious Inſtructions, gentle Admonitions, and ſometimes rounder Reproofs; againſt negligence or obſtinacy, will be requir'd a rouſing Vollie of paſtorly Threatnings; againſt a perſiſting ſtubbornes, or the fear of a reprobate ſenſe, a timely ſeparation from the Flock by that interdictive Sentence, leſt his Converſation unprohibited, or unbranded, might breath a peſtilential murrein into the other Sheepe. In ſumme, his juriſdiction is to ſee to the thriving and proſpering of that which he hath planted: what other work the Prelates have found for Chancellours and Suffragans, Delegates and Officials, with all the hell-peſtering rabble of Sumners and Apparitors, is but an invaſion upon the temporall Magiſtrate, and affected by them as men that are not aſham'd of the Enſigne and Banner of Antichriſt. But true Evangelical Juriſdiction or Diſcipline, is no more, as was ſaid, then for a Miniſter to ſee to the thriving and proſpering of that which he hath planted. And which is the worthieſt worke of theſe two, to plant, as every Miniſters Office is equally with the Biſhops, or to tend that which is planted, which the blind and undiſcerning Prelates call Juriſdiction, and would appropriate to themſelves as a buſineſſe of higher dignity? Have patience therefore a little, and heare a Law caſe: A certain man of large Poſſeſſions, had a faire Garden, and kept therein an honeſt and laborious Servant, whoſe skill and profeſſion was to ſet or ſow all wholſome Herbs, and delightfull Flowers, according to every ſeaſon, and what-ever elſe was to be done in a well-husbanded Nurſery of Plants and Fruits; now, when the time was come that he ſhould cut his Hedges, prune his Trees, looke to his tender Slips, and pluck up the Weeds that hinder'd their growth, he gets him up by break of day, and makes account to doe what was needfull in his Garden; and who would thinke that any other ſhould know better than he how the days work was to be ſpent? Yet for all this there comes another ſtrange Gardner that never knew the Soyle, never handl'd a Dibble or Spade to ſet the leaſt Pot-herb that grew there, much leſſe had endur'd an hours ſweat or chilneſſe, and yet challenges as his right the binding or unbinding of every Flower, the clipping of every Buſh, the weeding and worming of every Bed, both in that and all other Gardens thereabout: the honeſt Gardener, that ever ſince the day-peepe, till now the Sunne was grown ſomewhat ranke, had wrought painfully about his Bankes and Seed-plots, at his commanding Voice turnes ſuddenly about with ſome wonder; and although he could have well beteem'd to have thankt him of the eaſe hee profer'd, yet loving his own handiworke, modeſtly refus'd him, telling him withall, that for his part, if he had thought much of his owne paines, he could for once have committed the Worke to one of his fellow-labourers, for as much as it is well knowne to be a matter of leſſe skill and leſſe labour to keepe a Garden handſome, then it is to plant it, or contrive it, and that he had already perform'd himſelfe. No, ſaid the ſtranger, this is neither for you nor your fellows to meddle with, but for me onely that am for this purpoſe in dignity farre above you; and the proviſion which the Lord of the Soyle allowes me in this Office is, and that with good reaſon, ten-fold your wages: the Gardener ſmil'd and ſhooke his head; but what was determin'd I cannot tell you till the end of this Parliament.

Pag. 127. Remon. If in time you ſhall ſee wooden Chalices, and wooden Prieſts, thanke your ſelves.

Anſ. It had beene happy for this land, if your Prieſts had beene but only wooden; all England knowes they have been to this Iland not wood, but wormewood, that have infected the third part of our waters, like that Apoſtate Starre in the Revelation, that many Soules have di'd of their bitterneſſe; and if you meane by wooden, illiterate, or contemptible, there was no want of that ſort among you, and their number increaſing daily, as their lazineſſe, their Tavern-hunting, their neglect of all ſound literature, and their liking of doltiſh and monaſticall Schoolemen daily increaſt. What ſhould I tell you how the Univerſities, that Men looke ſhould be fountaines of Learning and Knowledg, have beene poyſon'd and choak'd under your Governance? and if to be wooden be to be baſe, where could there be found among all the reformed Churches, nay, in the Church of Rome it ſelf, a baſer brood of flattering and time-ſerving Prieſts, according as God pronounces by Iſaiah, the Prophet that teacheth lies he is the taile. As for your young ſchollers that petition for Biſhopricks and Deanaries to incourage them in their ſtudies, and that many Gentlemen elſe will not put their Sons to learning, away with ſuch young mercenary Stripplings and their Simoniacal Fathers, God has no neede of ſuch, they have no part or lot in his Vineyard, they may as well ſue for Nunneries, that they may have ſome convenient ſtowage for their wither'd daughters, becauſe they cannot give them portions anſwerable to the pride and vanity they have bred them in; this is the root of all our miſchief, that which they alleage for the incouragement of their ſtudies, ſhould be cut away forthwith as the very bait of pride and ambition, the very garbage that drawes together all the fowles of prey and ravin in the land to come and gorge upon the Church. How can it be but ever unhappy to the Church of England, while ſhee ſhall think to intice Men to the pure ſervice of God by the ſame meanes that were us'd to tempt our Saviour to the ſervice of the

Devill, by laying before him honour and preferment. Fit profeſſors indeed are they like to be, to teach others that Godlineſſe with content is great gaine, whenas their godlineſſe of teaching had not been but for worldly gaine. The heathen Philoſophers thought that vertue was for its owne ſake ineſtimable, and the greateſt gaine of a teacher to make a ſoule vertuous; ſo Xenophon writes of Socrates, who never bargain'd with any for teaching them; he fear'd not leſt thoſe who had receiv'd ſo high a benefit from him, would not of their owne free-will returne him all poſſible thankes. Was morall vertue ſo lovely, and ſo alluring, and heathen men ſo enamour'd of her, as to teach and ſtudy her with greateſt neglect and contempt of worldly profit and advancement? and is Chriſtian Piety ſo homely and ſo unpleaſant, and Chriſtian men ſo cloy'd with her, as that none will ſtudy and teach her, but for lucre and preferment! O ſtale-growne Piety! O Goſpell rated as cheap as thy Maſter, at thirty pence, and not worth the ſtudy, unleſſe thou canſt buy thoſe that will ſell thee! O race of Capernaitans, ſenſleſſe of divine doctrine, and capable onely of loaves and belly-cheer! But they will grant, perhaps, piety may thrive, but learning will decay: I would faine ask theſe men at whoſe hands they ſeeke inferior things, as wealth, honour, their dainty fare, their lofty houſes? No doubt but they will ſoone anſwer, that all theſe things they ſeek at God's hands. Doe they thinke then that all theſe meaner and ſuperfluous things come from God, and the divine gift of Learning from the den of Plutus, or the cave of Mammon? Certainly never any cleare ſpirit nurſt up from brighter influences, with a ſoule inlarg'd to the dimenſions of ſpacious art and high knowledg, ever enter'd there but with ſcorn, and thought it ever foule diſdain to make pelf or ambition the reward of his ſtudies, it being the greateſt honor, the greateſt fruit and proficiency of learned ſtudies to deſpiſe theſe things. Not liberal ſcience, but illiberal muſt that needs be that mounts in contemplation merely for money. And what would it avail us to have a hireling Clergy though never ſo learned? For ſuch can have neither true wiſdom nor grace, and then in vain do Men truſt in learning, where theſe be wanting. If in leſſe noble and almoſt mechanick Arts, according to the definitions of thoſe Authors, he is not eſteem'd to deſerve the name of a compleat Architect, an excellent Painter, or the like, that bears not a generous mind above the peaſantly regard of wages and hire; much more muſt we thinke him a moſt imperfect, and incompleate Divine, who is ſo farre from being a contemner of filthy lucre, that his whole Divinity is moulded and bred up in the beggarly, and brutiſh hopes of a fat Prebendary, Deanery, or Biſhoprick; which poore and low pitch't deſires, if they do but mixe with thoſe other heavenly intentions that draw a man to this ſtudy, it is juſtly expected that they ſhould bring forth a baſe born iſſue of Divinity, like that of thoſe imperfect, and putrid creatures that receive a crawling life from two moſt unlike procreants, the Sun and Mudd. And in matters of Religion, there is not any thing more intollerable then a learned Foole, or a learned Hypocrite; the one is ever coopt up at his empty ſpeculations, a ſot, an ideot for any uſe that mankind can make of him, or elſe ſowing the World with nice and idle queſtions, and with much toyle and difficulty wading to his auditors up to the eyebrows in deep ſhallows that wet not the inſtep: a plaine unlearned man that lives well by that light which he has, is better and wiſer, and edifies others more towards a godly and happy life than he. The other is ſtill uſing his ſophiſticated arts, and bending all his ſtudies how to make his inſatiate avarice and ambition ſeem pious and orthodoxall, by painting his lewd and deceitfull Principles with a ſmooth and gloſſy varniſh in a doctrinall way, to bring about his wickedeſt purpoſes. Inſtead of the great harme therefore that theſe men feare upon the diſſolving of Prelates, what an eaſe, and happineſſe will it be to us, when tempting rewards are taken away, that the cunningeſt and moſt dangerous mercenaries will ceaſe of themſelves to frequent the fold, whom otherwiſe ſcarce all the prayers of the faithful could have kept back from devouring the flock? But a true Paſtor of Chriſt's ſending hath this eſpeciall mark, that for greateſt labours, and greateſt merits in the Church, he requires either nothing, if he could ſo ſubſiſt, or a very common and reaſonable ſupply of humane neceſſaries: We cannot therefore do better then to leave this care of ours to God, he can eaſily ſend labourers into his Harveſt, that ſhall not cry, Give, give, but be contented with a moderate and beſeeming allowance ; nor will he ſuffer true learning to be wanting, where true grace and our obedience to him abounds: for if he give us to know him aright, and to practiſe this our knowledg in right eſtabliſht diſcipline, how much more will hee repleniſh us with all abilities in tongues and arts, that may conduce to his glory, and our good? He can ſtirre up rich Fathers to beſtow exquiſite education upon their Children, and ſo dedicate them to the ſervice of the Goſpell; he can make the ſons of Nobles his Miniſters, and Princes to be his Nazarites; for certainly there is no imployment more honourable, more worthy to take up a great ſpirit, more requiring a generous and free nurture, then to be the meſſenger and Herald of heavenly Truth from God to man, and by the faithful worke of holy doctrine, to procreate a number of faithful men, making a kind of creation like to God's, by infuſing his Spirit and likeneſſe into them, to their ſalvation, as God did into him; ariſing to what climat ſoever he turne him, like that Sun of righteouſneſſe that ſent him, with healing in his wings, and new light to break in upon the chill and gloomy hearts of his hearers, raiſing out of darkſome barrenneſſe a delicious and fragrant ſpring of ſaving knowledge, and good workes. Can a man thus imployd, find himſelfe diſcontented, or diſhonour'd for want of admittance to have a pragmaticall voyce at Seſſions, and Jayle deliveries? or becauſe hee may not as a Judge ſit out the wrangling noiſe of litigious Courts to ſhreeve the purſes of unconfeſſing and unmortify'd ſinners, and not their ſoules, or be diſcourag'd though men call him not Lord, when as the due performance of his office would gaine him even from Lords and Princes, the voluntary title of Father? Would he tugge for a Barony to ſit and vote in Parliament, knowing that no man can take from him the gift of wiſdome and ſound doctrine, which leaves him free, though not to be a member, yet a teacher, and perſwader of the Parliament? And in all wiſe apprehenſions the perſwaſive power in Man to win others to goodneſſe by inſtruction is greater, and more divine, then the compulſive power to reſtraine men from being evil by terrour of the Law; and therefore Chriſt left Moſes to be the Law-giver, but himſelfe came downe amongſt us to bee a teacher, with which office his heavenly Wiſdome was ſo well pleas'd, as that he was angry with thoſe that would have put a piece of temporall Judicature into his hands, diſclaiming that he had any commiſſion from above for ſuch matters.

Such a high Calling therefore as this, ſends not for thoſe droſſy ſpirits that need the lure, and whiſtle of earthly preferment, like thoſe animals that fetch and carry for a morſell; no. She can find ſuch as therefore ſtudy her precepts, becauſe ſhe teaches to deſpiſe preferment. And let not thoſe wretched Fathers thinke they ſhall impoveriſh the Church of willing and able ſupply, though they keep back their ſordid ſperm begotten in the luſtineſſe of their avarice, and turne them to their malting-kils; rather let them take heed what leſſons they inſtill into that lump of fleſh which they are the cauſe of, leſt, thinking to offer him as a preſent to God, they diſh him out for the Devill. Let the novice learn firſt to renounce the world, and ſo give himſelfe to God, and not therefore give himſelfe to God that hee may cloſe the better with the World, like that falſe Shepheard Palinode in the Eclogue of May, under whom the Poet lively perſonates our Prelates, whoſe whole life is a recantation of their paſtorall vow, and whoſe profeſſion to forſake the World, as they uſe the matter, boggs them deeper into the world: Thoſe our admired Spencer inveighs againſt, not without ſome preſage of theſe reforming times.

For Pan himſelfe was their inheritance,
And little them ſerv'd for their maintenance :
The Shepheards God ſo well them guided,
That of naught they were unprovided.
Butter enough, honey, milk, and whey,
And their flock fleeces them to array.
But tract of Time, and long proſperity
( That nurſe of vice, this of inſolency )
Lulled the Shepheards in ſuch ſecurity,
That not content with loyall obeyſance,
Some gan to gape for greedy governance,
And match themſelves with mighty Potentates,
Lovers of Lordſhips, and troublers of States.
Tho gan Shepheards Swaines to looke aloft,
And leave to live hard, and learne to lig ſoft.
Tho under colour of Shepheards ſome while
There crept in wolves full of fraud and guile,
That often devoured their owne Sheep,
And often the Shepheard that did them keep.
This was the firſt ſource of Shepheards ſorrow,
That now nill be quit with bale, nor borrow.

By all this we may conjecture, how little wee neede fear that the unguilding of our Prelates will prove the woodening of our Prieſts. In the meane while, let no Man carry in his head either ſuch narrow, or ſuch evil eyes, as not to looke upon the Churches of Belgia and Helvetia, and that envied City Geneva : Where in the Chriſtian World doth Learning more flouriſh than in theſe places ? Not among your beloved Jeſuits, nor their favourers, though you take all the Prelates into the number, and inſtance in what kinde of learning you pleaſe. And how in England all noble ſciences attending upon the traine of Chriſtian doctrine may flouriſh more than ever ; and how the able profeſſors of every Art may with ample ſtipends be honeſtly provided ; and finally, how there may be better care had that their hearers may benefit by them, and all this without the Prelates, the courſes are ſo many and ſo eaſie, that I ſhall paſſe them over.

Remon. It is God that makes the Biſhop, the King that gives the Biſhoprick ; What can you ſay to this? Sect. 14. Pag. 129.

Anſw. What you ſhall not long ſtay for : we ſay it is God that makes a Biſhop, and the Devil that makes him take a prelaticall Biſhoprick ; as for the King's gift, regall bounty may be excuſable in giving, where the Biſhops covetouſneſſe is damnable in taking.

Remon. Many eminent Divines of the Churches abroad have earneſtly wiſh'd themſelves in our condition. Pag. 137.

Anſw. I cannot blame them, they were not onely eminent, but ſupereminent Divines, and for ſtomach much like to Pompey the great, that could indure no equall.

Remon. The Babylonian note ſounds well in your Ears, downe with it, downe with it even to the ground. Pag. 139.

Anſw. You miſtake the matter, it was the Edomitiſh note, but change it, and if you be an Angel, cry with the Angel, It is falne, it is falne.

Remon. But the God of Heav'n will, we hope, vindicate his owne Ordinance ſo long perpetuated to the Church.

Anſw. Goe rather to your God of this World, and ſee if he can vindicate your Lordſhips, your temporall and ſpirituall Tyrannies, and all your pelfe ; for the God of Heaven is already come downe to vindicate his own Ordinance from your ſo long perpetuated Uſurpation.

Remon. If yet you can bluſh. Sect. 15.

Anſw. This is a more Edomitiſh conceit than the former, and muſt be ſilenc'd with a counter-quip of the ſame Countrey. Pag. 141. So often and ſo unſavourily has it been repeated, that the Reader may well cry, Downe with it, downe with it for ſhame. A Man would thinke you had eaten over liberally of Eſaüs red Porrage, and from thence dreame continually of bluſhing ; or perhaps, to heighthen your fancy in writing, are wont to ſit in your Doctors ſcarlet, which through your eyes infecting your pregnant imaginative with a red Suffuſion, begets a continual thought of bluſhing: That you thus perſecute ingenuous Men over all your Book, with this one over-tir'd rubricall conceit ſtill of bluſhing; but if you have no mercy upon them, yet ſpare your ſelfe, leſt you bejade the good Galloway, your owne opiniaſter Wit, and make the very Conceit it ſelfe bluſh with ſpur-galling.

Sect. 16. Pag. 148. Remon. The ſcandalls of our inferiour Miniſters I deſir'd to have had leſſe publique.

Anſw. And what your ſuperiour Archbiſhop or Biſhops? O forbid to have it told in Gath! ſay you. O dauber! and therefore remove not Impieties from Iſrael. Conſtantine might have done more juſtly to have puniſh'd thoſe Clergicall faults which he could not conceale, than to leave them unpuniſh'd, that they might remaine conceal'd: better had it beene for him that the Heathen had heard the fame of his Juſtice, than of his wilfull connivence and partiality; and ſo the name of God and his Truth had been leſſe blaſphem'd among his enemies, and the Clergie amended, which daily by this impunitie grew worſe and worſe. But, O to publiſh it in the ſtreetes of Aſcalon! Sure ſome Colonie of Puritans have taken Aſcalon from the Turke lately, that the Remonſtrant is ſo afraid of Aſcalon. The Papiſts we know condole yee, and neither Conſtantinople nor your neighbors of Marocco trouble you. What other Aſcalon can you allude to?

Remonſtrance. Pag. 37. Remon. What a death it is to thinke of the ſport and advantage theſe watchful enemies, theſe oppoſite Spectators will be ſure to make of our ſinne and ſhame?

Anſw. This is but to fling and ſtrugle under the inevitable net of God, that now begins to inviron you round.

Remonſtrance. Pag. 38. Remon. No one Clergie in the whole Chriſtian World yeelds ſo many eminent Schollers, learned Preachers, grave, holy and accompliſh'd Divines, as this Church of England doth at this day.

Anſw. Ha, ha, ha.

Remon. And long, and ever may it thus flouriſh.

Anſw. O peſtilent imprecation! flouriſh as it does at this day in the Prelates?

Remon. But oh forbid to have it told in Gath!

Anſw. Forbid him rather, ſacred Parliament, to violate the ſenſe of Scripture, and turne that which is ſpoken of the afflictions of the Church under her Pagan enemies, to a pargetted concealment of thoſe prelatical crying ſins: for from theſe is profaneneſſe gone forth into all the Land; they have hid their eyes from the Sabbaths of the Lord; they have fed themſelves, and not their Flocks; with force and cruelty have they ruled over Gods People: They have fed his Sheep (contrary to that which Saint Peter writes) not of a ready mind, but for filthy lucre; not as examples to the Flock, but as being Lords over Gods heritage: and yet this Dauber would daub ſtill with his untempered Morter. But hearken what God ſayes by the Prophet Ezekiel, Say unto them that daub this Wall with untempered Morter, that it ſhall fall; there ſhall be an overflowing ſhower, and yee O great hailſtones ſhall fall, and a ſtormy wind ſhall rend it, and I will ſay unto you, the Wall is no more, neither they that daub'd it.

1 Pet. 5.

Ezek. 13.

Pag. 149. Remon. Whether of us ſhall give a better account of our Charity to the God of Peace, I appeale.

Anſw. Your Charity is much to your fellow-offendors, but nothing to the numberleſs Soules that have beene loſt by thir falſe feeding: uſe not therefore ſo ſillily the name of Charity, as moſt commonly you doe, and the peacefull attribute of God to a prepoſterous end.

Sect. 17. Remon. In the next Section, like ill bred Sons, you ſpit in the face of your Mother the Church of England.

Anſw. What ſhould wee doe or ſay to this Remonſtrant? that by his idle and ſhallow reaſonings, ſeemes to have been converſant in no Divinity, but that which is colourable to uphold Biſhopricks. Wee acknowledge, and beleeve the Catholick reformed Church; and if any man be diſpos'd to uſe a trope or figure, as Saint Paul once did in calling her the common Mother of us all, let him doe as his own rethorick ſhall perſwade him. If therefore we muſt needs have a Mother, and if the Catholick Church onely be, and muſt be ſhe, let all Genealogie tell us, if it can, what we muſt call the Church of England, unleſſe wee ſhall make every Engliſh Proteſtant a kind of poeticall Bacchus, to have two Mothers: but marke, Readers, the crafty ſcope of theſe Prelates, they endeavour to impreſſe deeply into weak and ſuperſtitious fancies, the awful notion of a Mother, that hereby they might cheat them into a blind and implicite Obedience to whatſoever they ſhall decree, or think fit. And if we come to aske a reaſon of ought from our deare Mother, ſhe's inviſible, under the lock and key of the Prelates her ſpiritual adulterers; they onely are the internuntio's, or the go-betweens, of this trim devis'd mummery: whatſoever they ſay, ſhe ſayes muſt be a deadly ſin of diſobedience not to beleeve. So that wee who by Gods ſpecial grace, have ſhak'n off the ſervitude of a great male Tyrant, our pretended Father the Pope, ſhould now, if wee be not betimes aware of theſe wily Teachers, ſink under the ſlavery of a female notion, the cloudy conception of a demy-Iland Mother; and while we think to be obedient Sonnes, ſhould make our ſelves rather the Baſtards, or the Centaurs of thir ſpiritual Fornications.

Remon. Take heed of the Ravens of the Vally.

Anſw. The Ravens wee are to take heede on are your ſelves, that would peck out the Eyes of all knowing Chriſtians.

Remon. Sit you merry Brethren.

Anſw. So we ſhall when the furies of Prelaticall conſciences will not give them leave to doe ſo.

Queries. Whether they would not jeopard their Eares rather, &c. Sect. 18.

Anſw. A puniſhment that awaites the merits of your bold accomplices for the lopping, and ſtigmatizing of ſo many free borne Chriſtians. Pag. 160.

Remon. Whether the profeſſed ſlovenlineſſe in Gods ſervice, &c. Pag. 161.

Anſw. We have heard of Aaron and his linnen Amice, but thoſe dayes are paſt; and for your Prieſt under the Goſpell, that thinks himſelfe the purer, or the cleanlier in his Office for his new waſht Surpleſſe, we eſteem him for ſanctitie little better than Apollonius Thyanæus in his white Frocke, or the Prieſt of Iſis in his lawne Sleeves, and they may all for Holineſſe lie together in the ſuds.

Remon. Whether it were not moſt lawfull and juſt to puniſh your preſumption and diſobedience.

Anſw. The puniſhing of that which you call our preſumption and diſobedience, lies not now within the execution of your fangs; the mercifull God above, and our juſt Parliament will deliver us from your Epheſian Beaſts, your cruell Nimrods, with whom we ſhall be ever feareleſſe to encounter.

Remon. God give you wiſdome to ſee the Truth, and grace to follow it.

Anſw. I wiſh the like to all thoſe that reſiſt not the Holy Ghoſt; for of ſuch God commands Jeremie, ſaying, Pray not thou for them, neither lift up cry or prayer for them, neither make interceſſion to me, for I will not hear thee; and of ſuch Saint John ſaith, He that bids them God ſpeed, is partaker of their evill Deeds.

To the Poſtſcript.

Remon. A goodly Paſquin borrow'd for a great part out of Sions plea, or the Breviate conſiſting of a Rhapſody of Hiſtories.

Anſw. How wittily you tell us what your wonted courſe is upon the like occaſion: the Collection was taken, be it knowne to you, from as authentique Authors in this kinde, as any in a Biſhops Library; and the collector of it ſayes moreover, that if the like occaſion come againe, hee ſhall leſſe need the help of Breviates, or hiſtoricall Rhapſodies, than your Reverence to eek out your ſermonings ſhall need repaire to Poſtills, or Polianthea's.

Remon. They were Biſhops you ſay, true, but they were Popiſh Biſhops. Pag. 164.

Anſw. Since you would bind us to your juriſdiction by their Canon-law, ſince you would inforce upon us the old riff-raffe of Sarum, and other monaſticall reliques; ſince you live upon their unjuſt purchaſes, alleage their authorities, boaſt of their ſucceſſion, walke in their ſteps, their pride, their titles, their covetouſneſſe, their perſecuting of Gods people; ſince you diſclaime their actions, and build their Sepulchres, it is moſt juſt, that all their faults ſhould be imputed to yee, and their Iniquities viſited upon yee.

Pag. 166. Remon. Could yee ſee no Colleges, no Hoſpitals built?

Anſw. At that priméro of Piety, the Pope and Cardinals are the better Gameſters, and will cogge a Die into Heav'n before you.

Remon. No Churches re-edified?

Anſw. Yes, more Churches then Soules.

Remon. No learned Volumes writ?

Anſw. So did the miſcreant Biſhop of Spalatto write learned Volumes againſt the Pope, and run to Rome when he had done; yee write them in your Cloſets, and unwrite them in your Courts; hot Volumiſts and cold Biſhops; a ſwaſhbuckler againſt the Pope, and a dormouſe againſt the Devil, while the whole Dioceſſe be ſown with tares, and none to reſiſt the enemy, but ſuch as let him in at the Poſterne; a rare ſuperintendent at Rome, and a cipher at home. Hypocrites, the Goſpell faithfully preach'd to the poore, the deſolate Pariſhes viſited and duely fed; Loyterers throwne out, Wolves driven from the fold, had beene a better confutation of the Pope and Maſſe, than whole Hecatontomes of Controverſies; and all this careering with Speare in reſt, and thundring upon the ſteele Cap of Baronius or Bellarmine.

Remon. No ſeduced Perſons reclaim'd?

Anſw. More reclaimed Perſons ſeduc'd.

Remon. No hoſpitality kept?

Anſw. Bacchanalia's good ſtore in every Biſhops Family, and good gleeking.

Remon. No great offenders puniſh'd?

Anſw. The trophies of your high Commiſſion are renown'd.

Remon. No good Offices done for the publique?

Anſw. Yes, the good Office of reducing Monarchie to Tyrannie, of breaking pacifications, and calumniating the People to the King.

Remon. No care of the peace of the Church?

Anſw. No, nor of the Land; witneſſe the two Armies in the North that now lies plunder'd, and over-run by a Liturgie.

Remon. No diligence in preaching?

Anſw. Scarce any preaching at all.

Remon. No holineſſe in living?

Anſw. No.

Remon. Truely, Brethren, I can ſay no more, but that the fault is in your Eyes.

Anſw. If you can ſay no more than this, you were a proper Remonſtrant to ſtand up for the whole Tribe.

Remon. Wipe them, and looke better.

Anſw. Wipe your fat Corpulencies out of our light.

Remon. Yea, I beſeech God to open them rather that they may ſee good.

Anſw. If you mean good Prelates, let be your prayer, aske not impoſſibilities.

Remon. As for that proverb, the Biſhops foot hath been in it, it were more fit for a Scurra in Trivio, or ſome Ribald upon an Ale-bench.

Anſw. The fitter for them then of whom it was meant.

Pag. 167. Remon. I doubt not but they will ſay, the Biſhops foot hath been in your Booke, for I am ſure it is quite ſpoil'd by this juſt confutation; for your proverb, Sapit Ollam.

Anſw. Spoyld quoth ye? indeed it is ſo ſpoild, as a good Song is ſpoyld by a lewd ſinger, or as the ſaying is, God ſends meat, but the Cooks worke their wills: in that ſenſe we grant your Biſhops foot may have ſpoyld it, and made it Sapere ollam, if not Sapere aulam; which is the ſame in old Latin, and perhaps in plaine Engliſh. For certaine your confutation hath atchiev'd nothing againſt it, and left nothing upon it, but a foule taſte of your skillet foot, and a more perfect and diſtinguiſhable odour of your Socks, then of your Night-cap. And how the Biſhop ſhould confute a Booke with his Foot, unleſſe his Braines were dropt into his great Toe, I cannot meet with any man that can reſolve me, onely they tell me that certainly ſuch a Confutation muſt needs be goutie. So much for the Biſhops foot.

Remonſt. You tell us of Bonners Broth; it is the faſhion in ſome Countries to ſend in their Keal in the laſt Service, and this it ſeems is the manner amongſt our Smectymnuans.

Anſw. Your latter Service at the high Altar you mean; but ſoft Sir, the Feaſt was but begun, the Broth was your own, you have been inviting the Land to it this fourſcore years; and ſo long we have been your ſlaves to ſerve it up for you, much againſt our wills: we know you have the Beefe to it, ready in your Kitchins, we are ſure it was almoſt ſod before this Parliament begun; what direction you have given ſince to your Cooks to ſet it by in the Pantry till ſome fitter time, we know not, and therefore your deare Jeſt is loſt; this Broth was but your firſt Service: Alas, Sir, why doe you delude your Gueſts? Why doe not thoſe goodly Flanks and Briskets march up in your ſtately Chargers? doutleſſe, if need be, the Pope that owes you for mollifying the matter ſo well with him, and making him a true Church, will furniſh you with all the fat Oxen of Italy.

Remonſt. Learned and worthy Doctor Moulin ſhall tell them.

Anſw. Moulin ſayes in his Booke of the calling of Paſtors, that becauſe Biſhops were the Reformers of the Engliſh Church, therefore they were left remaining: This Argument is but of ſmall force to keepe you in your Cathedrals. For firſt it may be deny'd that Biſhops were our firſt Reformers, for Wickliffe was before them, and his egregious Labours are not to be neglected; beſides, our Biſhops were in this worke but the Diſciples of Prieſts, and began the Reformation before they were Biſhops. But what though Luther and other Monks were the Reformers of other places? does it follow therefore that Monks ought to continue? no, though Luther had taught ſo. And laſtly, Moulins Argument directly makes againſt you; for if there be nothing in it but this, Biſhops were left remaining becauſe they were the Reformers of the Church, by as good a Conſequence therefore they are now to be remov'd, becauſe they have been the moſt certaine deformers and ruiners of the Church. Thus you ſee how little it avails you to take Sanctuary among thoſe Churches which in the generall ſcope of your actions formerly you have diſregarded, and deſpis'd, however your faire words would now ſmooth it over otherwiſe.

Anſw. You boaſt much of Martyrs to uphold your Epiſcopacy; but if you would call to mind what Euſebius in his 5. l. recites from Apollinarius of Hierapolis, you ſhould then heare it eſteem'd no other then an old hereticall Argument, to prove a Poſition true, becauſe ſome that held it were Martyrs: This was that which gave boldneſſe to the Marcioniſts, and Cataphryges to avouch their impious Hereſies for pious Doctrine, becauſe they could reckon many Martyrs of their Sect; and when they were confuted in other Points, this was ever their laſt and ſtouteſt Plea.

Remonſt. In the mean time I beſeech the God of Heaven to humble you.

Anſw. We ſhall beſeech the ſame God to give you a more profitable and pertinent Humiliation then yet you know, and a leſſe miſtaken charitableneſſe, with that peace which you have hitherto ſo perverſely miſaffected.

An APOLOGY for Smectymnuus.

IF, Readers, to that ſame great difficulty of well-doing what we certainly know, were not added in moſt men as great a careleſſenes of knowing what they and others ought to do, we had bin long ere this, no doubt but all of us, much farther on our way to ſome degree of Peace and Happineſſe in this Kingdome. But ſince our ſinfull neglect of practiſing that which we know to be undoubtedly true and good, hath brought forth among us, through Gods juſt Anger, ſo great a difficulty now to know that which otherwiſe might be ſoone learnt, and hath divided us by a Controverſie of great importance indeed, but of no hard ſolution, which is the more our puniſhment, I reſolv'd (of what ſmall moment ſoever I might be thought) to ſtand on that ſide where I ſaw both the plain Autority of Scripture leading, and the reaſon of Juſtice and Equity perſwading; with this opinion which eſteemes it more unlike a Chriſtian to be a cold neuter in the cauſe of the Church, then the Law of Solon made it puniſhable after a Sedition in the State. And becauſe I obſerve that Feare and dull Diſpoſition, Lukewarmeneſſe and Sloth, are not ſeldomer wont to cloak themſelves under the affected name of Moderation, then true and lively Zeale is cuſtomably diſparag'd with the terme of Indiſcretion, Bitterneſſe, and Choler, I could not to my thinking honor a good Cauſe more from the heart, then by defending it earneſtly, as oft as I could judge it to behoove me, notwithſtanding any falſe name that could be invented to wrong or undervalue an honeſt meaning. Wherein although I have not doubted to ſingle forth more then once ſuch of them as were thought the chiefe and moſt nominated Oppoſers on the other ſide, whom no Man elſe undertooke: If I have done well either to be confident of the Truth, whoſe force is beſt ſeene againſt the ableſt Reſiſtance, or to be jealous and tender of the hurt that might be done among the weaker by the intrapping Autority of great Names titl'd to falſe Opinions; or that it be lawful to attribute ſomewhat to Gifts of Gods imparting, which I boaſt not, but thankfully acknowledge, and feare alſo leſt at my certaine account they be reckon'd to me many rather then few; or if laſtly it be but Juſtice not to defraud of due eſteeme the weariſome labours and ſtudious watchings, wherein I have ſpent and tir'd out almoſt a whole Youth, I ſhall not diſtruſt to be acquitted of preſumption: knowing, that if heretofore all ages have receav'd with favour and good acceptance the earlieſt induſtry of him that hath beene hopefull, it were but hard meaſure now, if the freedome of any timely ſpirit ſhould be oppreſt meerely by the big and blunted fame of his elder adverſary; and that his ſufficiency muſt be now ſentenc't, not by pondering the reaſon he ſhewes, but by calculating the years he brings. However, as my purpoſe is not, nor hath beene formerly, to looke on my Adverſary abroad, through the deceaving glaſſe of other Mens great opinion of him, but at home, where I may finde him in the proper light of his owne worth, ſo now againſt the rancor of an evill tongue, from which I never thought ſo abſurdly, as that I of all Men ſhould be exempt, I muſt be forc't to proceed from the unfained and diligent inquiry of mine owne Conſcience at home (for better way I know not, Readers) to give a more true account of my ſelfe abroad then this modeſt Confuter, as he calls himſelfe, hath given of me. Albeit that in doing this I ſhall be ſenſible of two things which to me will be nothing pleaſant; the one is, that not unlikely I ſhall be thought too much a Party in mine own Cauſe, and therein to ſee leaſt: the other, that I ſhall be put unwillingly to moleſt the publick view with the vindication of a private name; as if it were worth the while that the People ſhould care whether ſuch a one were thus, or thus. Yet thoſe I intreat who have found the leaſure to read that Name, however of ſmall repute, unworthily defam'd, would be ſo good and ſo patient as to heare the ſame Perſon not unneedfully defended. I will not deny but that the beſt Apology againſt falſe Accuſers is ſilence and ſufferance, and honeſt deeds ſet againſt diſhoneſt words. And that I could at this time moſt eaſily and ſecurely, with the leaſt loſſe of Reputation, uſe no other defence, I need not deſpaire to win beliefe; whether I conſider both the fooliſh contriving and ridiculous aiming of theſe his ſlanderous bolts, ſhot ſo wide of any ſuſpicion to be faſtn'd on me, that I have oft with inward contentment perceav'd my friends congratulating themſelves in my innocence, and my Enemies aſham'd of their partners folly: Or whether I look at theſe preſent times wherein moſt men, now ſcarce permitted the liberty to think over their owne concernments, have remov'd the ſeat of their thoughts more outward to the expectation of publick events. Or whether the examples of Men, either noble or religious, who have ſat downe lately with a meeke ſilence and ſufferance under many libellous Endorſements, may be a rule to others, I might well appeaſe my ſelf to put up any reproaches in ſuch an honourable Society of fellow-ſufferers, uſing no other Defence. And were it that Slander would be content to make an end where it firſt fixes, and not ſeek to caſt out the like infamy upon each thing that hath but any relation to the Perſon traduc'd, I ſhould have pleaded againſt this Confuter by no other Advocates then thoſe which I firſt commended, Silence and Sufferance, and ſpeaking deeds againſt faltering words. But when I diſcern'd his intent was not ſo much to ſmite at me, as through me to render odious the Truth which I had written, and to ſtaine with ignominy that Evangelick Doctrine which oppoſes the tradition of Prelaty, I conceav'd my ſelfe to be now not as mine own Perſon, but as a Member incorporate into that Truth whereof I was perſwaded, and whereof I had declar'd openly to be a partaker. Whereupon I thought it my duty, if not to my ſelfe, yet to the religious Cauſe I had in hand, not to leave on my garment the leaſt ſpot or blemiſh in good name ſo long as God ſhould give me to ſay that which might wipe it off. Leſt thoſe diſgraces which I ought to ſuffer, if it ſo befall me, for my Religion, through my default Religion be made liable to ſuffer for me. And, whether it might not ſomething reflect upon thoſe reverent Men whoſe friend I may be thought in writing the Animadverſions, was not my laſt care to conſider; if I ſhould reſt under theſe reproaches, having the ſame common Adverſary with them, it might be counted ſmall credit for their cauſe to have found ſuch an aſſiſtant as this babler hath deviſ'd me. What other thing in his Book there is of diſpute or queſtion, in anſwering thereto I doubt not to be juſtifi'd; except there be who will condemne me to have waſted time in throwing downe that which could not keep it ſelfe up. As for others, who notwithſtanding what I can allege have yet decreed to miſ-interpret the intents of my Reply, I ſuppoſe they would have found as many cauſes to have miſconceav'd the reaſons of my ſilence.

TO beginne therefore an Apology for thoſe Animadverſions which I writ againſt the Remonſtrant in defence of Smectymnuus; ſince the Preface, which was purpoſely ſet before them, is not thought apologeticall anough, it will be beſt to acquaint ye, Readers, before other things, what the meaning was to write them in that manner which I did. For I do not look to be askt wherefore I writ the Book, it being no difficulty to anſwer that I did it to thoſe ends which the beſt Men propoſe to themſelves when they write: But wherefore in that manner neglecting the maine bulk of all that ſpecious Antiquity, which might ſtunne Children, but not Men, I choſe rather to obſerve ſome kinde of military advantages to await him at his forragings, at his watrings, and when ever he felt himſelfe ſecure, to ſolace his veine in deriſion of his more ſerious opponents. And here let me have pardon, Readers, if the remembrance of that which he hath licenc't himſelfe to utter contemptuouſly of thoſe reverend Men provoke me to doe that over againe which ſome expect I ſhould excuſe as too freely done; ſince I have two provocations, his lateſt inſulting in his ſhort anſwer, and their finall patience. I had no fear but that the Authors of Smectymnuus, to all the ſhew of ſolidity which the Remonſtrant could bring, were prepar'd both with skill and purpoſe to returne a ſuffizing anſwer, and were able anough to lay the duſt and pudder in antiquity, which he and his, out of ſtratagem, are wont to raiſe; but when I ſaw his weake Arguments headed with ſharpe taunts, and that his deſigne was, if he could not refute them, yet at leaſt with quips and ſnapping Adagies to vapour them out, which they bent only upon the buſineſſe were minded to let paſſe, by how much I ſaw them taking little thought for their own Injuries, I muſt confeſſe

I took it as my part the leſſe to endure that my reſpected Friends, through their own unneceſſary patience, ſhould thus lye at the Mercy of a coy flurting ſtile; to be girded with frumps and curtall gibes, by one who makes ſentences by the Statute, as if all above three inches long were confiſcat. To me it ſeem'd an indignity, that whom his whole wiſdome could not move from their place, them his impetuous Folly ſhould preſume to ride over. And if I were more warme then was meet in any paſſage of that Booke, which yet I do not yeild, I might uſe therein the patronage of no worſe an Author then Gregory Nyſſen, who mentioning his ſharpneſſe againſt Eunomius in the defence of his brother Baſil, holds himſelfe irreprovable in that it was not for himſelfe, but in the cauſe of his Brother; and in ſuch caſes, ſaith he, perhaps it is worthier pardon to be angry then to be cooler. And whereas this Confuter taxes the whole Diſcourſe of Levity, I ſhall ſhew ye, Readers, whereſoever it ſhall be objected in particular, that I have anſwer'd with as little lightneſſe as the Remonſtrant hath given example. I have not beene ſo light as the palme of a Biſhop, which is the lighteſt thing in the world when he brings out his Book of Ordination: For then, contrary to that which is wont in releaſing out of priſon, any one that will pay his fees is layd hands on. Another reaſon, it would not be amiſſe though the Remonſtant were told, wherefore he was in that unuſuall manner beleaguer'd; and this was it, to pluck out of the heads of his Admirers the conceit that all who are not Prelaticall, are groſſe-headed, thick-witted, illiterat, ſhallow. Can nothing then but Epiſcopacy teach Men to ſpeak good Engliſh, to pick and order a ſet of words judiciouſly? Muſt we learne from Canons and quaint Sermonings, interlin'd with barbarous Latin, to illumin a period, to wreath an Enthymema with maiſtrous dexterity? I rather encline, as I have heard it obſerv'd, that a Jeſuits Italian when he writes, is ever naught, though he be borne and bred a Florentine; ſo to thinke that from like cauſes we may go neere to obſerve the ſame in the ſtile of a Prelat. For doubtleſſe that indeed according to Art is moſt eloquent, which returnes and approaches neereſt to Nature from whence it came; and they expreſſe Nature beſt, who in their lives leaſt wander from her ſafe leading, which may be call'd regenerate Reaſon. So that how he ſhould be truly eloquent who is not withall a good Man, I ſee not. Neverthleſſe as oft as is to be dealt with Men who pride themſelves in their ſuppoſed Art, to leave them unexcuſable wherin they will not be better'd; there be of thoſe that eſteeme Prelaty a figment, who yet can pipe if they can dance, nor will be unfurniſht to ſhew that what the Prelats admire and have not, others have and admire not. The knowledge whereof, and not of that only, but of what the Scripture teacheth us how we ought to withſtand the perverters of the Goſpell, were thoſe other motives which gave the Animadverſions no leave to remit a continuall vehemence throughout the Book. For as in teaching doubtleſſe the ſpirit of meekneſſe is moſt powerfull, ſo are the meeke only fit perſons to be taught: as for the proud, the obſtinate, and falſe Doctors of Mens devices, be taught they will not, but diſcover'd and laid open they muſt be. For how can they admit of teaching, who have the Condemnation of God already upon them for refuſing divine Inſtruction? that is, to be fill'd with their own devices, as in the Proverbs we may reade: therefore we may ſafely imitate the method that God uſes; with the froward to be froward, and to throw ſcorne upon the ſcorner, whom if any thing, nothing elſe will heale. And if the righteous ſhall laugh at the deſtruction of the ungodly, they may alſo laugh at their pertinacious and incurable obſtinacy, and at the ſame time be mov'd with deteſtation of their ſeducing malice, who imploy all their wits to defend a Prelaty uſurpt, and to deprave that juſt Government which Pride and Ambition, partly by fine fetches and pretences, partly by force, hath ſhoulder'd out of the Church. And againſt ſuch kind of deceavers openly and earneſtly to proteſt, leſt any one ſhould be inquiſitive wherefore this or that Man is forwarder then others, let him know that this Office goes not by Age or Youth, but to whomſoever God ſhall give apparently the Will, the Spirit, and the Utterance. Ye have heard the reaſons for which I thought not my ſelfe exempted from aſſociating with good Men in their labours toward the Churches wellfare: to which if any one brought oppoſition, I brought my beſt reſiſtance. If in requital of this, and for that I have not been negligent toward the reputation of my friends, I have gain'd a name beſtuck, or as I may ſay, bedeckt with the reproaches and reviles of this modeſt Confuter, it ſhall be to me neither ſtrange nor unwelcome, as that which could not come in a better time.

Having render'd an account what induc'd me to write thoſe Animadverſions in that manner as I writ them, I come now to ſee what the Confutation hath to ſay againſt them; but ſo as the Confuter ſhall hear firſt what I have to ſay againſt his Confutation. And becauſe he pretends to be a great Conjector at other Men by their Writings, I will not faile to give ye, Readers, a preſent taſte of him from his own title, hung out like a toling ſigne-poſt to call Paſſengers, not ſimply a Confutation, but a modeſt Confutation, with a Laudatory of it ſelfe obtruded in the very firſt word. Whereas a modeſt title ſhould only informe the buyer what the Book containes without furder inſinuation; this officious Epithet ſo haſtily aſſuming the modeſty which others are to judge of by reading, not the Author to anticipate to himſelfe by foreſtalling, is a ſtrong preſumption that his modeſty ſet there to ſale in the frontiſpice, is not much addicted to bluſh. A ſurer ſigne of his loſt ſhame he could not have given, then ſeeking thus unſeaſonably to prepoſſeſſe Men of his modeſty. And ſeeing he hath neither kept his word in the ſequel, nor omitted any kinde of boldneſſe in ſlandering, 'tis manifeſt his purpoſe was only to rub the forehead of his title with this word modeſt, that he might not want colour to be the more impudent throughout his whole Confutation. Next what can equally ſavour of Injuſtice and plaine Arrogance, as to prejudice and forecondemne his Adverſary in the title for ſlanderous and ſcurrilous, and as the Remonſtrants faſhion is, for frivolous, tedious, and falſe, not ſtaying till the Reader can hear him prov'd ſo in the following Diſcourſe; which is one cauſe of a ſuſpicion that in ſetting forth this Pamplet the Remonſtrant was not unconſulted with: thus his firſt addreſſe was an humble Remonſtance by a dutifull Son of the Church, almoſt as if he had ſaid her white-boy. His next was a Defence (a wonder how it ſcapt ſome praiſing adjunct) againſt the frivolous and falſe Exceptions of Smectymnuus, ſitting in the chaire of his Title-page upon his poore caſt Adverſaries both as a Judge and Party, and that before the Jury of Readers can be impannell'd. His laſt was a ſhort Anſwer to a tedious Vindication; ſo little can he ſuffer a Man to meaſure either with his eye or judgement, what is ſhort or what tedious, without his preoccupying direction: and from hence is begotten this modeſt Confutation againſt a ſlanderous and ſcurrilous Libell. I conceave, Readers, much may be gueſt at the Man and his Book, what depth there is, by the framing of his Title; which being in this Remonſtrant ſo raſh and unadviſed as ye ſee, I conceit him to be neere a kin to him who ſet forth a Paſſion Sermon with a formall Dedicatory in great Letters to our Saviour. Although I know that all we do ought to begin and end to his Praiſe and Glory, yet to inſcribe him in a void place with flouriſhes, as a Man in complement uſes to trick up the name of ſome Eſquire, Gentleman, or Lord Paramont at Common Law, to be his Book-patron, with the appendant form of a ceremonious preſentment, will ever appeare among the judicious to be but an inſuls and frigid affectation. As no leſſe was that before his Book againſt the Browniſts, to write a Letter to a Proſopopæa, a certain rhetoriz'd Woman whom he calls Mother, and complains of ſome that laid Whoredome to her charge; and certainly had he folded his Epiſtle with a Superſcription to be deliver'd to that female figure by any Poſt or Carrier who were not a Ubiquitary, it had beene a moſt miraculous greeting. We finde the Primitive Doctors as oft as they writ to Churches, ſpeaking to them as to a number of faithfull Brethren and Sons, and not to make a cloudy Tranſmigration of Sexes in ſuch a familiar way of writing as an Epiſtle ought to be, leaving the track of common adreſſe, to run up, and tread the Aire in metaphoricall Compellations, and many fond utterances better let alone. But I ſtep again to this Emblazoner of his Title-page, (whether it be the ſame Man or no I leave it in the midſt) and here I finde him pronouncing, without reprieve, thoſe Animadverſions to be a ſlanderous and ſcurrilous Libell. To which I, Readers, that they are neither ſlanderous, nor ſcurrilous, will anſwer in what place of his Book he ſhall be found with reaſon, and not inke only in his mouth. Nor can it be a Libell more than his owne, which is both nameleſſe and full of ſlanders; and if in this that it freely ſpeaks of things amiſſe in Religion, but eſtabliſht by act of State, I ſee not how Wickleffe and Luther, with all the firſt Martyrs and Reformers, could avoid the imputation of libelling. I never thought the humane frailty of erring in caſes of Religion Infamy to a State, no more then to a Councell; it had therefore beene neither civill nor chriſtianly, to derogate the Honour of the State for that cauſe, eſpecially when I ſaw the Parlament it ſelfe piouſly and magnanimouſly bent to ſupply and reforme the defects and overſights of their Fore-fathers, which to the godly and repentant ages of the Jewes were often matter of humble confeſſing and bewailing, not of confident aſſerting and maintaining. Of the State therefore I found good reaſon to ſpeak all honourable things, and to joyne in petition with good Men that petition'd: but againſt the Prelats who were the only ſeducers and miſ-leaders of the State to conſtitute the Government of the Church not rightly, methought I had not vehemence anough. And thus, Readers, by the example which hee hath ſet mee I have given yee two or three notes of him out of his Title-page; by which his firſtlings feare not to gueſſe boldly at his whole lumpe, for that gueſſe will not faile ye; and altho I tell him keen truth, yet he may beare with me, ſince I am like to chaſe him into ſome good knowledge, and others, I truſt, ſhall not miſ-ſpend their leaſure. For this my aime is, if I am forc't to be unpleaſing to him whoſe fault it is, I ſhall not forget at the ſame time to be uſefull in ſome thing to the ſtander-by.

As therefore he began in the Title, ſo in the next leafe he makes it his firſt buſineſſe to tamper with his Reader by ſycophanting and miſnaming the worke of his Adverſary. He calls it a Mime thruſt forth upon the ſtage to make up the breaches of thoſe ſolemn Scenes betweene the Prelats and the Smectymnuans. Wherein while he is ſo over-greedy to fix a name of ill ſound upon another, note how ſtupid he is to expoſe himſelfe or his own friends to the ſame ignominy; likening thoſe grave Controverſies to a piece of Stagery, or Scene-worke, where his owne Remonſtrant, whether in Buskin or Sock, muſt of all right be counted the chiefe Player, be it boaſting Thraſo, or Davus that troubles all things, or one who can ſhift into any ſhape, I meddle not; let him explicate who hath reſembl'd the whole Argument to a Comedy, for Tragicall, he ſays, were too ominous. Nor yet doth he tell us what a Mime is, whereof we have no pattern from ancient writers except ſome fragments, which containe many acute and wiſe ſentences. And this we know in Laertius, that the Mimes of Sophron were of ſuch reckning with Plato, as to take them nightly to read on, and after make them his pillow. Scaliger deſcribes a Mime to be a Poem imitating any action to ſtirre up laughter. But this being neither Poem, nor yet ridiculous, how is it but abuſively taxt to be a Mime? For if every Book which may by chance excite to laugh here and there, muſt be term'd thus, then may the Dialogues of Plato, who for thoſe his writings hath obtain'd the ſurname of Divine, be eſteem'd as they are by that Detractor in Athenæus, no better then Mimes. Becauſe there is ſcarce one of them, eſpecially wherein ſome notable Sophiſter lies ſweating and turmoyling under the inevitable and mercileſſe Dilemma's of Socrates, but that hee who reads, were it Saturne himſelfe, would be often rob'd of more then a ſmile. And whereas he tels us that ſcurrilous Mime was a perſonated grim lowring Foole, his fooliſh language unwittingly writes Foole upon his owne friend, for he who was there perſonated, was only the Remonſtrant; the Author is ever diſtinguiſh'd from the perſon he introduces. But in an ill houre hath his unfortunate raſhneſſe ſtumbl'd upon the mention of miming, that hee might at length ceaſe, which he hath not yet ſince he ſtept in, to gall and hurt him whom hee would aide. Could he not beware, could he not bethink him, was he ſo uncircumſpect, as not to foreſee, that no ſooner would that word Mime be ſet eye on in the Paper, but it would bring to minde that wretched Pilgrimage over Minſhews Dictionary call'd Mundus alter & idem, the idleſt and the paltrieſt Mime that ever mounted upon banke? Let him ask the Author of thoſe toothleſſe Satyrs who was the maker, or rather the anticreator of that univerſall foolery, who he was, who like that other principle of the Maniches the Arch evill one, when he had look't upon all that he had made and mapt out, could ſay no other but contrary to the Divine Mouth, that it was all very fooliſh. That grave and noble invention which the greateſt and ſublimeſt Wits in ſundry ages, Plato in Critias, and our two famous country-men, the one in his Utopia, the other in his new Atlantis choſe, I may not ſay as a Feild, but as a mighty Continent, wherein to diſplay the largeneſſe of their Spirits, by teaching this our world better and exacter things then were yet known or us'd: this petty Prevaricator of America, the Zanie of Columbus (for ſo he muſt be till his worlds end) having rambl'd over the huge topography of his own vain thoughts, no marvell if he brought us home nothing but a meer tankard drollery, a venereous parjetory for a ſtewes. Certainly he that could indure with a ſober pen to ſit and deviſe Laws for Drunkards to carouſe by, I doubt me whether the very ſoberneſſe of ſuch a one, like an unlicour'd Silenus, were not ſtark drunk. Let him go now and brand another man injuriouſly with the name of Mime, being himſelfe the looſeſt and moſt extravagant Mime that hath been heard of, whom no leſſe then almoſt halfe the world could ſerve for ſtage roome to play the Mime in. And let him adviſe again with Sir Francis Bacon, whom he cites to confute others, what it is to turn the ſinnes of Chriſtendome into a mimicall mockery, to rip up the ſaddeſt vices with a laughing countenance, eſpecially where neither reproofe nor better teaching is adjoynd. Nor is my meaning, Readers, to ſhift off a blame from my ſelfe, by charging the like upon my accuſer, but ſhall only deſire that Sentence may be reſpited, till I can come to ſome inſtance whereto I may give anſwer.

Thus having ſpent his firſt Onſet, not in confuting, but in a reaſonleſſe defaming of the Book, the method of his Malice hurries him to attempt the like againſt the Author; not by Proofes and Teſtimonies, but having no certaine notice of me, as he profeſſes, furder then what he gathers from the Animadverſions, blunders at me for the reſt, and flings out ſtray Crimes at a venture, which he could never, though he be a Serpent, ſuck from any thing that I have written, but from his own ſtufft magazin, and hoard of ſlanderous Inventions, over and above that which he converted to venome in the drawing. To me, Readers, it happens as a ſingular contentment; and let it be to good Men no ſlight ſatisfaction, that the Slanderer here confeſſes, he has no furder notice of mee then his owne conjecture. Although it had been honeſt to have inquir'd, before he utter'd ſuch infamous words, and I am credibly inform'd he did inquire; but finding ſmall comfort from the intelligence which he receav'd, whereon to ground the Falſities which he had provided, thought it his likelieſt courſe under a pretended ignorance to let drive at randome, leſt he ſhould loſe his odde Ends, which from ſome penurious Book of Characters he had been culling out and would faine apply. Not caring to burden me with thoſe Vices, whereof, among whom my Converſation hath been, I have been ever leaſt ſuſpected; perhaps not without ſome ſuttlety to caſt me into envie, by bringing on me a neceſſity to enter into mine own praiſes. In which Argument I know every wiſe Man is more unwillingly drawn to ſpeak, then the moſt repining eare can be averſe to heare. Neverthelеſſe ſince I dare not wiſh to paſſe this Life unperſecuted of ſlanderous tongues, for God hath told us that to be generally prais'd is wofull, I ſhall relye on his Promiſe to free the Innocent from cauſeleſſe Aſperſions: whereof nothing ſooner can aſſure me, then if I ſhall feele him now aſſiſting me in the juſt vindication of my ſelfe. which yet I could deferre, it being more meet that to thoſe other matters of publick debatement in this Book, I ſhould give attendance firſt, but that I feare it would but harme the Truth for me to reaſon in her behalf, ſo long as I ſhould ſuffer my honeſt eſtimation to lye unpurg'd from theſe inſolent ſuſpicions. And if I ſhall be large, or unwonted in juſtifying my ſelfe to thoſe who know me not, for elſe it would be needleſſe, let them conſider that a ſhort Slander will oft-times reach farder then a long Apology; and that he who will do juſtly to all Men, muſt begin from knowing how, if it ſo happen, to be not unjuſt to himſelf. I muſt be thought, if this Libeller (for now he ſhews himſelf to be ſo) can finde beliefe, after an inordinat and riotous Youth ſpent at the Univerſity, to have bin at length vomited out thence. For which commodious Lye, that he may be encourag'd in the trade another time, I thank him, for it hath given me an apt occaſion to acknowledge publickly with all gratefull minde, that more then ordinary favour and reſpect which I found above any of my Equals at the hands of thoſe curteous and learned Men, the Fellowes of that Colledge wherein I ſpent ſome Years: who at my parting, after I had taken two Degrees, as the manner is, ſignifi'd many ny wayes, how much better it would content them that I would ſtay; as by many Letters full of kindneſſe and loving reſpect, both before that time, and long after, I was aſſur'd of their ſingular good affection towards me. Which being likewiſe propenſe to all ſuch as were for their ſtudious and civil Life worthy of eſteeme, I could not wrong their Judgments, and upright Intentions, ſo much as to think I had that regard from them for other cauſe then that I might be ſtill encourag'd to proceed in the honeſt and laudable courſes, of which they apprehended I had given good proofe. And to thoſe ingenuous and friendly Men who were ever the countenancers of vertuous and hopefull Wits, I wiſh the beſt and happieſt things that Friends in abſence wiſh one to another. As for the common approbation or diſlike of that place, as now it is, that I ſhould eſteeme or diſeſteeme my ſelfe or any other the more for that, too ſimple and too credulous is the Confuter, if he thinke to obtaine with me, or any right Diſcerner. Of ſmall practize was that Phyſician who could not judge by what both ſhe or her Siſter hath of long time vomited, that the worſer ſtuffe ſhe ſtrongly keeps in her ſtomack, but the better ſhe is ever kecking at, and is queaſie. She vomits now out of ſickneſſe; but ere it be well with her, ſhe muſt vomit by ſtrong Phyſick. In the meane while that Suburb ſinke, as this rude Scavinger calls it, and more then ſcurrilouſly taunts it with the plague, having a worſe plague in his middle Entraile, that Suburb wherein I dwell, ſhall be in my account a more honourable place then his Univerſity. Which as in the time of her better health, and mine owne younger judgement, I never greatly admir'd, ſo now much leſſe. But he follows me to the City, ſtill uſurping and forging beyond his Book notice, which only he affirms to have had; and where my morning haunts are he wiſſes not. 'Tis wonder, that being ſo rare an Alchymiſt of ſlander, he could not extract that, as well as the Univerſity vomit, and the Suburb ſinke which his Art could diſtill ſo cunningly; but becauſe his Limbeck failes him, to give him and envie the more vexation, I'le tell him. Thoſe morning haunts are where they ſhould be at home, not ſleeping, or concocting the ſurfets of an irregular Feaſt, but up and ſtirring, in Winter often ere the ſound of any Bell awake men to labour, or to devotion; in Summer as oft with the Bird that firſt rouſes, or not much tardier, to reade good Authors, or cauſe them to be read, till the Attention be weary, or Memory have its full fraught: Then with uſefull and generous labours preſerving the Bodies health and hardineſſe; to render lightſome, cleare, and not lumpiſh obedience to the minde, to the cauſe of Religion, and our Countries liberty, when it ſhall require firme hearts in ſound bodies to ſtand and cover their ſtations, rather then to ſee the ruine of our Proteſtation, and the inforcement of a ſlaviſh Life. Theſe are the morning Practiſes, proceed now to the afternoon; in Playhouſes, he ſayes, and the Bordelloes. Your intelligence, unfaithful Spie of Canaan: he gives in his evidence, that there he hath trac't me. Take him at his word, Readers, but let him bring good Sureties ere ye diſmiſſe him, that while he pretended to dogge others, he did not turne in for his own pleaſure; for ſo much in effect he concludes againſt himſelfe, not contented to be caught in every other Gin, but he muſt be ſuch a novice, as to be ſtill hamper'd in his own Hempe. In the Animadverſions, ſaith he, I finde the mention of old Clokes, falſe Beards, Night-walkers, and ſalt Lotion; therefore the Animadverter haunts Playhouſes and Bordelloes; for if he did not, how could hee ſpeake of ſuch Gear? Now that he may know what it is to be a Childe, and yet to meddle with edg'd tooles, I turn his Antiſtrephon upon his own head; the Confuter knowes that theſe things are the furniture of Playhouſes and Bordelloes, therefore by the ſame reaſon the Confuter himſelfe hath been trac't in thoſe places. Was it ſuch a diſſolute Speech, telling of ſome Politicians who were wont to eaveſdrop in diſguiſes, to ſay they were often liable to a night-walking Cudgeller, or the emptying of a Urinall? What if I had writ as your Friend the Author of the aforeſaid Mime, Mundus alter & idem, to have bin raviſht like ſome young Cephalus or Hylas, by a troope of camping Huſwives in Viraginea, and that he was there forc't to ſweare himſelfe to an uxorious Varlet; then after a long ſervitude to have come into Aphrodiſia that pleaſant Countrey, that gave ſuch a ſweet ſmell to his Noſtrils among the ſhameleſſe Courtezans of Deſvergonia? Surely he would have then concluded me as conſtant at the Bordello, as the Gally-ſlave at his Oare. But ſince there is ſuch neceſſity to the hear-ſay of a Tire, a Periwig, or a Vizard, that Playes muſt have bin ſeene, what difficulty was there in that? when in the Colleges ſo many of the young Divines, and thoſe in next aptitude to Divinity, have bin ſeene ſo often upon the Stage, writhing and unboning their Clergie-limmes to all the antick and diſhoneſt geſtures of Trinculo's, Buffons, and Bawds; proſtituting the ſhame of that Miniſtery, which either they had, or were nigh having, to the eyes of Courtiers and Court-Ladies, with their Groomes and Madamoiſellaes. There while they acted, and overacted, among other young Scholars, I was a Spectator; they thought themſelves gallant Men, and I thought them fools; they made ſport, and I laught; they miſpronounc't, and I miſlik't; and to make up the atticiſme, they were out, and I hiſt. Judge now whether ſo many good Text men were not ſufficient to inſtruct me of falſe beards and vizards, without more Expoſitors: and how can this Confuter take the face to object to me the ſeeing of that which his reverent Prelats allow, and incite their young diſciples to act? For if it be unlawfull to ſit and behold a mercenary Comedian perſonating that which is leaſt unſeemly for a hireling to doe, how much more blamefull is it to indure the ſight of as vile things acted by Perſons either enter'd, or preſently to enter into the Miniſtery; and how much more foule and ignominious for them to be the Actors?

But becauſe as well by this upraiding to me the Bordello's, as by other ſuſpicious glancings in his Book, he would ſeem privily to point me out to his Readers, as one whoſe cuſtome of Life were not honeſt, but licentious; I ſhall intreat to be born with, though I digreſſe; and in a way not often trod, acquaint yee with the ſumme of my thoughts in this matter, through the courſe of my Yeares and Studies. Although I am not ignorant how hazardous it will be to do this under the noſe of the Envious, as it were in skirmiſh to change the compact Order, and inſtead of outward Actions, to bring inmoſt thoughts into front. And I muſt tell yee Readers, that by this ſort of Men I have bin already bitten at; yet ſhall they not for me know how ſlightly they are eſteem'd, unleſſe they have ſo much learning as to reade what in Greek Απειροκαλία is, which together with envie, is the common diſeaſe of thoſe who cenſure Books that are not for their reading. With me it fares now, as with him whoſe outward garment hath bin injur'd and ill-bedighted; for having no other ſhift, what helpe but to turne the inſide outwards, eſpecially if the lining be of the ſame, or, as it is ſometimes, much better? So if my name and outward demeanour be not evident anough to defend me, I muſt make tryall, if the diſcovery of my inmoſt thoughts can: Wherein of two purpoſes both honeſt, and both ſincere, the one perhaps I ſhall not miſſe; although I faile to gaine beliefe with others, of being ſuch as my perpetuall thoughts ſhall heere diſcloſe me, I may yet not faile of ſucceſſe in perſwading ſome to be ſuch really themſelves, as they cannot believe me to be more then what I fain. I had my time, Readers, as others have, who have good learning beſtow'd upon them, to be ſent to thoſe Places, where the opinion was, it might be ſooneſt attain'd; and as the manner is, was not unſtudied in thoſe Authors which are moſt commended; whereof ſome were grave Orators and Hiſtorians, whoſe matter methought I lov'd indeed, but as my Age then was, ſo I underſtood them; others were the ſmooth Elegiack Poets, whereof the Schooles are not ſcarce, whom both for the pleaſing ſound of their numerous Writing, which in imitation I found moſt eaſie, and moſt agreeable to natures part in me, and for their matter, which what it is, there be few who know not, I was ſo allur'd to read, that no recreation came to me better welcome: For that it was then thoſe Years with me which are excus'd, though they be leaſt ſevere, I may be ſav'd the labour to remember ye. Whence having obſerv'd them to account it the chiefe glory of their wit, in that they were ableſt to judge, to praiſe, and by that could eſteeme themſelves worthieſt to love thoſe high perfections, which under one or other name they took to celebrate; I thought with my ſelfe by every inſtinct and preſage of Nature, which is not wont to be falſe, that what imboldn'd them to this task, might with ſuch diligence as they us'd imbolden me; and that what judgment, wit, or elegance was my ſhare, would herein beſt appeare, and beſt value it ſelfe, by how much more wiſely, and with more love of Vertue

I ſhould chooſe (let rude eares be abſent) the object of not unlike praiſes : For albeit theſe thoughts to ſome will ſeeme vertuous and commendable, to others only pardonable, to a third ſort perhaps idle ; yet the mentioning of them now will end in ſerious. Nor blame it, Readers, in thoſe Years to propoſe to themſelves ſuch a reward, as the nobleſt Diſpoſitions above other things in this Life have ſometimes preferr'd : whereof not to be ſenſible, when good and faire in one Perſon meet, argues both a groſſe and ſhallow Judgement, and withall an ungentle, and ſwainiſh breſt. For by the firme ſetling of theſe perſwaſions, I became, to my beſt memory, ſo much a proficient, that if I found thoſe Authors any where ſpeaking unworthy things of themſelves, or unchaſte of thoſe Names which before they had extoll'd ; this effect it wrought with me, from that time forward their Art I ſtill applauded, but the Men I deplor'd ; and above them all, preferr'd the two famous renowners of Beatrice and Laura, who never write but honour of them to whom they devote their Verſe, diſplaying ſublime and pure thoughts, without tranſgreſſion. And long it was not after, when I was confirm'd in this opinion, that he who would not be fruſtrate of his hope to write well hereafter in laudable things, ought himſelfe to bee a true Poem ; that is, a compoſition and patterne of the beſt and honourableſt things ; not preſuming to ſing high praiſes of heroick Men, or famous Cities, unleſſe he have in himſelfe the experience and the practice of all that which is praiſeworthy. Theſe reaſonings, together with a certaine niceneſſe of Nature, an honeſt haughtineſſe, and ſelf-eſteem either of what I was, or what I might be, (which let envie call pride) and laſtly that Modeſty, whereof though not in the Title-page, yet here I may be excus'd to make ſome beſeeming profeſſion ; all theſe uniting the ſupply of their naturall aid together, kept me ſtill above thoſe low deſcents of Minde, beneath which he muſt deject and plunge himſelf, that can agree to ſalable and unlawfull proſtitutions. Next, (for heare me out now Readers) that I may tell ye whither my younger feet wander'd ; I betook me among thoſe lofty Fables and Romances, which recount in ſolemne Canto's, the deeds of Knighthood founded by our victorious Kings, and from hence had in renowne over all Chriſtendome : There I read it in the Oath of every Knight, that he ſhould defend to the expence of his beſt Blood, or of his Life, if it ſo befell him, the honour and chaſtity of Virgin or Matron : From whence even then I learnt what a noble vertue Chaſtity ſure muſt be, to the defence of which ſo many Worthies by ſuch a deare adventure of themſelves had ſworne ; and if I found in the ſtory afterward, any of them by word or deed, breaking that Oath, I judg'd it the ſame fault of the Poet, as that which is attributed to Homer, to have written undecent things of the Gods : Only this my mind gave me, that every free and gentle ſpirit, without that Oath, ought to be borne a Knight, nor needed to expect the gilt Spurre, or the laying of a Sword upon his ſhoulder to ſtir him up both by his counſell and his arme, to ſecure and protect the weakneſſe of any attempted Chaſtity. So that even thoſe Books, which to many others have bin the fuell of wantonneſſe and looſe living, I cannot thinke how, unleſſe by divine indulgence, prov'd to me ſo many incitements, as you have heard, to the love and ſteadfaſt obſervation of that Vertue which abhorres the ſociety of Bordello's. Thus from the Laureat fraternity of Poets, riper yeares, and the ceaſeleſſe round of ſtudy and reading, led me to the ſhady ſpaces of Philoſophy ; but chiefly to the divine Volumes of Plato, and his equall Xenophon : where if I ſhould tell ye what I learnt of Chaſtity and Love, I meane that which is truly ſo, whoſe charming cup is only Vertue, which ſhe bears in her hand to thoſe who are worthy ; the reſt are cheated with a thick intoxicating potion, which a certain Sorcereſſe, the abuſer of Loves name carries about, and how the firſt and chiefeſt office of Love begins and ends in the Soule, producing thoſe happy twins of her divine generation, Knowledg and Vertue ; with ſuch abſtracted ſublimities as theſe, it might be worth your liſtning, Readers, as I may one day hope to have ye in a ſtill time, when there ſhall be no chiding ; not in theſe noiſes, the Adverſary, as ye know, barking at the doore, or ſearching for me at the Burdello's, where it may be he has loſt himſelfe, and raps up without pitty the ſage and Rheumatick old Prelateſſe with all her young Corinthian Laity, to inquire for ſuch a one. Laſt of all, not in time, but as perfection is laſt, that care was ever had of me, with my earlieſt capacity, not to be negligently train'd in the precepts of Chriſtian Religion: This that I have hitherto related, hath bin to ſhew, that though Chriſtianity had bin but ſlightly taught me, yet a certain reſerv'dneſſe of naturall diſpoſition, and morall diſcipline learnt out of the nobleſt Philoſophy, was enough to keep me in diſdain of farre leſſe incontinences then this of the Bordello. But having had the doctrine of Holy Scripture, unfolding thoſe chaſte and high Myſteries, with timelieſt care infus'd, that the body is for the Lord, and the Lord for the body; thus alſo I argu'd to my ſelfe, that if unchaſtity in a Woman, whom Saint Paul termes the glory of Man, be ſuch a ſcandall and diſhonour, then certainly in a Man who is both the image and glory of God, it muſt, though commonly not ſo thought, be much more deflouring and diſhonourable; in that he ſins both againſt his owne body, which is the perfeter Sex, and his own glory which is in the Woman; and that which is worſt, againſt the image and glory of God which is in himſelfe. Nor did I ſlumber over that place, expreſſing ſuch high rewards of ever accompanying the Lamb, with thoſe celeſtiall Songs to others inapprehenſible, but not to thoſe who were not defil'd with Women, which doubtleſſe meanes Fornication: For Mariage muſt not be call'd a defilement. Thus large I have purpoſely bin, that if I have bin juſtly taxt with this Crime, it may come upon me after all this my confeſſion, with a tenne-fold ſhame: But if I have hitherto deſerv'd no ſuch opprobrious word, or ſuſpicion, I may hereby ingage my ſelfe now openly to the faithfull obſervation of what I have profeſt. I go on to ſhew you the unbridl'd impudence of this looſe rayler, who having once begun his race, regards not how farre he flyes out beyond all truth and ſhame; who from the ſingle notice of the Animadverſions, as he proteſts, will undertake to tell ye the very cloaths I weare, though he be much miſtaken in my Wardrobe: And like a ſon of Belial, without the hire of Jeſabel, charges me of blaſpheming God and the King, as ordnarily as he imagines me to drink Sack and ſweare, meerely becauſe this was a ſhred in his common place-Book, and ſeem'd to come off roundly, as if he were ſome Empirick of falſe Accuſations to try his poiſons upon me, whether they would work or no. Whom what ſhould I endeavour to refute more, when as that Book which is his only Teſtimony returnes the lye upon him; not giving him the leaſt hint of the Author to be either a Swearer, or a Sack-drinker. And for the Readers, if they can believe me, principally for thoſe reaſons which I have alleg'd, to be of Life and Purpoſe neither diſhoneſt, nor unchaſte, they will be eaſily induc't to thinke me ſober both of wine, and of word; but if I have bin already ſucceſſeleſſe in perſwading them, all that I can furder ſay, will be but vaine; and it will be better thrift to ſave two tedious labours, mine of excuſing, and theirs of needleſſe hearing.

Proceeding furder, I am met with a whole ging of words and phraſes not mine, for he hath maim'd them, and like a ſlye depraver mangl'd them in this his wicked Limbo, worſe then the ghoſt of Deiphobus appear'd to his friend Ænæas. Here I ſcarce know them, and he that would, let him repaire to the place in that Booke where I ſet them: For certainly this tormenter of Semicolons is as good at diſmembring and ſlitting ſentences, as his grave Fathers the Prelates have bin at ſtigmatizing and ſlitting Noſes. By ſuch handy-craft as this what might he not traduce? Only that odour which being his own muſt needs offend his ſenſe of ſmelling, ſince he will needes beſtow his foot among us, and not allow us to think he weares a Sock, I ſhall endeavour it may be offenceleſſe to other mens eares. The Remonſtrant having to do with grave and reverend Men his adverſaries, thought it became him to tell them in ſcorne, that the Biſhops foot had beene in their Book and confuted it; which when I ſaw him arrogate, to have done that with his heels that ſurpaſt the beſt conſideration of his head, to ſpurn a confutation among reſpected Men, I queſtion'd not the lawfulneſſe of moving his jollity to bethink him, what odor a Sock would have in ſuch a painful buſineſſe. And this may have chanc't to touch him more neerly then I was aware; for indeed a Biſhops foot that hath all his toes mauger the Gout, and a linnen Sock over it, is the apteſt embleme of the Prelate himſelfe; who being a Pluraliſt, may under one Surplice which is alſo linnen, hide foure Benefices beſides the metropolitan toe, and ſends a fouler ſtench to Heaven, then that which this young queaſineſſe reches at. And this is the immediate reaſon here why our inrag'd Confuter, that he may be as perfet an hypocrite as Caiaphas, ere he be a High Prieſt, cries out, Horrid blaſphemy! and like a recreant Jew calls for ſtones. I beſeech ye friends, ere the brickbats flye, reſolve me and your ſelves, is it blaſphemy, or any whit diſagreeing from Chriſtian meekneſſe, when as Chriſt himſelfe ſpeaking of unſavory traditions, ſcruples not to name the Dunghill and the Jakes, for me to anſwer a ſlovenly wincer of a confutation, that, if he would needs put his foot to ſuch a ſweaty ſervice, the odour of his Sock was like to be neither Musk, nor Benjamin? Thus did that fooliſh Monk in a barbarous Declamation accuſe Petrarch of blaſphemy for diſpraiſing the French Wines. But this which follows is plaine bedlam ſtuffe, this is the Demoniack legion indeed, which the Remonſtrant feard had been againſt him, and now he may ſee is for him: You that love Chriſt, ſaith he, and know this miſcreant wretch, ſtone him to death, leſt you ſmart for his impunity. What thinks the Remonſtrant? does he like that ſuch words as theſe ſhould come out of his ſhop, out of his Trojan horſe? to give the watch-word like a Guiſian of Paris to a mutiny or maſſacre; to proclaim a Cruſada againſt his fellow Chriſtian now in this troublous and divided time of the Kingdom? If he do, I ſhall ſay that to be the Remonſtrant is no better then to be a Jeſuit; and that if he and his accomplices could do as the rebels have done in Ireland to the Proteſtants, they would do in England the ſame to them that would no Prelats. For a more ſeditious and butcherly Speech no Cell of Loyola could have belch'd againſt one who in all his writing ſpake not, that any mans skin ſhould be rais'd. And yet this curſing Shimei, a hurler of ſtones, as well as a rayler, wants not the face inſtantly to make as though he deſpair'd of victory unleſs a modeſt defence would get it him. Did I erre at all, Readers, to foretell ye, when firſt I met with his title, that the epithet of modeſt there, was a certain red portending ſign, that he meant ere long to be moſt tempeſtuouſly bold, and ſhameleſs? Nevertheleſs he dares not ſay but there may be hid in his nature as much venemous Atheiſme and profanation, as he thinks, hath broke out at his adverſaries lips; but he hath not the ſoare running upon him, as he would intimate I have. Now truſt me not, Readers, if I be not already weary of pluming and footing this Seagull, ſo open he lies to ſtrokes, and never offers at another, but brings home the dorre upon himſelf. For if the ſore be running upon me, in all judgment I have ſcapt the diſeaſe; but he who hath as much infection hid in him, as he hath voluntarily confeſt, and cannot expell it, becauſe he is dull, for venomous Atheiſm were no treaſure to be kept within him elſe, let him take the part he hath choſen, which muſt needs follow, to ſwell and burſt with his own inward venom.

SECTION I.

But mark, Readers, there is a kind of juſtice obſerv'd among them that do evil, but this Man loves injuſtice in the very order of his malice. For having all this while abus'd the good name of his adverſary with all manner of licence in revenge of his Remonſtrant, if they be not both one perſon, or as I am told, Father and Son, yet after all this he calls for ſatisfaction, when as he himſelf hath already taken the utmoſt farding. Violence hath been done, ſays he, to the perſon of a holy and religious Prelat. To which, ſomething in effect to what S. Paul anſwer'd of Ananias, I anſwer, I wiſt not brethren that he was a holy and religious Prelat; for evil is written of thoſe who would be Prelats. And finding him thus in diſguiſe without his ſuperſcription or Phylactery either of holy or Prelat, it were no ſin to ſerve him as Longchamp Biſhop of Elie was ſerv'd in his diſguiſe at Dover: He hath begun the meaſure nameleſs, and when he pleaſes we may all appear as we are. And let him be then what he will, he ſhall be to me ſo as I find him principl'd. For neither muſt Prelat or Arch-Prelat hope to exempt himſelf from being reckon'd as one of the vulgar, which is for him only to hope whom true wiſdom and the contempt of vulgar opinions exempts, it being taught us in the Pſalmes, that he who is in honour and underſtandeth not, is as the beaſts that periſh. And now firſt the manner of handling that Cauſe which I undertook, he thinks is ſuſpicious, as if the wiſeſt, and the beſt words were not ever to ſome or other ſuſpicious. But where is the offence, the diſagreement from Chriſtian meekneſs, or the precept of Solomon in anſwering folly? When the Remonſtrant talks of froth and ſcum, I tell him there is none, and bid him ſpare his Ladle: when he brings in the meſs with Keale, Beef and Breweſſe, what ſtomack in England could forbear to call for flanks and briskets? Capon and white broth having been likely ſometimes in the ſame room with Chriſt and his Apoſtles, why does it trouble him that it ſhould be now in the ſame leafe, eſpecially, where the diſcourſe is not continu'd but interrupt? And let him tell me, is he wont to ſay grace, doth he not then name holieſt names over the ſteame of coſtlieſt ſuperfluities? Does he judg it fooliſh or diſhoneſt to write that among religious things, which when he talks of religious things he can devoutly chew? Is he afraid to name Chriſt where thoſe things are written in the ſame leafe, whom he fears not to name while the ſame things are in his mouth? Doth not Chriſt himſelf teach the higheſt things by the ſimilitude of old bottles and patcht cloaths? Doth he not illuſtrate beſt things by things moſt evil? his own coming to be as a thiefe in the night, and the righteous Mans wiſdom to that of an unjuſt Steward? He might therefore have done better to have kept in his canting beggars and heathen Altar to ſacrifice his thredbare criticiſm of Bomolochus to an unſeaſonable Goddeſs fit for him call'd Importunity, and have reſerv'd his Greek derivation till he lecture to his freſh Men, for here his itching pedantry is but flouted.

But to the end that nothing may be omitted which may furder ſatisfie any conſcionable man, who notwithſtanding what I could explain before the Animadverſions, remains yet unſatisfi'd concerning that way of writing which I there defended, but this confuter whom it pinches, utterly diſapproves, I ſhall aſſay once again, and perhaps with more ſucceſs. If therefore the queſtion were in oratory, whether a vehement vein throwing out indignation or ſcorn upon an object that merits it, were among the apteſt Ideas of ſpeech to be allow'd, it were my work, and that an eaſie one, to make it clear both by the rules of beſt Rhetoricians, and the famouſeſt examples of the Greek and Roman Orations. But ſince the Religion of it is diſputed, and not the Art, I ſhall make uſe only of ſuch reaſons and authorities, as Religion cannot except againſt. It will be harder to gainſay, then for me to evince that in the teaching of men diverſly temper'd different ways are to be try'd. The Baptiſt we know was a ſtrict man, remarkable for auſterity and ſet-order of life. Our Saviour who had all gifts in him, was Lord to expreſs his indoctrinating power in what ſort him beſt ſeem'd; ſometimes by a mild and familiar converſe, ſometimes with plain and impartiall home-ſpeaking, regardleſs of thoſe whom the auditors might think he ſhould have had in more reſpect; otherwhiles with bitter and ireful rebukes, if not teaching, yet leaving excuſeleſs thoſe his wilful Impugners. What was all in him, was divided among many others the teachers of his Church; ſome to be ſevere and ever of a ſad gravity that they may win ſuch, and check ſometimes thoſe who be of nature over-confident and jocond; others were ſent more cheerful, free, and ſtill as it were at large, in the midſt of an untreſpaſſing honeſty, that they who are ſo temper'd may have by whom they might be drawn to ſalvation, and they who are too ſcrupulous, and dejected of ſpirit, might be often ſtrengthn'd with wiſe conſolations and revivings: no man being forc'd wholly to diſſolve that groundwork of nature which God created in him, the ſanguine to empty out all his ſociable livelineſs, the cholerick to expel quite the unſinning predominance of his anger; but that each radical humour and paſſion wrought upon and corrected as it ought, might be made the proper mould and foundation of every mans peculiar gifts and vertues. Some alſo were indu'd with a ſtaid moderation, and ſoundneſs of argument, to teach and convince the rational and ſober-minded; yet not therefore that to be thought the only expedient courſe of teaching, for in times of oppoſition when either againſt new hereſies ariſing, or old corruptions to be reform'd, this cool unpaſſionate mildneſs of poſitive wiſdom is not anough to damp and aſtoniſh the proud reſiſtance of carnal and falſe Doctors, then (that I may have leave to ſoare a while as the Poets uſe) then Zeal, whoſe ſubſtance is ethereal, arming in compleat diamond, aſcends his fiery Chariot drawn with two blazing Meteors figur'd like beaſts, but of a higher breed then any the Zodiack yields, reſembling two of thoſe four which Ezechiel and S. John ſaw, the one viſag'd like a Lion to expreſs power, high autority and indignation; the other of count'nance like a Man to caſt deriſion and ſcorn upon perverſe and fraudulent ſeducers: with theſe the invincible warriour Zeal ſhaking looſely the ſlack reins drives over the heads of ſcarlet Prelats, and ſuch as are inſolent to maintain traditions, bruſing their ſtiffe necks under his flaming wheels. Thus did the true Prophets of old combat with the falſe; thus Chriſt himſelf the fountain of meekneſs found acrimony anough to be ſtill galling and vexing the Prelatical Phariſees. But ye will ſay theſe had immediat warrant from God to be thus bitter; and I ſay, ſo much the plainlier is it prov'd, that there may be a ſanctifi'd bitterneſs againſt the enemies of truth. Yet that ye may not think Inſpiration only the warrant thereof, but that it is as any other vertue, of moral and general obſervation, the example of Luther may ſtand for all, whom God made choice of before others to be of higheſt eminence and power in reforming the Church; who not of revelation, but of judgment writ ſo vehemently againſt the chief defenders of old untruths in the Romiſh Church, that his own friends and favourers were many times offended with the fierceneſs of his ſpirit; yet he being cited before Charles the fifth to anſwer for his Books, and having divided them into three ſorts, whereof one was of thoſe which he had ſharply written, refus'd, though upon deliberation giv'n him, to retract or unſay any word therein, as we may read in Sleidan. Yea he defends his eagerneſs, as being of an ardent ſpirit, and one who could not write a dull ſtile: and affirm'd he thought it Gods will to have the inventions of men thus laid open, ſeeing that matters quietly handled were quickly forgot. And herewithal how uſeful and available God had made this tart Rhetorick in the Churches cauſe, he often found by his own experience. For when he betook himſelf to lenity and moderation, as they call it, he reapt nothing but contempt both from Cajetan and Eraſmus, from Cocleus, from Ecchius and others; inſomuch that blaming his friends who had ſo counſell'd him, he reſolv'd never to run into the like error: if at other times he ſeem to excuſe his vehemence, as more then what was meet, I have not examin'd through his works to know how far he gave way to his own fervent mind; it ſhall ſuffice me to look to mine own. And this I ſhall eaſily aver, though it may ſeem a hard ſaying, that the Spirit of God who is purity it ſelf, when he would reprove any fault ſeverly, or but relate things done or ſaid with indignation by others, abſtains not from ſome words not civil at other times to be ſpok'n. Omitting that place in Numbers at the killing of Zimri and Coſbi done by Phineas in the heigth of zeal, related, as the Rabbins expound, not without an obſcene word, we may find in Deuteronomy and three of the Prophets, where God denouncing bitterly the puniſhments of Idolaters, tells them in a term immodeſt to be utter'd in cool blood, that their wives ſhall be defil'd openly. But theſe, they will ſay, were honeſt words in that age when they were ſpok'n. Which is more then any Rabbin can prove; and certainly had God been ſo minded, he could have pickt ſuch words as ſhould never have come into abuſe. What will they ſay to this? David going againſt Nabal, in the very ſame breath when he had but juſt before nam'd the name of God, he vows not to leave any alive of Nabals houſe that piſſeth againſt the Wall. But this was unadviſedly ſpoke, you will anſwer, and ſet down to aggravate his infirmity. Turn then to the firſt of Kings, where God himſelf uſes the phraſe, I will cut off from Jeroboam him that piſſeth againſt the wall. Which had it been an unſeemly ſpeech in the heat of an earneſt expreſſion, then we muſt conclude that Jonathan or Onkelos the Targumiſts were of cleaner language then he that made the tongue; for they render it as briefly, I will cut off all who are at years of diſcretion, that is to ſay, ſo much diſcretion as to hide nakedneſs. Whereas God who is the author both of purity and eloquence, choſe this phraſe as fitteſt in that vehement character wherein he ſpake. Otherwiſe that plain word might have eaſily bin forborn: Which the Maſoreths and Rabbinical Scholiaſts not well attending, have often us'd to blur the margent with Keri, inſtead of Ketiv, and gave us this inſuls rule out of their Talmud, That all words which in the Law are writ obſcenely, muſt be chang'd to more civil words: Fools who would teach men to reade more decently then God thought good to write. And thus I take it to be manifeſt, that indignation againſt men and their actions notoriouſly bad, hath leave and autority oft times to utter ſuch words und phraſes as in common talk were not ſo mannerly to uſe. That ye may know, not only as the Hiſtorian ſpeaks, that all thoſe things for which Men plough, build, or ſail, obey vertue, but that all words, and whatſoever may be ſpoken, ſhall at ſome time in an unwonted manner wait upon her purpoſes.

Now that the Confutant may alſo know as he deſires, what force of teaching there is ſometimes in Laughter; I ſhall return him in ſhort, that Laughter being one way of anſwering a Fool according to his folly, teaches two ſorts of Perſons, firſt, the Fool himſelf not to be wiſe in his own conceit, as Solomon affirms; which is certainly a great document, to make an unwiſe Man know himſelf. Next, it teacheth the Hearers, in as much a ſcorn is one of thoſe Puniſhments which belong to Men carnally wiſe, which is oft in Scripture declar'd; for when ſuch are puniſht, the ſimple are thereby made wiſe, if Salomons rule be true. And I would ask, to what end Eliah mockt the falſe Prophets? was it to ſhew his wit, or to fulfill his humour? doubtleſs we cannot imagine that great ſervant of God had any other end in all which he there did, but to teach and inſtruct the poore miſledde People. And we may frequently read, that many of the Martyrs in the midſt of their troubles, were not ſparing to deride and ſcoff their ſuperſtitious perſecutors. Now may the Confutant adviſe again with Sir Francis Bacon, whether Eliah and the Martyrs did well to turn Religion into a Comedy, or Satyr; to rip up the wounds of Idolatry and Superſtition with a laughing Countenance: So that for pious gravity his Author here is matcht and overmatcht, and for wit and morality in one that follows.

—laughing to teach the truth
What hinders? as ſome teachers give to Boys
Junkets and knacks, that they may learne apace.
Thus Flaccus in his firſt Satyr, and his tenth:
—Jeſting decides great things
Stronglier, and better oft then earneſt can.

I could urge the ſame out of Cicero, and Seneca, but he may content him with this. And henceforward, if he can learn, may know as well what are the bounds, and objects of laughter and vehement Reproof, as he hath known hitherto how to deſerve them both. But leſt ſome may haply think, or thus expoſtulat with me after all this debatement, who made you the buſy Almoner to deal about this dole of laughter and reprehenſion, which no Man thanks your bounty for? To the urbanity of that Man I ſhold anſwer much after this ſort: That I, friend Objecter, having read of heathen Philoſophers, ſome to have taught, that whoſoever would but uſe his ear to liſten, might hear the voice of his guiding Genius ever before him, calling and as it were pointing to that way which is his part to follow; others, as the Stoicks, to account Reaſon, which they call the Hegemonicon, to be the common Mercury conducting without error thoſe that give themſelves obediently to be led accordingly: having read this, I could not eſteem ſo poorly of the Faith which I profeſs, that God had left nothing to thoſe who had forſaken all other doctrines for his, to be an inward witneſs and warrant of what they have to do, as that they ſhould need to meaſure themſelves by other Mens meaſures, how to give ſcope or limit to their proper actions; for that were to make us the moſt at a ſtand, the moſt uncertaine and accidentall wanderers in our doings, of all Religions in the World. So that the queſtion ere while mov'd, who he is that ſpends thus the benevolence of laughter and reproof ſo liberally upon ſuch Men as the Prelats, may return with a more juſt demand, who he is not of place and knowledg never ſo mean, under whoſe contempt and jerk theſe men are not deſervedly faln? Neither can Religion receive any wound by diſgrace thrown upon the Prelats, ſince Religion and they ſurely were never in ſuch amity. They rather are the men who have wounded Religion, and their ſtripes muſt heal her. I might alſo tell them, what Electra in Sophocles, a wiſe Virgin anſwer'd her wicked Mother, who thought her ſelf too violently reprov'd by her the Daughter:

'Tis you that ſay it, not I; you do the deeds,
And your ungodly deeds find me the words.

If therefore the Remonſtrant complain of Libels, it is becauſe he feels them to be right aim'd. For I ask again, as before in the Animadverſions, how long is it ſince he hath diſreliſht Libels? we never heard the leaſt mutter of his voice againſt them while they flew abroad without controul or check, defaming the Scots and Puritans. And yet he can remember of none but Lyſimachus Nicanor, and that he miſlik'd and cenſur'd. No more but of one can the Remonſtrant remember? What if I put him in mind of one more? What if of one more whereof the Remonſtrant in many likelihoods may be thought the Author? Did he never ſee a Pamphlet intitl'd after his own faſhion, A Survey of that fooliſh, ſeditious, ſcandalous, profane Libel, the Proteſtation proteſted? The Child doth not more expreſly refigure the viſage of his Father, then that Book reſembles the ſtile of the Remonſtrant, in thoſe idioms of ſpeech, wherein he ſeems moſt to delight: and in the ſeventeenth Page three lines together taken out of the Remonſtrance word for word, not as a Citation, but as an Author borrows from himſelf. Whoever it be, he may as juſtly be ſaid to have libell'd, as he againſt whom he writes: there ye ſhall find another man then here is made ſhew of, there he bites as faſt as this whines. Vinegar in the Ink is there the antidote of Vipers. Laughing in a religious Controverſy is there a thrifty Phyſick to expel his melancholy. In the mean time the Teſtimony of Sir Francis Bacon was not miſalledg'd, complaining that Libels on the Biſhops part were utter'd openly; and if he hop'd the Prelats had no intelligence with the Libellors, he delivers it but as his favourable opinion. But had he contradicted himſelf, how could I aſſoil him here, more then a little before, where I know not how, by entangling himſelf, he leaves an aſperſion upon Job, which by any elſe I never heard laid to his charge? For having affirm'd that there is no greater confuſion then the confounding of jeſt and earneſt, preſently he brings the example of Job glancing at conceits of mirth, when he ſat among the people with the gravity of a Judg upon him. If Jeſt and Earneſt be ſuch a confuſion, then were the people much wiſer then Job, for he ſmil'd, and they believ'd him not. To defend Libels, which is that whereof I am next accus'd, was far from my purpoſe. I had not ſo little ſhare in good name, as to give another that advantage againſt my ſelf. The ſum of what I ſaid was, that a more free permiſſion of writing at ſome times might be profitable, in ſuch a queſtion eſpecially wherein the Magiſtrates are not fully reſolv'd; and both ſides have equal liberty to write, as now they have. Not as when the Prelats bore ſway, in whoſe time the Books of ſome men were confuted, when they who ſhould have anſwer'd were in cloſe priſon, deny'd the uſe of pen or paper. And the divine Right of Epiſcopacy was then valiantly aſſerted, when he who would have been reſpondent muſt have bethought himſelf withal how he could refute the Clink or the Gate-houſe. If now therefore they be perſu'd with bad words, who perſecuted others with bad deeds, it is a way to leſſen tumult rather then to encreaſe it; whenas anger thus freely vented ſpends it ſelf ere it break out into action, though Machiavel whom he cites, or any Machiavilian Prieſt think the contrary.

SECT. 3.

Now Readers I bring ye to his third Section; wherein very cautiouſly, and no more than needs, leſt I ſhould take him for ſome Chaplain at hand, ſome Squire of the body to his Prelat, one that ſerves not at the Altar only, but at the Court cup-board, he will beſtow on us a pretty model of himſelfe; and ſobs me out half a dozen tizical Mottoes where-ever he had them, hopping ſhort in the meaſure of Convulſion-fits; in which labour the agony of his Wit having ſcap'd narrowly, inſtead of well ſiz'd periods, he greets us with a quantity of thum-ring poſies. He has a fortune therefore good, becauſe he is content with it. This is a piece of ſapience not worth the brain of a fruit-trencher; as if Content were the meaſure of what is good or bad in the guiſt of Fortune. For by this rule a bad Man may have a good fortune, becauſe he may be oft times content with it for many reaſons which have no affinity with Vertue, as love of eaſe, want of ſpirit to uſe more, and the like. And therefore content, he ſays, becauſe it neither goes before, nor comes behind his merit. Belike then if his fortune ſhould go before his merit, he would not be content, but reſign, if we believe him, which I do the leſs, becauſe he implyes, that if it came behind his merit, he would be content as little. Whereas if a wiſe

Man's content ſhould depend upon ſuch a Therefore, becauſe his fortune came not behind his merit, how many wiſe Men could have content in this world? In his next pithy ſymbol I dare not board him, for he paſſes all the ſeven wiſe Maſters of Greece, attributing to himſelf that which on my life Salomon durſt not; to have affections ſo equally temper'd, that they neither too haſtily adhere to the truth before it be fully examin'd, nor too lazily afterward. Which unleſs he only were exempted out of the corrupt maſs of Adam, born without Sin original, and living without actual, is impoſſible. Had Salomon (for it behoves me to inſtance in the wiſeſt, dealing with ſuch a tranſcendent Sage as this) had Salomon affections ſo equally temper'd, as not adhering too lazily to the truth, when God warn'd him of his halting in Idolatry? do we read that he repented haſtily? did not his affections lead him haſtily from an examin'd truth, how much more would they lead him ſlowly to it? Yet this Man beyond a Stoick Apathy ſees truth as in a rapture, and cleaves to it; not as through the dim glaſs of his affections, which in this frail manſion of fleſh, are ever unequally temper'd, puſhing forward to error, and keeping back from truth oft times the beſt of Men. But how far this boaſter is from knowing himſelf, let his Preface ſpeak. Something I thought it was that made him ſo quick-ſighted to gather ſuch ſtrange things out of the Animadverſions, whereof the leaſt conception could not be drawn from thence, of Suburb-ſinks, ſometimes out of wit and cloaths; ſometimes in new Serge, drinking Sack, and ſwearing; now I know it was this equal temper of his affections that gave him to ſee clearer then any fenel rub'd Serpent. Laſtly, he has reſolv'd that neither perſon nor cauſe ſhall improper him. I may miſtake his meaning, for the word ye hear is improper. But whether if not a Perſon, yet a good Parſonage or Impropriation bought out for him would not improper him, becauſe there may be a quirk in the word, I leave it for a Canoniſt to reſolve.

SECT. 4.

And thus ends this Section, or rather Diſſection of himſelf, ſhort ye will ſay both in breath and extent, as in our own praiſes it ought to be, unleſs wherein a good name hath bin wrongfully attainted. Right, but if ye look at what he aſcribes to himſelf, that temper of his affections which cannot any where be but in Paradiſe, all the judicious Panegyricks in any language extant are not half ſo prolixe. And that well appears in his next removal. For what with putting his fancy to the tiptoe in this deſcription of himſelf, and what with adventuring preſently to ſtand upon his own legs without the crutches of his margent, which is the ſluce moſt commonly that feeds the drouth of his Text, he comes ſo lazily on in a Similie, with his arm full of weeds, and demeans himſelf in the dull expreſſion ſo like a dough kneaded thing, that he has not ſpirit enough left him ſo far to look to his Syntaxis, as to avoid nonſenſe. For it muſt be underſtood there that the Stranger, and not he who brings the bundle, would be deceav'd in cenſuring the field, which this hipſhot Grammarian cannot ſet into right frame of conſtruction, neither here in the Similitude, nor in the following Reddition thereof; which being to this purpoſe, that the faults of the beſt pickt out, and preſented in groſs, ſeem monſtrous, this, ſaith he, you have done, in pinning on his ſleeve the faults of others; as if to pick out his own faults, and to pin the faults of others upon him, were to do the ſame thing. To anſwer therefore how I have cull'd out the evil actions of the Remonſtrant from his Vertues, I am acquitted by the dexterity and conveyance of his nonſenſe, looſing that for which he brought his parable. But what of other Mens faults I have pinn'd upon his ſleeve, let him ſhew. For whether he were the Man who term'd the Martyrs Foxian Confeſſors, it matters not; he that ſhall ſtep up before others to defend a Church-Government, which wants almoſt no circumſtance, but only a name to be a plain Popedom, a Government which changes the fatherly and ever-teaching Diſcipline of Chriſt into that lordly and uninſtructing Juriſdiction which properly makes the Pope Antichriſt, makes himſelf an acceſſory to all the evil committed by thoſe, who are arm'd to do miſchief by that undue Government; which they by their wicked deeds do with a kind of paſſive and unwitting Obedience to God deſtroy. But he by plauſible words and traditions againſt the Scripture obſtinately ſeeks to maintain. They by their own wickedneſs ruining their own unjuſt autority, make room for good to ſucceed. But he by a ſhew of good upholding the evil which in them undoes it ſelf, hinders the good which they by accident let in. Their manifeſt crimes ſerve to bring forth an enſuing good, and haſten a remedy againſt themſelves; and his ſeeming good tends to reinforce their ſelf-puniſhing crimes and his own, by doing his beſt to delay all redreſs. Shall not all the miſchief which other men do be laid to his charge, if they do it by that unchurchlike power which he defends? Chriſt ſaith, he that is not with me is againſt me, and he that gathers not with me ſcatters. In what degree of enmity to Chriſt ſhall we place that man then, who ſo is with him, as that it makes more againſt him, and ſo gathers with him, that it ſcatters more from him? ſhall it avail that man to ſay he honours the Martyrs memory, and treads in their ſteps? No; the Phariſees confeſt as much of the holy Prophets. Let him and ſuch as he, when they are in their beſt actions, even at their prayers, look to hear that which the Phariſees heard from John the Baptiſt when they leaſt expected, when they rather lookt for praiſe from him; Generation of Vipers, who hath warn'd ye to flee from the wrath to come? Now that ye have ſtarted back from the purity of Scripture, which is the only rule of Reformation, to the old vomit of your traditions; now that ye have either troubl'd or leven'd the people of God, and the Doctrine of the Goſpel with ſcandalous Ceremonies and maſs-borrow'd Liturgies, do ye turn the uſe of that truth which ye profeſs, to countenance that falſhood which ye gain by? We alſo reverence the Martyrs, but rely only upon the Scriptures. And why we ought not to rely upon the Martyrs, I ſhall be content with ſuch reaſons as my Confuter himſelf affords me; who is, I muſt needs ſay for him, in that point as officious an Adverſary as I would wiſh to any man. For, firſt, ſaith he, there may be a Martyr in a wrong Cauſe, and as couragious in ſuffering as the beſt; ſometimes in a good Cauſe with a forward ambition diſpleaſing to God. Other whiles they that ſtory of them out of blind zeal or malice, may write many things of them untruly. If this be ſo, as ye hear his own confeſſion, with what ſafety can the Remonſtrant rely upon the Martyrs as Patrons of his Cauſe, when as any of thoſe who are alledg'd for the approvers of our Liturgy or Prelaty, might have bin, though not in a wrong cauſe, Martyrs? yet whether not vainly ambitious of that honour, or whether not miſreported or miſunderſtood in thoſe their opinions, God only knows. The Teſtimony of what we believe in Religion muſt be ſuch as the Conſcience may reſt on to be infallible and incorruptible, which is only the Word of God.

SECT. 5.

His fifth Section finds it ſelf agriev'd that the Remonſtrant ſhould be taxt with the illegal proceeding of the high Commiſſion, and Oath ex officio: And firſt whether they were illegal or no, 'tis more than he knows. See this malevolent Fox; that Tyranny which the whole Kingdom cry'd out againſt as ſtung with Adders and Scorpions, that Tyranny which the Parliament in compaſſion of the Church and Commonwealth hath diſſolv'd and fetch'd up by the roots, for which it hath receav'd the publick Thanks and Bleſſings of thouſands, this obſcure thorn-eater of Malice and Detraction, as well as of Quodlibets and Sophiſms, knows not whether it were illegal or not. Evil, evil would be your reward ye Worthies of the Parliament, if this Sophiſter and his Accomplices had the cenſuring or the ſounding forth of your labours. And that the Remonſtrant cannot waſh his hands of all the cruelties exercis'd by the Prelats, is paſt doubting. They ſcourg'd the Confeſſors of the Goſpel, and he held the Scourgers garments. They executed their rage, and he, if he did nothing elſe, defended the Government with the Oath that did it, and the Ceremonies which were the cauſe of it: does he think to be counted guiltleſs?

SECT. 6.

In the following Section I muſt foretel ye, Readers, the doings will be rough and dangerous, the bating of a Satyr. And if the work ſeem more trivial or boiſtrous then for this Diſcourſe, let the Remonſtrant thank the folly of this Confuter, who could not let a private word paſs, but he muſt make all this blaze of it. I had ſaid, that becauſe the Remonſtrant was ſo much offended with thoſe who were tart againſt the Prelats, ſure he lov'd toothleſs Satyrs, which I took were as improper as a toothed Sleekſtone. This Champion from behind the Arras cries out, that thoſe toothleſs Satyrs were of the Remonſtrants making; and arms himſelf here tooth and nail, and horn to boot, to ſupply the want of teeth, or rather of gums in the Satyrs. And for an onſet tells me, that the ſimily of a Sleekſtone ſhews I can be as bold with a Prelat as familiar with a Laundreſs. But does it not argue rather the laſcivious promptneſs of his own fancy, who from the harmleſs mention of a Sleekſtone could neigh out the remembrance of his old converſation among the Viraginian trollops? For me, if he move me, I ſhall claim his own Oath, the Oath ex officio againſt any Prieſt or Prelat in the Kingdom, to have ever as much hated ſuch pranks as the beſt and chaſteſt of them all. That exception which I made againſt toothleſs Satyrs the Confuter hopes I had from the Satyriſt, but is far deceav'd: neither had I ever read the hobbling Diſtich which he means. For this good hap I had from a careful education, to be inur'd and ſeaſon'd betimes with the beſt and eleganteſt Authors of the learned Tongues, and thereto brought an ear that could meaſure a juſt cadence, and ſcan without articulating; rather nice and humorous in what was tolerable, then patient to read every drawling Verſifier. Whence lighting upon this title of toothleſs Satyrs, I will not conceal ye what I thought, Readers, that ſure this muſt be ſome ſucking Satyr, who might have done better to have us'd his coral, and made an end of breeding, ere he took upon him to weild a Satyrs whip. But when I heard him talk of ſcouring the ruſted ſwords of elviſh Knights, do not blame me, if I chang'd my thought, and concluded him ſome deſperate Cutler. But why his ſcornful muſe could never abide with tragick ſhoos her ancles for to hide, the pace of the verſe told me that her maukin knuckles were never ſhapen to that royal buskin. And turning by chance to the ſixth Satyr of his ſecond Book, I was confirm'd; where having begun loftily in Heavens univerſal Alphabet, he falls down to that wretched poorneſs and frigidity as to talk of Bridge-ſtreet in Heav'n, and the Oſtler of Heav'n; and there wanting other matter to catch him a heat, (for certain he was in the frozen Zone miſerably benumm'd) with thoughts lower then any Beadle betakes him to whip the ſign-poſts of Cambridge Alehouſes, the ordinary ſubject of freſhmens tales, and in a ſtrain as pitiful. Which for him who would be counted the firſt Engliſh Satyr, to abaſe himſelf to, who might have learnt better among the Latin and Italian Satyriſts, and in our own tongue from the Viſion and Creed of Pierce plowman, beſides others before him, manifeſted a preſumptuous undertaking with weak and unexamin'd ſhoulders. For a Satyr as it was born out of a Tragedy, ſo ought to reſemble his parentage, to ſtrike high, and adventure dangerouſly at the moſt eminent vices among the greateſt perſons, and not to creep into every blind Taphouſe that fears a Conſtable more then a Satyr. But that ſuch a Poem ſhould be toothleſs, I ſtill affirm it to be a bull, taking away the eſſence of that which it calls it ſelf. For if it bite neither the perſons nor the vices, how is it a Satyr? and if it bite either, how is it toothleſs? ſo that toothleſs Satyrs are as much as if he had ſaid toothleſs teeth. What we ſhould do therefore with this learned Comment upon Teeth and Horns, which hath brought this Confutant into his pedantick Kingdom of Cornucopia, to reward him for gloſſing upon Horns even to the Hebrew root, I know not unleſs we ſhould commend him to be Lecturer in Eaſt-cheap upon St. Luke's day, when they ſend their Tribute to that famous hav'n by Detford. But we are not like to ſcape him ſo. For now the worm of Criticiſm works in him, he will tell us the derivation of German Rutters, of Meat, and of Ink, which doubtleſs, rightly apply'd with ſome gall in it, may prove good to heal this tetter of Pedagoguiſm that beſpreads him, with ſuch a Tenaſmus of originating, that if he be an Arminian, and deny original Sin, all the Etymologies of his Book ſhall witneſs that his brain is not meanly tainted with that infection.

SECT. 7.

His ſeventh Section labours to cavil out the flaws which were found in the Remonſtrants Logick; who having laid down for a general propoſition, that civil Polity is variable and arbitrary, from whence was inferr'd logically upon him that he had concluded the Polity of England to be arbitrary, for general includes particular; here his Defendant is not aſham'd to confeſs that the Remonſtrants propoſition was ſophyſtical by a Fallacy call'd, ad plures interrogationes: which ſounds to me ſomewhat ſtrange that a Remonſtrant of that pretended ſincerity ſhould bring deceitful and double dealing Propoſitions to the Parlament. The truth is, he had let ſlip a ſhrewd paſſage ere he was aware, not thinking the concluſion would turn upon him with ſuch a terrible edge, and not knowing how to wind out of the briars, he or his ſubſtitute ſeems more willing to lay the integrity of his Logick to pawn, and grant a fallacy in his own Major where none is, then be forc't to uphold the Inference. For that diſtinction of poſſible and lawful is ridiculous to be ſought for in that propoſition; no man doubting that it is poſſible to change the form of civil Polity; and that it is held lawful by that Major, the word arbitrary implies. Nor will this help him, to deny that it is arbitrary at any time or by any undertakers, (which are two limitations invented by him ſince) for when it ſtands as he will have it now by his ſecond Edition, civil Polity is variable, but not at any time or by any undertakers, it will reſult upon him, belike then at ſome time, and by ſome undertakers it may. And ſo he goes on mincing the matter, till he meets with ſomething in Sir Francis Bacon, then he takes heart again, and holds his Major at large. But by and by, as ſoon as the ſhadow of Sir Francis hath left him, he falls off again warping and warping till he come to contradict himſelf in diameter; and denies flatly that it is either variable or arbitrary, being once ſettl'd. Which third ſhift is no leſs a piece of laughter: For before the Polity was ſettl'd, how could it be variable, whenas it was no Polity at all, but either an Anarchy or a Tyranny? That limitation therefore of after ſetling is a mere Tautology. So that in fine his former Aſſertion is now recanted, and civil Polity is neither variable nor arbitrary.

SECT. 8.

Whatever elſe may perſwade me that this Confutation was not made without ſome aſſiſtance or advice of the Remonſtrant, yet in this eighth Section that his hand was not greatly intermixt, I can eaſily believe. For it begins with this ſurmiſe, that not having to accuſe the Remonſtrant to the King, I do it to the Parlament; which conceit of the man cleanly ſhoves the King out of the Parlament, and makes two bodies of one. Whereas the Remonſtrant in the Epiſtle to his laſt ſhort anſwer, gives his ſuppoſal that they cannot be ſever'd in the Rights of their ſeveral Concernments. Mark, Readers, if they cannot be ſever'd in what is ſeveral (which caſts a Bull's eye to go yoke with the toothleſs Satyrs) how ſhould they be ſever'd in their common concernments, the welfare of the Land, by due accuſation of ſuch as are the common grievances, among which I took the Remonſtrant to be one? And therefore if I accus'd him to the Parlament, it was the ſame as to accuſe him to the King. Next he caſts it into the diſh of I know not whom, that they flatter ſome of the Houſe, and libel others whoſe Conſciences made them vote contrary to ſome proceedings. Thoſe ſome proceedings can be underſtood of nothing elſe but the Deputies execution. And can this private Concocter of male-content, at the very inſtant when he pretends to extol the Parlament, afford thus to blur over, rather then to mention that publick triumph of their juſtice and conſtancy ſo high, ſo glorious, ſo reviving to the fainted Common-wealth, with ſuch a ſuſpicious and murmuring expreſſion as to call it ſome proceedings? and yet immediately he falls to glozing, as if he were the only man that rejoyc'd at theſe times. But I ſhall diſcover to ye Readers, that this his praiſing of them is as full of nonſenſe and ſcolaſtick foppery, as his meaning he himſelf diſcovers to be full of cloſe malignity. His firſt Encomium is, that the Sun looks not upon a braver, nobler Convocation then is that of King, Peers, and Commons. One thing I beg of ye Readers, as ye bear any zeal to learning, to elegance, and that which is call'd Decorum in the writing of Praiſe, eſpecially on ſuch a noble Argument, ye would not be offended, though I rate this cloiſter'd Lubber according to his deſerts. Where didſt thou learn to be ſo aguiſh, ſo puſillanimous, thou lozel Bachelour of Art, as againſt all cuſtom and uſe of Speech to term the high and ſovran Court of Parlament, a Convocation? Was this the flower of all thy Synonyma's and voluminous Papers, whoſe beſt Folio's are predeſtin'd to no better end then to make winding ſheets in Lent for Pilchers? Could'ſt thou preſume thus with one word's ſpeaking to clap as it were under hatches the King with all his Peers and Gentry into ſquare Caps, and Monkiſh Hoods? How well doſt thou now appear to be a chip of the old block, that could find Bridge-ſtreet and Ale-houſes in Heav'n? why didſt thou not, to be his perfect imitator, liken the King to the Vice-chancellour, and the Lords to the Doctors? Neither is this an indignity only but a reproach, to call that inviolable Reſidence of Juſtice and Liberty, by ſuch an odious name as now a Convocation is become, which would be nothing injur'd, though it were ſtil'd the houſe of bondage, whereout ſo many cruel tasks, ſo many unjuſt burdens have been laden upon the bruiſed conſciences of ſo many Chriſtians throughout the land. But which of thoſe worthy deeds, whereof we and our poſterity muſt confeſs this Parlament to have done ſo many and ſo noble, which of thoſe memorable acts comes firſt into his praiſes? none of all, not one. What will he then praiſe them for? not for any thing doing, but for deferring to do, for deferring to chaſtiſe his leud and inſolent Compriests: Not that they have deferr'd all, but that he hopes they will remit what is yet behind. For the reſt of his Oratory that follows, ſo juſt is it in the language of ſtall epiſtle nonſenſe, that if he who made it can underſtand it, I deny not but that he may deſerve for his pains a caſt Doublet. When a man would look he ſhould vent ſomething of his own, as ever in a ſet ſpeech the manner is with him that knows any thing, he, leſt we ſhould not take notice anough of his barren ſtupidity, declares it by Alphabet, and refers us to odd remnants in his Topicks. Nor yet content with the wonted room of his margent, but he muſt cut out large flocks and creeks into his text to unlade the fooliſh frigate of his unſeaſonable Autorities, not wherewith to praiſe the Parlament, but to tell them what he would have them do. What elſe there is, he jumbles together in ſuch a loſt conſtruction, as no man either letter'd or unletter'd will be able to piece up. I ſhall ſpare to tranſcribe him, but if I do him wrong, let me be ſo dealt with.

Now although it be a digreſſion from the enſuing matter, yet becauſe it ſhall not be ſaid I am apter to blame others than to make trial my ſelf, and that I may after this harſh diſcord touch upon a ſmoother ſtring awhile to entertain my ſelf and him that liſt, with ſome more pleaſing fit, and not the leaſt to teſtifie the gratitude which I owe to thoſe publick benefactors of their Country, for the ſhare I enjoy in the common peace and good by their inceſſant labours; I ſhall be ſo troubleſom to this Declamer for once, as to ſhew him what he might have better ſaid in their praiſe: Wherein I muſt mention only ſome few things of many, for more then that to a digreſſion may not be granted. Although certainly their Actions are worthy not thus to be ſpoken of by the way, yet if hereafter it befal me to attempt ſomething more anſwerable to their great Merits, I perceave how hopeleſs it will be to reach the heigth of their prayſes at the accompliſhment of that expectation that weights upon their noble Deeds, the unfiniſhing whereof already ſurpaſſes what others before them have left enacted with their utmoſt performance through many ages. And to the end we may be confident that what they do, proceeds neither from uncertain opinion, nor ſudden counſels, but from mature wiſdom, deliberate vertue, and deer affection to the publick good, I ſhall begin at that which made them likelieſt in the eyes of good men to effect thoſe things for the recovery of decay'd Religion and the Commonwealth, which they who were beſt minded had long wiſht for, but few, as the times then were deſperate, had the courage to hope for. Firſt therefore, the moſt of them being either of ancient and high Nobility, or at leaſt of known and well reputed Anceſtry, which is a great advantage towards Vertue one way, but in reſpect of wealth, eaſe and flattery, which accompanies a nice and tender education, is as much a hindrance another way; the good which lay before them they took, in imitating the worthieſt of their Progenitors; and the evil which aſſaulted their younger years by the temptation of riches, high birth, and that uſual bringing up, perhaps too favourable and too remiſs, through the ſtrength of an inbred goodneſs, and with the help of divine Grace, that had markt them out for no mean purpoſes, they nobly overcame. Yet had they a greater danger to cope with; for being train'd up in the knowledg of learning, and ſent to thoſe places which were intended to be the ſeed-plots of Piety and the liberal Arts, but were become the nurſeries of Superſtition and empty Speculation, as they were proſperous againſt thoſe vices which grow upon youth out of idleneſs and ſuperfluity, ſo were they happy in working off the harms of their abuſed ſtudies and labours, correcting by the clearneſs of their own judgment the errors of their miſ-inſtruction, and were as David was, wiſer then their teachers. And although their lot fell into ſuch times, and to be bred in ſuch places, where if they chanc't to be taught any thing good, or of their own accord had learn't it, they might ſee that preſently untaught them by the cuſtom and ill example of their Elders; ſo far in all probability was their youth from being miſled by the ſingle power of Example, as their riper years were known to be unmov'd with the baits of preferment, and undaunted for any diſcouragement and terror which appear'd often to thoſe that lov'd Religion and their native Liberty: which two things God hath inſeparably knit together, and hath diſclos'd to us that they who ſeek to corrupt our Religion are the ſame that would enthrall our civil Liberty. Thus in the midſt of all diſadvantages and diſreſpects (ſome alſo at laſt not without impriſonment and open diſgraces in the cauſe of their Country) having given proof of themſelves to be better made and fram'd by nature to the love and practiſe of Vertue, then others under the holieſt precepts and beſt examples have been headſtrong and prone to vice; and having in all the trials of a firm ingrafted honeſty not oftner buckl'd in the conflict, then giv'n every oppoſition the foil, this moreover was added by favour from Heav'n, as an ornament and happineſs to their Vertue, that it ſhould be neither obſcure in the opinion of men, nor eclipſt for want of matter equal to illuſtrat it ſelf; God and man conſenting in joynt approbation to chooſe them out as worthieſt above others to be both the great reformers of the Church, and the reſtorers of the Common-wealth. Nor did they deceave that expectation which with the eyes and deſires of their Countrey was fixt upon them; for no ſooner did the force of ſo much united Excellence meet in one Globe of brightneſs and efficacy, but encountring the dazl'd reſiſtance of Tyranny, they gave not over, though their enemies were ſtrong and ſuttle, till they had laid her groveling upon the fatal block; with one ſtroke winning again our loſt Liberties and Charters, which our Fore-fathers after ſo many battels could ſcarce maintain. And meeting next, as I may ſo reſemble, with the ſecond life of Tyranny (for ſhe was grown an ambiguous monſter, and to be ſlain in two ſhapes) guarded with Superſtition which hath no ſmall power to captivate the minds of men otherwiſe moſt wiſe, they neither were taken with her miter'd hypocriſie, nor terrifi'd with the puſh of her beſtial horns, but breaking them immediately forc't her to unbend the pontifical brow, and recoil: Which repulſe only given to the Prelats (that we may imagine how happy their removal would be) was the producement of ſuch glorious effects and conſequences in the Church, that if I ſhould compare them with thoſe exploits of higheſt fame in Poems and Panegyricks of old, I am certain it would but diminiſh and impair their worth, who are now my Argument: For thoſe ancient Worthies deliver'd men from ſuch Tyrants as were content to inforce only an outward obedience, letting the Mind be as free as it could; but theſe have freed us from a doctrine of Tyranny that offer'd violence and corruption even to the inward perſuaſion. They ſet at liberty Nations and Cities of men good and bad mixt together; but theſe opening the priſons and dungeons, call'd out of darkneſs and bonds the elect Martyrs and Witneſſes of their Redeemer. They reſtor'd the Body to eaſe and wealth; but theſe the oppreſt Conſcience to that freedom which is the chief prerogative of the Goſpel, taking off thoſe cruel burdens impos'd not by neceſſity, as other Tyrants are wont for the ſafeguard of their lives, but laid upon our necks by the ſtrange wilfulneſs and wantonneſs of a needleſs and jolly perſecuter call'd Indifference. Laſtly, ſome of thoſe ancient Deliverers have had immortal praiſes for preſerving their Citizens from a famine of corn. But theſe by this only repulſe of an unholy Hierarchy, almoſt in a moment repleniſht with ſaving knowledg their Countrey nigh famiſht for want of that which ſhould feed their ſouls. All this being done while two Armies in the field ſtood gazing on, the one in reverence of ſuch Nobleneſs quietly gave back and diſlodg'd; the other, ſpight of the unrulineſs, and doubted fidelity in ſome Regiments, was either perſwaded or compell'd to disband and retire home. With ſuch a Majeſty had their Wiſdom begirt it ſelf, that whereas others had levied war to ſubdue a Nation that ſought for peace, they ſitting here in peace could ſo many miles extend the force of their ſingle words as to overawe the diſſolute ſtoutneſs of an armed Power ſecretly ſtir'd up and almoſt hir'd againſt them. And having by a ſolemn proteſtation vow'd themſelves and the Kingdom anew to God and his ſervice, and by a prudent foreſight above what their Fathers thought on, prevented the diſſolution and fruſtrating of their deſigns by an untimely breaking up, notwithſtanding all the treaſonous Plots againſt them, all the rumours either of Rebellion or Invaſion, they have not bin yet brought to change their conſtant reſolution, ever to think fearleſly of their own ſafeties, and hopefully of the Common-wealth: which hath gain'd them ſuch an admiration from all good men, that now they hear it as their ord'nary ſurname, to be ſaluted the Fathers of their Country, and ſit as Gods among daily Petitions and publick Thanks flowing in upon them. Which doth ſo little yet exalt them in their own thoughts, that with all gentle affability, and curteous acceptance they both receave and return that tribute of thanks which is tender'd them; teſtifying their zeal and deſire to ſpend themſelves as it were piece-meal upon the grievances and wrongs of their diſtreſſed Nation: inſomuch that the meaneſt Artizans and Labourers, at other times alſo Women, and often the younger ſort of Servants aſſembling with their complaints, and that ſometimes in a leſs humble guiſe then for Petitioners, have gone with confidence, that neither their meanneſs would be rejected, nor their ſimplicity contemn'd, nor yet their urgency diſtaſted either by the dignity, wiſdom, or moderation of that ſupreme Senate; nor did they depart unſatisfi'd. And indeed, if we conſider the general concourſe of Suppliants, the free and ready admittance, the willing and ſpeedy redreſs in what is poſſible, it will not ſeem much otherwiſe, then as if ſome divine Commiſſion from Heav'n were deſcended to take into hearing and commiſeration the long remedileſs afflictions of this Kingdom; were it not that none more then themſelves labour to remove and divert ſuch thoughts, leſt men ſhould place too much confidence in their Perſons, ſtill referring us and our Prayers to him that can grant all, and appointing the monthly return of publick Faſts and Supplications. Therefore the more they ſeek to humble themſelves, the more does God by manifeſt ſigns and Teſtimonies, viſibly honour their proceedings; and ſets them as the mediators of this his Cov'nant which he offers us to renew. Wicked men daily conſpire their hurt, and it comes to nothing; Rebellion rages in our Iriſh Province, but with miraculous and loſleſs victories of few againſt many, is daily diſcomfited and broken; if we neglect not this early pledg of Gods inclining towards us, by the ſlackneſs of our needful aids. And whereas at other times we count it ample honour when God vouchſafes to make man the inſtrument and ſubordinate worker of his gracious Will, ſuch acceptation have their Prayers found with him, that to them he hath bin pleas'd to make himſelf the Agent, and Immediat performer of their deſires; diſſolving their difficulties when they are thought inexplicable, cutting out ways for them where no paſſage could be ſeen; as who is there ſo regardleſs of Divine Providence, that from late occurrences will not confeſs? If therefore it be ſo high a grace when men are prefer'd to be but the inferior officers of good things from God, what is it when God himſelf condeſcends, and works with his own Hands to fulfil the requeſts of Men? which I leave with them as the greateſt praiſe that can belong to human Nature: Not that we ſhould think they are at the end of their glorious Progreſs, but that they will go on to follow his Almighty leading, who ſeems to have thus cov'nanted with them; that if the Will and the Endeavour ſhall be theirs, the performance and the perfeting ſhall be his. Whence only it is that I have not fear'd, though many wiſe men have miſcarried in praiſing great deſigns before the utmoſt event, becauſe I ſee who is their aſſiſtant, who their confederat, who hath ingag'd his omnipotent Arm to ſupport and crown with ſucceſs their Faith, their Fortitude, their juſt and magnanimous Actions, till he have brought to paſs all that expected good which his Servants truſt is in his thoughts to bring upon this Land in the full and perfet Reformation of his Church.

Thus far I have digreſt, Readers, from my former Subject; but into ſuch a Path, as I doubt not ye will agree with me, to be much fairer and more delightful then the rode-way I was in. And how to break off ſuddenly into thoſe jarring notes which this Confuter hath ſet me, I muſt be wary, unleſs I can provide againſt offending the Ear, as ſome Muſicians are wont skilfully to fall out of one key into another, without breach of Harmony. By luck therefore his ninth Section is ſpent in mournful Elegy, certain paſſionat Soliloquies; and two whole pages of interrogatories that praiſe the Remonſtrant even to the ſonetting of his freſh Cheeks, quick Eyes, round Tongue, agil Hand, and nimble Invention.

In his tenth Section he will needs erect Figures, and tell Fortunes; I am no Biſhop, he ſays, I was never born to it: let me tell therefore this Wizzard, ſince he calculats ſo right, that he may know there be in the World, and I among thoſe, who nothing admire his Idol a Biſhoprick, and hold that it wants ſo much to be a Bleſſing, as that I rather deem it the meereſt, the falſeſt, the moſt unfortunate gift of Fortune. And were the puniſhment and miſery of being a Prelat Biſhop, terminated only in the Perſon, and did not extend to the affliction of the whole Dioceſs, if I would wiſh any thing in the bitterneſs of Soul to mine enemy, I would wiſh him the biggeſt and fatteſt Biſhoprick. But he proceeds; and the Familiar belike informs him, that a rich Widow, or a Lecture, or both, would content me: whereby I perceive him to be more ignorant in his art of divining then any Gipſy. For this I cannot omit without ingratitude to that Providence above, who hath ever bred me up in plenty, although my Life hath not bin unexpenſive in Learning, and voyaging about; ſo long as it ſhall pleaſe him to lend me what he hath hitherto thought good, which is anough to ſerve me in all honeſt and liberal occaſions, and ſomething over beſides, I were unthankful to that higheſt Bounty, if I ſhould make my ſelf ſo poor, as to ſolicite needily any ſuch kind of rich hopes as this Fortune-teller dreams of. And that he may furder learn how his Aſtrology is wide all the houſes of Heav'n in ſpelling Marriages, I care not if I tell him thus much profeſtly, though it be to the loſing of my rich hopes, as he calls them, that I think with them who both in prudence and elegance of Spirit, would chooſe a Virgin of mean fortunes honeſtly bred, before the wealthieſt Widow. The Feind therefore that told our Chaldean the contrary was a lying Feind. His next venom he utters againſt a Prayer which he found in the Animadverſions, angry it ſeems to find any prayers but in the Service-book; he diſlikes it, and I therefore like it the better. It was theatrical, he ſays; and yet it conſiſted moſt of Scripture language; it had no Rubrick to be ſung in an antick Coap upon the Stage of a High Altar. It was big-mouth'd, he ſays; no marvel, if it were fram'd as the Voice of three Kingdoms: neither was it a Prayer ſo much as a Hymn in proſe, frequent both in the Prophets, and in human Authors; therefore the ſtile was greater then for an ordinary Prayer. It was an aſtoniſhing Prayer. I thank him for that confeſſion, ſo it was intended to aſtound and to aſtoniſh the guilty Prelats; and this Confuter confeſſes that with him it wrought that effect. But in that which follows, he does not play the Soothſayer, but the diabolick ſlanderer of Prayers. It was made, he ſays, not ſo much to pleaſe God, or to benefit the weal-publick (how dares the Viper judg that?) but to intimate, ſaith he, your good abilities to her that is your rich hopes, your Maronilla. How hard is it when a man meets with a Fool to keep his Tongue from folly? That were miſerable indeed to be a Courter of Maronilla, and withal of ſuch a hapleſs invention, as that no way ſhould be left me to preſent my meaning, but to make my ſelf a canting Probationer of oriſons. The Remonſtrant when he was as young as I, could

Toothleſs Teach each hollow Grove to ſound his love, Satyrs, Wearying Eccho with one changeleſs word.

And ſo he well might, and all his Auditory beſides with his teach each.

Toothleſs Whether ſo me liſt my lovely Thoughts to ſing,
Satyrs, Come dance ye nimble Dryads by my ſide,
Whiles I report my Fortunes or my Loves.

Delicious! he had that whole Bevie at command whether in Morrice or at Maypole; whileſt I by this figure-caſter muſt be imagin'd in ſuch diſtreſs as to ſue to Maronilla, and yet left ſo impoveriſht of what to ſay, as to turn my Liturgy into my Ladies Pſalter. Believe it Graduat, I am not altogether ſo ruſtick, and nothing ſo irreligious, but as far diſtant from a Lecturer, as the meereſt Laick, for any conſecrating hand of a Prelat that ſhall ever touch me. Yet I ſhall not decline the more for that, to ſpeak my opinion in the Controverſy next mov'd, Whether the People may be allow'd for competent judges of a Miniſters ability. For how elſe can be fulfill'd that which God hath promis'd, to pour out ſuch abundance of knowledg upon all ſorts of Men in the times of the Goſpel? how ſhould the People examine the Doctrine which is taught them, as Chriſt and his Apoſtles continually bid them do? how ſhould they diſcern and beware of falſe Prophets, and try every Spirit, if they muſt be thought unfit to judg of the Miniſters abilities? The Apoſtles ever labour'd to perſwade the Chriſtian flock that they were call'd in Chriſt to all perfectneſs of ſpiritual knowledg, and full aſſurance of underſtanding in the myſtery of God. But the non-reſident and plurality-gaping Prelats, the gulphs and whirlepools of Benefices, but the dry pits of all ſound Doctrine, that they may the better preach what they liſt to their ſheep, are ſtill poſſeſſing them that they are ſheep indeed, without judgment, without underſtanding, the very Beaſts of Mount Sinai, as this Confuter calls them; which words of theirs may ſerve to condemn them out of their owne mouths, and to ſhew the groſs contrarieties that are in their opinions: For while none think the people ſo void of knowledg as the Prelats think them, none are ſo backward and malignant as they to beſtow knowledg upon them; both by ſuppreſſing the frequency of Sermons, and the printed explanations of the Engliſh Bible. No marvel if the people turn beaſts, when their Teachers themſelves, as Iſaiah calls them, are dumb and greedy dogs that can never have anough, ignorant, blind, and cannot underſtand; who while they all look their own way, every one for his gain from his quarter, how many parts of the Land are fed with windy Ceremonies inſtead of ſincere Milk; and while one Prelat enjoys the nouriſhment and right of twenty Miniſters, how many waſte places are left as dark as Galile of the Gentiles, ſitting in the region and ſhadow of Death; without preaching Miniſter, without light. So little care they of Beaſts to make them Men, that by their ſorcerous doctrine of Formalities, they take the way to transform them out of Chriſtian men into Judaizing beaſts. Had they but taught the Land, or ſuffer'd it to be taught, as Chriſt would it ſhould have bin, in all plenteous diſpenſation of the Word, then the poor Mechanick might have ſo accuſtom'd his ear to good teaching, as to have diſcern'd between faithful teachers and falſe. But now with a moſt inhumane cruelty they who have put out the peoples eyes, reproach them of their blindneſs; juſt as the Phariſees their true Fathers were wont, who could not indure that the People ſhould be thought competent judges of Chriſts doctrine, although we know they judg'd far better then thoſe great Rabbies: yet this People, ſaid they, that knows not the law is accurſt. We need not the autority of Pliny brought to tell us, the People cannot judg of a Miniſter: yet that hurts not. For as none can judg of a Painter, or Statuary, but he who is an Artiſt, that is, either in the Practick or Theory, which is often ſeparated from the practick, and judges learnedly without it; ſo none can judg of a Chriſtian Teacher, but he who hath either the practice, or the knowledg of Chriſtian Religion, though not ſo artfully digeſted in him. And who almoſt of the meaneſt Chriſtians hath not heard the Scriptures often read from his childhood, beſides ſo many Sermons and Lectures more in number then any Student hath heard in Philoſophy, whereby he may eaſily attain to know when he is wiſely taught, and when weakly? Whereof three ways I remember are ſet down in Scripture: The one is to read often that beſt of Books written to this purpoſe, that not the wiſe only, but the ſimple and ignorant may learn by them; the other way to know of a Miniſter, is by the life he leads, whereof the meaneſt underſtanding may be apprehenſive. The laſt way to judg aright in this point is, when he who judges, lives a Chriſtian life himſelf. Which of theſe three will the Confuter affirm to exceed the capacity of a plain Artizan? And what reaſon then is there left wherefore he ſhould be deny'd his voice in the election of his Miniſter, as not thought a competent diſcerner? It is but arrogance therefore, and the pride of a metaphyſical fume, to think that the mutinous rabble (for ſo he calls the Chriſtian Congregation) would be ſo miſtaken in a Clerk of the Univerſity that were to be their Miniſter. I doubt me thoſe Clerks that think ſo, are more miſtaken in themſelves; and what with truanting and debauchery, what with falſe grounds and the weakneſs of natural faculties in many of them (it being a Maxim in ſome men to ſend the ſimpleſt of their ſons thither) perhaps there would be found among them as many unſolid and corrupted judgments both in doctrine and life, as in any other two Corporations of like bigneſs. This is undoubted that if any Carpenter, Smith, or Weaver, were ſuch a bungler in his Trade, as the greater number of them are in their Profeſſion, he would ſtarve for any cuſtom. And ſhould he exerciſe his Manufacture as little as they do their Talents, he would forget his Art: and ſhould he miſtake his Tools as they do theirs, he would marr all the work he took in hand. How few among them that know to write, or ſpeak in a pure ſtile, much leſs to diſtinguiſh the idea's, and various kinds of ſtile; in Latin barbarous, and oft not without ſoleciſms, declaming in rugged and miſcellaneous geare blown together by the four winds, and in their choice preferring the gay rankneſs of Apuleius, Arnobius, or any modern Suſtianiſt, before the native Latiniſms of Cicero. In the Greek tongue moſt of them unletter'd, or unenter'd to any ſound proficiency in thoſe Attick Maſters of moral Wiſdom and Eloquence. In the Hebrew Text, which is ſo neceſſary to be underſtood, except it be ſome few of them, their lips are utterly uncircumcis'd. No leſs are they out of the way in Philoſophy, peſtring their heads with the ſapleſs dotages of old Paris and Salamanca. And that which is the main point, in their Sermons affecting the Comments and poſtils of Friers and Jeſuits, but ſcorning and ſlighting the reformed Writers: Inſomuch that the better ſort among them will confeſs it a rare matter to hear a true edifying Sermon in either of their great Churches; and that ſuch as are moſt humm'd and applauded there, would ſcarce be ſuffer'd the ſecond hearing in a grave Congregation of pious Chriſtians. Is there cauſe why theſe men ſhould overween, and be ſo queaſy of the rude multitude, leſt their deep worth ſhould be undervalu'd for want of fit Umpires? No my matriculated Confutant, there will not want in any Congregation of this Iſland, that hath not been altogether famiſht, or wholly perverted with Prelatiſh leven; there will not want divers plain and ſolid men, that have learnt by the experience of a good Conſcience, what it is to be well taught, who will ſoon look through and through both the lofty nakedneſs of your latinizing Barbarian, and the finical gooſery of your neat Sermon-actor. And ſo I leave you and your fellow Stars, as you term them, of either Horizon, meaning I ſuppoſe either Hemiſphere, unleſs you will be ridiculous in your Aſtronomy: For the rational Horizon in Heav'n is but one, and the ſenſible Horizons in Earth are innumerable; ſo that your Alluſion was as erroneous as your Stars. But that you did well to prognoſticat them all at loweſt in the Horizon; that is, either ſeeming bigger then they are through the miſt and vapour which they raiſe, or elſe ſinking, and waſted to the ſnuff in their Weſtern ſocket.

SECT. 11.

His eleventh Section intends I know not what, unleſs to clog us with the reſidue of his phlegmatick ſloth, diſcuſſing with a heavy pulſe the expedience of ſet formes: which no queſtion but to ſome, and for ſome time may be permitted, and perhaps there may be uſefully ſet forth by the Church a common Directory of publick Prayer, eſpecially in the adminiſtration of the Sacraments. But that it ſhould therefore be inforc't where both Miniſter and People profeſs to have no need, but to be ſcandaliz'd by it, that, I hope, every ſenſible Chriſtian will deny: And the reaſons of ſuch denial the Confuter himſelf, as his bounty ſtill is to his Adverſary, will give us out of his affirmation. Firſt ſaith he, God in his Providence hath choſen ſome to teach others, and pray for others, as Miniſters and Paſtors. Whence I gather, that however the faculty of others may be, yet that they whom God hath ſet apart to his Miniſtry, are by him endu'd with an ability of Prayer; becauſe their Office is to pray for others, and not to be the lip-working Deacons of other mens appointed words. Nor is it eaſily credible, that he who can preach well, ſhould be unable to pray well; when as it is indeed the ſame ability to ſpeak affirmatively, or doctrinally, and only by changing the mood, to ſpeak prayingly. In vain therefore do they pretend to want utterance in prayer, who can find utterance to preach. And if prayer be the gift of the Spirit, why do they admit thoſe to the Miniſtry, who want a main gift of their Function, and preſcribe gifted men to uſe that which is the remedy of another man's want; ſetting them their taſk to read, whom the Spirit of God ſtands ready to aſſiſt in his Ordinance with the gift of free conceptions? What if it be granted to the infirmity of ſome Miniſters (though ſuch ſeem rather to be half-Miniſters) to help themſelves with a ſet form, ſhall it therefore be urg'd upon the plenteous graces of others? And let it be granted to ſome people while they are Babes in Chriſtian Gifts, were it not better to take it away ſoon after, as we do loitering Books, and interlineary tranſlations from Children; to ſtir up and exerciſe that portion of the Spirit which is in them, and not impoſe it upon Congregations who not only deny to need it, but as a thing troubleſome and offenſive, refuſe it? Another reaſon which he brings for Liturgy is the preſerving of Order, Unity, and Piety; and the ſame ſhall be my reaſon againſt Liturgy. For I, Readers, ſhall always be of this opinion, that obedience to the Spirit of God, rather then to the fair ſeeming pretences of Men, is the beſt and moſt dutiful order that a Chriſtian can obſerve. If the Spirit of God maniſeſt the gift of Prayer in his Miniſter, what more ſeemly order in the Congregation, then to go along with that man in our devouteſt affections? for him to abridg himſelf by reading, and to foreſtal himſelf in thoſe petitions, which he muſt either omit, or vainly repeat, when he comes into the Pulpit under a ſhew of order, is the greateſt diſorder. Nor is Unity leſs broken, eſpecially by our Liturgy, though this Author would almoſt bring the Communion of Saints to a Communion of Liturgical words. For what other reformed Church holds Communion with us by our Liturgy, and does not rather diſlike it? and among our ſelves who knows it not to have been a perpetual cauſe of diſunion?

Laſtly, it hinders Piety rather then ſets it forward, being more apt to weaken the ſpiritual faculties, if the people be not wean'd from it in due time; as the daily pouring in of hot waters quenches the natural heat. For not only the body and the mind, but alſo the improvement of God's Spirit is quickn'd by uſing. Whereas they who will ever adhere to Liturgy, bring themſelves in the end to ſuch a paſs by over-much leaning, as to loſe even the legs of their devotion. Theſe inconveniencies and dangers follow the compelling of ſet forms: but that the toleration of the Engliſh Liturgy now in uſe, is more dangerous then the compelling of any other which the reformed Churches uſe, theſe reaſons following may evince. To contend that it is fantaſtical, if not ſenſeleſs in ſome places, were a copious argument, eſpecially in the Reſponſories. For ſuch Alternations as are there us'd muſt be by ſeveral perſons; but the Miniſter and the People cannot ſo ſever their intereſts, as to ſuſtain ſeveral perſons; he being the only mouth of the whole body which he preſents. And if the people pray, he being ſilent, or they ask one thing, and he another, it either changes the property, making the Prieſt the People, and the People the Prieſt by turns, or elſe makes two Perſons and two Bodies Repreſentative where there ſhould be but one. Which if it be nought elſe, muſt needs be a ſtrange quaintneſs in ordinary prayer. The like, or worſe may be ſaid of the Litany, wherein neither Prieſt nor People ſpeak any intire ſenſe of themſelves throughout the whole, I know not what to name it; only by the timely contribution of their parted ſtakes, cloſing up as it were the Schiſm of a ſlic'd prayer, they pray not in vain, for by this means they keep Life between them in a piece of gaſping ſenſe, and keep down the ſawcineſs of a continual rebounding nonſenſe. And hence it is that as it hath been far from the imitation of any warranted prayer, ſo we all know it hath been obvious to be the pattern of many a Jig. And he who hath but read in good Books of Devotion and no more, cannot be ſo either of ear or judgment unpractis'd to diſtinguiſh what is grave, pathetical, devout, and what not, but will preſently perceive this Liturgy all over in conception lean and dry, of affections empty and unmoving, of paſſion, or any heigth whereto the Soul might ſoar upon the wings of zeal, deſtitute and barren; beſides Errors, Tautologies, Impertinences, as thoſe thanks in the Womans Churching for her delivery from Sun-burning and Moon-blaſting, as if ſhe had been travailing not in her bed, but in the deſerts of Arabia. So that while ſome men ceaſe not to admire the incomparable frame of our Liturgy, I cannot but admire as faſt what they think is become of judgment and taſte in other men, that they can hope to be heard without laughter. And if this were all, perhaps it were a compliable matter. But when we remember this our Liturgy where we found it, whence we had it, and yet where we left it, ſtill ſerving to all the abominations of the Antichriſtian Temple, it may be wonder'd how we can demur whether it ſhould be done away or no, and not rather fear we have highly offended in uſing it ſo long. It hath indeed been pretended to be more ancient then the Maſſe, but ſo little prov'd, that whereas other corrupt Liturgies have had withal ſuch a ſeeming Antiquity, as that their publiſhers have ventur'd to aſcribe them with their worſt corruptions either to St. Peter, St. James, St. Mark, or at leaſt to Chryſoſtome or Baſil, ours hath been never able to find either Age or Author allowable, on whom to father thoſe things therein which are leaſt offenſive, except the two Creeds, for Te Deum has a ſmach in it of Limbus Patrum: As if Chriſt had not open'd the Kingdom of Heaven before he had overcome the ſharpneſs of Death. So that having receiv'd it from the Papal Church as an original Creature, for ought can be ſhewn to the contrary, form'd and faſhion'd by work-maſters ill to be truſted, we may be aſſur'd that if God loath the beſt of an Idolater's prayer, much more the conceited fangle of his prayer. This Confuter himſelf confeſſes that a Community of the ſame ſet form in prayers, is that which makes Church and Church truly one; we then uſing a Liturgy far more like to the Maſs-book then to any Proteſtant ſet-form, by his own words muſt have more Communion with the Romiſh Church, then with any of the Reformed. How can we then not partake with them the curſe and vengeance of their ſuperſtition, to whom we come ſo near in the ſame ſet-form and dreſs of our devotion? Do we think to ſift the matter finer then we are ſure God in his jealouſie will, who deteſted both the Gold and the Spoil of idolatrous Cities, and forbid the eating of things offer'd to Idols? Are we ſtronger then he, to brook that which his heart cannot brook? It is not ſurely becauſe we think that prayers are no where to be had but at Rome; that were a foul ſcorn and indignity caſt upon all the reformed Churches, and our own: if we imagine that all the godly Miniſters of England are not able to new mould a better and more pious Liturgy then this which was conceiv'd and infanted by an idolatrous Mother, how baſely were that to eſteem of God's Spirit, and all the holy bleſſings and privileges of a true Church above a falſe? Heark ye Prelats, is this your glorious Mother of England, who whenas Chriſt hath taught her to pray, thinks it not enough unleſs ſhe add thereto the teaching of Antichriſt? How can we believe ye would refuſe to take the ſtipend of Rome, when ye ſhame not to live upon the alms-basket of her prayers? Will ye perſwade us that ye can curſe Rome from your hearts, when none but Rome muſt teach ye to pray? Abraham diſdain'd to take ſo much as a thred or a ſhoo-latchet from the King of Sodom, though no foe of his, but a wicked King; and ſhall we receive our prayers at the bounty of our more wicked Enemies, whoſe gifts are no gifts, but the inſtruments of our bane? Alas that the Spirit of God ſhould blow as an uncertain wind, ſhould ſo miſtake his inſpiring, ſo miſbeſtow his gifts promis'd only to the elect, that the idolatrous ſhould find words acceptable to preſent God with, and abound to their neighbours, while the true profeſſors of the Goſpel can find nothing of their own worth the conſtituting, wherewith to worſhip God in publick. Conſider if this be to magnify the Church of England, and not rather to diſplay her nakedneſs to all the world. Like therefore as the retaining of this Romiſh Liturgy is a provocation to God, and a diſhonour to our Church, ſo is it by thoſe ceremonies, thoſe purifyings and offrings at the Altar, a pollution and diſturbance to the Goſpel it ſelf; and a kind of driving us with the fooliſh Galatians to another Goſpel. For that which the Apoſtles taught hath freed us in Religion from the Ordinances of men, and commands that burdens be not laid upon the Redeemed of Chriſt; though the Formaliſt will ſay, what no decency in God's worſhip? Certainly Readers, the worſhip of God ſingly in it ſelf, the very act of prayer and thankſgiving, with thoſe free and unimpos'd expreſſions which from a ſincere heart unbidden come into the outward geſture, is the greateſt decency that can be imagin'd. Which to dreſs up and garniſh with a deviſ'd bravery aboliſht in the Law, and diſclam'd by the Goſpel, adds nothing but a deformed uglineſs; and hath ever afforded a colourable pretence to bring in all thoſe traditions and carnalities that are ſo killing to the power and virtue of the Goſpel. What was that which made the Jews, figur'd under the names of Aholah and Aholibah, go a whoring after all the Heathens inventions, but that they ſaw a Religion gorgeouſly attir'd and deſirable to the eye? What was all that the falſe Doctors of the primitive Church, and ever ſince have done, but to make a fair ſhew in the fleſh, as St. Paul's words are? If we have indeed given a bill of Divorce to Popery and Superſtition, why do we not ſay as to a divorc'd wife; Thoſe things which are yours take them all with you, and they ſhall ſweep after you? Why were not we thus wiſe at our parting from Rome? Ah like a crafty Adultreſs ſhe forgot not all her ſmooth looks and inticing words at her parting; yet keep theſe letters, theſe tokens, and theſe few ornaments; I am not all ſo greedy of what is mine, let them preſerve with you the memory, of what I am? No, but of what I was, once fair and lovely in your eyes. Thus did thoſe tender hearted Reformers dotingly ſuffer themſelves to be overcome with Harlots language. And ſhe like a Witch, but with a contrary policy, did not take ſomething of theirs, that ſhe might ſtill have power to bewitch them, but for the ſame intent left ſomething of her own behind her. And that her whoriſh cunning ſhould prevail to work upon us her deceitful ends, though it be ſad to ſpeak, yet ſuch is our blindneſs, that we deſerve. For we are deep in dotage. We cry out Sacrilege and Miſdevotion againſt thoſe who in zeal have demoliſh't the dens and cages of her unclean wallowings. We ſtand for a Popiſh Liturgy as for the Ark of our Cov'nant. And ſo little does it appear our prayers are from the heart, that multitudes of us declare, they know not how to pray but by rote. Yet they can learnedly invent a prayer of their own to the Parlament, that they may ſtill ignorantly read the prayers of other men to God. They object, that if we muſt forſake all that is Rome's, we muſt bid adieu to our Creed; and I had thought our Creed had been of the Apoſtles, for ſo it bears title. But if it be hers, let her take it. We can want no Creed, ſo long as we want not the Scriptures. We magnify thoſe who in reforming our Church have inconſiderately and blamefully permitted the old leven to remain and ſour our whole lump. But they were Martyrs; true, and he that looks well into the book of God's providence, if he read there that God for this their negligence and halting, brought all that following perſecution upon this Church, and on themſelves, perhaps will be found at the laſt day not to have read amiſs.

SECT. 12.

But now, Readers, we have the Port within ſight; his laſt Section which is no deep one, remains only to be foarded, and then the wiſht ſhoar. And here firſt it pleaſes him much, that he hath diſcri'd me, as he conceives, to be unread in the Councels. Concerning which matter it will not be unneceſſary to ſhape him this anſwer; That ſome years I had ſpent in the ſtories of thoſe Greek and Roman Exploits, wherein I found many things both nobly done, and worthily ſpoken: when coming in the method of time to that age wherein the Church had obtain'd a Chriſtian Emperor, I ſo prepar'd my ſelf, as being now to read examples of wiſdom and goodneſs among thoſe who were formoſt in the Church, not elſe where to be parallell'd: But to the amazement of what I expected, Readers, I found it all quite contrary; excepting in ſome very few, nothing but Ambition, Corruption, Contention, Combuſtion: inſomuch that I could not but love the Hiſtorian Socrates, who in the proem to his fifth Book profeſſes, He was fain to intermix affairs of State, for that it would be elſe an extream annoyance to hear in a continu'd Diſcourſe the endleſs brabbles and counterplottings of the Biſhops. Finding therefore the moſt of their actions in ſingle to be weak, and yet turbulent, full of ſtrife, and yet flat of ſpirit, and the ſum of their beſt Councels there collected, to be moſt commonly in queſtions either trivial and vain, or elſe of ſhort and eaſy deciſion, without that great buſtle which they made; I concluded that if their ſingle ambition and ignorance was ſuch, then certainly united in a Council it would be much more; and if the compendious recital of what they there did was ſo tedious and unprofitable, then ſurely to ſit out the whole extent of their tattle in a dozen volumes, would be a loſs of time irrecoverable. Beſides that which I had read of St. Martin, who for his laſt ſixteen years could never be perſwaded to be at any Council of the Biſhops. And Gregory Nazianzen betook him to the ſame reſolution, affirming to Procopius, that of any Council or Meeting of Biſhops he never ſaw good end; nor any remedy thereby of evil in the Church, but rather an increaſe. For, ſaith he, their Contentions and deſire of Lording no tongue is able to expreſs. I have not therefore, I confeſs, read more of the Councels ſave here and there; I ſhould be ſorry to have been ſuch a prodigal of my time: but that which is better, I can aſſure this Confuter, I have read into them all. And if I want any thing yet, I ſhall reply ſomething toward that which in the defence of Muræna was anſwer'd by Cicero to Sulpitius the Lawyer. If ye provoke me (for at no hand elſe will I undertake ſuch a frivolous labour) I will in three months be an expert Counceliſt. For be not deceiv'd, Readers, by men that would overawe your ears with big Names and huge Tomes that contradict and repeal one another, becauſe they can cram a margent with Citations. Do but winnow their chaffe from their wheat, ye ſhall ſee their great heap ſhrink and wax thin paſt belief. From hence he paſſes to enquire wherefore I ſhould blame the vices of the Prelats only, ſeeing the inferiour Clergy is known to be as faulty. To which let him hear in brief; that thoſe Prieſts whoſe vices have been notorious, are all Prelatical, which argues both the impiety of that opinion, and the wicked remiſneſs of that government. We hear not of any which are call'd Nonconformiſts, that have been accus'd for ſcandalous living; but are known to be pious, or at leaſt ſober men. Which is a great good argument that they are in the truth, and Prelats in the error. He would be reſolv'd next, What the corruptions of the Univerſities concern the Prelats? and to that let him take this, That the Remonſtrant having ſpok'n as if Learning would decay with the removal of Prelats, I ſhew'd him that while Books were extant and in print, Learning could not readily be at a worſe paſs in the Univerſities then it was now under their government. Then he ſeeks to juſtify the pernicious Sermons of the Clergy, as if they upheld Soveranty, whenas all Chriſtian Soveranty is by law, and to no other end but to the maintenance of the common good. But their Doctrine was plainly the diſſolution of Law, which only ſets up Sov'ranty, and the erecting of an arbitrary ſway according to privat will, to which they would enjoin a ſlaviſh obedience without Law; which is the known definition of a Tyrant, and a tyranniz'd people. A little beneath he denies that great riches in the Church are the baits of pride and ambition: of which error to undeceive him, I ſhall allege a reputed divine Autority, as ancient as Conſtantine, which his love to Antiquity mnſt not except againſt; and to add the more waight, he ſhall learn it rather in the words of our old Poet Gower then in mine, that he may ſee it is no new opinion, but a truth deliver'd of old by a voice from Heav'n, and ratify'd by long experience.

This Conſtantine which heal hath found,
Within Rome anon let found Two Churches which he did make
For Peter and for Pauls ſake:
Of whom he had a viſion,
And yafe therto poſſeſſion
Of Lordſhip and of worlds good;
But how ſo that his will was good Toward the Pope and his Franchiſe,
Yet hath it proved otherwiſe
To ſee the working of the deed:
For in Cronick thus I read,
Anon as he hath made the yeſt,
A voice was heard on high the left,
Of which all Rome was adrad,
And ſaid, This day venim is ſhad
In holy Church, of temporall
That medleth with the ſpirituall;

And how it ſtant in that degree,
Yet may a man the ſooth ſee.
God amend it whan he will,
I can thereto none other ſkill.

But there were beaſts of prey, ſaith he, before wealth was beſtow'd on the Church. What though? becauſe the Vulturs had then but ſmall pickings, ſhall we therefore go and fling them a full gorge? if they for lucre uſe to creep into the Church undiſcernably, the more wiſdom will it be ſo to provide that no revenu there may exceed the golden mean: For ſo, good Paſtors will be content, as having need of no more, and knowing withal the precept and example of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and alſo will be leſs tempted to ambition. The bad will have but ſmall matter whereon to ſet their miſchief awork: And the worſt and ſutleſt heads will not come at all, when they ſhall ſee the crop nothing anſwerable to their capacious greedineſs: For ſmall temptations allure but dribling offendors; but a great purchaſe will call ſuch as both are moſt able of themſelves, and will be moſt inabl'd hereby to compaſs dangerous projects. But ſaith he, A widows houſe will tempt as well as a Biſhops Palace. Acutely ſpok'n! Becauſe neither we nor the Prelats can aboliſh widows houſes, which are but an occaſion taken of evil without the Church, therefore we ſhall ſet up within the Church a Lottery of ſuch prizes as are the direct inviting cauſes of avarice and ambition, both unneceſſary and harmful to be propos'd, and moſt eaſie, moſt convenient and needful to be remov'd. Yea but they are in a wiſe Diſpencers hand: Let them be in whoſe hand they will, they are moſt apt to blind, to puff up and pervert the moſt ſeeming good. And how they have bin kept from Vultures, what ever the diſpencers care hath bin, we have learnt by our miſeries. But this which comes next in view, I know not what good vein or humor took him when he let drop into his paper: I that was ere while the ignorant, the loyterer, on the ſudden by his permiſſion am now granted to know ſomething. And that ſuch a volley of expreſſions he hath met withal, as he would never deſire to have them better cloth'd. For me, Readers, although I cannot ſay that I am utterly untrain'd in thoſe rules which beſt Rhetoricians have giv'n, or unacquainted with thoſe examples which the prime authors of eloquence have written in any learned tongu, yet true eloquence I find to be none, but the ſerious and hearty love of truth: And that whoſe mind ſo ever is fully poſſeſt with a fervent deſire to know good things, and with the deareſt charity to infuſe the knowledg of them into others, when ſuch a man would ſpeak, his words (by what I can expreſs) like ſo many nimble and airy ſervitors trip about him at command, and in well-order'd files, as he would wiſh, fall aptly into their own places. But now to the remainder of our diſcourſe. Chriſt refus'd great riches, and large honours at the Devils hand. But why, ſaith he, as they were tender'd by him from whom it was a ſin to receave them. Timely remember'd: why is it not therefore as much a ſin to receave a Liturgy of the maſſes giving, were it for nothing elſe but for the giver? But he could make no uſe of ſuch a high eſtate, quoth the Confuter; opportunly. For why then ſhould the ſervant take upon him to uſe thoſe things which his maſter had unfitted himſelf to uſe, that he might teach his miniſters to follow his ſteps in the ſame miniſtery? But they were offer'd him to a bad end: So they prove to the Prelats, who after their preferment moſt uſually change the teaching labour of the Word, into the unteaching eaſe of Lordſhip over conſciences and purſes. But he proceeds, God entic't the Iſraelites with the promiſe of Canaan. Did not the Prelats bring as ſlaviſh minds with them, as the Jews brought out of Egypt, they had left out that inſtance. Beſides that it was then the time, when as the beſt of them, as Saint Paul ſaith, was ſhut up unto the faith under the Law their School-maſter, who was forc't to intice them as children with childiſh enticements. But the Goſpel is our manhood, and the Miniſtery ſhould be the manhood of the Goſpel, not to look after, much leſs ſo baſely to plead for earthly Rewards. But God incited the wiſeſt man Solomon with theſe means. Ah Confuter of thy ſelf, this example hath undone thee; Solomon askt an underſtanding heart, which the Prelats have little care to ask. He askt no riches, which is their chief care: therefore was the prayer of Solomon pleaſing to God; he gave him wiſdom at his requeſt, and riches without asking, as now he gives the Prelats riches at their ſeeking, and no wiſdom becauſe of their perverſe asking. But he gives not over yet, Moſes had an eye to the reward. To what Reward, thou man that lookſt with Balaams eyes? to what Reward had the faith of Moſes an eye? He that had forſaken all the greatneſs of Egypt, and choſe a troubleſome journey in his old age through the Wilderneſs, and yet arriv'd not at his journeys end: His faithful eyes were fixt upon that incorruptible Reward, promis'd to Abraham and his ſeed in the Meſſiah; he ſought a heav'nly Reward which could make him happy, and never hurt him, and to ſuch a Reward every good man may have a reſpect; But the Prelats are eager of ſuch Rewards as cannot make them happy, but can only make them worſe. Jacob, a Prince born, vow'd, that if God would but give him bread to eat, and raiment to put on, then the Lord ſhould be his God. But the Prelats of mean birth, and oft-times of loweſt, making ſhew as if they were call'd to the ſpiritual and humble miniſtery of the Goſpel, yet murmur, and think it a hard ſervice, unleſs contrary to the tenour of their Profeſſion, they may eat the bread and wear the honours of Princes: So much more covetous and baſe they are then Simon Magus, for he proffer'd a Reward to be admitted to that work, which they will not be meanly hir'd to. But ſaith he, Are not the Clergy members of Chriſt, why ſhould not each member thrive alike? Carnal Textman! As if worldly thriving were one of the privileges we have by being in Chriſt, and were not a providence oft-times extended more liberally to the Infidel then the Chriſtian. Therefore muſt the Miniſters of Chriſt not be over rich or great in the World, becauſe their Calling is ſpiritual, not ſecular; becauſe they have a ſpecial Warfare, which is not to be intangl'd with many impediments; becauſe their Maſter Chriſt gave them this Precept, and ſet them this Example, told them this was the myſtery of his coming, by mean things and perſons to ſubdue mighty ones: and laſtly, becauſe a middle eſtate is moſt proper to the office of teaching, whereas higher dignity teaches far leſs, and blinds the Teacher. Nay, ſaith the Confuter, fetching his laſt indeavour, The Prelats will be very loth to let go their Baronies, and Votes in Parlament, and calls it Gods Cauſe, with an unſufferable impudence. Not that they love the Honours and the Means; good men and generous, but that they would not have their Country made guilty of ſuch a ſacrilege and injuſtice. A worthy Patriot for his owne corrupt ends! That which he imputes a ſacrilege to his Countrey, is the only way left them to purge that abominable ſacrilege out of the Land, which none but the Prelats are guilty of: Who for the diſcharge of one ſingle duty receive and keep that which might be anough to ſatisfy the labours of many painful Miniſters better deſerving then themſelves: Who poſſeſs huge Benefices for lazie Performances, great Promotions only for the execution of a cruel diſgoſpelling Juriſdiction: Who ingroſs many pluralities under a non-reſident and ſlubbring diſpatch of Souls: Who let hundreds of Pariſhes famiſh in one Dioceſs, while they the Prelats are mute, and yet injoy that wealth that would furniſh all thoſe dark places with able ſupply; and yet they eat, and yet they live at the rate of Earls, and yet hoard up: They who chaſe away all the faithful Shepherds of the flock, and bring in a dearth of ſpiritual food, robbing thereby the Church of her deareſt treaſure, and ſending herds of ſouls ſtarvling to Hell, while they feaſt and riot upon the labours of hireling Curats, conſuming and purloining even that which by their foundation is allow'd, and left to the poor, and to reparations of the Church. Theſe are they who have bound the Land with the ſin of Sacrilege, from which mortal ingagement we ſhall never be free, till we have totally remov'd with one labour as one individual thing Prelaty and Sacrilege. And herein will the King be a true Defender of the Faith, not by paring or leſſening, but by diſtributing in due proportion the maintenance of the Church, that all parts of the Land may equally partake the plentiful and diligent preaching of the Faith, the ſcandal of Ceremonies thrown out that delude and circumvent the Faith; and the uſurpation of Prelats laid level, who are in words the Fathers, but in their deeds the oppugners of the Faith. This is that which will beſt confirm him in that glorious title. Thus ye have heard, Readers, how many ſhifts and wiles the Prelats have invented to ſave their ill got booty. And if it be true, as in Scripture it is foretold, that pride and covetouſneſs are the ſure marks of thoſe falſe Prophets which are to come, then boldly conclude theſe to be as great ſeducers as any of the latter times. For between this and the Judgment-day do not look for any arch Deceavers, who in ſpight of Reformation will uſe more craft, or leſs ſhame to defend their love of the world and their ambition then theſe Prelats have done. And if ye think that ſoundneſs of Reaſon, or what force of Argument ſoever will bring them to an ingenuous ſilence, ye think that which will never be. But if ye take that courſe which Eraſmus was wont to ſay Luther took againſt the Pope and Monks, if ye denounce war againſt their Miters and their Bellies, ye ſhall ſoon diſcern that Turbant of pride which they wear upon their heads, to be no Helmet of Salvation, but the meer mettle and horn-work of Papal Juriſdiction; and that they have alſo this gift, like a certain kind of ſome that are poſſeſt, to have their voice in their Bellies, which being well drain'd and taken down, their great Oracle, which is only there, will ſoon be dumb, and the Divine right of Epiſcopacy forthwith expiring, will put us no more to trouble with tedious antiquities and diſputes.

The Preface.

IN the publiſhing of humane Lawes, which for the moſt part aime not beyond the good of civill ſociety, to ſet them barely forth to the People without reaſon or preface, like a phyſicall preſcript, or only with threatnings, as it were a lordly Command, in the judgment of Plato was thought to be done neither generouſly nor wiſely. His advice was, ſeeing that perſuaſion certainly is a more winning, and more manlike way to keep Men in obedience then fear, that to ſuch Laws as were of principall moment, there ſhould be us'd as an induction, ſome well temper'd diſcourſe, ſhewing how good, how gainful, how happy it muſt needs be to live according to honeſty and juſtice; which being utter'd with thoſe native colours and graces of ſpeech, as true eloquence, the daughter of vertue, can beſt beſtow upon her mother's praiſes, would ſo incite, and in a manner charm the multitude into the love of that which is really good, as to imbrace it ever after, not of cuſtom and awe, which moſt men do, but of choice and purpoſe, with true and conſtant delight. But this practice we may learn from a better and more ancient authority then any heathen writer hath to give us; and indeed being a point of ſo high wiſdom and worth, how could it be but we ſhould find it in that Book, within whoſe ſacred context all wiſdome is infolded? Moſes therefore the only Lawgiver that we can believe to have been viſibly taught of God, knowing how vain it was to write Laws to men whoſe hearts were not firſt ſeaſon'd with the knowledge of God and of his works, began from the book of Geneſis, as a prologue to his Laws; which Joſephus right well hath noted. That the nation of the Jews, reading therein the univerſall goodneſs of God to all Creatures in the Creation, and his peculiar favour to them in his election of Abraham their anceſtor, from whom they could derive ſo many bleſſings upon themſelves, might be mov'd to obey ſincerely, by knowing ſo good a reaſon of their obedience. If then in the adminiſtration of civil Juſtice, and under the obſcurity of Ceremonial Rites, ſuch care was had by the wiſeſt of the Heathen, and by Moſes among the Jews, to inſtruct them at leaſt in a general reaſon of that Government to which their ſubjection was requir'd, how much more ought the Members of the Church under the Goſpel, ſeek to inform their underſtanding in the reaſon of that Government which the Church claims to have over them? eſpecially for that the Church hath in her immediate cure thoſe inner parts and affections of the mind where the ſeat of Reaſon is, having power to examine our ſpiritual knowledg, and to demand from us in God's behalf a ſervice intirely reaſonable. But becauſe about the manner and order of this Government, whether it ought to be Presbyterial or Prelatical, ſuch endleſs queſtion, or rather uproar is ariſen in this Land, as may be juſtly term'd what the Feaver is to the Phyſicians, the eternal Reproach of our Divines; whilſt other profound Clerks of late greatly, as they conceive, to the advancement of Prelaty, are ſo earneſtly meting out the Lydian Proconſular Aſia, to make good the prime Metropolis of Epheſus, as if ſome of our Prelats in all haſte meant to change their Soil, and become Neighbours to the Engliſh Bp of Chalcedon; and whilſt good Breerwood as buſily beſtirs himſelf in our vulgar tongue, to divide preciſely the three Patriarchats, of Rome, Alexandria, dria, and Antioch; and whether to any of theſe England doth belong. I ſhall in the mean while not ceaſe to hope, through the Mercy and Grace of Chriſt, the Head and Husband of his Church, that England ſhortly is to belong, neither to See Patriarchal, nor See Prelatical, but to the faithful feeding and diſciplining of that miniſterial Order, which the bleſſed Apoſtles conſtituted throughout the Churches; and this I ſhall eſſay to prove, can be no other then that of Presbyters and Deacons. And if any man incline to think I undertake a task too difficult for my years, I truſt, through the ſupreme inlightning aſſiſtance far otherwiſe; for my years, be they few or many, what imports it? ſo they bring reaſon, let that be lookt on: and for the task, from hence that the queſtion in hand is ſo needful to be known at this time, chiefly by every meaner capacity, and contains in it the explication of many admirable and heavenly privileges reacht out to us by the Goſpel, I conclude the task muſt be eaſy: God having to this end ordain'd his Goſpel to be the revelation of his power and wiſdom in Chriſt Jeſus. And this is one depth of his Wiſdom, that he could ſo plainly reveal ſo great a meaſure of it to the groſs diſtorted apprehenſion of decay'd mankind. Let others therefore dread and ſhun the Scriptures for their darkneſs, I ſhall wiſh I may deſerve to be reckon'd among thoſe who admire and dwell upon them for their clearneſs. And this ſeems to be the cauſe why in thoſe places of holy Writ, wherein is treated of Church-Government, the reaſons thereof are not formally and profeſtly ſet down, becauſe to him that heeds attentively the drift and ſcope of Chriſtian profeſſion, they eaſily imply themſelves; which thing further to explain, having now prefac'd enough, I ſhall no longer defer.

CHAP. I.

That Church Government is preſcrib'd in the Goſpel, and that to ſay otherwiſe is unſound.

THE firſt and greateſt reaſon of Church-Government, we may ſecurely, with the aſſent of many on the adverſe part, affirm to be, becauſe we find it ſo ordain'd and ſet out to us by the Appointment of God in the Scriptures; but whether this be Presbyterial, or Prelatical, it cannot be brought to the ſcanning, until I have ſaid what is meet to ſome who do not think it for the eaſe of their inconſequent Opinions, to grant that Church-Diſcipline is platform'd in the Bible, but that it is left to the diſcretion of Men. To this conceit of theirs I anſwer, that it is both unſound and untrue; for there is not that thing in the world of more grave and urgent importance throughout the whole life of Man, than is Diſcipline. What need I inſtance? He that hath read with judgment, of Nations and Common-wealths, of Cities and Camps, of Peace and War, Sea and Land, will readily agree that the flouriſhing and decaying of all Civil Societies, all the moments and turnings of humane Occaſions are mov'd to and fro as upon the Axle of Diſcipline. So that whatſoever power or ſway in mortal things weaker men have attributed to Fortune, I durſt with more confidence (the honour of Divine Providence ever ſav'd) aſcribe either to the vigor or the ſlackneſs of Diſcipline. Nor is there any ſociable perfection in this Life, Civil or Sacred, that can be above Diſcipline; but ſhe is that which with her muſical Cords preſerves and holds all the parts thereof together. Hence in thoſe perfect Armies of Cyrus in Xenophon, and Scipio in the Roman ſtories, the excellence of military Skill was eſteem'd, not by the not needing, but by the readieſt ſubmitting to the Edicts of their Commander. And certainly Diſcipline is not only the removal of Diſorder; but if any viſible ſhape can be given to divine things, the very viſible ſhape and image of Vertue, whereby ſhe is not only ſeen in the regular geſtures and motions of her heavenly Paces as ſhe walks, but alſo makes the harmony of her Voice audible to mortal ears. Yea, the Angels themſelves, in whom no diſorder is fear'd, as the Apoſtle that ſaw them in his rapture deſcribes, are diſtinguiſht and quaternion'd into their Celeſtial Princedoms, and Satrapies, according as God himſelf has writ his Imperial Decrees through the great Provinces of Heav'n. The ſtate alſo of the Bleſſed in Paradiſe, though never ſo perfect, is not therefore left without Diſcipline, whoſe golden ſurvaying Reed marks out and meaſures every Quarter and Circuit of New Jeruſalem. Yet is it not to be conceiv'd that thoſe eternal Effluences of Sanctity and Love in the glorified Saints, ſhould by this means be confin'd and cloy'd with repetitiou of that which is preſcrib'd, but that our happineſs may orb it ſelf into a thouſand vagancies of glory and delight, and with a kind of eccentrical Equation be, as it were, an invariable Planet of Joy and Felicity; how much leſs can we believe that God would leave his frail and feeble, tho not leſs beloved Church here below, to the perpetual ſtumble of Conjecture and Diſturbance in this our dark Voyage, without the Card and Compaſs of Diſcipline? Which is ſo hard to be of Man's making, that we may ſee even in the guidance of a Civil State to worldly happineſs, it is not for every learned, or every wiſe Man, though many of them conſult in common, to invent or frame a Diſcipline: but if it be at all the work of Man, it muſt be of ſuch a one as is a true knower of himſelf, and himſelf in whom Contemplation and Practice, Wit, Prudence, Fortitude, and Eloquence, muſt be rarely met, both to comprehend the hidden cauſes of things, and ſpan in his thoughts all the various effects that Paſſion or Complexion can work in Man's nature; and hereto muſt his hand be at defiance with Gain, and his heart in all Vertues heroick. So far is it from the ken of theſe wretched Projectors of ours, that beſcraul their Pamphlets every day with new Forms of Government for our Church. And therefore all the antient Lawgivers were either truly inſpir'd, as Moſes, or were ſuch men as with Authority anough might give it out to be ſo, as Minos, Lycurgus, Numa, becauſe they wiſely forethought that men would never quietly ſubmit to ſuch a Diſcipline as had not more of God's hand in it than Man's. To come within the narrowneſs of Houſhold-Government, obſervation will ſhew us many deep Counſellors of State and Judges do demean themſelves incorruptly in the ſettl'd courſe of Affairs, and many worthy Preachers upright in their Lives, powerful in their Audience: but look upon either of theſe men where they are left to their own diſciplining at home, and you ſhall ſoon perceive, for all their ſingle knowledg and uprightneſs, how deficient they are in the regulating of their own Family; not only in what may concern the vertuous and decent compoſure of their minds in their ſeveral places, but that which is of a lower and eaſier performance, the right poſſeſſing of the outward Veſſel, their Body, in Health or Sickneſs, Reſt or Labour, Diet or Abſtinence, whereby to render it more pliant to the Soul, and uſeful to the Common-wealth: which if men were but as good to diſcipline themſelves, as ſome are to tutor their Horſes and Hawks, it could not be ſo groſs in moſt houſholds. If then it appear ſo hard, and ſo little known how to govern a Houſe well, which is thought of ſo eaſy diſcharge, and for every man's undertaking; what skill of Man, what Wiſdom, what Parts can be ſufficient to give Laws and Ordinances to the elect Houſhold of God? If we could imagine that he had left it at random without his provident and gracious ordering, who is he ſo arrogant, ſo preſumptuous, that durſt diſpoſe and guide the living Ark of the Holy Ghoſt, though he ſhould find it wandring in the Field of Bethſhemeſh, without the conſcious warrant of ſome high Calling? But no profane Inſolence can parallel that which our Prelates dare avouch, to drive outragiouſly, and ſhatter the holy Ark of the Church, not born upon their ſhoulders with pains and labour in the Word, but drawn with rude Oxen their Officials, and their own brute Inventions. Let them make ſhews of reforming while they will, ſo long as the Church is mounted upon the Prelatical Cart, and not as it ought, between the hands of the Miniſters, it will but ſhake and totter; and he that ſets to his hand, though with a good intent to hinder the ſhogging of it, in this unlawful Waggonry wherein it rides, let him beware it be not fatal to him as it was to Uzza. Certainly if God be the Father of his Family the Church, wherein could he expreſs that Name more, then in training it up under his own Allwiſe and dear Oeconomy, not turning it looſe to the havock of Strangers and Wolves, that would ask no better plea then this to do in the Church of Chriſt, whatever Humour, Faction, Policy, or licentious Will would prompt them to? Again, if Chriſt be the Church's Husband, expecting her to be preſented before him a pure unſpotted Virgin; in what could he ſhew his tender Love to her more, then in preſcribing his own ways, which he beſt knew would be to the improvement of her health and beauty, with much greater care doubtleſs than the Perſian King could appoint for his Queen Eſther, thoſe maiden dietings and ſet preſcriptions of Baths and Odours, which may render her at laſt the more amiable to his eye? For of any Age or Sex, moſt unfitly may a Virgin be left to an uncertain and arbitrary Education. Yea, though ſhe be well inſtructed, yet is ſhe ſtill under a more ſtrait tuition, eſpecially if betroth'd. In like manner the Church bearing the ſame reſemblance, it were not reaſon to think ſhe ſhould be left deſtitute of that care which is as neceſſary and proper to her, as Inſtruction. For publick Preaching indeed is the Gift of the Spirit, working as beſt ſeems to his ſecret Will; but Diſcipline is the practick work of preaching directed and apply'd, as is moſt requiſite, to particular Duty; without which it were all one to the benefit of Souls, as it would be to the cure of Bodies. If all the Phyſicians in London ſhould get into the ſeveral Pulpits of the City, and aſſembling all the diſeaſed in every Pariſh, ſhould begin a learned Lecture of Pleuriſies, Palſies, Lethargies, to which perhaps none there preſent were inclin'd; and ſo without ſo much as feeling one Puls, or giving the leaſt order to any skilful Apothecary, ſhould diſmiſs 'em from time to time, ſome groaning, ſome languiſhing, ſome expiring, with this only charge, to look well to themſelves, and do as they hear. Of what excellence and neceſſity then Church-Diſcipline is, how beyond the Faculty of man to frame, and how dangerous to be left to man's Invention, who would be every foot turning it to ſiniſter Ends; how properly alſo it is the Work of God as Father, and of Chriſt as Husband of the Church, we have by thus much heard.

CHAP. II.

That Church-Government is ſet down in Holy Scripture, and that to ſay otherwiſe is untrue.

As therefore it is unſound to ſay, that God hath not appointed any ſet Government in his Church, ſo is it untrue. Of the time of the Law there can be no doubt: for to let paſs the firſt Inſtitution of Prieſts and Levites, which is too clear to be inſiſted upon, when the Temple came to be built, which in plain judgment could breed no eſſential change either in Religion, or in the Prieſtly Government; yet God to ſhew how little he could endure that men ſhould be tampring and contriving in his Worſhip, though in things of leſs regard, gave to David for Solomon, not only a pattern and model of the Temple, but a direction for the courſes of the Prieſts and Levites, and for all the work of their Service. At the return from the Captivity, things were only reſtor'd after the Ordinance of Moſes and David; or if the leaſt alteration be to be found, they had with them inſpired men, Prophets; and it were not ſober to ſay they did ought of moment without divine Intimation. In the Propheſy of Ezekiel, from the 40*th* Chapter onward, after the deſtruction of the Temple, God by his Prophet ſeeking to wean the hearts of the Jews from their old Law, to expect a new and more perfect Reformation under Chriſt, ſets out before their eyes the ſtately Fabrick and Conſtitution of his Church, with all the Eccleſiaſtical Functions appertaining: indeed the Deſcription is as ſorted beſt to the apprehenſion of thoſe times, typical and ſhadowie, but in ſuch manner as never yet came to paſs, nor never muſt literally, unleſs we mean to annihilat the Goſpel. But ſo exquiſit and lively the deſcription is in portraying the new ſtate of the Church, and eſpecially in thoſe points where Government ſeems to be moſt active, that both Jews and Gentiles might have good cauſe to be aſſur'd, that God, when ever he meant to reform his Church, never intended to leave the Government thereof delineated here in ſuch curious Architecture, to be patch't afterwards, and varniſh't over with the devices and imbelliſhings of mans Imagination. Did God take ſuch delight in meaſuring out the Pillars, Arches, and Doors of a material Temple? Was he ſo punctual and circumſpect in Lavers, Altars, and Sacrifices ſoon after to be abrogated, leſt any of theſe ſhould have been made contrary to his mind? Is not a far more perfect work, more agreeable to his perfection in the moſt perfect ſtate of the Church Militant, the new Alliance of God to man? Should not he rather now by his own preſcribed Diſcipline have caſt his Line and Level upon the Soul of Man which is his rational Temple, and by the divine Square and Compaſs thereof, form and regenerate in us the lovely ſhapes of Vertues and Graces, the ſooner to edify and accompliſh that immortal ſtature of Chriſt's Body, which is his Church, in all her glorious Lineaments and Proportions? And that this indeed God hath done for us in the Goſpel we ſhall ſee with open eyes, not under a Vail. We may paſs over the Hiſtory of the Acts and other places, turning only to thoſe Epiſtles of St. Paul to Timothy and Titus; where the ſpiritual eye may diſcern more goodly and gracefully erected, then all the magnificence of Temple or Tabernacle, ſuch a heavenly Structure of Evangelic Diſcipline, ſo diffuſive of Knowledg and Charity to the proſperous increaſe and growth of the Church, that it cannot be wonder'd if that elegant and artful Symmetry of the promiſed new Temple in Ezekiel, and all thoſe ſumptuous things under the Law were made to ſignify the inward beauty and ſplendor of the Chriſtian Church thus govern'd. And whether this be commanded, let it now be judg'd. St. Paul after his Preface to the firſt of Timothy, which he concludes in the 17*th* Verſe with Amen, enters upon the ſubject of his Epiſtle, which is to eſtabliſh the Church-government, with a command. This charge I commit to thee ſon Timothy; according to the Prophecies which went before on thee, that thou by them might'ſt war a good Warfare: which is plain enough thus expounded: This charge I commit to thee, wherein I now go about to inſtruct thee how thou ſhalt ſet up Church-diſcipline, that thou might'ſt war a good Warfare, bearing thy ſelf conſtantly and faithfully in the Miniſtry, which in the 1*ſt* to the Corinthians is alſo call'd a Warfare; and ſo after a kind of Parentheſis concerning Hymenæus, he returns to his command, though under the mild word of Exhorting, Chap. 2. ver. 1. I exhort therefore; as if he had interrupted his former command by the occaſional mention of Hymenæus. More beneath in the 14*th* verſe of the 3*d* Chapter, when he hath deliver'd the Duties of Biſhops or Presbyters, and Deacons, not once naming any other Order in the Church, he thus adds; Theſe things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee ſhortly (ſuch neceſſity it ſeems there was) but if I tarry long, that thou may'ſt know how thou ought'ſt to behave thy ſelf in the Houſe of God. From this place it may be juſtly ask't, whether Timothy by this here written, might know what was to be known concerning the Orders of Church-governors or no? If he might, then in ſuch a clear Text as this may we know too without further jangle; if he might not, then did St. Paul write inſufficiently, and moreover ſaid not true, for he ſaith here he might know; and I perſwade my ſelf he did know ere this was written, but that the Apoſtle had more regard to the inſtruction of us, then to the informing of him. In the fifth Chapter, after ſome other Church-Precepts concerning Diſcipline, mark what a dreadful command follows, Ver. 21. I charge thee before God and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the elect Angels, that thou obſerve theſe things: and as if all were not yet ſure enough, he cloſes up the Epiſtle with an adjuring charge thus; I give thee charge in the ſight of God, who quickneth all things, and before Chriſt Jeſus, that thou keep this Commandment: that is, the whole Commandment concerning Diſcipline, being the main purpoſe of the Epiſtle: although Hooker would fain have this denouncement refer'd to the particular Precept going before, becauſe the word Commandment is in the ſingular number, not remembring that even in the firſt Chapter of this Epiſtle, the word Commandment is us'd in a plural Senſe, Ver. 5. Now the end of the Commandment is Charity: And what more frequent then in like manner to ſay the Law of Moſes? So that either to reſtrain the ſignificance too much, or too much to inlarg it, would make the Adjuration either not ſo waighty, or not ſo pertinent. And thus we find here that the Rules of Church-diſcipline are not only commanded, but hedg'd about with ſuch a terrible impalement of Commands, as he that will break through wilfully to violate the leaſt of them, muſt hazard the wounding of his Conſcience even to death. Yet all this notwithſtanding we ſhall find them broken well nigh all by the fair pretenders even of the next Ages. No leſs to the contempt of him whom they fain to be the Arch-founder of Prelaty, St. Peter, who by what he writes in the 5th Chapter of his firſt Epiſtle, ſhould ſeem to be far another man then Tradition reports him: there he commits to the Presbyters only full Authority, both of feeding the Flock, and Epiſcopating; and commands that obedience be given to them as to the mighty hand of God, which is his mighty Ordinance. Yet all this was as nothing to repel the ventrous boldneſs of Innovation that enſu'd, changing the Decrees of God that are immutable, as if they had been breath'd by Man. Neverthelеſs when Chriſt, by thoſe Viſions of St. John, foreſhews the Reformation of his Church, he bids them take his Reed, and mete it out again after the firſt Pattern, for he preſcribes him no other. Ariſe, ſaid the Angel, and meaſure the Temple of God, and the Altar, and them that worſhip therein. What is there in the World can meaſure men but Diſcipline? Our word Ruling imports no leſs. Doctrine indeed is the meaſure, or at leaſt the reaſon of the meaſure, it's true; but unleſs the meaſure be apply'd to that which it is to meaſure, how can it actually do its proper work? Whether therefore Diſcipline be all one with Doctrine, or the particular Application thereof to this or that Perſon, we all agree that Doctrine muſt be ſuch only as is commanded; or whether it be ſomething really differing from Doctrine, yet was it only of Gods appointment, as being the moſt adequat meaſure of the Church and her Children, which is here the Office of a great Evangeliſt, and the Reed given him from Heaven. But that part of the Temple which is not thus meaſur'd, ſo far is it from being in Gods tuition or delight, that in the following Verſe he rejects it; however in ſhew and viſibility it may ſeem a part of his Church, yet in as much as it lies thus unmeaſur'd, he leaves it to be trampl'd by the Gentiles; that is, to be polluted with idolatrous and Gentiliſh Rites and Ceremonies. And that the principal Reformation here foretold, is already come to paſs, as well in Diſcipline as in Doctrine, the ſtate of our neighbour Churches afford us to behold. Thus through all the periods and changes of the Church, it hath been prov'd that God hath ſtill reſerv'd to himſelf the right of enacting Church-Government.

CHAP. III.

That it is dangerous and unworthy the Goſpel, to hold that Church-Government is to be pattern'd by the Law, as Bp. Andrews, and the Primat of Armagh maintain.

WE may return now from this interpoſing difficulty thus remov'd, to affirm, that ſince Church-Government is ſo ſtrictly commanded in Gods Word, the firſt and greateſt reaſon why we ſhould ſubmit thereto, is becauſe God hath ſo commanded. But whether of theſe two, Prelaty, or Presbytery can prove it ſelf to be ſupported by this firſt and greateſt reaſon, muſt be the next diſpute. Wherein this Poſition is to be firſt laid down, as granted; that I may not follow a Chaſe rather than an Argument, that one of theſe two, and none other, is of Gods ordaining; and if it be, that Ordinance muſt be evident in the Goſpel. For the imperfect and obſcure Inſtitution of the Law, which the Apoſtles themſelves doubt not oft-times to vilify, cannot give Rules to the compleat and glorious Miniſtration of the Goſpel, which looks on the Law as on a Child, not as on a Tutor. And that the Prelats have no ſure foundation in the Goſpel, their own guiltineſs doth manifeſt; they would not elſe run queſting up as high as Adam to fetch their Original, as 'tis ſaid one of them lately did in publick. To which aſſertion, had I heard it, becauſe I ſee they are ſo inſatiable of Antiquity, I ſhould have gladly aſſented, and confeſt them yet more antient: For Lucifer before Adam, was the firſt Prelat Angel; and both he, as is commonly thought, and our forefather Adam, as we all know, for aſpiring above their Orders, were miſerably degraded. But others better adviſ'd, are content to receive their beginnings from Aaron and his Sons, among whom B. Andrews of late years, and in theſe times the Primat of Armagh for their learning, are reputed the beſt able to ſay what may be ſaid in this Opinion. The Primat in his diſcourſe about the original of Epiſcopacy newly reviſ'd, begins thus. The ground of Epiſcopacy is fetcht partly from the pattern preſcribed by God in the Old Teſtament, and partly from the imitation thereof brought in by the Apoſtles. Herein I muſt entreat to be excuſ'd of the deſire I have to be ſatisfi'd, how for example the ground of Epiſcopacy is fetch't partly from the example of the Old Teſtament, by whom next, and by whoſe Authority. Secondly, how the Church-Government under the Goſpel, can be rightly call'd an imitation of that in the Old Teſtament; for that the Goſpel is the end and fulfilling of the Law, our liberty alſo from the Bondage of the Law, I plainly read. How then the ripe age of the Goſpel ſhould be put to School again, and learn to govern her ſelf from the infancy of the Law, the ſtronger to imitate the weaker, the Freeman to follow the Captive, the learned to be leſſon'd by the rude, will be a hard undertaking to evince from any of thoſe principles which either Art or Inſpiration hath written. If any thing done by the Apoſtles may be drawn howſoever to a likeneſs of ſomething Moſaical, if it cannot be prov'd that it was done of purpoſe in imitation, as having the right thereof grounded in Nature, and not in Ceremony or Type, it will little avail the matter. The whole Judaick Law is either political, and to take pattern by that, no Chriſtian Nation ever thought it ſelf oblig'd in Conſcience; or moral, which contains in it the obſervation of whatſoever is ſubſtantially, and perpetually true and good, either in Religion, or courſe of Life. That which is thus Moral, beſides what we fetch from thoſe unwritten Laws and Ideas which nature hath ingraven in us, the Goſpel, as ſtands with her dignity moſt, lectures to us from her own authentick hand-writing and command, not copies out from the borrow'd Manuſcript of a ſubſervient ſcrowl, by way of imitating: As well might ſhe be ſaid in her Sacrament of Water, to imitate the Baptiſm of John. What though ſhe retain Excommunication us'd in the Synagogue, retain the morality of the Sabbath? ſhe does not therefore imitate the Law her underling, but perfect her. All that was morally deliver'd from the Law to the Goſpel, in the Office of the Prieſts and Levites, was, that there ſhould be a Miniſtry ſet apart to teach and diſcipline the Church; both which Duties the Apoſtles thought good to commit to the Presbyters. And if any diſtinction of Honour were to be made among them, they directed it ſhould be to thoſe not that only rule well, but eſpecially to thoſe that labour in the Word and Doctrine. By which we are taught, that laborious teaching is the moſt honourable Prelaty that one Miniſter can have above another in the Goſpel: If therefore the ſuperiority of Biſhopſhip be grounded on the Prieſthood as a part of the Moral Law, it cannot be ſaid to be an Imitation; for it were ridiculous that Morality ſhould imitate Morality, which ever was the ſame thing. This very word of patterning or imitating, excludes Epiſcopacy from the ſolid and grave Ethical Law, and betrays it to be a meer Child of Ceremony, or likelier ſome miſbegotten thing, that having pluckt the gay Feathers of her obſolete bravery, to hide her own deformed bareneſs, now vaunts and glories in her ſtolen Plumes. In the mean while, what danger there is againſt the very Life of the Goſpel, to make in any thing the Typical Law her Pattern, and how impoſſible in that which touches the Prieſtly Government, I ſhall uſe ſuch light as I have receiv'd, to lay open. It cannot be unknown by what Expreſſions the holy Apoſtle S. Paul ſpares not to explain to us the nature and condition of the Law, calling thoſe Ordinances which were the chief and eſſential Offices of the Prieſts, the Elements and Rudiments of the World, both weak and beggarly. Now to breed, and bring up the Children of the Promiſe, the Heirs of Liberty and Grace, under ſuch a kind of Government as is profeſt to be but an imitation of that Miniſtry which engender'd to bondage the ſons of Agar; how can this be but a foul injury and derogation, if not a cancelling of that Birth-right and immunity which Chriſt hath purchas'd for us with with his blood? For the miniſtration of the Law conſiſting of carnal things, drew to it ſuch a Miniſtery as conſiſted of carnal reſpects, dignity, precedence, and the like. And ſuch a Miniſtery eſtabliſh't in the Goſpel, as is founded upon the points and terms of ſuperiority, and neſts it ſelf in worldly honours, will draw to it, and we ſee it doth, ſuch a Religion as runs back again to the old pomp and glory of the fleſh: For doubtleſs there is a certain attraction and magnetick force betwixt the Religion and the miniſterial form therof. If the Religion be pure, ſpiritual, ſimple and lowly, as the Goſpel moſt truly is, ſuch muſt the face of the Miniſtery be. And in like manner if the form of the miniſtery be grounded in the worldly degrees of Autority, Honour, temporal Juriſdiction, we ſee with our eyes it will turn the inward power and purity of the Goſpel into the outward carnality of the Law; evaporating and exhaling the internal worſhip into empty conformities, and gay ſhews. And what remains then but that we ſhould run into as dangerous and deadly Apoſtacy as our lamentable neighbours the Papiſts, who by this very ſnare and pitfal of imitating the Ceremonial Law, fell into that irrecoverable Superſtition, as muſt needs make void the Cov'nant of Salvation to them that perſiſt in this blindneſs?

CHAP. IV.

That it is impoſſible to make the Prieſthood of Aaron a pattern whereon to ground Epiſcopacy.

THat which was promis'd next, is to declare the impoſſibility of grounding Evangelick Government in the imitation of the Jewiſh Prieſthood; which will be done by conſidering both the quality of the Perſons, and the Office it ſelf. Aaron and his ſons were the Princes of their Tribe before they were ſanctified to the Prieſthood: that perſonal Eminence which they held above the other Levites, they receav'd not only from their Office, but partly brought it into their Office; and ſo from that time forward the Prieſts were not choſen out of the whole number of the Levites, as our Biſhops, but were born inheritors of the Dignity. Therefore unleſs we ſhall chooſe our Prelats only out of the Nobility, and let them run in a blood, there can be no poſſible imitation of Lording over their Brethren in regard of their perſons altogether unlike. As for the Office, which was a repreſentation of Chriſts own Perſon more immediately in the High-prieſt, and of his whole Prieſtly Office in all the other, to the performance of which the Levites were but as Servitors and Deacons, it was neceſſary there ſhould be a diſtinction of dignity between two Functions of ſo great odds. But there being no ſuch difference among our Miniſters, unleſs it be in reference to the Deacons, it is impoſſible to found a Prelaty upon the imitation of this Prieſthood: For wherein, or in what work is the Office of a Prelat excellent above that of a Paſtor? in Ordination you'll ſay, but flatly againſt Scripture; for there we know Timothy receav'd Ordination by the hands of the Presbytery, notwithſtanding all the vain deluſions that are us'd to evade that Teſtimony, and maintain an unwarrantable Uſurpation. But wherefore ſhould Ordination be a cauſe of ſetting up a ſuperiour degree in the Church? Is not that whereby Chriſt became our Saviour a higher and greater work, then that whereby he did ordain Meſſengers to preach and publiſh him our Saviour? Every Miniſter ſuſtains the Perſon of Chriſt in his higheſt work of communicating to us the Myſteries of our Salvation, and hath the power of binding and abſolving; how ſhould he need a higher dignity to repreſent or execute that which is an inferior work in Chriſt? Why ſhould the performance of Ordination, which is a lower office, exalt a Prelat, and not the ſeldom diſcharge of a higher and more noble Office, which is preaching and adminiſtring, much rather depreſs him? Verily neither the nature, nor the example of Ordination doth any way require an imparity between the ordainer and the ordained:

dained: For what more natural than every like to produce his like, Man to beget Man, Fire to propagate Fire? And in examples of higheſt opinion the ordainer is inferior to the ordained; for the Pope is not made by the precedent Pope, but by Cardinals, who ordain and conſecrate to a higher and greater Office than their own.

CHAP. V.

To the Arguments of B. Andrews, and the Primat.

IT follows here to attend to certain objections in a little Treatiſe lately printed among others of like ſort at Oxford, and in the Title ſaid to be out of the rude draughts of Biſhop Andrews: And ſurely they be rude draughts indeed, in ſo much that it is marvel to think what his friends meant to let come abroad ſuch ſhallow reaſonings with the name of a Man ſo much bruited for learning. In the 12 and 23 pages he ſeems moſt notoriouſly inconſtant to himſelf; for in the former place he tells us he forbears to take any argument of Prelaty from Aaron, as being the type of Chriſt. In the latter he can forbear no longer, but repents him of his raſh gratuity, affirming, that to ſay, Chriſt being come in the fleſh, his figure in the High-prieſt ceaſeth, is the ſhift of an Anabaptiſt; and ſtiffly argues, that Chriſt being as well King as Prieſt, was as well fore-reſembled by the Kings then, as by the High-prieſt: So that if his coming take away the one Type, it muſt alſo the other. Marvellous piece of Divinity! and well worth that the Land ſhould pay ſix thouſand pounds a year for in a Biſhoprick, although I read of no Sophiſter among the Greeks that was ſo dear, neither Hippias nor Protagoras, nor any whom the Socratick School famouſly refuted without hire. Here we have the type of the King ſow'd to the typet of the Biſhop, ſuttly to caſt a jealouſie upon the Crown, as if the right of Kings, like Meleager in the Metamorphoſis, were no longer liv'd then the firebrand of Prelaty. But more likely the Prelats fearing (for their own guilty carriage proteſts they do fear) that their fair days cannot long hold, practize by poſſeſſing the King with this moſt falſe doctrine, to engage his power for them, as in his own quarrel, that when they fall they may fall in a general ruin, juſt as cruel Tyberius would wiſh,

When I die, let the Earth be roul'd in flames.

But where, O Biſhop, doth the purpoſe of the Law ſet forth Chriſt to us as a King? That which never was intended in the Law, can never be aboliſh'd as part thereof. When the Law was made, there was no King: if before the Law, or under the Law God by a ſpecial type in any King would foreſignifie the future Kingdom of Chriſt, which is not yet viſibly come; what was that to the Law? The whole ceremonial Law and Types can be in no Law elſe, comprehend nothing but the propitiatory Office of Chriſt's Prieſtood; which being in ſubſtance accompliſht, both Law and Prieſthood fades away of it ſelf, and paſſes into air like a tranſitory viſion, and the right of Kings neither ſtands by any Type nor falls. We acknowledg that the civil Magiſtrate wears an Autority of God's giving, and ought to be obey'd as his Vicegerent. But to make a King a Type, we ſay is an abuſive and unskilful ſpeech, and of a moral ſolidity makes it ſeem a ceremonial ſhadow: Therefore your typical chain of King and Prieſt muſt unlink. But is not the type of Prieſt taken away by Chriſts coming? No, ſaith this famous Proteſtant Biſhop of Wincheſter, it is not; and he that ſaith it is, is an Anabaptiſt. What think ye, Readers, do ye not underſtand him? What can be gather'd hence but that the Prelat would ſtill ſacrifice? conceave him Readers, he would miſſificate. Their Altars indeed were in a fair forwardneſs; and by ſuch arguments as theſe they were ſetting up the molten Calf of their Maſs again, and of their great Hierarch the Pope. For if the Type of Prieſt be not taken away, then neither of the High-prieſt, it were a ſtrange beheading; and High-prieſt more then one there cannot be, and that one can be no leſs then a Pope. And this doubtleſs was the bent of his career, though never ſo covertly. Yea but there was ſomething elſe in the High-prieſt beſides the figure, as is plain by S. Pauls acknowledging him. 'Tis true, that in the 17th of Deut. whence this autority ariſes to the Prieſt in matters too hard for the ſecular Judges, as muſt needs be many in the occaſions of thoſe times, involv'd ſo with ceremonial Niceties, no wonder though it be commanded to enquire at the mouth of the Prieſts, who beſides the Magiſtrates their collegues, had the Oracle of Urim to conſult with. And whether the High-prieſt Ananias had not incroach't beyond the limits of his prieſtly autority, or whether us'd it rightly, was no time then for S. Paul to conteſt about. But if this inſtance be able to aſſert any right of juriſdiction to the Clergy, it muſt impart it in common to all Miniſters, ſince it were a great folly to ſeek for Counſel in a hard intricat ſcruple from a Dunce Prelat, when there might be found a ſpeedier ſolution from a grave and learned Miniſter, whom God hath gifted with the judgment of Urim more amply oft-times then all the Prelats together, and now in the Goſpel hath granted the privilege of this oraculous Ephod alike to all his Miniſters. The reaſon therefore of imparity in the Prieſts, being now, as is aforeſaid, really annull'd both in their perſon, and in their repreſentative Office, what right of juriſdiction ſoever can be from this place levitically bequeath'd, muſt deſcend upon the Miniſters of the Goſpel equally, as it finds them in all other points equal. Well then, he is finally content to let Aaron go; Eleazar will ſerve his turn, as being a Superior of ſuperiors, and yet no type of Chriſt in Aarons life-time. O thou that would'ſt wind into any figment, or phantaſm to ſave thy Miter! Yet all this will not fadge, though it be cunningly interpoliſht by ſome ſecond hand with crooks and emendations: Here then, the type of Chriſt in ſome one particular, as of entring yearly into the Holy of Holies, and ſuch like, reſted upon the High-prieſt only as more immediately perſonating our Saviour: but to reſemble his whole ſatisfactory Office all the lineage of Aaron was no more then ſufficient. And all, or any of the Prieſts conſider'd ſeparately without relation to the higheſt, are but as a lifeleſs trunk, and ſignifie nothing. And this ſhews the excellence of Chriſts Sacrifice, who at once and in one perſon fulfill'd that which many hundreds of Prieſts many times repeating had anough to foreſhew. What other imparity there was among themſelves, we may ſafely ſuppoſe it depended on the dignity of their Birth and Family, together with the circumſtances of a carnal Service, which might afford many priorities. And this I take to be the ſum of what the Biſhop hath laid together to make plea for Prelaty by imitation of the Law: Though indeed, if it may ſtand, it will infer Popedom all as well. Many other courſes he tries, enforcing himſelf with much oſtentation of endleſs Genealogies, as if he were the man that S. Paul forewarns us of in Timothy, but ſo unvigorouſly, that I do not fear his winning of many to his Cauſe, but ſuch as doting upon great names are either over-weak, or over ſudden of Faith. I ſhall not refuſe therefore to learn ſo much prudence as I find in the Roman Souldier that attended the Croſs, not to ſtand breaking of legs, when the breath is quite out of the body, but paſs to that which follows. The Primat of Armagh at the beginning of his Tractat ſeeks to avail himſelf of that place in the 66th of Eſaiah, I will take of them for Prieſts and Levites, ſaith the Lord, to uphold hereby ſuch a form of ſuperiority among the Miniſters of the Goſpel, ſucceeding thoſe in the Law, as the Lords-day did the Sabbath. But certain if this method may be admitted of interpreting thoſe prophetical paſſages concerning Chriſtian times in a punctual correſpondence, it may with equal probability be urg'd upon us, that we are bound to obſerve ſome monthly Solemnity anſwerable to the new Moons, as well as the Lords-day which we keep in lieu of the Sabbath: for in the 23d verſe the Prophet joins them in the ſame manner together, as before he did the Prieſts and Levites, thus. And it ſhall come to paſs that from one New Moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another ſhall all fleſh come to worſhip before me, ſaith the Lord. Undoubtedly with as good conſequence may it be alledg'd from hence, that we are to ſolemnize ſome religious monthly meeting different from the Sabbath, as from the other any diſtinct formality of Eccleſiaſtical Orders may be inferr'd. This rather will appear to be the lawful and unconſtrain'd ſenſe of the Text, that God in taking of them for Prieſts and Levites, will not eſteem them unworthy, though Gentiles, to undergo any function in the Church, but will make of them a full and perfect Miniſtery, as was that of the Prieſts and Levites in their kind. And Biſhop Andrews himſelf, to end the controverſie, ſends us a candid Expoſition of this quoted verſe from the 24th page of his ſaid book, plainly deciding that God by thoſe legal names there of Prieſts and Levites means our Presbyters and Deacons; for which either ingenuous confeſſion, or ſlip of his pen we give him thanks, and withal to him that brought theſe Treatiſes into one volume, who ſetting the contradictions of two learned Men ſo near together, did not foreſee. What other deducements or analogies are cited out of S. Paul to prove a likeneſs between the Miniſters of the Old and New Teſtament, having tri'd their ſinews, I judg they may paſs without harm doing to our Cauſe. We may remember then that Prelaty neither hath nor can have foundation in the Law, nor yet in the Goſpel; which aſſertion as being for the plainneſs thereof a matter of eye-ſight, rather then of diſquiſition, I voluntarily omit, not forgetting to ſpecifie this note again, that the earneſt deſire which the Prelats have to build their Hierarchy upon the ſandy bottom of the Law, gives us to ſee abundantly the little aſſurance which they find to reare up their high roofs by the autority of the Goſpel, repulſt as it were from the writings of the Apoſtles, and driven to take ſanctuary among the Jews. Hence that open confeſſion of the Primat before mention'd; Epiſcopacy is fetcht partly from the pattern of the Old Teſtament, and partly from the New as an imitation of the Old; though nothing can be more rotten in Divinity then ſuch a poſition as this, and is all one as to ſay, Epiſcopacy is partly of divine inſtitution, and partly of mans own carving. For who gave the autority to fetch more from the pattern of the Law then what the Apoſtles had already fetcht, if they fetcht any thing at all, as hath been prov'd they did not? So was Jeroboams Epiſcopacy partly from the pattern of the Law, and partly from the pattern of his own Carnality; a parti-colour'd and a parti-member'd Epiſcopacy: and what can this be leſs then a monſtrous? Others therefore among the Prelats, perhaps not ſo well able to brook, or rather to juſtifie this foul relapſing to the old Law, have condeſcended at laſt to a plain confeſſing that both the names and offices of Biſhops and Presbyters at firſt were the ſame, and in the Scriptures no where diſtinguiſht. This grants the Remonſtrant in the fift Section of his defence, and in the Preface to his laſt ſhort anſwer. But what need reſpect be had whether he grant or grant it not, when as through all Antiquity, and even in the loftieſt times of Prelaty, we find it granted? Jerome the learned'ſt of the Fathers hides not his opinion, that Cuſtom only, which the Proverb calls a Tyrant, was the maker of Prelaty; before his audacious workmanſhip the Churches were rul'd in common by the Presbyters: and ſuch a certain truth this was eſteem'd, that it became a decree among the Papal Canons compil'd by Gratian. Anſelme alſo of Canterbury, who to uphold the points of his Prelatiſm made himſelf a traytor to his Country, yet commenting the Epiſtles to Titus and the Philippians, acknowledges from the clearneſs of the Text, what Jerome and the Church Rubrick hath before acknowledg'd. He little dreamt then that the weeding-hook of Reformation would after two ages pluck up his glorious poppy from inſulting over the good corn. Though ſince ſome of our Britiſh Prelats, ſeeing themſelves preſt to produce Scripture, try all their cunning, if the New Teſtament will not help them, to frame of their own heads as it were with wax a kind of Mimick Biſhop limm'd out to the life of a dead Prieſthood: Or elſe they would ſtrain us out a certain figurative Prelat, by wringing the collective allegory of thoſe ſeven Angels into ſeven ſingle Rochets. Howſoever ſince it thus appears that cuſtom was the creator of Prelaty, being leſs ancient then the government of Presbyters, it is an extreme folly to give them the hearing that tell us of Biſhops through ſo many ages: and if againſt their tedious muſter of Citations, Sees, and Succeſſions, it be reply'd that wagers and Church antiquities, ſuch as are repugnant to the plain dictat of Scripture, are both alike the arguments of fools, they have their anſwer. We rather are to cite all thoſe ages to an arraignment before the Word of God, wherefore, and what pretending, how preſuming they durſt alter that divine Inſtitution of Presbyters, which the Apoſtles who were no various and inconſtant men ſurely had ſet up in the Churches; and why they chuſe to live by cuſtom and catalogue, or as St. Paul ſaith by ſight and viſibility, rather then by faith? But firſt I conclude from their own mouths, that God's command in Scripture, which doubtleſs ought to be the firſt and greateſt reaſon of Church-government, is wanting to Prelaty. And certainly we have plenteous warrant in the doctrine of Chriſt to determine that the want of this reaſon is of it ſelf ſufficient to confute all other pretences that may be brought in favour of it.

CHAP. VI.

That Prelaty was not ſet up for prevention of Schiſm, as is pretended; or if it were, that it performs not what it was firſt ſet up for, but quite the contrary.

YET becauſe it hath the outſide of a ſpecious reaſon, and ſpecious things we know are apteſt to work with humane lightneſs and frailty, even againſt the ſolideſt truth that ſounds not plauſibly, let us think it worth the examining for the love of infirmer Chriſtians, of what importance this their ſecond reaſon may be. Tradition they ſay hath taught them, that for the prevention of growing Schiſm the Biſhop was heav'd above the Presbyter. And muſt Tradition then ever thus to the world's end be the perpetual canker-worm to eat out God's Commandments? are his decrees ſo inconſiderate and ſo fickle, that when the ſtatutes of Solon or Lycurgus ſhall prove durably good to many ages, his in forty years ſhall be found defective, ill contriv'd, and for needful cauſes to be alter'd? Our Saviour and his Apoſtles did not only foreſee, but foretel and forewarn us to look for Schiſm. Is it a thing to be imagin'd of God's wiſdom, or at leaſt of Apoſtolic prudence, to ſet up ſuch a Government in the tenderneſs of the Church, as ſhould incline, or not be more able then any other to oppoſe it ſelf to Schiſm? It was well known what a bold lurker Schiſm was, even in the houſhold of Chriſt, between his own Diſciples and thoſe of John the Baptiſt about faſting: and early in the Acts of the Apoſtles the noiſe of Schiſm had almoſt drown'd the proclaiming of the Goſpel; yet we read not in Scripture that any thought was had of making Prelats, no not in thoſe places where diſſention was moſt rife. If Prelaty had been then eſteem'd a remedy againſt Schiſm, where was it more needful then in that great variance among the Corinthians which St. Paul ſo labour'd to reconcile? and whoſe eye could have found the fitteſt remedy ſooner then his? and what could have made the remedy more available, then to have us'd it ſpeedily? And laſtly, what could have been more neceſſary then to have written it for our inſtruction? yet we ſee he neither commended it to us, nor us'd it himſelf. For the ſame diviſion remaining there, or elſe burſting forth again more then twenty years after St. Paul's death, we find in Clement's Epiſtle of venerable Autority, written to the yet factious Corinthians, that they were ſtill govern'd by Presbyters. And the ſame of other Churches out of Hermas, and divers other the ſcholers of the Apoſtles, by the late induſtry of the learned Salmaſius appears. Neither yet did this worthy Clement, St. Paul's Diſciple, though writing to them to lay aſide Schiſm, in the leaſt word adviſe them to change the Presbyterian Government into Prelaty. And therefore if God afterward gave or permitted this inſurrection of Epiſcopacy, it is to be fear'd he did it in his wrath, as he gave the Iſraelites a King. With ſo good a will doth he uſe to alter his own choſen Government once eſtabliſh'd. For mark whether this rare device of mans brain, thus preferr'd before the Ordinance of God, had better ſucceſs then fleſhly wiſdom, not counſelling with God, is wont to have. So far was it from removing Schiſm, that if Schiſm parted the Congregations before, now it rent and mangl'd, now it rag'd. Hereſie begat Hereſie with a certain monſtrous haſte of pregnancy in her birth, at once born and bringing forth. Contentions, before brotherly, were now hoſtile. Men went to chooſe their Biſhop as they went to a pitcht field, and the day of his election was like the ſacking of a City, ſometimes ended with the blood of thouſands. Nor this among Hereticks only, but men of the ſame belief, yea Confeſſors, and that with ſuch odious ambition, that Euſebius in his eighth Book teſtifies he abhorr'd to write. And the reaſon is not obſcure, for the poor dignity, or rather burden, of a Parochial Presbyter could not ingage any great party, nor that to any deadly feud: but Prelaty was a power of that extent and ſway, that if her election were popular, it was ſeldom not the cauſe of ſome faction or broil in the Church. But if her dignity came by favour of ſome Prince, ſhe was from that time his creature, and obnoxious to comply with his ends in ſtate, were they right or wrong. So that inſtead of finding Prelaty an impeacher of Schiſm or Faction, the more I ſearch the more I grow into all perſwaſion to think rather that faction and ſhe, as with a ſpouſal ring, are wedded together, never to be divorc'd. But here let every one behold the juſt and dreadful judgment of God meeting with the audacious pride of man that durſt offer to mend the ordinances of Heaven. God out of the ſtrife of men brought forth by his Apoſtles to the Church that beneficent and ever diſtributing office of Deacons, the Stewards and Miniſters of holy alms: Man, out of the pretended care of peace and unity, being caught in the ſnare of his impious boldneſs to correct the will of Chriſt, brought forth to himſelf upon the Church that irreconcileable Schiſm of Perdition and Apoſtacy, the Roman Antichriſt; for that the exaltation of the Pope aroſe out of the reaſon of Prelaty, it cannot be deny'd. And as I noted before, that the pattern of the High Prieſt pleaded for in the Goſpel (for take away the head Prieſt, the reſt are but a carcaſs) ſets up with better reaſon a Pope then an Archbiſhop; for if Prelaty muſt ſtill riſe and riſe till it come to a Primat, why ſhould it ſtay there? whenas the Catholick Government is not to follow the diviſion of Kingdoms, the Temple beſt repreſenting the univerſal Church, and the High Prieſt the univerſal Head: ſo I obſerve here, that if to quiet Schiſm there muſt be one head of Prelaty in a Land, or Monarchy, riſing from a provincial to a national Primacy, there may upon better grounds of repreſſing Schiſm be ſet up one Catholick head over the Catholick Church. For the peace and good of the Church is not terminated in the ſchiſmleſs eſtate of one or two Kingdoms, but ſhould be provided for by the joint conſultation of all reformed Chriſtendom: that all controverſie may end in the final pronounce or canon of one Arch-primat or Proteſtant Pope. Although by this means, for ought I ſee, all the diameters of Schiſm may as well meet and be knit up in the center of one grand falſhood. Now let all impartial men arbitrate what goodly inference theſe two main reaſons of the Prelats have, that by a natural league of conſequence make more for the Pope then for themſelves; yea, to ſay more home, are the very womb for a new Subantichriſt to breed in, if it be not rather the old force and power of the ſame man of ſin counterfeiting Proteſtant. It was not the prevention of Schiſm, but it was Schiſm it ſelf, and the hateful thirſt of Lording in the Church that firſt beſtow'd a being upon Prelaty; this was the true cauſe, but the pretence is ſtill the ſame. The Prelats, as they would have it thought, are the only mawls of Schiſm. Forſooth if they be put down, a deluge of innumerable Sects will follow; we ſhall be all Browniſts, Familiſts, Anabaptiſts. For the word Puritan ſeems to be quaſht, and all that heretofore were counted ſuch, are now Browniſts. And thus do they raiſe an evil report upon the expected reforming Grace that God hath bid us hope for, like thoſe faithleſs ſpies, whoſe carcaſſes ſhall periſh in the wilderneſs of their own confuſed ignorance, and never taſte the good of Reformation. Do they keep away Schiſm? if to bring a num and chill ſtupidity of Soul, an unactive blindneſs of mind upon the people by their leaden Doctrine, or no Doctrine at all; if to perſecute all knowing and zealous Chriſtians by the violence of their Courts, be to keep away Schiſm, they keep away Schiſm indeed: and by this kind of Diſcipline all Italy and Spain is as purely and politickly kept from Schiſm as England hath been by them. With as good a plea might the dead-palſie boaſt to a man, 'tis I that free you from ſtitches and pains, and the troubleſome feeling of cold and heat, of wounds and ſtrokes; if I were gone, all theſe would moleſt you. The winter might as well vaunt it ſelf againſt the Spring, I deſtroy all noyſome and rank weeds, I keep down all peſtilent vapours; yes, and all wholeſome herbs, and all freſh dews, by your violent and hide-bound froſt: but when the gentle weſt winds ſhall open the fruitful boſom of the Earth, thus over-girded by your impriſonment, then the flowers put forth and ſpring, and then the Sun ſhall ſcatter the miſts, and the manuring hand of the tiller ſhall root up all that burdens the ſoil without thank to your bondage. But far worſe then any frozen captivity is the bondage of Prelats, for that other, if it keep down any thing which is good within the Earth, ſo doth it likewiſe that which is ill; but theſe let out freely the ill, and keep down the good, or elſe keep down the leſſer ill, and let out the greateſt. Be aſham'd at laſt to tell the Parlament, ye curb Schiſmaticks, whenas they know ye cheriſh and ſide with Papiſts, and are now as it were one party with them, and 'tis ſaid they help to petition for ye. Can we believe that your Government ſtrains in good earneſt at the petty gnats of Schiſm, whenas we ſee it makes nothing to ſwallow the Camel Hereſie of Rome, but that indeed your throats are of the right Phariſaical ſtrain? Where are thoſe Schiſmaticks with whom the Prelats hold ſuch hot skirmiſh? ſhew us your Acts, thoſe glorious Annals which your Courts of loathed memory lately deceas'd have left us? Thoſe Schiſmaticks I doubt me will be found the moſt of them ſuch as whoſe only Schiſm was to have ſpoke the truth againſt your high abominations and cruelties in the Church; this is the Schiſm ye hate moſt, the removal of your criminous Hierarchy. A politick Government of yours, and of a pleaſant conceit, ſet up to remove thoſe as a pretended Schiſm, that would remove you as a palpable Hereſie in Government. If the Schiſm would pardon ye that, ſhe might go jagg'd in as many cuts and ſlaſhes as ſhe pleas'd for you. As for the rending of the Church, we have many reaſons to think it is not that which ye labour to prevent ſo much as the rending of your pontifical ſleeves: that Schiſm would be the ſoreſt Schiſm to you, that would be Browniſm and Anabaptiſm indeed. If we go down, ſay you, as if Adrian's wall were broke, a flood of Sects will ruſh in. What Sects? What are their opinions? give us the Inventory; it will appear both by your former proſecutions and your preſent inſtances, that they are only ſuch to ſpeak of as are offended with your lawleſs Government, your Ceremonies, your Liturgy, an extract of the Maſs-book tranſlated. But that they ſhould be contemners of publick prayer, and Churches us'd without ſuperſtition, I truſt God will manifeſt it e're long to be as falſe a ſlander, as your former ſlanders againſt the Scots. Noiſe it till ye be hoarſe, that a rabble of Sects will come in; it will be anſwer'd ye, No rabble Sir Prieſt, but a unanimous multitude of good Proteſtants will then join to the Church, which now becauſe of you ſtand ſeparated. This will be the dreadful conſequence of your removal. As for thoſe terrible names of Sectaries and Schiſmaticks which ye have got together, we know your manner of fight, when the quiver of your arguments, which is ever thin, and weakly ſtor'd, after the firſt brunt is quite empty, your courſe is to betake ye to your other quiver of ſlander, wherein lies your beſt archery. And whom ye could not move by ſophiſtical arguing, them you think to confute by ſcandalous miſnaming; thereby inciting the blinder ſort of people to miſlike and deride ſound Doctrine and good Chriſtianity, under two or three vile and hateful terms. But if we could eaſily indure and diſſolve your doubtieſt reaſons in argument, we ſhall more eaſily bear the worſt of your unreaſonableneſs in calumny and falſe report: Eſpecially being foretold by Chriſt, that if he our Maſter were by your predeceſſors call'd Samaritan and Belzebub, we muſt not think it ſtrange if his beſt Diſciples in the Reformation, as at firſt by thoſe of your Tribe they were call'd Lollards and Huſſites, ſo now by you be term'd Puritans and Browniſts. But my hope is, that the people of England will not ſuffer themſelves to be juggl'd thus out of their Faith and Religion by a miſt of names caſt before their eyes, but will ſearch wiſely by the Scriptures, and look quite through this fraudulent aſperſion of a diſgraceful name into the things themſelves: knowing that the Primitive Chriſtians in their times were accounted ſuch as are now call'd Familiſts and Adamites, or worſe. And many on the Prelatick ſide, like the Church of Sardis, have a name to live, and yet are dead; to be Proteſtants, and are indeed Papiſts in moſt of their principles. Thus perſwaded, this your old fallacy we ſhall ſoon unmask, and quickly apprehend how you prevent Schiſm, and who are your Schiſmaticks. But what if ye prevent and hinder all good means of preventing Schiſm? That way which the Apoſtles us'd, was to call a Council; from which by any thing that can be learnt from the fifteenth of the Acts, no faithful Chriſtian was debarr'd, to whom knowledg and piety might give entrance. Of ſuch a Council as this every parochial Conſiſtory is a right homogeneous and conſtituting part, being in it ſelf as it were a little Synod, and towards a general Aſſembly moving upon her own baſis in an even and firm progreſſion, as thoſe ſmaller Squares in battel unite in one great Cube, the main Phalanx, an emblem of truth and ſtedfaſtneſs. Whereas on the other ſide Prelaty aſcending by a gradual monarchy from Biſhop to Archbiſhop, from thence to Primat, and from thence, for there can be no reaſon yielded neither in Nature, nor in Religion, wherefore, if it have lawfully mounted thus high, it ſhould not be a Lordly Aſcendant in the Horoſcope of the Church, from Primat to Patriarch, and ſo to Pope: I ſay, Prelaty thus aſcending in a continual pyramid upon pretence to perfect the Churches unity, if notwithſtanding it be found moſt needful, yea the utmoſt help to dearn up the rents of Schiſm by calling a Council, what does it but teach us that Prelaty is of no force to effect this work which ſhe boaſts to be her maſter-piece; and that her pyramid aſpires and ſharpens to ambition, not to perfection or unity? This we know, that as often as any great Schiſm diſparts the Church, and Synods be proclam'd, the Presbyters have as great right there, and as free vote of old, as the Biſhops, which the Canon-law conceals not. So that Prelaty, if ſhe will ſeek to cloſe up diviſions in the Church, muſt be forc't to diſſolve and unmake her own pyramidal figure, which ſhe affirms to be of ſuch uniting power, whenas indeed it is the moſt dividing and ſchiſmatical form that Geometricians know of, and muſt be fain to inglobe or incube her ſelf among the Presbyters; which ſhe hating to do, ſends her haughty Prelats from all parts with their forked Miters, the badg of Schiſm, or the ſtamp of his cloven foot, whom they ſerve I think, who according to their Hierarchies acuminating ſtill higher and higher in a cone of Prelaty, inſtead of healing up the gaſhes of the Church, as it happens in ſuch pointed bodies meeting, fall to gore one another with their ſharp ſpires for upper place and precedence, till the Council it ſelf prove the greateſt Schiſm of all. And thus they are ſo far from hindring diſſention, that they have made unprofitable, and even noyſome, the chiefeſt remedy we have to keep Chriſtendom at one, which is by Councils: and theſe, if we rightly conſider Apoſtolick example, are nothing elſe but general Presbyteries. This ſeem'd ſo far from the Apoſtles to think much of, as if hereby their dignity were impair'd, that, as we may gather by thoſe Epiſtles of Peter and John, which are likely to be lateſt written, when the Church grew to a ſetling, like thoſe heroick Patricians of Rome (if we may uſe ſuch compariſon) haſting to lay down their Dictatorſhip, they rejoyc'd to call themſelves, and to be as Fellow-elders among their Brethren; knowing that their high office was but as the ſcaffolding of the Church yet unbuilt, and would be but a troubleſome disfigurement, ſo ſoon as the building was finiſh'd. But the lofty minds of an age or two after, ſuch was their ſmall diſcerning, thought it a poor indignity, that the high rear'd Government of the Church ſhould ſo on a ſudden, as it ſeem'd to them, ſquat into a Presbytery. Next, or rather before Councils, the timelieſt prevention of Schiſm is to preach the Goſpel abundantly and powerfully throughout all the Land, to inſtruct the Youth religiouſly, to endeavour how the Scriptures may be eaſieſt underſtood by all men; to all which the proceedings of theſe men have been on ſet purpoſe contrary. But how, O Prelats, ſhould you remove Schiſm? and how ſhould you not remove and oppoſe all the means of removing Schiſm? when Prelaty is a Schiſm it ſelf from the moſt reformed and moſt flouriſhing of our neighbour Churches abroad, and a ſad ſubject of diſcord and offence to the whole nation at home. The remedy which you alledge is the very diſeaſe we groan under; and never can be to us a remedy but by removing it ſelf. Your predeceſſors were believ'd to aſſume this pre-eminence above their brethren, only that they might appeaſe diſſention. Now God and the Church calls upon you, for the ſame reaſon, to lay it down, as being to thouſands of good men offenſive, burdenſome, intolerable. Surrender that pledg, which, unleſs you foully uſurpt it, the Church gave you, and now claims it again, for the reaſon ſhe firſt lent it. Diſcharge the truſt committed to you, prevent Schiſm, and that ye can never do, but by diſcharging your ſelves. That Government which ye hold, we confeſs, prevents much, hinders much, removes much; but what? the Schiſms and Grievances of the Church? no, but all the peace and unity, all the welfare not of the Church alone, but of the whole Kingdom. And if it be ſtill permitted ye to hold, will cauſe the moſt ſad, I know not whether Separation be anough to ſay, but ſuch a wide gulph of diſtraction in this Land, as will never cloſe her diſmal gap until ye be forc'd (for of your ſelves ye will never do as that Roman Curtius nobly did) for the Churches peace and your Countries, to leap into the midſt, and be no more ſeen. By this we ſhall know whether yours be that ancient Prelaty which you ſay was firſt conſtituted for the reducement of quiet and unanimity into the Church, for then you will not delay to prefer that above your own preferment. If otherwiſe, we muſt be confident that your Prelaty is nothing elſe but your ambition, an inſolent preferring of your ſelves above your brethren; and all your learned ſcraping in antiquity, even to diſturb the bones of old Aaron and his ſons in their graves, is but to maintain and ſet upon our necks a ſtately and ſevere dignity, which you call ſacred, and is nothing in very deed but a grave and reverent gluttony, a ſanctimonious avarice, in compariſon of which, all the duties and dearneſſes which ye owe to God or to his Church, to Law, Cuſtom, or Nature, ye have reſolv'd to ſet at nought. I could put you in mind what Counſel Clement a Fellow-labourer with the Apoſtles gave to the Presbyters of Corinth, whom the people, though unjuſtly, ſought to remove. Who among you, ſaith he, is noble minded, who is pitiful, who is charitable? let him ſay thus, If for me this ſedition, this enmity, theſe differences be, I willingly depart, I go my ways, only let the flock of Chriſt be at peace with the Presbyters that are ſet over it. He that ſhall do this, ſaith he, ſhall get him great honour in the Lord, and all places will receive him. This was Clement's Counſel to good and holy men, that they ſhould depart rather from their juſt office, then by their ſtay to ravle out the ſeamleſs garment of Concord in the Church. But I have better counſel to give the Prelats, and far more acceptable to their ears, this advice in my opinion is fitter for them: Cling faſt to your Pontifical Sees, bate not, quit your ſelves like Barons, ſtand to the utmoſt for your haughty Courts and Votes in Parliament. Still tell us, that you prevent Schiſm, though Schiſm and Combuſtion be the very iſſue of your bodies, your firſt-born; and ſet your Country a bleeding in a Prelatical mutiny, to fight for your pompe, and that ill-favour'd weed of temporal honour that ſits diſhonourably upon your laick ſhoulders, that ye may be fat and fleſhy, ſwoln with high thoughts, and big with miſchievous deſigns, when God comes to viſit upon you all this fourſcore years vexation of his Church under your Egyptian Tyranny. For certainly of all thoſe bleſſed Souls which you have perſecuted, and thoſe miſerable ones which you have loſt, the juſt vengeance does not ſleep.

CHAP. VII.

That thoſe many Sects and Schiſms by ſome ſuppos'd to be among us, and that Rebellion in Ireland, ought not to be a hindrance, but a haſtning of Reformation.

AS for thoſe many Sects and Diviſions rumor'd abroad to be amongſt us, it is not hard to perceive that they are partly the mere fictions and falſe alarms of the Prelats, thereby to caſt amazements and panick terrors into the hearts of weaker Chriſtians, that they ſhould not venture to change the preſent deformity of the Church for fear of I know not what worſe inconveniencies. With the ſame objected fears and ſuſpicions, we know that ſuttle Prelat Gardner ſought to divert the firſt Reformation. It may ſuffice us to be taught by St. Paul, that there muſt be Sects for the manifeſting of thoſe that are ſound-hearted. Theſe are but winds and flaws to try the floting veſſel of our Faith, whether it be ſtanch and ſail well, whether our ballaſt be juſt, our anchorage and cable ſtrong. By this is ſeen who lives by Faith and certain knowledg, and who by credulity and the prevailing opinion of the age, whoſe vertue is of an unchangeable grain, and whoſe of a ſlight waſh. If God come to try our conſtancy, we ought not to ſhrink or ſtand the leſs firmly for that, but paſs on with more ſtedfaſt reſolution to eſtabliſh the Truth, though it were through a lane of Sects and Hereſies on each ſide. Other things men do to the glory of God: but Sects and Errors, it ſeems, God ſuffers to be for the glory of good men, that the world may know and reverence their true fortitude and undaunted conſtancy in the Truth. Let us not therefore make theſe things an incumbrance, or an excuſe of our delay in reforming, which God ſends us as an incitement to proceed with more honour and alacrity. For if there were no oppoſition, where were the trial of an unfained goodneſs and magnanimity? Vertue that wavers is not vertue, but vice revolted from it ſelf, and after a while returning. The actions of juſt and pious men do not darken in their middle courſe; but Solomon tells us, they are as the ſhining light, that ſhineth more and more unto the perfet day. But if we ſhall ſuffer the trifling doubts and jealouſies of future Sects to overcloud the fair beginnings of purpos'd Reformation, let us rather fear that another proverb of the ſame wiſe man be not upraided to us, that the way of the wicked is as darkneſs, they ſtumble at they know not what. If Sects and Schiſms be turbulent in the unſetl'd eſtate of a Church, while it lies under the amending hand, it beſt beſeems our Chriſtian courage to think they are but as the throws and pangs that go before the birth of Reformation, and that the work it ſelf is now in doing. For if we look but on the nature of elemental and mixt things, we know they cannot ſuffer any change of one kind or quality into another, without the ſtruggle of contrarieties. And in things artificial, ſeldom any elegance is wrought without a ſuperfluous waſt and refuſe in the tranſaction. No marble ſtatue can be politely carv'd, no fair edifice built without almoſt as much rubbiſh and ſweeping. Inſomuch that even in the ſpiritual conflict of St. Paul's converſion, there fell ſcales from his eyes that were not perceiv'd before. No wonder then in the reforming of a Church, which is never brought to effect without the fierce encounter of truth and falſhood together, if, as it were the ſplinters and ſhares of ſo violent a jouſting, there fall from between the ſhock many fond errors and fanatick opinions, which when Truth has the upper hand, and the Reformation ſhall be perfeted, will eaſily be rid out of the way, or kept ſo low, as that they ſhall be only the exerciſe of our knowledg, not the diſturbance or interruption of our faith. As for that which Barclay in his image of Minds writes concerning the horrible and barbarous conceits of Engliſhmen in their Religion, I deem it ſpoken like what he was, a fugitive Papiſt, traducing the Iland whence he ſprung. It may be more judiciouſly gather'd from hence, that the Engliſhman of many other Nations is leaſt atheiſtical, and bears a natural diſpoſition of much reverence and awe towards the Deity; but in his weakneſs and want of better inſtruction, which among us too frequently is neglected, eſpecially by the meaner ſort, turning the bent of his own wits, with a ſcrupulous and ceaſeleſs care, what he might do to inform himſelf aright of God and his Worſhip, he may fall not unlikely ſometimes, as any other Land-man, into an uncouth opinion. And verily if we look at his native towardlineſs in the rough caſt without breeding, ſome Nation or other may haply be better compos'd to a natural civility and right judgment then he. But if he get the benefit once of a wiſe and well rectifi'd nurture, which muſt firſt come in general from the godly vigilance of the Church, I ſuppoſe that where-ever mention is made of Countries, Manners, or Men, the Engliſh People among the firſt that ſhall be prais'd, may deſerve to be accounted a right pious, right honeſt, and right hardy Nation. But thus while ſome ſtand dallying and deferring to reform for fear of that which ſhould mainly haſten them forward, leſt Schiſm and Error ſhould encreaſe, we may now thank our ſelves and our delays, if inſtead of Schiſm a bloody and inhumane rebellion be ſtrook in between our ſlow movings. Indeed againſt violent and powerful oppoſition there can be no juſt blame of a lingring diſpatch. But this I urge againſt thoſe that diſcourſe it for a maxim, as if the ſwift opportunities of eſtabliſhing or reforming Religion were to attend upon the fleam of ſtate-buſineſs. In ſtate many things at firſt are crude and hard to digeſt, which only time and deliberation can ſupple and concoct. But in Religion, wherein is no immaturity, nothing out of ſeaſon, it goes far otherwiſe. The door of Grace turns upon ſmooth hinges wide opening to ſend out, but ſoon ſhutting to recal the precious offers of mercy to a Nation: which unleſs watchfulneſs and zeal, two quick-ſighted and ready-handed virgins, be there in our behalf to receive, we looſe: and ſtill the ofter we looſe, the ſtraiter the door opens, and the leſs is offer'd. This is all we get by demurring in God's ſervice. 'Tis not rebellion that ought to be the hindrance of Reformation, but it is the want of this which is the cauſe of that. The Prelats which boaſt themſelves the only bridlers of Schiſm, God knows have been ſo cold and backward both there and with us to repreſs Hereſie and Idolatry, that either through their careleſſneſs or their craft all this miſchief is befaln. What can the Iriſh Subject do leſs in God's juſt diſpleaſure againſt us, then revenge upon Engliſh bodies the little care that our Prelats have had of their Souls? Nor hath their negligence been new in that Iland, but ever notorious in Queen Elizabeth's days, as Camden their known friend forbears not to complain. Yet ſo little are they toucht with remorſe of theſe their cruelties, for theſe cruelties are theirs, the bloody revenge of thoſe Souls which they have famiſh'd, that whenas againſt our brethren the Scots, who by their upright and loyal deeds have now bought themſelves an honourable name to poſterity, whatſoever malice by ſlander could invent, rage in hoſtility attempt, they greedily attempted, toward theſe murdrous Iriſh, the enemies of God and Mankind, a curſed off-ſpring of their own connivance, no man takes notice but that they ſeem to be very calmly and indifferently affected. Where then ſhould we begin to extinguiſh a rebellion that hath its cauſe from the miſgovernment of the Church? where, but at the Churches reformation, and the removal of that Government which purſues and wars with all good Chriſtians under the name of Schiſmaticks, but maintains and foſters all Papiſts and Idolaters as tolerable Chriſtians? And if the ſacred Bible may be our light, we are neither without example, nor the witneſs of God himſelf, that the corrupted eſtate of the Church is both the cauſe of tumult and civil wars, and that to ſtint them, the peace of the Church muſt firſt be ſetl'd. Now for a long ſeaſon, ſaith Azariah to King Aſa, Iſrael hath been without the true God, and without a teaching Prieſt, and without Law: and in thoſe times there was no peace to him that went out, nor to him that came in, but great vexations were upon all the inhabitants of the countries. And Nation was deſtroy'd of Nation, and City of City, for God did vex them with all adverſity. Be ye ſtrong therefore, ſaith he to the Reformers of that age, and let not your hands be weak, for your work ſhall be rewarded. And in thoſe Prophets that liv'd in the times of Reformation after the Captivity, often doth God ſtir up the People to conſider that while eſtabliſhment of Church-matters was neglected, and put off, there was no peace to him that went Zech. 8. out or came in; for I, ſaith God, had ſet all men every one againſt his neighbour. But from the very day forward that they went ſeriouſly and effectually about Hag. 2. the welfare of the Church, he tells them that they themſelves might perceive the ſudden change of things into a proſperous and peaceful condition. But it will here be ſaid that the Reformation is a long work, and the miſeries of Ireland are urgent of a ſpeedy redreſs. They be indeed; and how ſpeedy we are, the poor afflicted remnant of our martyr'd Countrymen that ſit there on the Sea-ſhore, counting the hours of our delay with their ſighs, and the minutes with their falling tears, perhaps with the deſtilling of their bloody wounds, if they have not quite by this time caſt off, and almoſt curſt the vain hope of our founder'd ſhips and aids, can beſt judg how ſpeedy we are to their relief. But let their ſuccours be haſted, as all need and reaſon is; and let not therefore the Reformation, which is the chiefeſt cauſe of ſucceſs and victory, be ſtill procraſtinated. They of the Captivity in their greateſt extremities could find both counſel and hands anough at once to build, and to expect the enemies aſſault. And we for our parts, a populous and mighty Nation, muſt needs be faln into a ſtrange plight either of effeminacy or confuſion, if Ireland, that was once the conqueſt of one ſingle Earl with his private forces, and the ſmall aſſiſtance of a petty Kerniſh Prince, ſhould now take up all the Wiſdom and Proweſs of this potent Monarchy, to quell a barbarous crew of Rebels, whom if we take but the right courſe to ſubdue, that is, beginning at the Reformation of our Church, their own horrid Murders and Rapes will ſo fight againſt them, that the very Sutlers and Horſe-boys of the Camp will be able to rout and chaſe them without the ſtaining of any noble Sword. To proceed by other method in this Enterprize, be our Captains and Commanders never ſo expert, will be as great an Error in the Art of War, as any Novice in Souldierſhip ever committed. And thus I leave it as a declared Truth, that neither the fear of Sects, no nor Rebellion, can be a fit plea to ſtay Reformation, but rather to puſh it forward with all poſſible diligence and ſpeed.

The Second BOOK.

HOW happy were it for this frail, and as it may be truly call'd, mortal Life of Man, ſince all earthly things which have the name of good and convenient in our daily uſe, are withal ſo cumberſome and full of trouble, if Knowledg, yet which is the beſt and lightſomeſt poſſeſſion of the mind, were, as the common ſaying is, no burden; and that what it wanted of being a load to any part of the body, it did not with a heavy advantage overlay upon the Spirit? For not to ſpeak of that Knowledg that reſts in the contemplation of natural Cauſes and Dimenſions, which muſt needs be a lower Wiſdom, as the Object is low, certain it is that he who hath obtain'd in more then the ſcantieſt meaſure to know any thing diſtinctly of God, and of his true Worſhip, and what is infallibly good and happy in the ſtate of man's Life, what in it ſelf evil and miſerable, though vulgarly not ſo eſteem'd; he that hath obtain'd to know this, the only high valuable Wiſdom indeed, remembring alſo that God even to a ſtrictneſs requires the improvement of theſe his entruſted Gifts, cannot but ſuſtain a ſorer burden of mind, and more preſſing then any ſupportable toil or weight which the Body can labour under: how and in what manner he ſhall diſpoſe and employ thoſe ſums of Knowledg and Illumination which God hath ſent him into this world to trade with. And that which aggravats the burden more, is, that having receiv'd amongſt his allotted parcels certain pretious Truths of ſuch an orient luſtre as no Diamond can equal; which nevertheleſs he has in charge to put off at any cheap rate, yea, for nothing to them that will; the great Merchants of this world fearing that this cours would ſoon diſcover, and diſgrace the fals glitter of their deceitful Wares wherewith they abuſe the People, like poor Indians, with Beads and Glaſſes, practize by all means how they may ſuppreſs the venting of ſuch Rarities, and at ſuch a cheapnes as would undo them, and turn their Traſh upon their hands. Therefore by gratifying the corrupt deſires of men in fleſhly Doctrines, they ſtir them up to perſecute with hatred and contempt all thoſe that ſeek to bear themſelves uprightly in this their ſpiritual Factory: which they foreſeeing, though they cannot but teſtify of Truth, and the excellency of that heavenly Traffick which they bring, againſt what oppoſition or danger ſoever, yet needs muſt it ſit heavily upon their Spirits, that being in God's prime Intention and their own, ſelected Heralds of Peace, and diſpenſers of Treaſure ineſtimable, without price to them that have no Pence, they find in the diſcharge of their Commiſſion, that they are made the greateſt Variance and Offence, a very Sword and Fire both in Houſe and City over the whole Earth. This is that which the ſad Profet Jeremiah laments, Wo is me my Mother, that thou haſt born me a man of ſtrife and contention! And although divine Inſpiration muſt certainly have been ſweet to thoſe ancient Profets, yet the irkſomeneſs of that Truth which they brought was ſo unpleaſant unto them, that every where they call it a Burden. Yea that myſterious Book of Revelation, which the great Evangeliſt was bid to eat, as it had been ſome eye-brightning Electuary of Knowledg and Foreſight, though it were ſweet in his Mouth, and in the learning, it was bitter in his belly, bitter in the denouncing. Nor was this hid from the wiſe Poet Sophocles, who in that place of his Tragedy, where Tireſias is call'd to reſolve K. Edipus in a matter which he knew would be grievous, brings him in bemoaning his lot, that he knew more then other men. For ſurely to every good and peaceable Man it muſt in nature needs be a hateful thing to be the diſpleaſer and moleſter of thouſands; much better would it like him doubtleſs to be the Meſſenger of Gladnes and Contentment, which is his chief intended buſineſs to all mankind, but that they reſiſt and oppoſe their own true happineſs. But when God commands to take the Trumpet, and blow a dolorous or a jarring Blaſt, it lies not in man's Will what he ſhall ſay, or what he ſhall conceal. If he ſhall think to be ſilent, as Jeremiah did, becauſe of the reproach and deriſion he met with daily, and all his familiar Friends watcht for his halting, to be reveng'd on him for ſpeaking the Truth, he would be forc't to confeſs as he confeſt; his Word was in my heart as a burning fire ſhut up in my bones; I was weary with forbearing, and could not ſtay. Which might teach theſe times not ſuddenly to condemn all things that are ſharply ſpoken, or vehemently written, as proceeding out of Stomach, Virulence, and ill Nature; but to conſider rather that if the Prelats have leave to ſay the worſt that can be ſaid, and do the worſt that can be done, while they ſtrive to keep to themſelves, to their great pleaſure and commodity, thoſe things which they ought to render up, no man can be juſtly offended with him that ſhall endeavour to impart and beſtow, without any gain to himſelf, thoſe ſharp but ſaving words, which would be a terror and a torment in him to keep back. For me, I have determin'd to lay up as the beſt Treaſure, and ſolace of a good old Age, if God voutſafe it me, the honeſt liberty of free Speech from my Youth, where I ſhall think it available in ſo dear a Concernment as the Churches good. For if I be either by diſpoſition, or what other cauſe, too inquiſitive, or ſuſpicious of my ſelf and mine own doings, who can help it? But this I foreſee, that ſhould the Church be brought under heavy oppreſſion, and God have given me ability the while to reaſon againſt that Man that ſhould be the Author of ſo foul a deed; or ſhould ſhe, by bleſſing from above on the induſtry and courage of faithful Men, change this her diſtracted eſtate into better days, without the leaſt furderance or contribution of thoſe few Talents which God at that preſent had lent me, I foreſee what ſtories I ſhould hear within my ſelf, all my life after, of Diſcourage and Reproach.. Timorous and ingrateful, the Church of God is now again at the foot of her inſulting Enemies, and thou bewailſt; what matters it for thee, or thy bewailing? When time was, thou couldſt not find a ſyllable of all that thou haſt read, or ſtudied, to utter in her behalf. Yet eaſe and leaſure was given thee for thy retired Thoughts, out of the ſweat of other men. Thou hadſt the diligence, the parts, the language of a Man, if a vain Subject were to be adorn'd or beautifi'd; but when the Cauſe of God and his Church was to be pleaded, for which purpoſe that Tongue was given thee which thou haſt, God liſten'd if he could hear thy Voice among his zealous Servants, but thou wert dumb as a beaſt; from hence forward be that which thine own brutiſh ſilence hath made thee. Or elſe I ſhould have heard on the other ear; Slothful, and ever to be ſet light by, the Church hath now overcom her late Diſtreſſes after the unwearied labours of many her true Servants that ſtood up in her defence; thou alſo wouldſt take upon thee to ſhare amongſt them of their joy: But wherefore thou? where canſt thou ſhew any Word or Deed of thine which might have haſten'd her peace? whatever thou doſt now talk, or write, or look, is the Alms of other mens active prudence and zeal. Dare not now to ſay, or do any thing better then thy former ſloth and infancy; or if thou darſt, thou doſt impudently to make a thrifty purchaſe of boldneſs to thy ſelf, out of the painful Merits of other men: what before was thy Sin, is now thy Duty, to be abject and worthleſs. Theſe, and ſuch like leſſons as theſe, I know would have been my Matins daily, and my Even-ſong. But now by this litle diligence, mark what a privilege I have gain'd with good Men and Saints, to claim my right of lamenting the tribulations of the Church, if ſhe ſhould ſuffer, when others that have ventur'd nothing for her ſake, have not the honour to be admitted Mourners. But if ſhe lift up her drooping head and proſper, among thoſe that have ſomething more then wiſht her welfare, I have my charter and freehold of rejoycing to me and my Heirs. Concerning therefore this wayward Subject againſt Prelaty, the touching whereof is ſo diſtaſtful and diſquietous to a number of men, as by what hath been ſaid I may deſerve of charitable Readers to be credited, that neither Envy nor Gall hath enterd me upon this Controverſy, but the enforcement of Conſcience only, and a preventive fear leſt the omitting of this Duty ſhould be againſt me when I would ſtore up to my ſelf the good proviſion of peaceful hours: So leſt it ſhould be ſtill imputed to me, as I have found it hath been, that ſome ſelf-pleaſing humor of vain-glory hath incited me to conteſt with Men of high eſtimation, now while green years are upon my head, from this needleſs ſurmiſal I ſhall hope to diſſwade the intelligent and equal Auditor, if I can but ſay ſuccesfully that which in this Exigent behoovs me, although I would be heard only, if it might be, by the elegant and learned Reader, to whom principally for a while I ſhall beg leave I may addreſs my ſelf. To him it will be no new thing, though I tell him that if I hunted after praiſe, by the oſtentation of Wit and Learning, I ſhould not write thus out of mine own ſeaſon, when I have neither yet compleated to my mind the full Circle of my private ſtudies, although I complain not of any inſufficiency to the matter in hand; or were I ready to my wiſhes, it were a folly to commit any thing elaborately compos'd to the careleſs and interrupted liſtening of theſe tumultuous times. Next, if I were wiſe only to my own ends, I would certainly take ſuch a Subject as of it ſelf might catch applauſe, whereas this hath all the Diſadvantages on the contrary, and ſuch a Subject as the publiſhing whereof might be delay'd at pleaſure, and time enough to pencil it over with all the curious touches of Art, even to the perfection of a faultleſs Picture; whenas in this Argument the not deferring is of great moment to the good ſpeeding, that if Solidity have leiſure to do her office, Art cannot have much. Laſtly, I ſhould not chuſe this manner of writing, wherein knowing my ſelf inferior to my ſelf, led by the genial Power of Nature to another Task, I have the uſe, as I may account it, but of my left hand. And though I ſhall be fooliſh in ſaying more to this purpoſe, yet ſince it will be ſuch a folly, as wiſeſt Men going about to commit, have only confeſt and ſo committed, I may truſt with more reaſon, becauſe with more folly, to have courteous pardon. For although a Poet, ſoaring in the high Region of his Fancies, with his Garland and ſinging Robes about him, might, without Apology, ſpeak more of himſelf then I mean to do; yet for me ſitting here below in the cool Element of Proſe, a mortal thing among many Readers of no Empyreal Conceit, to venture and divulge unuſual things of my ſelf, I ſhall petition to the gentler ſort, it may not be envy to me. I muſt ſay therefore, that after I had from my firſt years, by the ceaſeleſs diligence and care of my Father, whom God recompence, been exercis'd to the Tongues, and ſome Sciences, as my Age would ſuffer, by ſundry Maſters and Teachers both at home and at the Schools, it was found, that whether ought was impos'd me by them that had the overlooking, or betak'n to of mine own choiſe in Engliſh, or other Tongue, proſing or verſing, but chiefly this latter, the ſtile by certain vital Signs it had, was likely to live. But much latelier in the privat Academies of Italy, whither I was favor'd to reſort, perceiving that ſome Trifles which I had in memory, compos'd at under twenty or thereabout (for the manner is, that every one muſt give ſome proof of his wit and reading there) met with acceptance above what was lookt for, and other things which I had ſhifted in ſcarſity of Books and Conveniences to patch up amongſt them, were receiv'd with written Encomiums, which the Italian is not forward to beſtow on men of this ſide the Alps, I began thus far to aſſent both to them and divers of my Friends here at home; and not leſs to an inward prompting which now grew daily upon me, that by labour and intent ſtudy, (which I take to be my portion in this Life) joyn'd with the ſtrong propenſity of Nature, I might perhaps leave ſomething ſo written to after-times, as they ſhould not willingly let it die. Theſe thoughts at once poſſeſt me, and theſe other; That if I were certain to write as men buy Leaſes, for three Lives and downward, there ought no regard be ſooner had then to God's Glory, by the honour and inſtruction of my Country. For which cauſe, and not only for that I knew it would be hard to arrive at the ſecond Rank among the Latines, I apply'd my ſelf to that Reſolution which Arioſto follow'd againſt the perſwaſions of Bembo, to fix all the Induſtry and Art I could unite to the adorning of my native Tongue; not to make verbal Curioſities the end, that were a toylſom Vanity, but to be an Interpreter and Relater of the beſt and ſageſt things among mine own Citizens throughout this Iland in the mother dialect. That what the greateſt and choiceſt Wits of Athens, Rome, or modern Italy, and thoſe Hebrews of old did for their Country, I in my proportion, with this over and above, of being a Chriſtian, might do for mine; not caring to be once nam'd abroad, though perhaps I could attain to that, but content with theſe Britiſh Ilands as my World, whoſe Fortune hath hitherto bin, that if the Athenians, as ſome ſay, made their ſmall Deeds great and renowned by their eloquent writers, England hath had her noble Atchievements made ſmall by the unskilful handling of Monks and Mechanicks.

Time ſerves not now, and perhaps I might ſeem too profuſe to give any certain account of what the mind at home, in the ſpacious circuits of her muſing, hath liberty to propoſe to her ſelf, though of higheſt hope, and hardeſt attempting, whether that Epick form whereof the two Poems of Homer, and thoſe other two of Virgil and Taſſo are a diffuſe, and the Book of Job a brief Model: or whether the rules of Ariſtotle herein are ſtrictly to be kept, or Nature to be follow'd, which in them that know Art, and uſe Judgment, is no tranſgreſſion, but an inriching of Art. And laſtly, what King or Knight before the Conqueſt might be choſen in whom to lay the pattern of a Chriſtian Hero. And as Taſſo gave to a Prince of Italy his chois, whether he would command him to write of Godfreys expedition againſt the Infidels, or Beliſarius againſt the Gothes, or Charlemain againſt the Lombards; if to the inſtinct of Nature and the imboldning of Art ought may be truſted, and that there be nothing advers in our Climat, or the fate of this Age, it haply would be no raſhneſs from an equal diligence and inclination, to preſent the like offer in our own ancient Stories. Or whether thoſe Dramatick Conſtitutions, wherein Sophocles and Euripides raign, ſhall be found more doctrinal and exemplary to a Nation. The Scripture alſo affords us a Divine paſtoral Drama in the Song of Salomon, conſiſting of two Perſons, and a double Chorus, as Origen rightly judges. And the Apocalyps of Saint John is the majeſtick Image of a high and ſtately Tragedy, ſhutting up and intermingling her ſolemn Scenes and Acts with a ſevenfold Chorus of Halleluja's and harping Symphonies: and this my opinion the grave autority of Pareus, commenting that Book, is ſufficient to confirm. Or if occaſion ſhall lead, to imitat thoſe magnifick Odes and Hymns wherein Pindarus and Callimachus are in moſt things worthy, ſome others in their frame judicious, in their matter moſt an end faulty. But thoſe frequent Songs throughout the Law and Prophets beyond all theſe, not in their divine Argument alone, but in the very critical Art of Compoſition, may be eaſily made appear over all the kinds of Lyrick Poeſy, to be incomparable. Theſe abilities, whereſoever they be found, are the inſpired gift of God rarely beſtow'd, but yet to ſome (though moſt abuſe) in every Nation: and are of power, beſide the Office of a Pulpit, to inbreed and cheriſh in a great People the ſeeds of Vertu, and publick Civility, to allay the perturbations of the Mind, and ſet the affections in right tune; to celebrate in glorious and lofty Hymns the Throne and Equipage of Gods Almightineſs, and what he works, and what he ſuffers to be wrought with high Providence in his Church; to ſing victorious Agonies of Martyrs and Saints, the Deeds and Triumphs of juſt and pious Nations, doing valiantly through Faith againſt the enemies of Chriſt; to deplore the general relapſes of Kingdoms and States from juſtice and Gods true worſhip. Laſtly, whatſoever in Religion is holy and ſublime, in Vertu amiable or grave, whatſoever hath Paſſion or Admiration in all the changes of that which is call'd Fortune from without, or the wily ſuttleties and refluxes of mans thoughts from within; all theſe things with a ſolid and treatable ſmoothneſs to paint out and deſcribe. Teaching over the whole Book of Sanctity and Vertu, through all the inſtances of Example, with ſuch delight to thoſe, eſpecially of ſoft and delicious Temper, who will not ſo much as look upon Truth her ſelf, unleſs they ſee her elegantly dreſt;

that whereas the Paths of honeſty and good Life appear now rugged and difficult, though they be indeed eaſy and pleaſant, they would then appear to all men both eaſy and pleaſant, though they were rugged and difficult indeed. And what a benefit this would be to our Youth and Gentry, may be ſoon gueſt by what we know of the Corruption and Bane which they ſuck in daily from the writings and interludes of libidinous and ignorant Poetaſters, who having ſcars ever heard of that which is the main conſiſtence of a true Poem, the choys of ſuch Perſons as they ought to introduce, and what is moral and decent to each one, do for the moſt part lap up vitious Principles in ſweet Pils to be ſwallow'd down, and make the taſt of vertuous Documents harſh and ſowr. But becauſe the Spirit of man cannot demean it ſelf lively in this Body without ſome recreating intermiſſion of Labour, and ſerious things, it were happy for the Commonwealth, if our Magiſtrates, as in thoſe famous Governments of old, would take into their care, not only the deciding of our contentious Law-Caſes and Brauls, but the managing of our publick Sports, and feſtival Paſtimes, that they might be, not ſuch as were autoriz'd a while ſince, the provocations of Drunkenneſs and Luſt, but ſuch as may inure and harden our Bodies by Martial exerciſes to all warlike skil and performance; and may civilize, adorn, and make diſcreet our Minds by the learned and affable meeting of frequent Academies, and the procurement of wiſe and artful recitations, ſweetned with eloquent and graceful inticements to the love and practice of Juſtice, Temperance and Fortitude, inſtructing and bettering the Nation at all opportunities, that the call of Wiſdom and Vertu may be heard every where, as Solomon ſaith, She crieth without, ſhe uttereth her voice in the Streets, in the top of high places, in the chief concours, and in the openings of the Gates: Whether this may not be not only in Pulpits, but after another perſwaſive method, at ſet and ſolemn Paneguries, in Theaters, Porches, or what other place or way, may win moſt upon the People to receive at once both Recreation, and Inſtruction; let them in authority conſult. The thing which I had to ſay, and thoſe Intentions which have liv'd within me ever ſince I could conceive my ſelf any thing worth to my Country, I return to crave excuſe that urgent Reaſon hath pluckt from me, by an abortive and foredated diſcovery. And the accompliſhment of them lies not but in a power above mans to promiſe; but that none hath by more ſtudious ways endeavour'd, and with more unwearied Spirit that none ſhall, that I dare almoſt aver of my ſelf, as far as life and free leaſure will extend; and that the Land had once infranchis'd her ſelf from this impertinent yoke of Prelaty, under whoſe inquiſitorius and tyrannical duncery, no free and ſplendid Wit can flouriſh. Neither do I think it ſhame to covenant with any knowing Reader, that for ſome few years yet I may go on truſt with him toward the payment of what I am now indebted, as being a work not to be rais'd from the heat of Youth, or the vapours of Wine; like that which flows at waſt from the Pen of ſome vulgar Amoriſt, or the trencher fury of a riming Paraſite; nor to be obtain'd by the invocation of Dame Memory and her Siren Daughters, but by devout Prayer to that eternal Spirit, who can enrich with all utterance and knowledg, and ſends out his Seraphim, with the hallow'd Fire of his Altar, to touch and purify the Lips of whom he pleaſes: to this muſt be added induſtrious and ſelect Reading, ſteddy Obſervation, inſight into all ſeemly and generous Arts and Affairs; till which in ſome meaſure be compaſt, at mine one peril and coſt, I refuſe not to ſuſtain this expectation from as many as are not loth to hazard ſo much credulity upon the beſt Pledges that I can give them. Although it nothing content me to have diſclos'd thus much before hand, but that I truſt hereby to make it manifeſt with what ſmall willingneſs I endure to interrupt the purſuit of no leſs hopes then theſe, and leave a calm and pleaſing Solitarines, fed with cherful and confident thoughts, to imbark in a troubl'd Sea of noiſes and hoars Diſputes, from beholding the bright countenance of Truth, in the quiet and ſtill Air of delightful Studies, to come into the dim reflection of hollow Antiquities ſold by the ſeeming bulk, and there be fain to club quotations with men whoſe learning and belief lies in marginal ſtuffings; who when they have, like good ſumpters, laid ye down their horſ-load of Citations and Fathers at your door, with a Rapſody of who and who were Biſhops here or there, ye may take off their Packſaddles, their days work is don, and Epiſcopacy, as they think, ſtoutly vindicated. Let any gentle Apprehenſion that can diſtinguiſh learned Pains from unlearned Drudgery, imagin what pleaſure or profoundneſs can be in this, or what honour to deal againſt ſuch Adverſaries. But were it the meaneſt under-ſervice, if God by his ſecretary Conſcience injoin it, it were ſad for me if I ſhould draw back, for me eſpecially; now when all men offer their aid to help, eaſe and lighten the difficult labours of the Church, to whoſe ſervice, by the intentions of my Parents and Friends, I was deſtin'd of a Child, and in mine own reſolutions, till coming to ſome maturity of years, and perceiving what Tyranny had invaded the Church, that he who would take Orders muſt ſubſcribe ſlave, and take an Oath withal; which unleſs he took with a Conſcience that would retch, he muſt either ſtrait perjure, or ſplit his Faith; I thought it better to prefer a blameleſs ſilence before the ſacred Office of ſpeaking, bought and begun with ſervitude and forſwearing. Howſoever thus Church-outed by the Prelats, hence may appear the right I have to meddle in theſe matters, as before the neceſſity and conſtraint appear'd.

CHAP. I.

That Prelaty oppoſeth the reaſon and end of the Goſpel three ways, and firſt in her outward Form.

AFter this digreſſion, it would remain that I ſhould ſingle out ſome other reaſon which might undertake for Prelaty to be a fit and lawful Church-Government; but finding none of like validity with theſe that have alredy ſped according to their fortune, I ſhall add one reaſon why it is not to be thought a Church-Government at all, but a Church-Tyranny, and is at hoſtile Terms with the end and reaſon of Chriſts Evangelick Miniſtry. Albeit I muſt confeſs to be half in doubt whether I ſhould bring it forth or no, it being ſo contrary to the eye of the World, and the World ſo potent in moſt mens Hearts, that I ſhall endanger either not to be regarded, or not to be underſtood: For who is there almoſt that meaſures Wiſdom by ſimplicity, Strength by ſuffering, Dignity by lowlineſs? who is there that counts it firſt to be laſt, ſomthing to be nothing, and reckons himſelf of great command in that he is a Servant? Yet God when he meant to ſubdue the World and Hell at once, part of that to Salvation, and this wholy to Perdition, made chois of no other Weapons, or Auxiliaries then theſe, whether to ſave or to deſtroy. It had been a ſmall Maiſtery for him to have drawn out his Legions into array, and flankt them with his Thunder; therefore he ſent Fooliſhneſs to confute Wiſdom, Weakneſs to bind Strength, Deſpiſedneſs to vanquiſh Pride: And this is the great myſtery of the Goſpel made good in Chriſt himſelf, who as he teſtifies came not to be miniſter'd to, but to miniſter; and muſt be fulfil'd in all his Miniſters till his ſecond coming. To go againſt theſe principles St. Paul ſo fear'd, that if he ſhould but affect the Wiſdom of words in his preaching, he thought it would be laid to his charge, that he had made the Croſs of Chriſt to be of none effect. Whether then Prelaty do not make of none effect the Croſs of Chriſt, by the principles it hath ſo contrary to theſe, nullifying the power and end of the Goſpel, it ſhall not want due proof, if it want not due belief. Neither ſhall I ſtand to trifle with one that will tell me of Quiddities and Formalities, whether Prelaty or Prelateity in abſtract notion be this or that; it ſuffices me that I find it in his Skin, ſo I find it inſeparable, or not oftner otherwiſe then a Phenix hath bin ſeen: although I perſwade me that whatever faultines was but ſuperficial to Prelaty at the beginning, is now by the juſt Judgment of God, long ſince branded and inworn into the very eſſence thereof. Firſt therefore, if to do the work of the Goſpel, Chriſt our Lord took upon him the form of a Servant; how can his Servant in this Miniſtry take upon him the form of a Lord? I know Bilſon hath decipher'd us all the galanteries of Signore and Monſignore, and Monſieur, as circumſtantially as any punctualiſt of Caſteel, Naples, or Fountain-Bleau could have done: but this muſt not ſo complement us out of our right minds, as to be to learn that the form of a Servant was a mean, laborious, and vulgar Life apteſt to teach; which form Chriſt thought fitteſt, that he might bring about his Will according to his own Principles, chooſing the meaner things of this World, that he might put under the high. Now whether the pompous Garb, the lordly Life, the Wealth, the haughty diſtance of Prelaty be thoſe meaner things of the World, whereby God in them would manage the myſtery of his Goſpel, be it the verdit of common ſenſe. For Chriſt ſaith in St. John, The Servant is not greater then his Lord, nor he that is ſent greater then he that ſent him; and adds, If ye know theſe things, happy are ye if ye do them. Then let the Prelats well adviſe, if they neither know, nor do theſe things, or if they know, and yet do them not, wherein their Happineſs conſiſts. And thus is the Goſpel fruſtrated by the Lordly form of Prelaty.

CHAP. II.

That the ceremonius doctrin of Prelaty oppoſeth the reaſon and end of the Goſpel.

THAT which next declares the heavenly Power, and reveals the deep myſtery of the Goſpel, is the pure ſimplicity of Doctrine, accounted the fooliſhneſs of this World, yet croſſing and confounding the Pride and Wiſdom of the Fleſh. And wherein conſiſts this fleſhly Wiſdom and Pride? in being altogether ignorant of God and his Worſhip? No ſurely, for Men are naturally aſham'd of that. Where then? It conſiſts in a bold preſumption of ordering the Worſhip and Service of God after mans own Will in Traditions and Ceremonies. Now if the Pride and Wiſdom of the Fleſh were to be defeated and confounded, no doubt but in that very point wherein it was proudeſt, and thought it ſelf wiſeſt, that ſo the victory of the Goſpel might be the more illuſtrious. But our Prelats, inſtead of expreſſing the ſpiritual Power of their Miniſtry, by warring againſt this chief bulwark and ſtrong hold of the Fleſh, have enter'd into faſt League with the principal Enemy againſt whom they were ſent, and turn'd the ſtrength of fleſhly Pride and Wiſdom againſt the pure ſimplicity of ſaving Truth. Firſt, miſtruſting to find the Autority of their Order in the immediat Inſtitution of Chriſt, or his Apoſtles, by the clear evidence of Scripture, they fly to the carnal ſupportment of Tradition; when we appeal to the Bible, they to the unweildy Volumes of Tradition: And do not ſhame to reject the Ordinance of him that is eternal, for the pervers iniquity of ſixteen hundred Years; chooſing rather to think Truth it ſelf a Liar, then that ſixteen Ages ſhould be taxt with an error; not conſidering the general Apoſtaſy that was foretold, and the Churches flight into the Wildernes. Nor is this anough; inſtead of ſhewing the reaſon of their lowly Condition from divine example and command, they ſeek to prove their high pre-eminence from human Conſent and Authority. But let them chaunt while they will of Prerogatives, we ſhall tell them of Scripture; of Cuſtom, we of Scripture; of Acts and Statutes, ſtill of Scripture; till the quick and pearcing Word enter to the dividing of their Souls, and the mighty weaknes of the Goſpel throw down the weak mightines of mans reaſoning. Now for their demeanor within the Church, how have they disfigur'd and defac't that, more then angelick brightneſs, the unclouded ſerenity of Chriſtian Religion, with the dark overcaſting of ſuperſtitious Coaps and flaminical Veſtures, wearing on their Backs, and I abhor to think, perhaps in ſome worſe Place, the unexpreſſible Image of God the Father? Tell me ye Prieſts, wherefore this Gold, wherefore theſe Robes and Surplices over the Goſpel? Is our Religion guilty of the firſt Treſpaſs, and hath need of cloathing to cover her Nakedneſs? What does this elſe but caſt an ignominy upon the perfection of Chriſts miniſtry, by ſeeking to adorn it with that which was the poor remedy of our Shame? Believe it, wondrous Doctors, all corporeal reſemblances of inward Holineſs and Beauty are now paſt; he that will cloath the Goſpel now, intimates plainly, that the Goſpel is naked, uncomely, that I may not ſay reproachful. Do not, ye Church-maſkers, while Chriſt is clothing upon our Barenes with his righteous Garment, to make us acceptable in his Fathers ſight; do not, as ye do, cover and hide his righteous verity with the polluted clothing of your Ceremonies, to make it ſeem more decent in your own eyes. How beautiful, ſaith Iſaiah, are the Feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publiſheth Salvation! Are the feet ſo beautiful, and is the very bringing of theſe tidings ſo decent of it ſelf? What new Decency then can be added to this by your ſpinſtry? Ye think by theſe gaudy gliſterings to ſtir up the devotion of the rude Multitude; ye think ſo, becauſe ye forſake the heavenly teaching of S. Paul for the helliſh Sophiſtry of Papiſm. If the Multitude be rude, the lips of the Preacher muſt give Knowledg, and not Ceremonies. And although ſome Chriſtians be new born Babes comparatively to ſome that are ſtronger, yet in reſpect of Ceremony, which is but the rudiment of the Law, the weakeſt Chriſtian hath thrown off the robes of his Minority, and is a perfect man, as to legal Rites. What childrens food there is in the Goſpel we know to be no other than the ſincerity of the Word, that they may grow thereby. But is here the utmoſt of your outbraving the ſervice of God? No. Ye have bin bold, not to ſet your threſhold by his threſhold, or your poſts by his poſts, but your Sacrament, your Sign, call it what you will, by his Sacrament, baptizing the Chriſtian Infant with a ſolemn ſprinkle, and unbaptizing for your own part with a profane and impious forefinger: as if when ye had laid the purifying element upon his Forehead, ye meant to cancel and croſs it out again with a caracter not of Gods bidding. O but the innocence of theſe Ceremonies! O rather the ſottiſh abſurdity of this excuſe! What could be more innocent than the waſhing of a cup, a glaſs, or hands before meat, and that under the Law when ſo many Waſhings were commanded, and by long tradition? yet our Saviour deteſted their Cuſtoms, though never ſo ſeeming harmleſs, and charges them ſeverely that they had tranſgreſt the Commandments of God by their traditions, and worſhipt him in vain. How much more then muſt theſe, and much groſſer Ceremonies now in force delude the end of Chriſt's coming in the fleſh againſt the fleſh, and ſtifle the ſincerity of our new Cov'nant, which hath bound us to forſake all carnal Pride and Wiſdom, eſpecially in matters of Religion? Thus we ſee again how Prelaty, ſailing in oppoſition to the main end and power of the Goſpel, doth not join in that miſterious Work of Chriſt, by lowlineſs to confound height, by ſimplicity of doctrin the wiſdom of the world, but contrariwiſe hath made it ſelf high in the world and the fleſh, to vanquiſh things by the world accounted low, and made it ſelf wiſe in tradition and fleſhly ceremony, to confound the purity of doctrin which is the Wiſdom of God.

CHAP. III.

That Prelatical Juriſdiction oppoſeth the reaſon and end of the Goſpel and of State.

THe third and laſt Conſideration remains, whether the Prelats in their function do work according to the Goſpel, practizing to ſubdue the mighty things of this world by things weak, which S. Paul hath ſet forth to be the power and excellence of the Goſpel; or whether in more likelihood they band themſelves with the prevalent things of this world, to over-run the weak things which Chriſt hath made choice to work by; and this will ſooneſt be diſcern'd by the cours of their Juriſdiction. But here again I find my thoughts almoſt in ſuſpenſe betwixt yea and no, and am nigh turning mine eye which way I may beſt retire, and not proceed in this ſubject, blaming the ardency of my mind that fixt me too attentively to come thus far. For Truth, I know not how, hath this unhappineſs fatal to her, ere ſhe can come to the trial and inſpection of the Underſtanding; being to paſs through many little wards and limits of the ſeveral Affections and Deſires, ſhe cannot ſhift it, but muſt put on ſuch colours and attire, as thoſe pathetical handmaids of the Soul pleaſe to lead her in to their Qneen: And if ſhe find ſo much favour with them, they let her paſs in her own likeneſs; if not, they bring her into the preſence habited and colour'd like a notorious falſhood. And contrary when any Falſhood comes that way, if they like the errand ſhe brings, they are ſo artful to counterfeit the very ſhape and viſage of Truth, that the Underſtanding not being able to diſcern the fucus which theſe Inchantreſſes with ſuch cunning have laid upon the feature ſometimes of Truth, ſometimes of Falſhood interchangeably, ſentences for the moſt part one for the other at the firſt bluſh, according to the ſuttle impoſture of theſe ſenſual miſtreſſes that keep the ports and paſſages between her and the object. So that were it not for leaving imperfect that which is already ſaid, I ſhould go near to relinquiſh that which is to follow. And becauſe I ſee that moſt Men, as it happens in this world, either weakly or falſly principl'd, what through ignorance, and what through cuſtom of licence, both in diſcours and writing, by what hath bin of late written in vulgar, have not ſeem'd to attain the deciſion of this point, I ſhall likewiſe aſſay thoſe wily Arbitreſſes who in moſt men have, as was heard, the ſole uſhering of Truth and Falſhood between the ſenſe and the ſoul, with what loyalty they will uſe me in convoying this Truth to my underſtanding; the rather for that by as much acquaintance as I can obtain with them, I do not find them engag'd either one way or other. Concerning therefore Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, I find ſtill more controverſie, who ſhould adminiſter it; then diligent enquiry made to learn what it is, for had the pains bin taken to ſearch out that, it had bin long ago enroul'd to be nothing elſe but a pure tyrannical forgery of the Prelats; and that juriſdictive power in the Church there ought to be none at all. It cannot be conceiv'd that what men now call Juriſdiction in the Church, ſhould be other thing then a Chriſtian Cenſorſhip; and therefore is it moſt commonly and truly nam'd Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure. Now if the Roman Cenſor, a civil function, to that ſevere aſſize of ſurvaying and controuling the privateſt and ſlieſt manners of all men and all degrees, had no Juriſdiction, no courts of Plea, or Inditement, no punitive force annext; whether it were that to this manner of correction the intanglement of ſuits was improper, or that the notice of thoſe upright Inquiſitors extended to ſuch the moſt covert and ſpiritous vices as would ſlip eaſily between the wider and more material graſp of the Law; or that it ſtood more with the Majeſty of that Office to have no other Serjeants or Maces about them but thoſe inviſible ones of Terror and Shame: Or laſtly, were it their fear, leſt the greatneſs of this Autority and Honour, arm'd with Juriſdiction, might ſtep with eaſe into a Tyranny: In all theſe reſpects, with much more reaſon undoubtedly, ought the cenſure of the Church be quite deveſted and diſintal'd of all Juriſdiction whatſoever. For if the cours of Judicature to a political Cenſorſhip ſeem either too tedious, or too contentious, much more may it to the diſcipline of the Church, whoſe definitive decrees are to be ſpeedy, but the execution of rigour ſlow, contrary to what in legal proceedings is moſt uſual; and by how much the leſs contentious it is, by ſo much will it be the more Chriſtian. And if the Cenſor in his moral Epiſcopy, being to judg moſt in matters not anſwerable by writ or action, could not uſe an inſtrument ſo groſs and bodily as Juriſdiction is, how can the Miniſter of the Goſpel manage the corpulent and ſecular trial of Bill and Proceſs in things meerly ſpiritual? Or could that Roman Office, without this juridical Sword or Saw, ſtrike ſuch a reverence of it ſelf into the moſt undaunted hearts, as with one ſingle daſh of ignominy to put all the Senate and Knighthood of Rome into a tremble? ſurely much rather might the heavenly Miniſtery of the Evangel bind her ſelf about with far more pearcing beams of Majeſty and awe, by wanting the beggarly help of halings and amercements in the uſe of her powerful Keies. For when the Church without temporal ſupport is able to do her great works upon the unforc't obedience of men, it argues a Divinity about her. But when ſhe thinks to credit and better her ſpiritual efficacy, and to win her ſelf reſpect and dread by ſtrutting in the falſe viſard of worldly autority, 'tis evident that God is not there, but that her apoſtolick vertu is departed from her, and hath left her Key-cold: Which ſhe perceaving as in a decay'd nature, ſeeks to the outward fomentations and chaſings of worldly help, and external flouriſhes, to fetch, if it be poſſible, ſome motion into her extream parts, or to hatch a counterfeit life with the crafty and arteficial heat of Juriſdiction. But it is obſervable, that ſo long as the Church, in true imitation of Chriſt, can be content to ride upon an Aſs, carrying her ſelf and her Government along in a mean and ſimple guiſe, ſhe may be, as he is, a Lion of the tribe of Juda; and in her humility all men with loud Hoſanna's will confeſs her Greatneſs. But when deſpiſing the mighty operation of the Spirit by the weak things of this world, ſhe thinks to make her ſelf bigger and more conſiderable, by uſing the way of civil force and juriſdiction, as ſhe ſits upon this Lion ſhe changes into an Aſs, and inſtead of Hoſanna's every man pelts her with ſtones and dirt. Laſtly, if the wiſdom of the Romans fear'd to commit Juriſdiction to an Office of ſo high eſteem and dred as was the Cenſors, we may ſee what a ſoleciſm in the art of policy it hath bin all this while through Chriſtendom to give juriſdiction to Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure. For that ſtrength, joyn'd with Religion, abus'd and pretended to ambitious ends, muſt of neceſſity breed the heavieſt and moſt quelling Tyranny not only upon the necks, but even to the ſouls of men: which if Chriſtian Rome had bin ſo cautelous to prevent in her Church, as Pagan Rome was in her State, we had not had ſuch a lamentable experience thereof as now we have from thence upon all Chriſtendom. For although I ſaid before, that the Church coveting to ride upon the lionly form of Juriſdiction, makes a transformation of her ſelf into an Aſs, and becomes deſpicable, that is to thoſe whom God hath enlight'nd with true knowledg; but where they remain yet in the reliques of Superſtition, this is the extremity of their bondage, and blindneſs, that while they think they do obeiſance to the Lordly viſage of a Lion, they do it to an Aſs, that through the juſt Judgment of God is permitted to play the dragon among them becauſe of their wilful ſtupidity. And let England here well rub her eyes, leſt by leaving Juriſdiction and Church-Cenſure to the ſame perſons, now that God hath bin ſo long medicining her eye-ſight, ſhe do not with her overpolitick fetches mar all, and bring her ſelf back again to worſhip this Aſs beſtriding a Lion. Having hitherto explain'd, that to Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure no juriſdictive power can be added, without a childiſh and dangerous overſight in Policy, and a pernicious contradiction in evangelick Diſcipline, as anon more fully; it will be next to declare wherein the true reaſon and force of Church-Cenſure conſiſts, which by then it ſhall be laid open to the root; ſo little is it that I fear leſt any crookedneſs, any wrincle or ſpot ſhould be found in Presbyterial Government, that if Bodin the famous French Writer, though a Papiſt, yet affirms that the Commonwealth which maintains this Diſcipline will certainly flouriſh in Vertu and Piety, I dare aſſure my ſelf that every true Proteſtant will admire the Integrity, the Uprightneſs, the divine and gracious Purpoſes thereof, and even for the reaſon of it ſo coherent with the doctrin of the Goſpel, beſide the evidence of command in Scripture, will confeſs it to be the only true Church-government; and that contrary to the whole end and myſtery of Chriſt's coming in the fleſh, a falſe appearance of the ſame is exercis'd by Prelaty. But becauſe ſome count it rigorous, and that hereby men ſhall be liable to a double Puniſhment, I will begin ſomewhat higher, and ſpeak of Puniſhment. Which, as it is an evil, I eſteem to be of two ſorts, or rather two degrees only, a reprobate Conſcience in this life, and Hell in the other world. Whatever elſe men call Puniſhment or Cenſure, is not properly an Evil, ſo it be not an illegal violence, but a ſaving med'cin ordain'd of God both for the publick and privat good of Man; who conſiſting of two parts, the inward and the outward, was by the eternal Providence left under two ſorts of cure, the Church and the Magiſtrat. The Magiſtrat hath only to deal with the outward part, I mean not of the Body alone, but of the Mind in all her outward acts, which in Scripture is call'd the outward man. So that it would be helpful to us if we might borrow ſuch Authority as the Rhetoricians by patent may give us, with a kind of Promethean skill to ſhape and faſhion this outward Man into the ſimilitude of a Body, and ſet him viſible before us; imagining the inner Man only as the Soul. Thus then the Civil Magiſtrat looking only upon the outward Man, (I ſay as a Magiſtrat, for what he doth further, he doth it as a Member of the Church) if he find in his complexion, skin, or outward temperature the Signs and Marks, or in his doings the Effects of Injuſtice, Rapine, Luſt, Cruelty, or the like, ſometimes he ſhuts up as in frenetick or infectious Diſeaſes; or confines within dores, as in every ſickly eſtate. Sometimes he ſhaves by Penalty or Mulct, or els to cool and take down thoſe luxuriant Humors which Wealth and Exceſs have caus'd to abound. Otherwhiles he ſeres, he cauterizes, he ſcarifi's, lets blood; and finally, for utmoſt remedy cuts off. The Patients, which moſt an end are brought into his Hoſpital, are ſuch as are far gone, and beſide themſelves, (unleſs they be falſly accus'd) ſo that Force is neceſſary to tame and quiet them in their unruly fits, before they can be made capable of a more human cure. His general End is the outward Peace and Welfare of the Commonwealth, and civil Happineſs in this Life. His particular End in every Man is, by the infliction of pain, damage, and diſgrace, that the Senſes and common perceivance might carry this Meſſage to the Soul within, that it is neither eaſeful, profitable, nor praiſ-worthy in this Life to do evil. Which muſt needs tend to the good of Man, whether he be to live or die; and be undoubtedly the firſt means to a natural Man, eſpecially an Offender, which might open his eyes to a higher conſideration of Good and Evil, as it is taught in Religion. This is ſeen in the often penitence of thoſe that ſuffer, who, had they ſcapt, had gon on ſinning to an immeſurable heap, which is one of the extreameſt puniſhments. And this is all that the Civil Magiſtrat, as ſo being, confers to the healing of Man's mind, working only by terrifying Plaiſters upon the rind and orifice of the Sore; and by all outward appliances, as the Logicians ſay, a poſteriori, at the Effect, and not from the Cauſe; not once touching the inward bed of Corruption, and that hectick diſpoſition to evil, the ſource of all Vice and Obliquity againſt the Rule of Law. Which how inſufficient it is to cure the Soul of Man, we cannot better gueſs then by the Art of bodily Phyſick. Therefore God, to the intent of further healing man's deprav'd Mind, to this Power of the Magiſtrat, which contents it ſelf with the reſtraint of evil doing in the external Man, added that which we call Cenſure, to purge it and remove it clean out of the inmoſt Soul. In the beginning this Autority ſeems to have bin plac't, as all both civil and religious Rites once were, only in each Father of a Family: Afterwards among the Heathen, in the wiſe Men and Philoſophers of the Age; but ſo as it was a thing voluntary, and no ſet Government. More diſtinctly among the Jews, as being God's peculiar, where the Prieſts, Levites, Profets, and at laſt the Scribes and Phariſees took charge of inſtructing and overſeeing the Lives of the People. But in the Goſpel, which is the ſtraiteſt and the deareſt Cov'nant can be made between God and Man, we being now his adopted Sons, and nothing fitter for us to think on then to be like him, united to him, and as he pleaſes to expreſs it, to have fellowſhip with him, it is all neceſſity that we ſhould expect this bleſt Efficacy of healing our inward Man to be miniſtr'd to us in a more familiar and effectual Method then ever before. God being now no more a Judg after the Sentence of the Law, nor, as it were, a Schoolmaſter of periſhable Rites, but a moſt indulgent Father, governing his Church as a Family of Sons in their diſcreet Age: and therefore in the ſweeteſt and mildeſt manner of paternal Diſcipline, he hath committed this other Office of preſerving in healthful conſtitution the inner Man, which may be term'd the Spirit of the Soul, to his ſpiritual Deputy the Miniſter of each Congregation; who being beſt acquainted with his own Flock, hath beſt reaſon to know all the ſecreteſt Diſeaſes likely to be there. And look by how much the internal Man is more excellent and noble then the external, by ſo much is his Cure more exactly, more throughly, and more particularly to be perform'd. For which cauſe the Holy Ghoſt by the Apoſtles joyn'd to the Miniſter, as Aſſiſtant in this great Office, ſometimes a certain number of grave and faithful Brethren, (for neither doth the Phyſician do all in reſtoring his Patient, he preſcribes, another prepares the Med'cin, ſome tend, ſome watch, ſome viſit) much more may a Miniſter partly not ſee all, partly err as a Man: Beſides, that nothing can be more for the mutual honour and love of the People to their

Paſtor, and his to them, then when in ſelect numbers and courſes they are ſeen partaking, and doing reverence to the holy Duties of Diſcipline by their ſerviceable and ſolemn Preſence, and receiving honour again from their Imployment, not now any more to be ſeparated in the Church by Vails and Partitions as Laicks and unclean, but admitted to wait upon the Tabernacle as the rightful Clergy of Chriſt, a choſen Generation, a royal Prieſthood, to offer up ſpiritual Sacrifice in that meet place to which God and the Congregation ſhall call and aſſign them. And this all Chriſtians ought to know, that the Title of Clergy S. Peter gave to all God's People, till Pope Higinus and the ſucceeding Prelates took it from them, appropriating that Name to themſelves and their Prieſts only; and condemning the reſt of God's Inheritance to an injurious and alienat condition of Laity, they ſeparated from them by local Partitions in Churches, through their groſs ignorance and pride imitating the old Temple: and excluded the Members of Chriſt from the property of being Members, the bearing of orderly and fit Offices in the Eccleſiaſtical Body, as if they had meant to ſow up that Jewiſh Vail which Chriſt by his death on the Croſs rent in ſunder. Although theſe Uſurpers could not ſo preſently overmaſter the Liberties and lawful Titles of God's freeborn Church; but that Origen, being yet a Lay-man, expounded the Scriptures publickly, and was therein defended by Alexander of Jeruſalem, and Theoctiſtus of Cæſarea, producing in his behalf divers Examples, that the privilege of teaching was antiently permitted to many worthy Laymen: And Cyprian in his Epiſtles profeſſes he will do nothing without the advice and aſſent of his aſſiſtant Laicks. Neither did the firſt Nicene Councel, as great and learned as it was, think it any robbery to receive in, and require the help and preſence of many learned lay Brethren, as they were then call'd. Many other Autorities to confirm this Aſſertion, both out of Scripture and the Writings of next Antiquity, Golartius hath collected in his Notes upon Cyprian; whereby it will be evident, that the Laity, not only by Apoſtolick permiſſion, but by conſent of many the ancienteſt Prelates, did participat in Church-Offices as much as is deſir'd any lay Elder ſhould now do. Sometimes alſo not the Elders alone, but the whole Body of the Church is intereſted in the Work of Diſcipline, as oft as publick Satisfaction is given by thoſe that have given publick Scandal. Not to ſpeak now of her right in Elections. But another reaſon there is in it, which though Religion did not commend to us, yet moral and civil Prudence could not but extol. It was thought of old in Philoſophy, that ſhame, or to call it better, the reverence of our Elders, our Brethren and Friends, was the greateſt Incitement to vertuous Deeds, and the greateſt diſſuaſion from unworthy Attempts that might be. Hence we may read in the Iliad, where Hector being wiſht to retire from the Battel, many of his Forces being routed, makes anſwer, that he durſt not for ſhame, leſt the Trojan Knights and Dames ſhould think he did ignobly. And certain it is that wheras Terror is thought ſuch a great ſtickler in a Common-wealth, honourable ſhame is a far greater, and has more reaſon: for where ſhame is, there is fear; but where fear is, there is not preſently ſhame. And if any thing may be done to imbreed in us this generous and chriſtianly Reverence one of another, the very Nurs and Guardian of Piety and Vertue, it cannot ſooner be then by ſuch a Diſcipline in the Church, as may uſe us to have in awe the Aſſemblies of the Faithful, and to count it a thing moſt grievous, next to the grieving of God's Spirit, to offend thoſe whom he hath put in Autority, as a healing ſuperintendence over our Lives and Behaviours, both to our own happineſs, and that we may not give offence to good men, who without amends by us made, dare not, againſt God's Command, hold Communion with us in holy things. And this will be accompanied with a religious dread of being outcaſt from the company of Saints, and from the fatherly protection of God in his Church, to conſort with the Devil and his Angels. But there is yet a more ingenuous and noble degree of honeſt ſhame, or call it, if you will, an eſteem, whereby men bear an inward Reverence toward their own Perſons. And if the Love of God, as a Fire ſent from Heaven to be ever kept alive upon the Altar of our Hearts, be the firſt Principle of all godly and vertuous Actions in men, this pious and juſt honouring of our ſelves is the ſecond, and may be thought as the radical moiſture and fountain-head, whence every laudable and worthy Enterprize iſſues forth. And although I have given it the name of a liquid thing, yet is it not incontinent to bound it ſelf, as humid things are, but hath in it a moſt reſtraining and powerful abſtinence to ſtart back, and globe it ſelf upward from the mixture of any ungenerous and unbeſeeming motion, or any Soil wherewith it may peril to ſtain it ſelf. Something I confeſs it is to be aſham'd of evil doing in the preſence of any; and to reverence the Opinion and the Countenance of a good Man rather than a bad, fearing moſt in his ſight to offend, goes ſo far as almoſt to be vertuous; yet this is but ſtill the fear of Infamy, and many ſuch, when they find themſelves alone, ſaving their Reputation, will compound with other Scruples, and come to a cloſe treaty with their dearer Vices in ſecret. But he that holds himſelf in reverence and due eſteem, both for the dignity of God's Image upon him, and for the price of his Redemption, which he thinks is viſibly markt upon his Forehead, accounts himſelf both a fit Perſon to do the nobleſt and godlieſt Deeds, and much better worth then to deject and defile, with ſuch a debaſement and ſuch a pollution as Sin is, himſelf ſo highly ranſom'd and enobl'd to a new Friendſhip and filial Relation with God. Nor can he fear ſo much the offence and reproach of others, as he dreads and would bluſh at the reflection of his own ſevere and modeſt eye upon himſelf, if it ſhould ſee him doing or imagining that which is ſinful, though in the deepeſt ſecrecy. How ſhall a Man know to do himſelf this right, how to perform this honourable duty of Eſtimation and Reſpect towards his own Soul and Body? which way will lead him beſt to this Hill-top of Sanctity and Goodneſs, above which there is no higher aſcent but to the Love of God, which from this ſelf-pious regard cannot be aſunder? No better way doubtleſs then to let him duly underſtand, that as he is call'd by the high Calling of God to be holy and pure, ſo is he by the ſame appointment ordain'd, and by the Churches call admitted to ſuch Offices of Diſcipline in the Church, to which his own ſpiritual Gifts, by the Example of Apoſtolick Inſtitution, have autoriz'd him. For we have learnt that the ſcornful term of Laick, the conſecrating of Temples, Carpets, and Table-cloths, the railing in of a repugnant and contradictive Mount Sinai in the Goſpel, as if the touch of a lay Chriſtian, who is nevertheleſs God's living Temple, could profane dead Judaiſms, the excluſion of Chriſt's People from the Offices of holy Diſcipline through the pride of a uſurping Clergy, cauſes the reſt to have an unworthy and abject Opinion of themſelves, to approach to holy Duties with a ſlaviſh fear, and to unholy doings with a familiar boldneſs. For ſeeing ſuch a wide and terrible diſtance between religious things and themſelves, and that in reſpect of a wooden Table, and the perimeter of holy Ground about it, a flagon Pot, and a linen Corporal, the Prieſt eſteems their Layſhips unhallow'd and unclean, they fear Religion with ſuch a fear as loves not, and think the purity of the Goſpel too pure for them, and that any uncleanneſs is more ſutable to their unconſecrated Eſtate. But when every good Chriſtian, throughly acquainted with all thoſe glorious Privileges of Sanctification and Adoption, which render him more ſacred then any dedicated Altar or Element, ſhall be reſtor'd to his right in the Church, and not excluded from ſuch place of ſpiritual Government, as his Chriſtian Abilities, and his approved good Life in the eye and teſtimony of the Church, ſhall prefer him to, this and nothing ſooner will open his eyes to a wiſe and true valuation of himſelf; which is ſo requiſite and high a point of Chriſtianity, and will ſtir him up to walk worthy the honourable and grave Imployment wherewith God and the Church hath dignifi'd him; not fearing leſt he ſhould meet with ſome outward holy thing in Religion, which his Lay-touch or preſence might profane; but leſt ſomething unholy from within his own Heart, ſhould diſhonour and profane in himſelf that Prieſtly Unction and Clergy-right whereto Chriſt hath entitl'd him. Then would the Congregation of the Lord ſoon recover the true likeneſs and viſage of what ſhe is indeed, a holy Generation, a royal Prieſthood, a ſaintly Communion, the Houſhold and City of God. And this I hold to be another conſiderable Reaſon why the Functions of Church-Government ought to be free and open to any Chriſtian man, though never ſo laick, if his Capacity, his Faith and prudent demeanour commend him. And this the Apoſtles warrant us to do. But the Prelats object, that this will bring profaneneſs into the Church: to whom may be reply'd, that none have brought that in more then their own irreligious courſes, nor more driven Holineſs out of living into liveleſs things. For whereas God, who hath cleans'd every beaſt and creeping worm, would not ſuffer S. Peter to call them common or unclean, the Prelat Biſhops, in their printed Orders hung up in Churches, have proclaim'd the beſt of Creatures, Mankind, ſo unpurifi'd and contagious, that for him to lay his Hat or his Garment upon the Chancel-Table, they have defin'd it no leſs hainous, in expreſs words, than to profane the Table of the Lord. And thus have they by their Canaanitiſh Doctrine, (for that which was to the Jew but Jewiſh, is to the Chriſtian no better then Canaanitiſh) thus have they made common and unclean, thus have they made profane that nature which God hath not only clean'd, but Chriſt alſo hath aſſum'd. And now that the equity and juſt reaſon is ſo perſpicuous, why in Eccleſiaſtick cenſure the aſſiſtance ſhould be added of ſuch, as whom not the vile odour of Gain and Fees (forbid it God, and blow it with a Whirlwind out of our Land) but Charity, Neighbourhood, and duty to Church-Government hath call'd together, where could a wiſe man wiſh a more equal, gratuitous, and meek examination of any Office that he might happen to commit againſt Chriſtianity then here? Would he prefer thoſe proud ſimoniacal Courts? Thus therefore the Miniſter aſſiſted attends his Heavenly and Spiritual Cure: where we ſhall ſee him both in the courſe of his proceeding; and firſt in the excellency of his end, from the Magiſtrate far different, and not more different then excelling. His end is to recover all that is of man, both Soul and Body, to an everlaſting Health: and yet as for worldly Happineſs, which is the proper Sphere wherein the Magiſtrate cannot but confine his motion without a hideous exorbitancy from Law, ſo little aims the Miniſter, as his intended ſcope, to procure the much Proſperity of this Life, that ofttimes he may have cauſe to wiſh much of it away, as a Diet puffing up the Soul with a ſlimy fleſhineſs, and weakning her principal Organick parts. Two heads of evil he has to cope with, Ignorance and Malice. Againſt the former he provides the daily Manna of incorruptible Doctrine, not at thoſe ſet Meals only in publick, but as oft as he ſhall know that each Infirmity, or Conſtitution requires. Againſt the latter with all the branches thereof, not medling with that reſtraining and ſtyptick Surgery which the Law uſes, not indeed againſt the malady, but againſt the Eruptions, and outermoſt Effects thereof; he on the contrary, beginning at the prime cauſes and roots of the Diſeaſe, ſends in thoſe two divine Ingredients of moſt cleanſing power to the Soul, Admonition and Reproof; beſides which two there is no Drug or Antidote that can reach to purge the mind, and without which all other Experiments are but vain, unleſs by accident. And he that will not let theſe paſs into him, though he be the greateſt King, as Plato affirms, muſt be thought to remain impure within, and unknowing of thoſe things wherein his pureneſs and his knowledg ſhould moſt appear. As ſoon therefore as it may be diſcern'd that the Chriſtian Patient, by feeding otherwhere on Meats not allowable, but of evil Juice, hath diſorder'd his Diet, and ſpread an ill Humour through his Vains, immediatly diſpoſing to a Sickneſs, the Miniſter, as being much nearer both in Eye and Duty then the Magiſtrate, ſpeeds him betimes to overtake that diffus'd Malignance with ſome gentle Potion of Admoniſhment; or if ought be obſtructed, puts in his opening and diſcuſſive Confections. This not ſucceeding after once or twice, or oftner, in the preſence of two or three his faithful Brethren appointed thereto, he adviſes him to be more careful of his deareſt Health, and what it is that he ſo raſhly hath let down into the divine Veſſel of his Soul, God's Temple. If this obtain not, he then, with the counſel of more Aſſiſtants, who are inform'd of what diligence hath been already us'd, with more ſpeedy Remedies lays neerer ſiege to the entrenched Cauſes of his Diſtemper, not ſparing ſuch fervent and well-aim'd Reproofs as may beſt give him to ſee the dangerous eſtate wherein he is. To this alſo his Brethren and Friends intreat, exhort, adjure; and all theſe Endeavours, as there is hope left, are more or leſs repeated. But if neither the regard of himſelf, nor the reverence of his Elders and Friends prevail with him, to leave his vitious Appetite, then as the time urges, ſuch Engines of Terror God hath given into the hand of his Miniſter as to ſearch the tendereſt Angles of the Heart: one while he ſhakes his ſtubborneſs with racking convulſions nigh deſpair, otherwhiles with deadly corroſives he gripes the very roots of his faulty liver to bring him to life through the entry of death. Hereto the whole Church beſeech him, beg of him, deplore him, pray for him. After all this perform'd with what patience and attendance is poſſible, and no relenting on his part, having done the utmoſt of their cure, in the name of God and of the Church they diſſolve their fellowſhip with him, and holding forth the dreadful ſponge of Excommunion, pronounce him wip'd out of the liſt of God's Inheritance, and in the cuſtody of Satan till he repent. Which horrid ſentence, tho it touch neither life nor limb, nor any worldly poſſeſſion, yet has it ſuch a penetrating force, that ſwifter then any chymical ſulphur, or that lightning which harms not the skin, and rifles the entrals, it ſcorches the inmoſt Soul. Yet even this terrible denouncement is left to the Church for no other cauſe but to be as a rough and vehement cleanſing medicin, where the malady is obdurat, a mortifying to life, a kind of ſaving by undoing. And it may be truly ſaid, that as the mercies of wicked men are cruelties, ſo the cruelties of the Church are mercies. For if repentance ſent from Heaven meet this loſt wanderer, and draw him out of that ſteep journey wherein he was haſting towards deſtruction, to come and reconcile to the Church, if he bring with him his bill of health, and that he is now clear of infection, and of no danger to the other ſheep, then with incredible expreſſions of joy all his brethren receive him, and ſet before him thoſe perfumed bankets of Chriſtian conſolation; with pretious ointments bathing and fomenting the old, and now to be forgotten ſtripes which terror and ſhame had inflicted; and thus with heavenly ſolaces they cheer up his humble remorſe, till he regain his firſt health and felicity. This is the approved way which the Goſpel preſcribes, theſe are the ſpiritual weapons of holy cenſure, and miniſterial warfare, not carnal, but mighty t[illegible]ugh God to the pulling down of ſtrong holds, caſting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth it ſelf againſt the knowledg of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Chriſt. 2 Cor. 10. What could be done more for the healing and reclaming that divine particle of God's breathing, the Soul, and what could be done leſs? he that would hide his faults from ſuch a wholſome curing as this, and count it a twofold puniſhment, as ſome do, is like a man that having foul diſeaſes about him, periſhes for ſhame, and the fear he has of a rigorous inciſion to come upon his fleſh. We ſhall be able by this time to diſcern whether Prelatical Juriſdiction be contrary to the Goſpel or no. Firſt therefore the government of the Goſpel being economical and paternal, that is, of ſuch a family where there be no ſervants, but all ſons in obedience, not in ſervility, as cannot be deny'd by him that lives but within the ſound of Scripture; how can the Prelats juſtify to have turn'd the fatherly orders of Chriſt's houſhold, the bleſſed meekneſs of his lowly roof, thoſe ever open and inviting doors of his dwelling-houſe, which delight to be frequented with only filial acceſſes; how can they juſtify to have turn'd theſe domeſtick privileges into the bar of a proud judicial Court, where fees and clamours keep ſhop and drive a trade, where bribery and corruption ſolicits, paltring the free and monileſs power of diſcipline with a carnal ſatisfaction by the purſe? Contrition, humiliation, confeſſion, the very ſighs of a repentant Spirit are there ſold by the penny. That undeflour'd and unblemiſhable ſimplicity of the Goſpel, not ſhe her ſelf, for that could never be, but a falſe-whited, a lawnie reſemblance of her, like that air-born Helena in the fables, made by the ſorcery of Prelats, inſtead of calling her Diſciples from the receit of cuſtom, is now turn'd Publican her ſelf; and gives up her body to a mercenary whoredom under thoſe fornicated Arches which ſhe calls God's houſe, and in the ſight of thoſe her altars which ſhe hath ſet up to be ador'd, makes merchandize of the bodies and ſouls of men. Rejecting Purgatory for no other reaſon, as it ſeems, then becauſe her greedineſs cannot defer, but had rather uſe the utmoſt extortion of redeemed penances in this life. But becauſe theſe matters could not be thus carri'd without a begg'd and borrow'd force from worldly autority, therefore Prelaty ſlighting the deliberat and choſen counſel of Chriſt in his ſpiritual government, whoſe glory is in the weakneſs of fleſhly things, to tread upon the creſt of the world's pride and violence by the power of ſpiritual Ordinances, hath on the contrary made theſe her friends and champions which are Chriſt's enemies in this his high deſign, ſmothering and extinguiſhing the ſpiritual force of his bodily weakneſs in the diſcipline of his Church with the boiſtrous and carnal tyranny of an undue, unlawful, and ungoſpel-like Juriſdiction. And thus Prelaty both in her fleſhly ſupportments, in her carnal Doctrine of Ceremony and Tradition, in her violent and ſecular power, going quite counter to the prime end of Chriſt's coming in the fleſh, that is to revele his truth, his glory, and his might, in a clean contrary manner then Prelaty ſeeks to do, thwarting and defeating the great myſtery of God ; I do not conclude that Prelaty is Antichriſtian, for what need I? the things themſelves conclude it. Yet if ſuch like practiſes, and not many worſe then theſe of our Prelats, in that great darkneſs of the Roman Church, have not exempted both her and her preſent members from being judg'd to be Antichriſtian in all orthodoxal eſteem, I cannot think but that it is the abſolute voice of Truth and all her children to pronounce this Prelaty, and theſe her dark deeds in the midſt of this great Light wherein we live, to be more Antichriſtian than Antichriſt himſelf.

The CONCLUSION.

The miſchief that Prelaty does in the State.

I Add one thing more to thoſe great ones that are ſo fond of Prelaty : this is certain, that the Goſpel being the hidden might of Chriſt, as hath been heard, hath ever a victorious power join'd with it, like him in the Revelation that went forth on the white Horſe with his bow and his crown conquering, and to conquer. If we let the Angel of the Goſpel ride on his own way, he does his proper buſineſs, conquering the high thoughts, and the proud reaſonings of the fleſh, and brings them under to give obedience to Chriſt with the Salvation of many Souls. But if ye turn him out of his rode, and in a manner force him to expreſs his irreſiſtible power by a Doctrine of carnal might, as Prelaty is, he will uſe that fleſhly ſtrength which ye put into his hands to ſubdue your Spirits by a ſervile and blind ſuperſtition, and that again ſhall hold ſuch dominion over your captive minds, as returning with an inſatiat greedineſs and force upon your worldly wealth and power, wherewith to deck and magnify her ſelf, and her falſe worſhips, ſhe ſhall ſpoil and havock your eſtates, diſturb your eaſe, diminiſh your honour, inthraul your liberty under the ſwelling mood of a proud Clergy, who will not ſerve or feed your Souls with ſpiritual food ; look not for it, they have not wherewithal, or if they had, it is not in their purpoſe. But when they have glutted their ingrateful bodies, at leaſt if it be poſſible that thoſe open Sepulchres ſhould ever be glutted, and when they have ſtufft their idoliſh Temples with the waſteful pillage of your eſtates, will they yet have any compaſſion upon you, and that poor pittance which they have left you ; will they be but ſo good to you as that raviſher was to his ſiſter, when he had us'd her at his pleaſure ; will they but only hate ye, and ſo turn ye looſe? no, they will not, Lords and Commons, they will not favour ye ſo much. What will they do then in the name of God and Saints, what will theſe man-haters yet with more deſpight and miſchief do? I'll tell ye, or at leaſt remember ye, for moſt of ye know it already. That they may want nothing to make them true merchants of Babylon, as they have done to your Souls, they will ſell your Bodies, your Wives, your Children, your Liberties, your Parlaments, all theſe things, and if there be ought elſe dearer then theſe, they will ſell at an out-cry in their Pulpits to the arbitrary and illegal diſpoſe of any one that may hereafter be call'd a King, whoſe mind ſhall ſerve him to liſten to their bargain. And by their corrupt and ſervile Doctrines boring our ears to an everlaſting ſlavery, as they have done hitherto, ſo will they yet do their beſt to repeal and eraſe every line and clauſe of both our great Charters. Nor is this only what they will do, but what they hold as the main reaſon and myſtery of their advancement that they muſt do; be the Prince never ſo juſt and equal to his Subjects, yet ſuch are their malicious and depraved eyes, that they ſo look on him, and ſo underſtand him, as if he requir'd no other gratitude, or piece of ſervice from them then this. And indeed they ſtand ſo opportunely for the diſturbing or the deſtroying of a State, being a knot of creatures whoſe dignities, means, and preferments have no foundation in the Goſpel, as they themſelves acknowledg, but only in the Princes favour, and to continue ſo long to them, as by pleaſing him they ſhall deſerve: whence it muſt needs be they ſhould bend all their intentions and ſervices to no other ends but to his, that if it ſhould happen that a Tyrant (God turn ſuch a ſcourge from us to our enemies) ſhould come to graſp the Scepter, here were his ſpear-men and his lances, here were his firelocks ready, he ſhould need no other Pretorian band nor penſionary then theſe, if they could once with their perfidious preachments awe the people. For although the Prelats in time of Popery were ſometimes friendly anough to Magna Charta, it was becauſe they ſtood upon their own bottom, without their main dependance on the Royal nod: but now being well acquainted that the Proteſtant Religion, if ſhe will reform her ſelf rightly by the Scriptures, muſt undreſs them of all their guilded vanities, and reduce them, as they were at firſt, to the lowly and equal order of Presbyters, they know it concerns them nearly to ſtudy the times more then the text, and to lift up their eyes to the hills of the Court, from whence only comes their help; but if their pride grow weary of this crouching and obſervance, as e're long it would, and that yet their minds clime ſtill to a higher aſcent of worldly honour, this only refuge can remain to them, that they muſt of neceſſity contrive to bring themſelves and us back again to the Popes Supremacy, and this we ſee they had by fair degrees of late been doing. Theſe be the two fair ſupporters between which the ſtrength of Prelaty is born up, either of inducing Tyranny, or of reducing Popery. Hence alſo we may judg that Prelaty is meer falſhood. For the property of Truth is, where ſhe is publickly taught, to unyoke and ſet free the minds and ſpirits of a Nation firſt from the thraldom of Sin and Superſtition, after which all honeſt and legal freedom of civil Life cannot be long abſent; but Prelaty, whom the tyrant Cuſtom begot a natural tyrant in Religion, and in State the agent and miniſter of Tyranny, ſeems to have had this fatal gift in her nativity like another Midas, that whatſoever ſhe ſhould touch or come near either in ecclesial or political Government, it ſhould turn, not to Gold, though ſhe for her part could wiſh it, but to the droſs and ſcum of ſlavery, breeding and ſetling both in the Bodies and the Souls of all ſuch as do not in time, with the ſovran treacle of ſound Doctrine, provide to fortify their hearts againſt her Hierarchy. The ſervice of God who is Truth, her Liturgy confeſſes to be perfect freedom; but her works and her opinions declare that the ſervice of Prelaty is perfect ſlavery, and by conſequence perfect falſhood. Which makes me wonder much that many of the Gentry, ſtudious men, as I hear, ſhould engage themſelves to write, and ſpeak publickly in her defence, but that I believe their honeſt and ingenuous natures coming to the Univerſities to ſtore themſelves with good and ſolid Learning, and there unfortunately fed with nothing elſe but the ſcragged and thorny Lectures of monkiſh and miſerable Sophiſtry, were ſent home again with ſuch a ſcholaſtical Bur in their throats, as hath ſtopt and hinder'd all true and generous Philoſophy from entring, crack't their voices for ever with metaphyſical Gargariſms, and hath made them admire a ſort of formal outſide men prelatically addicted, whoſe unchaſten'd and unwrought minds were never yet initiated or ſubdu'd under the true lore of Religion or moral Vertue, which two are the beſt and greateſt points of Learning, but either ſlightly train'd up in a kind of hypocritical and hackny cours of literature to get their living by, and dazle the ignorant, or elſe fondly overſtudied in uſeleſs controverſies, except thoſe which they uſe with all the ſpecious and deluſive ſuttlety they are able, to defend their prelatical Sparta, having a Goſpel and Church-government ſet before their eyes, as a fair field wherein they might exerciſe the greateſt vertues and the greateſt deeds of Chriſtian Autority, in mean fortunes and little furniture of this world; which even the ſage Heathen Writers, and thoſe old Fabritii and Curii well knew to be a manner of working, then which nothing could lik'n a mortal man more to God, who delights moſt to work from within himſelf, and not by the heavy luggage of corporeal inſtruments, they underſtand it not, and think no ſuch matter, but admire and dote upon worldly riches and honours, with an eaſy and intemperate life, to the bane of Chriſtianity: yea, they and their Seminaries ſhame not to profeſs, to petition, and never lin pealing our ears, that unleſs we fat them like Boors, and cram them as they liſt with Wealth, with Deaneries, and Pluralities, with Baronies and ſtately Preferments, all Learning and Religion will go underfoot. Which is ſuch a ſhameleſs, ſuch a beſtial plea, and of that odious impudence in Church-men, who ſhould be to us a pattern of temperance and frugal mediocrity, who ſhould teach us to contemn this world, and the gaudy things thereof, according to the promiſe which they themſelves require from us in Baptiſm, that ſhould the Scripture ſtand by and be mute, there is not that ſect of Philoſophers among the Heathen ſo diſſolute, no not Epicurus, nor Ariſtippus with all his Cyrenaick rout, but would ſhut his School-doors againſt ſuch greazy Sophiſters; not any College of Mountebanks, but would think ſcorn to diſcover in themſelves with ſuch a brazen forehead the outrageous deſire of filthy lucre. Which the Prelats make ſo little conſcience of, that they are ready to fight, and if it lay in their power, to maſſacre all good Chriſtians under the names of horrible Schiſmaticks for only finding fault with their temporal dignities, their unconſcionable wealth and revenues, their cruel autority over their Brethren that labour in the Word, while they ſnore in their luxurious exceſs: Openly proclaiming themſelves now in the ſight of all men, to be thoſe which for a while they ſought to cover under ſheeps clothing, ravenous and ſavage wolves, threatning inroades and bloody incurſions upon the flock of Chriſt, which they took upon them to feed, but now clame to devour as their prey. More like that huge Dragon of Egypt breathing out waſte and deſolation to the Land, unleſs he were daily fatn'd with Virgins blood. Him our old Patron St. George by his matchleſs valour ſlew, as the Prelat of the Garter that reads his Collect can tell. And if our Princes and Knights will imitate the fame of that old Champion, as by their order of Knighthood ſolemnly taken, they vow, far be it that they ſhould uphold and ſide with this Engliſh Dragon; but rather to do as indeed their oath binds them, they ſhould make it their knightly adventure to purſue and vanquiſh this mighty ſail-wing'd Monſter that menaces to ſwallow up the Land, unleſs her bottomleſs gorge may be ſatisfi'd with the blood of the King's daughter the Church; and may, as ſhe was wont, fill her dark and infamous den with the bones of the Saints. Nor will any one have reaſon to think this as too incredible or too tragical to be ſpok'n of Prelaty, if he conſider well from what a maſs of ſlime and mud the ſlothful, the covetous and ambitious hopes of Church-promotions and fat Biſhopricks, ſhe is bred up and nuzzl'd in, like a great Python from her youth, to prove the general poyſon both of Doctrine and good Diſcipline in the Land. For certainly ſuch hopes and ſuch principles of earth as theſe wherein ſhe welters from a young one, are the immediate generation both of a ſlaviſh and tyrannous life to follow, and a peſtiferous contagion to the whole Kingdom, till like that fenborn Serpent ſhe be ſhot to death with the darts of the Sun, the pure and powerful beams of God's Word. And this may ſerve to deſcribe to us in part, what Prelaty hath bin, and what, if ſhe ſtand, ſhe is like to be toward the whole body of people in England. Now that it may appear how ſhe is not ſuch a kind of evil, as hath any good or uſe in it, which many evils have, but a diſtill'd quinteſſence, a pure elixir of miſchief, peſtilent alike to all, I ſhall ſhew briefly, e're I conclude, that the Prelats, as they are to the ſubjects a calamity, ſo are they the greateſt underminers and betrayers of the Monarch, to whom they ſeem to be moſt favourable. I cannot better liken the ſtate and perſon of a King then to that mighty Nazarite Samſon; who being diſciplin'd from his birth in the precepts and the practice of temperance and ſobriety, without the ſtrong drink of injurious and exceſſive deſires, grows up to a noble ſtrength and perfection with thoſe his illuſtrious and ſunny Locks, the Laws, waving and curling about his god-like ſhoulders. And while he keeps them about him undiminiſht and unſhorn, he may with the jaw-bone of an Aſs, that is with the word of his meaneſt officer, ſuppreſs and put to confuſion thouſands of thoſe that riſe againſt his juſt power. But laying down his head among the ſtrumpet flatteries of Prelats, while he ſleeps and thinks no harm, they wickedly ſhaving off all thoſe bright and waighty treſſes of his Laws, and juſt Prerogatives, which were his ornament and ſtrength, deliver him over to indirect and violent counſels, which as thoſe Philiſtins put out the fair and far-ſighted eyes of his natural diſcerning, and make him grind in the priſon-houſe of their ſiniſter ends and practices upon him: Till he, knowing this Prelatical Raſor to have bereft him of his wonted might, nouriſh again his puiſſant hair, the golden beams of Law and Right; and they ſternly ſhook, thunder with ruin upon the heads of thoſe his evil Counſellors, but not without great affliction to himſelf. This is the ſum of their loyal ſervice to Kings; yet theſe are the men that ſtill cry, The King, the King, the Lord's Anointed. We grant it, and wonder how they came to light upon any thing ſo true; and wonder more, if Kings be the Lord's Anointed, how they dare thus oyl over and beſmear ſo holy an Unction with the corrupt and putrid oyntment of their baſe flatteries; which while they ſmooth the skin, ſtrike inward and envenom the life-blood. What fidelity Kings can expect from Prelats, both examples paſt, and our preſent experience of their doings at this day, whereon is grounded all that hath bin ſaid, may ſuffice to inform us. And if they be ſuch clippers of Regal Power, and ſhavers of the Laws, how they ſtand affected to the Law-giving Parlament, your ſelves, worthy Peers and Commons, can beſt teſtify; the current of whoſe glorious and immortal actions hath bin only oppos'd by the obſcure and pernicious deſigns of the Prelats, until their inſolence broke out to ſuch a bold affront, as hath juſtly immur'd their haughty looks within ſtrong walls. Nor have they done any thing of late with more diligence, then to hinder or break the happy aſſembling of Parlaments, however needful to repair the ſhatter'd and disjointed frame of the Commonwealth; or if they cannot do this, to croſs, to diſinable, and traduce all Parlamentary Proceedings. And this, if nothing elſe, plainly accuſes them to be no lawful Members of the Houſe, if they thus perpetually mutinie againſt their own body. And though they pretend, like Salomon's harlot, that they have right thereto. by the ſame judgment that Salomon gave, it cannot belong to them, whenas it is not only their aſſent, but their endeavour continually to divide Parlaments in twain; and not only by dividing, but by all other means to aboliſh and deſtroy the free uſe of them to all poſterity. For the which, and for all their former miſdeeds, whereof this Book and many Volumes more cannot contain the moytie, I ſhall move ye Lords in the behalf I dare ſay of many thouſand good Chriſtians, to let your juſtice and ſpeedy ſentence paſs againſt this great malefactor Prelaty. And yet in the midſt of rigor I would beſeech ye to think of mercy; and ſuch a mercy, I fear I ſhall overſhoot with a deſire to ſave this falling Prelaty, ſuch a mercy (if I may venture to ſay it) as may exceed that which for only ten righteous perſons would have ſav'd Sodom. Not that I dare adviſe ye to contend with God, whether he or you ſhall be more merciful, but in your wiſe eſteems to ballance the offences of thoſe peccant Cities with theſe enormous riots of ungodly miſrule that Prelaty hath wrought both in the Church of Chriſt, and in the State of this Kingdom. And if ye think ye may with a pious preſumption ſtrive to go beyond God in mercy, I ſhall not be one now that would diſſwade ye. Though God for leſs then ten juſt perſons would not ſpare Sodom, yet if you can find after due ſearch but only one good thing in Prelaty either to Religion or civil Government, to King or Parlament, to Prince or People, to Law, Liberty, Wealth or Learning, ſpare her, let her live, let her ſpread among ye, till with her ſhadow all your Dignities and Honours, and all the glory of the Land be darken'd and obſcur'd. But on the contrary, if ſhe be found to be malignant, hoſtile, deſtructive to all theſe, as nothing can be ſurer, then let your ſevere and impartial Doom imitate the divine Vengeance; rain down your puniſhing force upon this godleſs and oppreſſing Government: and bring ſuch a dead Sea of ſubverſion upon her, that ſhe may never in this Land riſe more to afflict the holy reformed Church, and the elect People of God.

Prelatical Episcopacy,

And whether it may be deduc'd from the Apoſtolical Times by virtue of thoſe Teſtimonies which are alledg'd to that purpoſe in ſome late Treatiſes; one whereof goes under the Name of James Archbiſhop of Armagh.

EPISCOPACY, as it is taken for an Order in the Church above a Presbyter, or as we commonly name him the Miniſter of a Congregation, is either of Divine Conſtitution, or of Human. If onely of Human, we have the ſame human Privilege that all Men have ever had ſince Adam, being born free, and in the Miſtreſs Iland of all the Britiſh, to retain this Epiſcopacy, or to remove it, conſulting with our own Occaſions and Conveniencies, and for the prevention of our own Dangers and Diſquiets, in what beſt manner we can deviſe, without running at a loſs, as we muſt needs in thoſe ſtale and uſeleſs Records of either uncertain or unſound Antiquity; which if we hold faſt to the grounds of the Reformed Church, can neither skill of us, nor we of it, ſo oft as it would lead us to the broken reed of Tradition. If it be of Divine Conſtitution, to ſatisfie us fully in that, the Scripture onely is able, it being the onely Book left us of Divine Authority, not in any thing more divine then in the all-ſufficiency it hath to furniſh us, as with all other ſpirituall Knowledg, ſo with this in particular, ſetting out to us a perfect Man of God, accompliſh't to all the good works of his charge: Through all which Book can be no where, either by plain Text, or ſolid reaſoning, found any difference between a Biſhop and a Presbyter, ſave that they be two names to ſignify the ſame Order. Notwithſtanding this clearneſs, and that by all evidence of Argument, Timothy and Titus (whom our Prelates claim to imitate onely in the controuling part of their Office) had rather the Vicegerency of an Apoſtleſhip commited to them, then the ordinary charge of a Biſhoprick, 2 Tim. 4. as being Men of an extraordinary calling; yet to verify that which St. Paul foretold of ſucceeding times, when Men began to have itching Eares, then not contented with the plentifull and wholſom fountaines of the Goſpel, they began after their owne Luſts to heap to themſelves Teachers; and as if the divine Scripture wanted a Supplement, and were to be eek't out, they cannot think any doubt reſolv'd, and any Doctrine confirm'd, unleſs they run to that indigeſted heap and frie of Authors, which they call Antiquity. Whatſoever time, or the heedleſs hand of blind chance, hath drawn down from of old to this preſent, in her huge Drag-net, whether Fiſh, or Sea-weed, Shells, or Shrubbs, unpickt, unchoſen, thoſe are the Fathers. Seeing therefore ſome Men, deeply converſant in Books, have had ſo little care of late to give the World a better account of their reading, then by divulging needleſs Tractats, ſtufft with ſpecious names of Ignatius, and Polycarpus; with fragments of old Martyrologies, and Legends, to diſtract and ſtagger the multitude of credulous Readers, and miſlead them from their ſtrong guards and places of Safety, under the tuition of Holy Writ; it came into my thoughts to perſwade my ſelf, ſetting all diſtances, and nice reſpects aſide, that I could do Religion, and my Country no better ſervice for the time, then doing my utmoſt endeavour to recall the People of GOD from this vain forraging after Straw, and to reduce them to their firm Stations under the ſtandard of the Goſpel; by making appear to them, firſt the inſufficiency, next the inconveniency; and laſtly, the impiety of theſe gay Teſtimonies, that their great Doctors would bring them to dote on. And in performing this, I ſhall not ſtrive to be more exact in Method, then as their citations lead me.

Firſt, therefore concerning Ignatius ſhall be treated fully, when the Author ſhall come to inſiſt upon ſome places in his Epiſtles. Next to prove a ſucceſſion of 27 Biſhops from Timothy, he cites one Leontius Biſhop of Magneſia, out of the 11*th* Act of the Chalcedonian Council: this is but an obſcure and ſingle witneſs, and for his faithful dealing who ſhall commend him to us, with this his Catalogue of Biſhops? What know we further of him, but that he might be as factious and falſe a Biſhop, as Leontius of Antioch, that was a hundred years his Predeceſſor? For neither the praiſe of his Wiſdom, or his Vertue, hath left him memorable to Poſterity, but only this doubtful relation, which we muſt take at his word: and how ſhall this Teſtimony receive credit from his word, whoſe very Name had ſcarce been thought on but for this bare Teſtimony? But they will ſay, he was a Member of the Council, and that may deſerve to gain him Credit with us. I will not ſtand to argue, as yet with fair allowance I might, that we may as juſtly ſuſpect there were ſome bad and ſlippery men in that Council, as we know there are wont to be in our Convocations: Nor ſhall I need to plead at this time, that nothing hath been more attempted, nor with more ſubtlety brought about, both antiently by other Hereticks, and modernly by Papiſts, then to falſify the Editions of the Councils, of which we have none but from our Adverſaries hands, whence Canons, Acts, and whole ſpurious Councils are thruſt upon us; and hard it would be to prove in all, which are legitimat againſt the lawful rejection of an urgent, and free diſputer. But this I purpoſe not to take advantage of; for what avails it to wrangle about the corrupt Editions of Councils, when as we know that many Years ere this time, which was almoſt 500 Years after Chriſt, the Councils themſelves were fouly corrupted with ungodly Prelatiſm, and ſo far plung'd into worldly Ambition, as that it ſtood them upon long ere this to uphold their now well-taſted Hierarchy by what a fair pretext ſoever they could, in like manner as they had now learnt to defend many other groſs Corruptions by as ancient, and ſuppoſed authentick Tradition as Epiſcopacy? And what hope can we have of this whole Council to warrant us a matter, 400 Years at leaſt above their time, concerning the diſtinction of Biſhop and Presbyter, when as we find them ſuch blind Judges of things before their eyes, in their decrees of precedency between Biſhop and Biſhop, acknowledging Rome for the Apoſtolick Throne, and Peter in that See for the Rock, the Baſis, and the Foundation of the Catholick Church and Faith, contrary to the interpretation of more antient Fathers? and therefore from a miſtaken Text did they give to Leo, as Peters ſucceſſor, a kind of Preheminence above the whole Council, as Euagrius expreſſes (for now the Pope was come to that height, as to arrogate to himſelf by his Vicars incompetible honours) and yet having thus yielded to Rome the univerſal Primacy for ſpiritual Reaſons, as they thought, they conclude their ſitting with a carnal and ambitious Decree, to give the ſecond place of Dignity to Conſtantinople from reaſon of State, becauſe it was New ROME; and by like conſequence, doubtleſs of earthly Privileges annext to each other City, was the BISHOP thereof to take his place.

I may ſay again therefore, what hope can we have of ſuch a Council, as beginning in the Spirit, ended thus in the Fleſh? Much rather ſhould we attend to what Euſebius, the antienteſt Writer extant of Church-Hiſtory, notwithſtanding all the helps he had above theſe, confeſſes in the 4*th* Chapter of his 3*d* Book, That it was no eaſy matter to tell who were thoſe that were left Biſhops of the Churches by the Apoſtles, more then by what a man might gather from the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the Epiſtles of St. Paul, in which number he reckons Timothy for Biſhop of Epheſus. So as may plainly appear, that this Tradition of Biſhoping Timothy over Epheſus, was but taken for granted out of that place in St. Paul, which was only an intreating him to tarry [illegible] Epheſus, to do ſomthing left him in charge. Now if Euſebius, a famous Writer, thought it ſo difficult to tell who were appointed Biſhops by the Apoſtles, much more may we think it difficult to Leontius, an obſcure Biſhop, ſpeaking beyond his own Dioceſs: and certainly much more hard was it for either of them to determine what kind of Biſhops theſe were, if they had ſo little means to know who they were; and much leſs reaſon have we to ſtand to their definitive Sentence, ſeeing they have bin ſo raſh to raiſe up ſuch lofty Biſhops and Biſhopricks out of places in Scripture meerly miſunderſtood.

1 Tim. 1. 3.

Thus while we leave the Bible to gad after theſe Traditions of the Antients, we hear the Antients themſelves confeſſing, that what knowledg they had in this point was ſuch as they had gather'd from the Bible.

Since therefore Antiquity it ſelf hath turn'd over the Controverſy to that ſovran Book which we had fondly ſtraggl'd from, we ſhall do better not to detain this venerable Apparition of Leontius any longer, but diſmiſs him with his Liſt of ſeven and twenty, to ſleep unmoleſted in his former obſcurity.

Now for the word προεστὼς, it is more likely that Timothy never knew the word in that ſenſe; it was the vanity of thoſe next ſucceeding times not to content themſelves with the ſimplicity of Scripture-phraſe, but muſt make a new Lexicon to name themſelves by; one will be call'd προεστὼς, or Antiſtes, a word of Precedence; another would be term'd a Gnoſtick, as Clemens; a third Sacerdos, or Prieſt, and talks of Altars; which was a plain ſign that their Doctrin began to change, for which they muſt change their expreſſions. But that place of Juſtin Martyr ſerves rather to convince the Author, then to make for him, where the name προεστὼς τῶν ἀδελφῶν, the Preſident, or Paſtor of the Brethren (for to what end is he their Preſident, but to teach them?) cannot be limited to ſignify a Prelatical Biſhop, but rather communicates that Greek appellation to every ordinary Presbyter: For there he tells what the Chriſtians had wont to do in their ſeveral Congregations, to read and expound, to pray and adminiſter, all which he ſays the προεστὼς, or Antiſtes did. Are theſe the Offices only of a Biſhop, or ſhall we think that every Congregation where theſe things were done, which he attributes to this Antiſtes, had a Biſhop preſent among them? Unleſs they had as many Antiſtites as Presbyters, which this place rather ſeems to imply; and ſo we may infer even from their own alledg'd Authority, that Antiſtes was nothing elſe but Presbyter.

As for that nameleſs Treatiſe of Timothy's Martyrdom, only cited by Photius that liv'd almoſt 900 Years after Chriſt, it hanſomly follows in that Author, the Martyrdom of the ſeven Sleepers, that ſlept (I tell you but what mine Author ſays) three hundred ſeventy and two years; for ſo long they had bin ſhut up in a Cave without meat, and were found living. This Story of Timothy's Epheſian Biſhoprick, as it follows in order, ſo may it for truth, if it only ſubſiſt upon its own Authority, as it doth; for Photius only ſaith he read it, he does not aver it. That other legendary piece found among the lives of the Saints, and ſent us from the ſhop of the Jeſuits at Lovain, does Euſeb. l. 6. κεφ. κδ.
but bear the name of Polycrates, how truly who can tell? and ſhall have ſome more weight with us, when Polycrates can perſwade us of that which he affirms in the ſame place of Euſebius's 5*th* Book, that St. John was a Prieſt, and wore the golden Breſtplate: and why ſhould he convince us more with his Traditions of Timothy's Epiſcopacy, then he could convince Victor Biſhop of Rome with his Traditions concerning the Feaſt of Eaſter, who not regarding his irrefragable inſtances of examples taken from Philip and his Daughters that were Propheteſſes, or from Polycarpus, no nor from St. John himſelf, excommunicated both him, and all the Aſian Churches, for celebrating their Eaſter judaically? He may therefore go back to the ſeven Biſhops his Kinſmen, and make his moan to them, that we eſteem his traditional Ware as lightly as Victor did.

Thoſe of Theodoret, Felix, and John of Antioch, are Autorities of later times, and therefore not to be receiv'd for their Antiquities ſake to give in evidence concerning an Allegation, wherein Writers, ſo much their Elders, we ſee ſo eaſily miſcarry. What if they had told us that Peter, who as they ſay left Ignatius Biſhop of Antioch, went afterwards to Rome, and was Biſhop there, as this Ignatius, and Irenæus, and all Antiquity with one mouth deliver? there be nevertheleſs a number of learned and wiſe Proteſtants, who have written, and will maintain, that Peter's being at Rome as Biſhop, cannot ſtand with concordance of Scripture.

Now come the Epiſtles of Ignatius to ſhew us firſt, that Oneſimus was Biſhop of Epheſus; next to aſſert the difference of Biſhop and Presbyter, wherin I wonder that men, teachers of the Proteſtant Religion, make no more difficulty of impoſing upon our Belief a ſuppoſititious ofspring of ſome dozen Epiſtles, whereof five are rejected as ſpurious, containing in them Hereſies and Trifles;

which cannot agree in Chronology with Ignatius, entitling him Arch-biſhop of Antioch Theopolis, which name of Theopolis that City had not till Juſtinians time, long after, as Credenus mentions; which argues both the barbarous time, and the unſkilful fraud of him that foiſted this Epiſtle upon Ignatius. In the Epiſtle to thoſe of Tarſus, he condemns them for Miniſters of Satan, that ſay Chriſt is God above all. To the Philippians them that kept their Eaſter as the Aſian Churches, as Polycarpus did, and them that faſted upon any Saturday, or Sunday, except one, he counts as thoſe that had ſlain the Lord. To thoſe of Antioch, he ſalutes the Sub-Deacons, Chaunters, Porters, and Exorciſts, as if theſe had bin Orders of the Church in his time: thoſe other Epiſtles leſs queſtion'd, are yet ſo interlarded with Corruptions, as may juſtly indue us with a wholſome ſuſpition of the reſt. As to the Trallians, he writes that a Biſhop hath power over all beyond all Government and Autority whatſoever. Surely then no Pope can deſire more than Ignatius attributes to every Biſhop; but what will become then of the Archbiſhops and Primats, if every Biſhop in Ignatius's judgment be as ſupream as a Pope? To the Epheſians, near the very place from whence they fetch their proof for Epiſcopacy, there ſtands a line that caſts an ill hue upon all the Epiſtle; Let no man err, ſaith he; unleſs a man be within the rays or encloſure of the Altar, he is depriv'd of the bread of Life. I ſay not but this may be ſtretch'd to a figurative conſtruction, but yet it has an ill look, eſpecially being follow'd beneath with the mention of I know not what Sacrifices. In the other Epiſtle to Smyrna, wherein is written that they ſhould follow their Biſhop as Chriſt did his Father, and the Presbytery as the Apoſtles; not to ſpeak of the inſulſe, and ill-laid compariſon, this cited place lies upon the very brim of another Corruption, which had they that quote this paſſage, ventur'd to let us read, all men would have readily ſeen what grain the Teſtimony had bin of, where it is ſaid, that it is not lawful without a Biſhop to baptize, nor to offer, nor to do Sacrifice. What can our Church make of theſe Phraſes but ſcandalous? And but a little further he plainly falls to contradict the Spirit of God in Solomon, judg by the words themſelves; My Son, ſaith he, honour God and the King; but I ſay, honour God and the Biſhop as High-prieſt, bearing the Image of God according to his ruling, and of Chriſt according to his Prieſting, and after him honour the King. Excellent Ignatius! can ye blame the Prelats for making much of this Epiſtle? Certainly if this Epiſtle can ſerve you to ſet a Biſhop above a Presbyter, it may ſerve you next to ſet him above a King. Theſe, and other like places in abundance through all thoſe ſhort Epiſtles, muſt either be adulterat, or elſe Ignatius was not Ignatius, nor a Martyr, but moſt adulterate, and corrupt himſelf. In the midſt therefore of ſo many forgeries, where ſhall we fix to dare ſay this is Ignatius? As for his ſtile who knows it? ſo disfigur'd and interrupted as it is, except they think that where they meet with any thing ſound, and orthodoxal, there they find Ignatius, and then they believe him not for his own Authority, but for a truths ſake, which they derive from elſwhere: to what end then ſhould they cite him as Authentick for Epiſcopacy, when they cannot know what is Authentick in him, but by the judgment which they brought with them, and not by any judgment which they might ſafely learn from him? How can they bring ſatisfaction from ſuch an Author, to whoſe very eſſence the Reader muſt be fain to contribute his own Underſtanding? Had God ever intended that we ſhould have ſought any part of uſeful Inſtruction from Ignatius, doubtles he would not have ſo ill provided for our knowledg, as to ſend him to our hands in this broken and disjointed plight; and if he intended no ſuch thing, we do injuriouſly in thinking to taſt better the pure Evangelick Manna, by ſeaſoning our Mouths with the tainted ſcraps and fragments of an unknown Table, and ſearching among the verminous and polluted Rags dropt overworn from the toyling ſhoulders of Time, with theſe deformedly to quilt and interlace the intire, the ſpotleſs, and undecaying robe of Truth, the daughter not of Time, but of Heaven, only bred up here below in Chriſtian Hearts, between two grave and holy Nurſes, the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Goſpel.

Next follows Irenæus Biſhop of Lions, who is cited to affirm that Polycarpus was made Biſhop of Smyrna by the Apoſtles; and this it may ſeem, none could better tell then he who had both ſeen and heard Polycarpus: But when did he hear him? himſelf confeſſes to Florinus, when he was a Boy. Whether that Age in Irenæus may not be liable to many miſtakings; and whether a Boy may be truſted to take an exact account of the manner of a Church Conſtitution, and upon what terms, and within what limits, and with what kind of Commiſſion Polycarpus receiv'd his Charge, let a man conſider, ere he be cerdulous. It will not be deny'd that he might have ſeen Polycarpus in his youth, a man of great eminence in the Church, to whom the other Presbyters might give way for his Vertue, Wiſdom, and the reverence of his Age; and ſo did Anicetus Biſhop of Rome, even in his own City, give him a kind of priority in adminiſtring the Sacrament, as may be read in Euſebius: but that we ſhould hence conclude a diſtinct, and ſuperior order from the young obſervation of Irenæus, nothing yet alledg'd can warrant us, unleſs we ſhall believe ſuch as would face us down, that Calvin, and after him Beza were Biſhops of Geneva, becauſe that in the unſettl'd ſtate of the Church, while things were not fully compos'd, their worth and learning caſt a greater ſhare of buſineſs upon them, and directed mens eyes principally towards them; and yet theſe men were the diſſolvers of Epiſcopacie. We ſee the ſame neceſſity in ſtate Affairs; Brutus that expell'd the Kings out of Rome, was for the time forc't to be as it were a King himſelf, till matters were ſet in order, as in a free Commonwealth. He that had ſeen Pericles lead the Athenians which way he liſted, haply would have ſaid he had bin their Prince, and yet he was but a powerful and eloquent Man in a Democratie, and had no more at any time then a temporary and elective ſway, which was in the will of the people when to abrogate. And it is moſt likely that in the Church, they which came after theſe Apoſtolick Men, being leſs in Merit, but bigger in Ambition, ſtrove to invade thoſe Privileges by intruſion and plea of right, which Polycarpus, and others like him poſſeſt from the voluntary ſurrender of Men ſubdu'd by the excellencie of their heavenly Gifts; which becauſe their Succeſſors had not, and ſo could neither have that Autority, it was their policy to divulge that the eminence which Polycarpus and his equals enjoy'd, was by right of conſtitution, not by free will of condeſcending. And yet thus far Irenæus makes againſt them as in that very place to call Polycarpus an Apoſtolical Presbyter. But what fidelity his relations had in general, we cannot ſooner learn then by Euſebius, who neer the end of his third Book, ſpeaking of Papias a very ancient Writer, one that had heard St. John, and was known to many that had ſeen, and bin acquainted with others of the Apoſtles, but being of a ſhallow wit, and not underſtanding thoſe Traditions which he receiv'd, fill'd his Writings with many new Doctrines, and fabulous conceits; he tells us there, that divers Eccleſiaſtical Men, and Irenæus among the reſt, while they lookt at his Antiquity, became infected with his Errors. Now if Irenæus were ſo raſh as to take unexamin'd opinions from an Author of ſo ſmall capacity, when he was a Man, we ſhould be more raſh our ſelves to rely upon thoſe obſervations which he made when he was a Boy. And this may be a ſufficient reaſon to us why we need no longer muſe at the ſpreading of many idle Traditions ſo ſoon after the Apoſtles, whilſt ſuch as this Papias had the throwing them about, and the inconſiderate zeal of the next Age, that heeded more the Perſon then the Doctrine, had the gathering them up. Where ever a man, who had bin any way converſant with the Apoſtles, was to be found, thither flew all the inquiſitive ears, although the exerciſe of right inſtructing was chang'd into the curioſity of impertinent fabling: where the Mind was to be edified with ſolid Doctrine, there the fancy was ſooth'd with ſolemn Stories: with leſs fervency was ſtudied what Saint Paul, or Saint John had written then was liſten'd to one that could ſay here he taught, here he ſtood, this was his ſtature; and thus he went habited, and O happy this houſe that harbour'd him, and that cold ſtone whereon he reſted, this Village wherein he wrought ſuch a miracle, and that pavement bedew'd with the warm effuſion of his laſt blood, that ſprouted up into eternal Roſes to crown his Martyrdom. Thus while all their thoughts were pour'd out upon circumſtances, and the gazing after ſuch Men as had ſat at table with the Apoſtles (many of which Chriſt hath profeſt, yea though they had caſt out Devils in his name, he will not know at the laſt day) by this means they loſt their time, and truanted in the fundamental grounds of ſaving knowledg, as was ſeen ſhortly by their Writings. Laſtly for Irenæus, we have cauſe to think him leſs judicious in his reports from hand to hand of what the Apoſtles did, when we find him ſo negligent in keeping the Faith which they writ, as to ſay in his third Book againſt Hereſies, that the obedience of Mary was the cauſe of Salvation to her ſelf, and all Mankind; and in his fift Book, that as Eve was ſeduc't to fly God, ſo the Virgin Mary was perſwaded to obey God, that the Virgin Mary might be made the Advocate of the Virgin Eve. Thus if Irenæus for his neerneſs to the Apoſtles, muſt be the Patron of Epiſcopacy to us, it is no marvel though he be the Patron of Idolatry to the Papiſt, for the ſame cauſe. To the Epiſtle of thoſe Brethren of Smyrna, that write the Martyrdom of Polycarpus, and ſtile him an Apoſtolical, and Prophetical Doctor, and Biſhop of the Church in Smyrna, I could be content to give ſome credit for the great honour and affection which I ſee thoſe Brethren bear him, and not undeſervedly if it be true which they there ſay that he was a Prophet, and had a voice from Heaven to comfort him at his death, which they could hear, but the reſt could not for the noiſe and tumult that was in the place; and beſides, if his body were ſo precious to the Chriſtians, that he was never wont to pull off his ſhoes for one or other that ſtill ſtrove to have the Office, that they might come to touch his feet, yet a light ſcruple or two I would gladly be reſolv'd in: If Polycarpus (who, as they ſay, was a Prophet that never fail'd in what he foretold) had declar'd to his friends, that he knew by viſion, he ſhould die no other death then burning, how it came to paſs that the fire when it came to proof, would not do his work, but ſtarting off like a full ſail from the maſt, did but reflect a golden light upon his unviolated limbs, exhaling ſuch a ſweet odour, as if all the incenſe of Arabia had bin burning, in ſo much that when the bill-men ſaw that the fire was over-aw'd, and could not do the deed, one of them ſteps to him and ſtabs him with a ſword, at which wound ſuch abundance of blood guſht forth as quencht the fire. By all this relation it appears not how the fire was guilty of his death, and then how can his Propheſie be fulfill'd? Next how the ſtanders-by could be ſo ſoon weary of ſuch a glorious ſight, and ſuch a fragrant ſmell, as to haſten the Executioner to put out the fire with the Martyrs Blood, unleſs perhaps they thought, as in all perfumes, that the Smoak would be more odorous then the Flame: Yet theſe good brethren ſay he was Biſhop of Smyrna. No man queſtions it, if Biſhop and Presbyter anciently were all one, and how does it appear by any thing in this teſtimony that they were not? If among his other high titles of Prophetical, Apoſtolical, and moſt Admired of thoſe times, he be alſo ſtil'd Biſhop of the Church of Smyrna in a kind of ſpeech, which the Rhetoricians call κατ' ἐξοχὴν, for his excellence ſake, as being the moſt famous of all the Smyrnian Presbyters; it cannot be prov'd neither from this nor that other place of Irenæus, that he was therefore in diſtinct and monarchical order above the other Presbyters; it is more probable, that if the whole Presbytery had been as renowned as he, they would have term'd every one of them ſeverally Biſhop of Smyrna. Hence it is that we read ſometimes of two Biſhops in one place; and had all the Presbyters there been of like worth, we might perhaps have read of twenty.

Tertullian accoſts us nexts (for Polycrates hath had his Anſwer) whoſe Teſtimony, ſtate but the queſtion right, is of no more force to deduce Epiſcopacy, then the two former. He ſays that the Church of Smyrna had Polycarpus plac't there by John, and the Church of Rome Clement ordain'd by Peter; and ſo the reſt of the Churches did ſhew what Biſhops they had receiv'd by the appointment of the Apoſtles. None of this will be contradicted, for we have it out of the Scripture that Biſhops or Presbyters, which were the ſame, were left by the Apoſtles in every Church, and they might perhaps give ſome ſpecial charge to Clement, or Polycarpus, or Linus, and put ſome ſpecial truſt in them for the experience they had of their Faith and Conſtancy; it remains yet to be evinc't out of this and the like places, which will never be, that the word Biſhop is otherwiſe taken, then in the language of Saint Paul, and the Acts, for an order above Presbyters. We grant them Biſhops, we grant them worthy Men, we grant them plac't in ſeveral Churches by the Apoſtles; we grant that Irenæus and Tertul affirm this, but that they were plac't in a ſuperiour Order above the Presbytery, ſhew from all theſe words why we ſhould grant. 'Tis not enough to ſay the Apoſtle left this man Biſhop in Rome, and that other in Epheſus, but to ſhew when they alter'd their own Decree ſet down by St. Paul, and made all the Presbyters underlings to one Biſhop. But ſuppoſe Tertullian had made an imparity where none was originally, ſhould he move us, that goes about to prove an imparity between God the Father, and God the Son, as theſe words import in his Book againſt Praxeas? The Father is the whole ſubſtance, but the Son a derivation, and portion of the whole, as he himſelf profeſſes, becauſe the Father is greater than me. Believe him now for a faithful relater of Tradition, whom you ſee ſuch an unfaithful expounder of the Scripture; beſides, in his time all allowable Tradition was now loſt. For this ſame Author whom you bring to teſtifie the Ordination of Clement to the Biſhoprick of Rome by Peter, teſtifies alſo in the beginning of his Treatiſe concerning Chaſtity, that the Biſhop of Rome did then uſe to ſend forth his Edicts by the name of Pontifex Maximus, and Epiſcopus Epiſcoporum, chief Prieſt, and Biſhop of Biſhops: For ſhame then do not urge that Autority to keep up a Biſhop, that will neceſſarily ingage you to ſet up a Pope. As little can your advantage be from Hegeſippus an Hiſtorian of the ſame time not extant, but cited by Euſebius; his words are, that in every City all things ſo ſtood in his time as the Law, and the Prophets, and our Lord did preach. If they ſtood ſo, then ſtood not Biſhops above Presbyters; for what our Lord and his Diſciples taught, God be thanked, we have no need to go learn of him: and you may as well hope to perſwade us out of the ſame Author, that James the Brother of our Lord was a Nazarite, and that to him only it was lawful to enter into the Holy of Holies; that his food was not upon any thing that had life, Fiſh, or Fleſh; that he us'd no wollen Garments, but only Linen, and ſo as he trifles on.

If therefore the Tradition of the Church were now grown ſo ridiculous, and diſconſenting from the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, even in thoſe points which were of leſt moment to mens particular ends, how well may we be aſſur'd it was much more degenerated in point of Epiſcopacy, and Precedency, things which could afford ſuch plauſible Pretences, ſuch commodious traverſes for Ambition, and Avarice to lurk behind?

As for thoſe Brittain Biſhops which you cite, take heed what you do; for our Brittain Biſhops, leſs ancient then theſe, were remarkable for nothing more then their Poverty, as Sulp. Severus, and Beda can remember you of Examples good ſtore.

Laſtly (for the fabulous Metaphraſtes is not worth an Anſwer) that Authority of Clemens Alexandrinus is not to be found in all his Works; and wherever it be extant, it is in controverſie, whether it be Clemens or no; or if it were, it ſays only that Saint John in ſome places conſtituted Biſhops: queſtionleſs he did, but where does Clement ſay he ſet them above Presbyters? No man will gainſay the conſtitution of Biſhops; but the raiſing them to a ſuperiour, and diſtinct order above Presbyters, ſeeing the Goſpel makes them one and the ſame thing, a thouſand ſuch Allegations as theſe will not give Prelatical Epiſcopacy, one Chapel of eaſe above a Pariſh Church. And thus much for this cloud I cannot ſay rather then petty-fog of Witneſſes, with which Epiſcopal Men would caſt a miſt before us, to deduce their exalted Epiſcopacy from Apoſtolick Times. Now although, as all men well know, it be the wonted ſhift of Errour, and fond Opinion, when they find themſelves outlaw'd by the Bible, and forſaken of ſound Reaſon, to betake them with all ſpeed to their old ſtarting hole of Tradition, and that wild, and overgrown covert of Antiquity, thinking to frame there a large room, and find good ſtabling, yet thus much their own deify'd Antiquity betrays them, to inform us that Tradition hath had very ſeldom or never the gift of Perſwaſion; as that which Church-Hiſtories report of thoſe Eaſt and Weſtern Paſchaliſts formerly ſpoken of will declare. Who would have thought that Polycarpus on the one ſide could have err'd in what he ſaw Saint John do, or Anicetus Biſhop of Rome on the other ſide, in what he or ſome of his friends might pretend to have ſeen Saint Peter, or Saint Paul do, and yet neither of theſe could perſwade either when to keep Eaſter? The like frivolous Contention troubled the Primitive Engliſh Churches, while Colmanus, and Wilfride on either ſide deducing their Opinions, the one from the undeniable Example of Saint John, and the learned Biſhop Anatolius, and laſtly the miraculous Columba, the other from Saint Peter and the Nicene Councel, could gain no ground each of other, till King Oſwy perceiving no likelihood of ending the Controverſie that way, was fain to decide it himſelf good King, with that ſmall knowledg, wherewith thoſe times had furniſht him. So when thoſe pious Greek Emperours began, as Cedrenus relates, to put down Monks, and aboliſh Images, the old Idolaters finding themſelves blaſted, and driven back by the prevailing light of the Scripture, ſent out their ſturdy Monks call'd the Abramites, to alledge for Images the ancient Fathers Dionyſius, and this our objected Irenæus: nay they were ſo high flown in their Antiquity, that they undertook to bring the Apoſtles, and Luke the Evangeliſt, yea Chriſt himſelf, from certain Records that were then current, to patronize their Idolatry. Yet for all this the worthy Emperour Theophilus, even in thoſe dark times, choſe rather to nouriſh himſelf and his people with the ſincere Milk of the Goſpel, then to drink from the mixt Confluence of ſo many corrupt and poyſonous Waters, as Tradition would have perſwaded him to by moſt ancient ſeeming Authorities. In like manner all the reformed Churches abroad, unthroning Epiſcopacy, doubtleſs were not ignorant of theſe Teſtimonies alledg'd to draw it in a line from the Apoſtles days; for ſurely the Author will not think he hath brought us now any new Authorities, or Conſiderations into the world, which the Reformers in other places were not adviſ'd of: and yet we ſee, the interceſſion of all theſe Apoſtolick Fathers could not prevail with them to alter their reſolved Decree of reducing into order their uſurping and over-provender'd Epiſcopants; and God hath bleſt their Work this hundred years with a proſperous and ſtedfaſt, and ſtill happy Succeſs. And this may ſerve to prove the Inſufficiency of theſe preſent Epiſcopal Teſtimonies, not only in themſelves, but in the account of thoſe ever that have been the followers of Truth. It will next behoove us to conſider the Inconvenience we fall into, by uſing our ſelves to be guided by theſe kind of Teſtimonies. He that thinks it the part of a well-learned Man to have read diligently the ancient Stories of the Church, and to be no ſtranger in the Volumes of the Fathers, ſhall have all judicious Men conſenting with him; not hereby to controul, and new fangle the Scripture, God forbid, but to mark how Corruption and Apoſtacy crept in by degrees, and to gather up where ever we find the remaining ſparks of original Truth, wherewith to ſtop the mouths of our Adverſaries, and to bridle them with their own curb, who willingly paſs by that which is Orthodoxal in them, and ſtudiouſly cull out that which is commentitious, and beſt for their turns, not weighing the Fathers in the ballance of Scripture, but Scripture in the ballance of the Fathers. If we therefore, making firſt the Goſpel our Rule and Oracle, ſhall take the good which we light on in the Fathers, and ſet it to oppoſe the evil which other men ſeek from them, in this way of ſkirmiſh we ſhall eaſily maſter all Superſtition and falſe Doctrine; but if we turn this our diſcreet and wary uſage of them into a blind devotion towards them, and whatſoever we find written by them, we both forſake our own grounds and reaſons which led us at firſt to part from Rome, that is to hold to the Scriptures againſt all Antiquity; we remove our Cauſe into our Adverſaries own Court, and take up there thoſe caſt Principles which will ſoon cauſe us to ſoder up with them again, in as much as believing Antiquity for it ſelf in any one point, we bring an ingagement upon our ſelves of aſſenting to all that it charges upon us. For ſuppoſe we ſhould now, neglecting that which is clear in Scripture, that a Biſhop and Presbyter is all one both in Name and Office, and that what was done by Timothy and Titus, executing an extraordinary place, as fellow-labourers with the Apoſtles, and of a univerſal charge in planting Chriſtianity through divers Regions, cannot be drawn into particular and daily example; ſuppoſe that neglecting this clearneſs of the Text, we ſhould by the uncertain, and corrupted Writings of ſucceeding times, determine that Biſhop and Presbyter are different, becauſe we dare not deny what Ignatius, or rather the Perkin Warbeck of Ignatius, ſays; then muſt we be conſtrain'd to take upon our ſelves a thouſand Superſtitions and falſities which the Papiſts will prove us down in from as good Authorities, and as ancient as theſe that ſet a Biſhop above a Presbyter. And the plain truth is, that when any of our men of thoſe that are wedded to Antiquity come to diſpute with a Papiſt, and leaving the Scriptures put themſelves without appeal to the Sentence of Synods and Councels, uſing in the cauſe of Sion the hir'd Souldiery of revolted Iſrael, where they give the Romaniſts one buff, they receive two counterbuffs. Were it therefore but in this regard, every true Biſhop ſhould be afraid to conquer in his Cauſe by ſuch Authorities as theſe, which if we admit for the Authorities ſake, we open a broad paſſage for a multitude of Doctrines that have no ground in Scripture to break in upon us.

Laſtly, I do not know, it being undeniable that there are but two Eccleſiaſtical Orders, Biſhops and Deacons, mention'd in the Goſpel, how it can be leſs then Impiety to make a demur at that, which is there ſo perſpicuous, confronting, and parallelling the ſacred Verity of Saint Paul with the offals and ſweepings of Antiquity, that met as accidentally and abſurdly, as Epicurus his Atoms, to patch up a Leucippean Ignatius, enclining rather to make this phantaſm an expounder, or indeed a depraver of Saint Paul, then Saint Paul an examiner, and diſcoverer of this Impoſtorſhip; nor caring how ſlightly they put off the verdit of holy Text unſalv'd, that ſays plainly there be but two Orders, ſo they maintain the Reputation of their imaginary Doctor that proclaims three. Certainly if Chriſts Apoſtle have ſet down but two, then according to his own words, though he himſelf ſhould unſay it, and not only the Angel of Smyrna, but an Angel from Heaven ſhould bear us down that there be three, Saint Paul has doom'd him twiſe, Let him be accurſt, for Chriſt hath pronounc't that no tittle of his Word ſhall fall to the ground; and if one jot be alterable, it is as poſſible that all ſhould periſh: and this ſhall be our Righteouſneſs, our ample warrant, and ſtrong aſſurance both now, and at the laſt day never to be aſham'd of, againſt all the heaped names of Angels, and Martyrs, Councels, and Fathers urg'd upon us, if we have given our ſelves up to be taught by the pure, and living Precept of Gods Word only, which without more additions, nay with a forbidding of them, hath within it ſelf the promiſe of Eternal Life, the end of all our weariſom Labours, and all our ſuſtaining Hopes. But if any ſhall ſtrive to ſet up his Ephod, and Teraphim of Antiquity againſt the brightneſs and perfection of the Goſpel; let him fear leſt he and his Baal be turn'd into Boſheth. And thus much may ſuffice to ſhew that the pretended Epiſcopacy cannot be deduc'd from the Apoſtolical TIMES.

OF REFORMATION in ENGLAND, AND THE Cauſes that hitherto have hindred it.

In two Books. VVritten to a Friend.

SIR,

AMidſt thoſe deep and retired thoughts, which with every Man chriſtianly inſtructed, ought to be moſt frequent, of God, and of his miraculous Ways and Works amongſt Men, and of our Religion and Works, to be perform'd to him; after the Story of our Saviour Chriſt, ſuffering to the loweſt bent of weakneſſe in the Fleſh, and preſently triumphing to the higheſt pitch of Glory in the Spirit, which drew up his Body alſo, till we in both be united to him in the Revelation of his Kingdom: I do not know of any thing more worthy to take up the whole paſſion of Pity on the one ſide, and Joy on the other, then to conſider firſt, the foul and ſudden Corruption, and then after many a tedious Age, the long deferr'd, but much more wonderful and happy Reformation of the Church in theſe latter days. Sad it is to think how that Doctrin of the Goſpel, planted by Teachers divinely inſpir'd, and by them winnow'd, and ſifted from the Chaff of overdated Ceremonies, and refin'd to ſuch a ſpiritual height and temper of Purity, and knowledg of the Creator, that the Body, with all the Circumſtances of Time and Place, were purifi'd by the Affections of the regenerate Soul, and nothing left impure, but Sin; Faith needing not the weak, and fallible Office of the Senſes, to be either the Uſhers or Interpreters of heavenly Myſteries, ſave where our Lord himſelf in his Sacraments ordain'd, that ſuch a Doctrine ſhould, through the groſſneſs and blindneſs of her Profeſſors, and the fraud of deceivable Traditions, drag ſo downwards, as to backſlide one way into the Jewiſh beggery of old caſt Rudiments, and ſtumble forward another way into the new-vomited Paganiſm of ſenſual Idolatry, attributing Purity or Impurity to things indifferent, that they might bring the inward Acts of the Spirit to the outward and cuſtomary Eye-ſervice of the Body, as if they could make God earthly and fleſhly, becauſe they could not make themſelves heavenly and ſpiritual; they began to draw down all the divine Intercours betwixt God and the Soul, yea, the very ſhape of God himſelf, into an exterior and bodily Form, urgently pretending a neceſſity and obligement of joyning the Body in a formal Reverence, and Worſhip circumſcrib'd; they hallow'd it, they fum'd it, they ſprincl'd it, they bedeck't it, not in Robes of pure Innocency, but of pure Linen, with other deformed and fantaſtick dreſſes, in Palls and Miters, Gold, and Guegaw's fetcht from Aron's old Wardrobe, or the Flamins Veſtry: then was the Prieſt ſet to con his Motions and his Poſtures, his Liturgies and his Lurries, till the Soul by this means of over-bodying her ſelf, given up juſtly to fleſhly delights, bated her Wing apace downward: And finding the eaſe ſhe had from her viſible and ſenſuous Collegue the Body, in performance of religious Duties, her Pineons now broken, and flagging, ſhifted off from her ſelf the labour of high ſoaring any more, forgot her heavenly flight, and left the dull and droyling Carcas to plod on in the old Road, and drudging Trade of outward Conformity. And here out of queſtion from her pervers conceiting of God, and holy things, ſhe had faln to believe no God at all, had not cuſtom and the worm of Conſcience nipt her Incredulity hence to all the Duties of evangelical Grace, inſtead of the adoptive and chearful boldneſs which our new Alliance with God requires, came ſervile, and thral-like fear: For in very deed, the ſuperſtitious Man, by his good Will, is an Atheiſt; but being ſcar'd from thence by the pangs and gripes of a boiling Conſcience, all in a pudder ſhuffles up to himſelf ſuch a God, and ſuch a Worſhip as is moſt agreeable to remedy his fear; which fear of his, as alſo is his hope, fixt only upon the Fleſh, renders likewiſe the whole faculty of his Apprehenſion carnal; and all the inward Acts of Worſhip, iſſuing from the native ſtrength of the Soul, run out laviſhly to the upper Skin, and there harden into a Cruſt of Formality. Hence Men came to ſcan the Scriptures by the Letter, and in the Covenant of our Redemption, magnifi'd the external Signs more then the quickning Power of the Spirit; and yet looking on them through their own guiltineſs, with a ſervile fear, and finding as little comfort, or rather terror from them again, they knew not how to hide their ſlaviſh approach to Gods Beheſts by them not underſtood, nor worthily receav'd, but by cloaking their ſervile crouching to all religious Preſentments, ſomtimes lawful, ſomtimes Idolatrous, under the name of Humility, and terming the py-bald Frippery, and oſtentation of Ceremonies, Decency.

Then was Baptiſm chang'd into a kind of Exorciſm, and Water, ſanctifi'd by Chriſts Inſtitute, thought little enough to waſh off the Original Spot without the Scratch, or croſs impreſſion of a Prieſt's fore-finger: And that Feaſt of Free-grace, and Adoption to which Chriſt invited his Diſciples to ſit as Brethren, and Co-heirs of the happy Covenant, which at that Table was to be ſeal'd to them, even that Feaſt of Love and heavenly-admitted Fellowſhip, the Seal of filial Grace, became the ſubject of Horror, and glouting Adoration, pageanted about like a dreadful Idol: Which ſometimes deceives wel-meaning Men, and beguiles them of their Reward, by their voluntary Humility; which indeed is fleſhly Pride, preferring a fooliſh Sacrifice, and the Rudiments of the World, as Saint Paul to the Coloſſians explaineth, before a ſavory Obedience to Chriſts Example. Such was Peters unſeaſonable Humility, as then his Knowledg was ſmall, when Chriſt came to waſh his feet; who at an impertinent time would needs ſtrain Courteſy with his Maſter, and falling troubleſomly upon the lowly, alwiſe, and unexaminable intention of Chriſt, in what he went with reſolution to do, ſo provok't by his interruption the meek Lord, that he threat'nd to exclude him from his heavenly Portion, unleſs he could be content to be leſs arrogant and ſtiff-neckt in his Humility.

But to dwell no longer in characterizing the Depravities of the Church, and how they ſprung, and how they took increaſe; when I recall to mind at laſt, after ſo many dark Ages, wherein the huge overſhadowing Train of Error had almoſt ſwept all the Stars out of the Firmament of the Church; how the bright and bliſsful Reformation (by Divine Power) ſtrook through the black and ſettled Night of Ignorance and Antichriſtian Tyranny, methinks a ſoveraign and reviving Joy muſt needs ruſh into the Boſom of him that reads or hears; and the ſweet Odour of the returning Goſpel imbath his Soul with the fragrancy of Heaven. Then was the Sacred BIBLE ſought out of the duſty Corners where profane Falſhood and Neglect had thrown it, the Schools opened, Divine and Humane Learning rak't out of the Embers of forgotten Tongues, the Princes and Cities trooping apace to the new erected Banner of Salvation; the Martyrs, with the unreſiſtable might of Weakneſs, ſhaking the Powers of Darkneſs, and ſcorning the fiery Rage of the old red Dragon.

The pleaſing purſuit of theſe Thoughts hath oft-times led me into a ſerious queſtion and debatement with my ſelf, how it ſhould come to paſs that England (having had this Grace and Honour from GOD to be the firſt that ſhould ſet up the Standard for the recovery of loſt Truth, and blow the firſt Evangelick Trumpet to the Nations, holding up, as from a Hill, the new Lamp of ſaving Light to all Chriſtendom) ſhould now be laſt, and moſt unſettl'd in the enjoyment of that Peace, whereof ſhe taught the way to others; although indeed our Wickleſs preaching, at which all the ſucceeding Reformers more effectually lighted their Tapers, was to his Countrymen but a ſhort Blaze, ſoon dampt and ſtifl'd by the Pope and Prelats for ſix or ſeven Kings Reigns; yet methinks the Precedency which GOD gave this Iland, to be the firſt Reſtorer of buried Truth, ſhould have been followed with more happy ſucceſs, and ſooner attain'd Perfection; in which as yet we are amongſt the laſt: for, albeit in purity of Doctrine we agree with our Brethren; yet in Diſcipline, which is the execution and applying of Doctrine home, and laying the Salve to the very Orifice of the Wound, yea, tenting and ſearching to the Core, without which Pulpit-Preaching is but ſhooting at Rovers; in this we are no better then a Schiſm from all the Reformation, and a ſore Scandal to them; for while we hold Ordination to belong only to Biſhops, as our Prelats do, we muſt of neceſſity hold alſo their Miniſters to be no Miniſters, and ſhortly after their Church to be no Church. Not to ſpeak of thoſe ſenſeleſs Ceremonies which we only retain, as a dangerous earneſt of ſliding back to Rome, and ſerving meerly, either as a miſt to cover nakedneſs where true Grace is extinguiſht, or as an Enterlude to ſet out the Pomp of Prelatiſm. Certainly it would be worth the while therefore, and the pains, to enquire more particularly, what, and how many the chief Cauſes have been, that have ſtill hindred our uniform Conſent to the reſt of the Churches abroad, at this time eſpecially when the Kingdom is in a good propenſity thereto; and all Men in Prayers, in Hopes, or in Diſputes, either for or againſt it.

Yet will I not inſiſt on that which may ſeem to be the Cauſe on GODS part; as his Judgment on our Sins, the tryal of his own, the unmaſking of Hypocrites: nor ſhall I ſtay to ſpeak of the continual eagerneſs and extream diligence of the Pope and Papiſts to ſtop the furtherance of Reformation, which know they have no hold or hope of England their loſt Darling, longer then the Government of Biſhops bolſters them out; and therefore plot all they can to uphold them, as may be ſeen by the Book of Santa Clara the Popiſh Prieſt in defence of Biſhops, which came out piping hot much about the time that one of our own Prelats, out of an ominous fear, had writ on the ſame Argument; as if they had join'd their Forces, like good Confederates, to ſupport one falling Babel.

But I ſhall chiefly endeavour to declare thoſe Cauſes that hinder the forwarding of true Diſcipline, which are among our ſelves. Orderly proceeding will divide our Inquiry into our Fore-fathers Days, and into our Times. HENRY VIII. was the firſt that rent this Kingdom from the Popes Subjection totally; but his Quarrel being more about Supremacy, then other faultineſs in Religion that he regarded, it is no marvel if he ſtuck where he did. The next default was in the Biſhops, who though they had renounc't the Pope, they ſtill hugg'd the Popedom, and ſhar'd the Authority among themſelves, by their ſix bloody Articles, perſecuting the Proteſtants no ſlacker then the Pope would have done. And doubtles, whenever the Pope ſhall fall, if his ruine be not like the ſudden down-come of a Tower, the Biſhops, when they ſee him tottering, will leave him, and fall to ſcrambling, catch who may, he a Patriarchdom, and another what comes next hand; as the French Cardinal of late, and the See of Canterbury hath plainly affected.

In Edward the VI's Days, why a compleat Reformation was not effected, to any conſiderate Man may appear. Firſt, He no ſooner entred into his Kingdom, but into a War with Scotland; from whence the Protector returning with Victory, had but newly put his hand to repeal the ſix Articles, and throw the Images out of Churches, but Rebellions on all ſides, ſtir'd up by obdurate Papiſts, and other Tumults, with a plain War in Norfolk, holding tack againſt two of the Kings Generals, made them of force content themſelves with what they had already done. Hereupon follow'd ambitious Contentions among the Peers, which ceas'd not but with the Protector's death, who was the moſt zealous in this point: And then Northumberland was he that could do moſt in England, who little minding Religion, (as his Apoſtacy well ſhew'd at his death) bent all his Wit how to bring the Right of the Crown into his own Line. And for the Biſhops, they were ſo far from any ſuch worthy Attempts, as that they ſuffer'd themſelves to be the common Stales to countenance, with their proſtituted Gravities, every Politick Fetch that was then on foot, as oft as the potent Statiſts pleas'd to employ them. Never do we read that they made uſe of their Authority, and high Place of acceſs, to bring the jarring Nobility to Chriſtian Peace, or to withſtand their diſloyal Projects: but if a Toleration for Maſs were to be beg'd of the King for his Siſter MARY, leſt CHARLES the Fifth ſhould be angry; who but the grave Prelats, Cranmer and Ridley, muſt be ſent to extort it from the young King? But out of the Mouth of that godly and Royal Child, Chriſt himſelf return'd ſuch an awful repulſe to thoſe halting and time-ſerving Prelats, that after much bold importunity, they went their way not without ſhame and tears.

Nor was this the firſt time that they diſcover'd to be followers of this World; for when the Protectors Brother, Lord Sudley, the Admiral, through private malice and mal-engine was to loſe his Life, no man could be found fitter then Biſhop Latimer (like another Doctor Shaw) to divulge in his Sermon the forged Accuſations laid to his charge, thereby to defame him with the People, who elſe 'twas thought would take ill the innocent mans Death, unleſs the Reverend Biſhop could warrant them there was no foul play. What could be more impious then to debar the Children of the King from their right to the Crown? To comply with the ambitious Uſurpation of a Traytor, and to make void the laſt Will of HENRY VIII. to which the Breakers had ſworn obſervance? Yet Biſhop Cranmer one of the Executors, and the other Biſhops none refuſing (leſt they ſhould reſiſt the Duke of Northumberland) could find in their Conſciences to ſet their hands to the diſinabling and defeating not only of Princeſs MARY the Papiſt, but of ELIZABETH the Proteſtant, and (by the Biſhops judgment) the lawful Iſſue of King HENRY.

Who then can think (though theſe Prelats had ſought a further Reformation) that the leaſt wry face of a Politician would not have huſh't them? But it will be ſaid, Theſe men were Martyrs: What then? Though every true Chriſtian will be a Martyr when he is called to it; not preſently does it follow that every one ſuffering for Religion, is without exception. Saint Paul writes, that A man may give his Body to be burnt, (meaning for Religion) and yet not have Charity: He is not therefore above all poſſibility of erring, becauſe he burns for ſome Points of Truth.

Witnes the Arians and Pelagians which were ſlain by the Heathen for Chriſts ſake, yet we take both theſe for no true friends of Chriſt. If the Martyrs (ſaith Cyprian in his 30*th* Epiſtle) decree one thing, and the Goſpel another, either the Martyrs muſt loſe their Crown by not obſerving the Goſpel for which they are Martyrs, or the Majeſty of the Goſpel muſt be broken and lie flat, if it can be overtopt by the novelty of any other Decree.

And herewithal I invoke the Immortal DEITY, reveler and judg of Secrets, That wherever I have in this BOOK plainly and roundly (though worthily and truly) laid open the faults and blemiſhes of Fathers, Martyrs, or Chriſtian Emperors, or have otherwiſe inveighed againſt Error and Superſtition with vehement Expreſſions; I have done it, neither out of malice, nor liſt to ſpeak evil, nor any vain glory, but of meer neceſſity to vindicate the ſpotleſs Truth from an ignominious Bondage, whoſe native worth is now become of ſuch a low eſteem, that ſhe is like to find ſmall credit with us for what ſhe can ſay, unleſs ſhe can bring a Ticket from Crarmer, Latimer, and Ridley; or prove her ſelf a retainer to Conſtantine, and wear his badg. More tolerable it were for the Church of GOD, that all theſe Names were utterly aboliſht like the Brazen Serpent, then that mens fond opinion ſhould thus idolize them, and the Heavenly Truth be thus captivated.

Now to proceed, whatſoever the Biſhops were, it ſeems they themſelves were unſatisfi'd in matters of Religion as they then ſtood, by that Commiſſion granted to 8 Biſhops, 8 other Divines, 8 Civilians, 8 common Lawyers, to frame Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions; which no wonder if it came to nothing, for (as Hayward relates) both their Profeſſions and their Ends were different. Laſtly, We all know by Examples, that exact Reformation is not perfeted at the firſt puſh, and thoſe unweildy Times of Edward VI. may hold ſome Plea by this excuſe. Now let any reaſonable man judg whether that Kings Reign be a fit time from whence to pattern out the Conſtitution of a Church Diſcipline, much leſs that it ſhould yield occaſion from whence to foſter and eſtabliſh the continuance of Imperfection, with the commendatory ſubſcriptions of Confeſſors and Martyrs, to intitle and ingage a glorious Name to a groſs Corruption. It was not Epiſcopacy that wrought in them the Heavenly fortitude of Martyrdom, as little is it that Martyrdom can make good Epiſcopacy; but it was Epiſcopacy that led the good and holy men through the temptation of the Enemy, and the ſnare of this preſent World, to many blame-worthy and opprobrious Actions. And it is ſtill Epiſcopacy that before all our eyes worſens and ſlugs the moſt Learned, and ſeeming religious of our Miniſters, who no ſooner advanc't to it, but like a ſeething Pot ſet to cool, ſenſibly exhale and reak out the greateſt part of that zeal, and thoſe Gifts which were formerly in them, ſettling in a skinny congealment of eaſe and ſloth at the top: and if they keep their Learning by ſome potent ſway of Nature, 'tis a rare chance; but their Devotion moſt commonly comes to that queazy temper of Lukewarmneſs, that gives a Vomit to GOD himſelf.

But what do we ſuffer miſ-ſhapen and enormous Prelatiſm, as we do, thus to blanch and varniſh her deformities with the fair Colours, as before of Martyrdom, ſo now of Epiſcopacy? They are not Biſhops, GOD and all good Men know they are not, that have fill'd this Land with late Confuſion and Violence, but a Tyrannical crew and Corporation of Impoſters that have blinded and abus'd the World ſo long under that Name. He that inabl'd with Gifts from God, and the lawful and Primitive choice of the Church aſſembl'd in convenient number, faithfully from that time forward feeds his Parochial Flock, has his coequal and compresbyterial Power to ordain Miniſters and Deacons by publick Prayer, and Vote of Chriſts Congregation in like ſort as he himſelf was ordain'd, and is a true Apoſtolick Biſhop. But when he ſteps up into the Chair of Pontifical Pride, and changes a moderate and exemplary Houſe for a miſgovern'd and haughty Palace, ſpiritual Dignity for carnal Precedence, and ſecular high Office and Employment for the high Negotiations of his Heavenly Embaſſage: Then he degrades, then he un-biſhops himſelf; he that makes him Biſhop makes him no Biſhop. No marvel therefore if S. Martin complain'd to Sulpitius Severus, that ſince he was Biſhop he felt inwardly a ſenſible decay of thoſe Vertues and Graces that God had given him in great meaſure before; although the ſame Sulpitius write that he was nothing tainted or alter'd in his Habit, Diet, or perſonal demeanour from that ſimple plainneſs to which he firſt betook himſelf. It was not therefore that thing alone which God took diſpleaſure at in the Biſhops of thoſe times, but rather an univerſal rottennes and gangreen in the whole Function.

From hence then I paſs to Queen ELIZABETH the next Proteſtant Prince, in whoſe Days why Religion attain'd not a perfect reducement in the beginning of her Reign, I ſuppoſe the hindring Cauſes will be found to be common with ſome formerly alledg'd for King EDWARD VI. the greeneſs of the Times, the weak Eſtate which Queen MARY left the Realm in, the great Places and Offices executed by Papiſts, the Judges, the Lawyers, the Juſtices of Peace for the moſt part Popiſh, the Biſhops firm to Rome; from whence was to be expected the furious flaſhing of Excommunications, and abſolving the People from their Obedience. Next her private Councellors, whoever they were, perſwaded her (as Camden writes) that the altering of Eccleſiaſtical Policy would move Sedition. Then was was the Liturgy given to a number of moderate Divines, and Sir Tho. Smith a Stateſman to be purg'd and phiſick't: And ſurely they were moderate Divines indeed, neither hot nor cold; and Grindal the beſt of them, afterwards Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, loſt favour in the Court, and I think was diſcharg'd the government of his See, for favouring the Miniſters, though Camden ſeem willing to find another Cauſe: therefore about her ſecond Year, in a Parliament, of Men and Minds ſome ſcarce well grounded, others belching the ſoure crudities of yeſterdays Popery, thoſe Conſtitutions of EDWARD VI. which as you heard before, no way ſatisfi'd the men that made them, are now eſtabliſh't for beſt, and not to be mended. From that time follow'd nothing but impriſonments, troubles, diſgraces on all thoſe that found fault with the Decrees of the Convocation, and ſtrait were they branded with the Name of Puritans. As for the Queen her ſelf, ſhe was made believe that by putting down Biſhops her Prerogative would be infring'd, of which ſhall be ſpoken anon as the courſe of Method brings it in: And why the Prelats labour'd it ſhould be ſo thought, ask not them, but ask their Bellies. They had found a good Tabernacle, they ſate under a ſpreading Vine, their Lot was fallen in a fair Inheritance. And theſe perhaps were the chief Impeachments of a more ſound rectifying the Church in the Queens Time.

From this Period I count to begin our Times, which becauſe they concern us more nearly, and our own Eyes and Ears can give us the ampler ſcope to judg, will require a more exact ſearch; and to effect this the ſpeedier, I ſhall diſtinguiſh ſuch as I eſteem to be the hinderers of Reformation into 3 ſorts, Antiquitarians, (for ſo I had rather call them then Antiquaries, whoſe labours are uſeful and laudable). 2, Libertines. 3. Politicians.

To the votariſts of Antiquity I ſhall think to have fully anſwer'd, if I ſhall be able to prove out of Antiquity, Firſt, that if they will conform our Biſhops to the purer times, they muſt mew their feathers, and their pounces, and make but curt-tail'd Biſhops of them; and we know they hate to be dockt and clipt, as much as to be put down outright. Secondly, that thoſe purer times were corrupt, and their Books corrupted ſoon after. Thirdly, that the beſt of thoſe that then wrote diſclaim that any man ſhould repoſe on them, and ſend all to the Scriptures.

Firſt therefore, if thoſe that over-affect Antiquity will follow the ſquare thereof, their Biſhops muſt be elected by the hands of the whole Church. The ancienteſt of the extant Fathers, Ignatius, writing to the Philadelphians, ſaith, that it belongs to them as to the Church of God to chooſe a Biſhop. Let no man cavil, but take the Church of God as meaning the whole conſiſtence of Orders and Members, as St. Paul's Epiſtles expreſs, and this likewiſe being read over: Beſides this, it is there to be mark'd, that thoſe Philadelphians are exhorted to chooſe a Biſhop of Antioch. Whence it ſeems by the way that there was not that wary limitation of Dioceſs in thoſe times, which is confirm'd even by a faſt friend of Epiſcopacy, Camden, who cannot but love Biſhops, as well as old coins, and his much lamented Monaſteries, for antiquities ſake. He writes in his deſcription of Scotland, that over all the world Biſhops had no certain Dioces, till Pope Dionyſius about the year 268 did cut them out; and that the Biſhops of Scotland executed their function in what place ſoever they came indifferently, and without diſtinction, till King Malcolm the third, about the year 1070. Whence may be gueſt what their function was: Was it to go about circl'd with a band of rooking Officials, with cloke-bags full of Citations, and Proceſſes to be ſerv'd by a corporalty of griffon-like Promooters and Apparitors? Did he go about to pitch down his Court, as an Empirick does his banck, to inveigle in all the Money of the Country? No certainly it would not have bin permitted him to exerciſe any ſuch Function indifferently wherever he came. And verily ſome ſuch matter it was as want of a fat Dioces that kept our Britain Biſhops ſo poor in the Primitive times, that being call'd to the Council of Ariminum in the year 359. they had not wherewithal to defray the charges of, their Journey, but were fed and lodg'd upon the Emperor's coſt; which muſt needs be no accidental, but uſual poverty in them: for the Author Sulpitius Severus in his 2d Book of Church-Hiſtory praiſes them, and avouches it praiſe-worthy in a Biſhop to be ſo poor as to have nothing of his own. But to return to the ancient election of Biſhops, that it could not lawfully be without the conſent of the People is ſo expreſs in Cyprian, and ſo often to be met with, that to cite each place at large, were to tranſlate a good part of the Volume; therefore touching the chief paſſages, I refer the reſt to whom ſo liſt peruſe the Author himſelf: in the 24 Epiſt. If a Biſhop, ſaith he, be once made and allow'd by the Teſtimony and Judgment of his Collegues and the People, no other can be made. In the 55. When a Biſhop is made by the ſuffrage of all the People in Peace. In the 68. mark but what he ſays; The People chiefly hath power either of chooſing worthy ones, or refuſing unworthy: This he there proves by Authorities out of the old and new Teſtament, and with ſolid reaſons: theſe were his antiquities.

This voice of the people, to be had ever in Epiſcopal Elections, was ſo well known, before Cyprian's time, even to thoſe that were without the Church, that the Emperor Alexander Severus deſir'd to have his Governours of Provinces choſen in the ſame manner, as Lampridius can tell; ſo little thought it he offenſive to Monarchy. And if ſingle authorities perſwade not, hearken what the whole general Council of Nicæa, the firſt and famouſeſt of all the reſt, determines, writing a Synodal Epiſtle to the African Churches, to warn them of Arianiſm; it exhorts them to chooſe orthodox Biſhops in the place of the dead, ſo they be worthy, and the people chooſe them, whereby they ſeem to make the peoples aſſent ſo neceſſary, that merit, without their free choice, were not ſufficient to make a Biſhop. What would ye ſay now, grave Fathers, if you ſhould wake and ſee unworthy Biſhops, or rather ther no Biſhops, but Egyptian task-maſters of Ceremonies thruſt purpoſely upon the groaning Church to the affliction and vexation of God's people? It was not of old that a Conſpiracy of Biſhops could fruſtrate and fob off the right of the people; for we may read how St. Martin, ſoon after Conſtantine, was made Biſhop of Turon in France by the peoples conſent, from all places thereabout, maugre all the oppoſition that the Biſhops could make. Thus went matters of the Church almoſt 400 years after Chriſt, and very probably far lower: for Nicephorus Phocas the Greek Emperor, whoſe reign fell near the 1000 year of our Lord, having done many things tyrannically, is ſaid by Cedrenus to have done nothing more grievous and diſpleaſing to the people, then to have inacted that no Biſhop ſhould be choſen without his will; ſo long did this right remain to the people in the midſt of other palpable corruptions. Now for Epiſcopal dignity, what it was, ſee out of Ignatius, who in his Epiſtle to thoſe of Trallis confeſſeth, that the Presbyters are his fellow-Counſellors and fellow-Benchers. And Cyprian in many places, as in the 6, 41, 52 Epiſt. ſpeaking of Presbyters, calls them his Compresbyters, as if he deem'd himſelf no other, whenas by the ſame place it appears he was a Biſhop, he calls them Brethren; but that will be thought his meekneſs: yea, but the Presbyters and Deacons writing to him, think they do him honour enough when they phraſe him no higher then Brother Cyprian, and dear Cyprian in the 26 Epiſt. For their Authority 'tis evident not to have bin ſingle, but depending on the counſel of the Presbyters, as from Ignatius was erewhile alledg'd; and the ſame Cyprian acknowledges as much in the 6 Epiſt. and adds thereto, that he had determin'd, from his entrance into the Office of Biſhop, to do nothing without the conſent of his people, and ſo in the 31 Epiſt. for it were tedious to courſe through all his writings, which are ſo full of the like aſſertions, inſomuch that ev'n in the womb and center of Apoſtacy, Rome it ſelf, there yet remains a glimps of this truth; for the Pope himſelf, as a learned Engliſh writer notes well, performeth all Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction as in Conſiſtory amongſt his Cardinals, which were originally but the Pariſh Prieſts of Rome. Thus then did the Spirit of unity and meekneſs inſpire and animate every joint and ſinew of the myſtical body; but now the graveſt and worthieſt Miniſter, a true Biſhop of his fold, ſhall be revil'd and ruffl'd by an inſulting and only Canon-wiſe Prelat, as if he were ſome ſlight paltry companion: and the people of God, redeem'd and waſh'd with Chriſt's blood, and dignify'd with ſo many glorious titles of Saints, and Sons in the Goſpel, are now no better reputed then impure Ethnicks; and lay dogs, ſtones and pillars, and crucifixes have now the honour and the alms due to Chriſt's living members; the Table of Communion, now become a Table of Separation, ſtands like an exalted platform upon the brow of the Quire, fortifi'd with bulwark and barricado, to keep off the profane touch of the Laicks, whilſt the obſcene and ſurfeted Prieſt ſcruples not to paw and mammock the Sacramental Bread, as familiarly as his Tavern Bisket. And thus the people, vilifi'd and rejected by them, give over the earneſt ſtudy of vertue and godlineſs, as a thing of greater purity then they need, and the ſearch of divine knowledg as a myſtery too high for their capacities, and only for Church-men to meddle with; which is that the Prelats deſire, that when they have brought us back to Popiſh blindneſs, we might commit to their diſpoſe the whole managing of our Salvation, for they think it was never fair world with them ſince that time. But he that will mould a modern Biſhop into a primitive, muſt yeild him to be elected by the popular voice, undioceſt, unrevenu'd, unlorded, and leave him nothing but brotherly equality, matchleſs temperance, frequent faſting, inceſſant prayer and preaching, continual watchings and labours in his Miniſtry; which what a rich booty it would be, what a plump endowment to the many-benefice-gaping mouth of a Prelat, what a reliſh it would give to his canary-ſucking, and ſwan-eating palat, let old Biſhop Mountain judg for me.

How little therefore thoſe ancient times make for modern Biſhops hath bin plainly diſcours'd; but let them make for them as much as they will, yet why we ought not ſtand to their arbitrement, ſhall now appear by a threefold corruption which will be found upon them. 1. The beſt times were ſpreadingly infected. 2. The beſt men of thoſe times fouly tainted. 3. The beſt writings of thoſe men dangerouſly adulterated. Theſe Poſitions are to be made good out of thoſe times witneſſing of themſelves. Firſt, Ignatius in his early days teſtifies to the Churches of Aſia, that even then Hereſies were ſprung up, and riſe every where, as Euſebius relates in his 3 Book, 35 chap. after the Greek number. And Hegeſippus, a grave Church-writer of prime Antiquity, affirms in the ſame Book of Euſebius, c. 32. That while the Apoſtles were on earth, the depravers of Doctrine did but lurk; but they once gon, with open forehead they durſt preach down the truth with falſities. Yea, thoſe that are reckon'd for orthodox began to make ſad and ſhameful rents in the Church about the trivial celebration of Feaſts, not agreeing when to keep Eaſter-day; which controverſie grew ſo hot, that Victor the Biſhop of Rome excommunicated all the Churches of Aſia for no other cauſe, and was worthily therof reprov'd by Irenæus. For can any ſound Theologer think that theſe great Fathers underſtood what was Goſpel, or what was Excommunication? Doubtleſs that which led the good men into fraud and error was, that they attended more to the near tradition of what they heard the Apoſtles ſomtimes did, then to what they had left written, not conſidering that many things which they did were by the Apoſtles themſelves profeſt to be done only for the preſent, and of mere indulgence to ſome ſcrupulous converts of the Circumciſion, but what they writ was of firm decree to all future ages. Look but a century lower in the 1 cap. of Euſebius 8 Book. What a univerſal tetter of impurity had invenom'd every part, order, and degree of the Church, to omit the lay-herd, which will be little regarded, thoſe that ſeem'd to be our Paſtors, ſaith he, overturning the Law of God's worſhip, burnt in contentions one towards another, and increaſing in hatred and bitterneſs, outragiouſly ſought to uphold Lordſhip, and command as it were a Tyranny. Stay but a little, magnanimous Biſhops, ſuppreſs your aſpiring thoughts, for there is nothing wanting but Conſtantine to reign, and then Tyranny her ſelf ſhall give up all her cittadels into your hands, and count ye thence forward her truſtieſt agents. Such were theſe that muſt be call'd the ancienteſt and moſt virgin times between Chriſt and Conſtantine. Nor was this general contagion in their actions, and not in their writings: who is ignorant of the foul errors, the ridiculous wreſting of Scripture, the Hereſies, the vanities thick ſown through the volums of Juſtin Martyr, Clemens, Origen, Tertullian, and others of eldeſt time? Who would think him fit to write an Apology for Chriſtian Faith to the Roman Senat, that would tell them how of the Angels, which he muſt needs mean thoſe in Geneſis call'd the Sons of God, mixing with Women were begotten the Devils, as good Juſtin Martyr in his Apology told them. But more indignation would it move to any Chriſtian that ſhall read Tertullian, terming St. Paul a novice, and raw in grace, for reproving St. Peter at Antioch, worthy to be blam'd if we beleeve the Epiſtle to the Galatians: perhaps from this hint the blaſphemous Jeſuits preſum'd in Italy to give their judgment of St. Paul, as of a hot-headed perſon, as Sandys in his Relations tells us.

Now beſides all this, who knows not how many ſurreptitious works are ingraff'd into the legitimate writings of the Fathers? and of thoſe Books that paſs for authentick, who knows what hath bin tamper'd withal, what hath bin raz'd out, what hath bin inſerted? Beſides the late legerdemain of the Papiſts, that which Sulpitius writes concerning Origen's Books, gives us cauſe vehemently to ſuſpect, there hath bin packing of old. In the third chap. of his 1 Dialogue we may read what wrangling the Biſhops and Monks had about the reading or not reading of Origen, ſome objecting that he was corrupted by Hereticks, others anſwering that all ſuch Books had bin ſo dealt with. How then ſhall I truſt theſe times to lead me, that teſtify ſo ill of leading themſelves? Certainly of their defects their own witneſs may be beſt receiv'd, but of the rectitude and ſincerity of their life and doctrine, to judg rightly, we muſt judg by that which was to be their rule.

But it will be objected, that this was an unſetl'd ſtate of the Church, wanting the temporal Magiſtrate to ſuppreſs the licence of falſe Brethren, and the extravagancy of ſtill new opinions; a time not imitable for Church-government, where the temporal and ſpiritual power did not cloſe in one belief, as under Conſtantine. I am not of opinion to think the Church a Vine in this reſpect, becauſe, as they take it, ſhe cannot ſubſiſt without claſping about the Elm of worldly ſtrength and felicity, as if the heavenly City could not ſupport port it ſelf without the props and buttreſſes of ſecular Authority. They extol Conſtantine becauſe he extoll'd them; as our homebred Monks in their Hiſtories blanch the Kings their Benefactors, and brand thoſe that went about to be their Correctors. If he had curb'd the growing Pride, Avarice and Luxury of the Clergy, then every Page of his Story ſhould have ſwell'd with his faults, and that which Zozimus the Heathen writes of him ſhould have come in to boot: we ſhould have heard then in every declamation how he ſlew his Nephew Commodus a worthy man, his noble and eldeſt Son Criſpus, his Wife Fauſta, beſides numbers of his Friends; then his cruel exactions, his unſoundneſs in Religion, favoring the Arians that had been condemn'd in a Council, of which himſelf ſat as it were Preſident; his hard meaſure and baniſhment of the faithful and invincible Athanaſius; his living unbaptiz'd almoſt to his dying day; theſe blurs are too apparent in his Life. But ſince he muſt needs be the Load-ſtar of Reformation, as ſome men clatter, it will be good to ſee further his knowledg of Religion what it was, and by that we may likewiſe gueſs at the ſincerity of his times in thoſe that were not Heretical, it being likely that he would converſe with the famouſeſt Prelats (for ſo he had made them) that were to be found for Learning.

Of his Arianiſm we heard, and for the reſt, a pretty ſcantling of his Knowledg may be taken by his deferring to be baptiz'd ſo many years, a thing not uſual, and repugnant to the tenor of Scripture, Philip knowing nothing that ſhould hinder the Eunuch to be baptiz'd after profeſſion of his Belief. Next, by the exceſſive devotion, that I may not ſay Superſtition both of him and his Mother Helena, to find out the Croſs on which Chriſt ſuffer'd, that had long lien under the rubbiſh of old ruines, (a thing which the Diſciples and Kindred of our Saviour might with more eaſe have done, if they had thought it a pious duty:) ſome of the nails whereof he put into his Helmet, to bear off blows in battel, others he faſten'd among the ſtuds of his bridle, to fulfil (as he thought, or his Court Biſhops perſwaded him) the Propheſie of Zechariah; And it ſhall be that that which is in the bridle ſhall be holy to the Lord. Part of the Croſs in which he thought ſuch Virtue to reſide, as would prove a kind of Palladium to ſave the City wherever it remain'd, he caus'd to be laid up in a Pillar of Porphyrie by his Statue. How he or his Teachers could trifle thus with half an eye open upon St. Paul's Principles, I know not how to imagine.

How ſhould then the dim Taper of this Emperor's age that had ſuch need of ſnuffing, extend any beam to our times wherewith we might hope to be better lighted, then by thoſe Luminaries that God hath ſet up to ſhine to us far nearer hand. And what Reformation he wrought for his own time, it will not be amiſs to conſider; he appointed certain times for Faſts and Feaſts, built ſtately Churches, gave large Immunities to the Clergy, great Riches and Promotions to Biſhops, gave and miniſter'd occaſion to bring in a deluge of Ceremonies, thereby either to draw in the Heathen by a reſemblance of their Rites, or to ſet a gloſs upon the ſimplicity and plainneſs of Chriſtianity; which to the gorgeous Solemnities of Paganiſm, and the ſenſe of the World's Children, ſeem'd but a homely and yeomanly Religion, for the beauty of inward Sanctity was not within their proſpect.

So that in this manner the Prelats, both then and ever ſince, coming from a mean and plebeian Life, on a ſudden to be Lords of ſtately Palaces, rich furniture, delicious fare, and princely attendance, thought the plain and homeſpun verity of Chriſt's Goſpel unfit any longer to hold their Lordſhips acquaintance, unleſs the poor thredbare Matron were put into better clothes; her chaſt and modeſt vail, ſurrounded with celeſtial beams, they overlaid with wanton treſſes, and in a flaring tire beſpeckl'd her with all the gaudy allurements of a Whore.

Thus flouriſh'd the Church with Conſtantine's wealth, and thereafter were the effects that follow'd; his Son Conſtantius prov'd a flat Arian, and his Nephew Julian an Apoſtate, and there his Race ended: the Church that before by inſenſible degrees welk'd and impair'd, now with large ſteps went down hill decaying; at this time Antichriſt began firſt to put forth his horn, and that ſaying was common, that former times had wooden Chalices and golden Prieſts; but they golden Chalices and wooden Prieſts. Formerly (ſaith Sulpitius, tius) Martyrdom by glorious death was ſought more greedily then now Biſhopricks by vile Ambition are hunted after, (ſpeaking of theſe times) and in another place, they gape after poſſeſſions, they tend Lands and Livings, they coure over their Gold, they buy and ſell: and if there be any that neither poſſeſs nor traffique, that which is worſe, they ſit ſtill, and expect gifts, and proſtitute every induement of Grace, every holy thing to ſale. And in the end of his Hiſtory thus he concludes, all things went to wrack by the Faction, Wilfulneſs, and Avarice of the Biſhops, and by this means God's people, and every good man was had in ſcorn and deriſion: which St. Martin found truly to be ſaid by his friend Sulpitius; for being held in admiration of all men, he had only the Biſhops his enemies, found God leſs favourable to him after he was Biſhop then before, and for his laſt 16 years would come at no Biſhop's meeting. Thus you ſee, Sir, what Conſtantine's doings in the Church brought forth, either in his own or in his Son's Reign.

Now leſt it ſhould be thought that ſomething elſe might ail this Author thus to hamper the Biſhops of thoſe days; I will bring you the opinion of three the famouſeſt men for Wit and Learning that Italy at this day glories of, whereby it may be concluded for a receiv'd opinion even among men profeſſing the Romiſh Faith, that Conſtantine marr'd all in the Church. Dante in his 19 Canto of Inferno hath thus, as I will render it you in Engliſh blank Verſe:

Ah Conſtantine, of how much ill was cauſe
Not thy Converſion, but thoſe rich demains
That the firſt wealthy Pope receiv'd of thee.

So in his 20 Canto of Paradiſe he makes the like complaint, and Petrarch ſeconds him in the ſame mind in his 108 Sonnet, which is wip't out by the Inquiſitor in ſome Editions; ſpeaking of the Roman Antichriſt as merely bred up by Conſtantine.

Founded in chaſt and humble Poverty,
'Gainſt them that rais'd thee doſt thou lift thy horn,
Impudent whoore, where haſt thou plac'd thy hope?
In thy Adulterers, or thy ill got wealth?
Another Conſtantine comes not in haſt.

Arioſto of Ferrara, after both theſe in time, but equal in fame, following the ſcope of his Poem in a difficult knot how to reſtore Orlando his chief Hero to his loſt ſenſes, brings Aſtolfo the Engliſh Knight up into the Moon, where St. John, as he feigns, met him. Cant. 34.

And to be ſhort, at laſt his guid him brings
Into a goodly valley, where he ſees
A mighty maſs of things ſtrangely confus'd,
Things that on earth were loſt, or were abus'd.

And amongſt theſe ſo abuſed things, liſten what he met withal, under the Conduct of the Evangeliſt.

Then paſt he to a flowry Mountain green,
Which once ſmelt ſweet, now ſtinks as odiouſly;
This was that gift (if you the truth will have)
That Conſtantine to good Sylveſtro gave.

And this was a truth well known in England before this Poet was born, as our Chaucer's Plowman ſhall tell you by and by upon another occaſion. By all theſe circumſtances laid together, I do not ſee how it can be diſputed what good this Emperor Conſtantine wrought to the Church, but rather whether ever any, though perhaps not wittingly, ſet open a door to more miſchief in Chriſtendom. There is juſt cauſe therefore that when the Prelats cry out, Let the Church be reform'd according to Conſtantine, it ſhould ſound to a judicious ear no otherwiſe, then if they ſhould ſay, Make us rich, make us lofty, make us lawleſs; for if any under him were not ſo, thanks to thoſe ancient remains of Integrity, which were not yet quite worn out, and not to his Government.

Thus finally it appears, that thoſe purer Times were not ſuch as they are cry'd up, and not to be follow'd without ſuſpicion, doubt and danger. The laſt Point wherein the Antiquary is to be dealt with at his own Weapon, is to make it manifeſt, that the ancienteſt and beſt of the Fathers have diſclaim'd all Sufficiency in themſelves that Men ſhould rely on, and ſent all Comers to the Scriptures, as allſufficient: That this is true, will not be unduly gather'd by ſhewing what eſteem they had of Antiquity themſelves, and what validity they thought in it to prove Doctrine, or Diſcipline. I muſt of neceſſity begin from the ſecond Rank of Fathers, becauſe till then Antiquity could have no Plea. Cyprian in his 63 Epiſtle: If any, ſaith he, of our Anceſtors, either ignorantly, or out of ſimplicity, hath not obſerv'd that which the Lord taught us by his Example, (ſpeaking of the Lord's Supper) his ſimplicity God may pardon of his Mercy; but we cannot be excus'd for following him, being inſtructed by the Lord. And have not we the ſame Inſtructions, and will not this holy Man, with all the whole Conſiſtory of Saints and Martyrs that liv'd of old, riſe up and ſtop our mouths in Judgment, when we ſhall go about to father our Errors and Opinions upon their Authority? In the 73 Epiſt. he adds, In vain do they oppoſe Cuſtom to us, if they be overcome by Reaſon; as if Cuſtom were greater then Truth, or that in ſpiritual things that were not to be follow'd, which is reveal'd for the better by the Holy Ghoſt. In the 74, Neither ought Cuſtom to hinder that Truth ſhould not prevail; for Cuſtom without Truth is but agedneſs of Error.

Next Lactantius, he that was prefer'd to have the bringing up of Conſtantine's Children, in his ſecond Book of Inſtitutions, Chap. 7 & 8. diſputes againſt the vain truſt in Antiquity, as being the chiefeſt Argument of the Heathen againſt the Chriſtians: They do not conſider, ſaith he, what Religion is; but they are confident it is true, becauſe the Ancients deliver'd it; they count it a Treſpaſs to examine it. And in the eighth: Not becauſe they went before us in Time, therefore in Wiſdom; which being given alike to all Ages, cannot be prepoſſeſt by the Ancients: Wherefore ſeeing that to ſeek the Truth is inbred to all, they bereave themſelves of Wiſdom, the Gift of God, who without Judgment follow the Ancients, and are led by others like brute Beaſts. St. Auſtin writes to Fortunatian, that he counts it lawful in the Books of whomſoever, to reject that which he finds otherwiſe then true, and ſo he would have others deal by him. He neither accounted, as it ſeems, thoſe Fathers that went before, nor himſelf, nor others of his Rank, for Men of more then ordinary Spirit, that might equally deceive, and be deceiv'd: and oftimes ſetting our ſervile humours aſide, yea, God ſo ordering, we may find Truth with one Man, as ſoon as in a Council, as Cyprian agrees, 71 Epiſt. Many things, ſaith he, are better reveal'd to ſingle Perſons. At Nicæa in the firſt, and beſt reputed Council of all the World, there had gon out a Canon to divorce married Prieſts, had not one old Man Paphnutius ſtood up, and reaſon'd againſt it.

Now remains it to ſhew clearly that the Fathers refer all deciſion of Controverſy to the Scriptures, as all-ſufficient to direct, to reſolve, and to determine. Ignatius taking his laſt leave of the Aſian Churches, as he went to Martyrdom, exhorted them to adhere cloſe to the written Doctrine of the Apoſtles, neceſſarily written for Poſterity: ſo far was he from unwritten Traditions, as may be read in the 36 cap. of Euſebius 3. b. In the 74 Epiſt. of Cyprian againſt Stefan Biſhop of Rome impoſing upon him a Tradition; Whence, quoth he, is this Tradition? Is it fetcht from the Authority of Chriſt in the Goſpel, or of the Apoſtles in their Epiſtles? for God teſtifies that thoſe things are to be done which are written. And then thus, What Obſtinacy, what Preſumption is this, to prefer Humane Tradition before Divine Ordinance? And in the ſame Epiſt. If we ſhall return to the head, and beginning of Divine Tradition, (which we all know he means the Bible) humane Error ceaſes; and the reaſon of heavenly Myſteries unfolded, whatſoever was obſcure, becomes clear. And in the 14 Diſtinct. of the ſame Epiſt. directly againſt our modern Fantaſies of a ſtill Viſible Church, he teaches, That ſucceſſion of Truth may fail; to renew which, we muſt have recourſe to the Fountains ; uſing this excellent Similitude, If a Channel, or Conduit-pipe which brought in Water plentifully before, ſuddenly fail, do we not go to the Fountain to know the Cauſe, whether the Spring affords no more, or whether the Vein be ſtopt, or turn'd aſide in the mid-courſe ? Thus ought we to do, keeping God's Precepts, that if in ought the Truth ſhall be chang'd, we may repair to the Goſpel, and to the Apoſtles, that thence may ariſe the reaſon of our doings, from whence our order and beginning aroſe. In the 75 he inveighs bitterly againſt Pope Stefanus, for that he could boaſt his Succeſſion from Peter, and yet foiſt in Traditions that were not Apoſtolical. And in his Book of the Unity of the Church, he compares thoſe that, neglecting God's Word, follow the Doctrines of Men, to Corah, Dathan, and Abiram. The very firſt Page of Athanaſius againſt the Gentiles, avers the Scriptures to be ſufficient of themſelves for the declaration of Truth ; and that if his Friend Macarius read other Religious Writers, it was but φιλοκάλως come un virtuoſo, (as the Italians ſay) as a lover of Elegance : And in his 2*d* Tome, the 39 pag. after he hath reckon'd up the Canonical Books, In theſe only, ſaith he, is the Doctrine of Godlineſs taught ; Let no Man add to theſe, or take from theſe. And in his Synopſis, having again ſet down all the Writers of the Old and New Teſtament, Theſe, ſaith he, be the Anchors and Props of our Faith. Beſides theſe, millions of other Books have been written by great and wiſe Men according to Rule, and agreement with theſe, of which I will not now ſpeak, as being of infinite number, and meer dependance on the Canonical Books. Baſil in his 2*d* Tome, writing of true Faith, tells his Auditors, He is bound to teach them that which he hath learn't out of the Bible : And in the ſame Treatiſe he ſaith, That ſeeing the Commandments of the Lord are faithful, and ſure for ever ; it is a plain falling from the Faith, and a high pride, either to make void any thing therein, or to introduce any thing not there to be found : And he gives the reaſon, for Chriſt ſaith, My Sheep hear my Voice, they will not follow another, but fly from him, becauſe they know not his Voice. But not to be endleſs in Quotations, it may chance to be objected, that there be many Opinions in the Fathers which have no ground in Scripture ; ſo much the leſs, may I ſay, ſhould we follow them, for their own words ſhall condemn them, and acquit us that lean not on them ; otherwiſe theſe their words will acquit them, and condemn us. But it will be reply'd, the Scriptures are difficult to be underſtood, and therefore require the Explanation of the Fathers. 'Tis true, there be ſome Books, and eſpecially ſome places in thoſe Books, that remain clouded ; yet ever that which is moſt neceſſary to be known, is moſt eaſy ; and that which is moſt difficult, ſo far expounds it ſelf ever, as to tell us how little it imports our ſaving Knowledg. Hence to infer a general Obſcurity over all the Text, is a meer Suggeſtion of the Devil to diſſwade Men from reading it, and caſts an Aſperſion of Diſhonour both upon the Mercy, Truth, and Wiſdom of God. We count it no gentleneſs, or fair dealing in a Man of Power amongſt us, to require ſtrict and punctual Obedience, and yet give out all his Commands ambiguous and obſcure, we ſhould think he had a Plot upon us ; certainly ſuch Commands were no Commands, but Snares. The very Eſſence of Truth is plainneſs and brightneſs, the darkneſs and crookedneſs is our own. The Wiſdom of God created Underſtanding, fit and proportionable to Truth, the Object, and End of it, as the Eye to the thing viſible. If our Underſtanding have a Film of Ignorance over it, or be blear with gazing on other falſe Gliſterings ; what is that to Truth ? If we will purge with ſovrain Eyeſalve that intellectual Ray which God hath planted in us, then we would believe the Scriptures proteſting their own plainneſs and perſpicuity, calling to them to be inſtructed, not only the Wiſe and Learned, but the Simple, the Poor, the Babes, foretelling an extraordinary effuſion of Gods Spirit upon every Age, and Sex, attributing to all Men, and requiring from them the Ability of ſearching, trying, examining all things, and by the Spirit diſcerning that which is good ; and as the Scriptures themſelves pronounce their own plainneſs, ſo do the Fathers teſtify of them.

I will not run into a Paroxyſm of Citations again in this Point, only inſtance Athanaſius in his fore-mention'd firſt page ; The knowledg of Truth, ſaith he, wants no humane Lore, as being evident in it ſelf, and by the preaching of Chriſt now opens brighter then the Sun. If theſe Doctors, who had ſcarce half the Light that we enjoy, who all, except two or three, were ignorant of the Hebrew Tongue, and many of the Greek, blundering upon the dangerous and ſuſpectful Tranſlations of the Apoſtat Aquila, the Heretical Theodotion, the Judaiz'd Symmachus, the Erroneous Origen; if theſe could yet find the Bible ſo eaſy, why ſhould we doubt, that have all the helps of Learning, and faithful Induſtry that Man in this Life can look for, and the Aſſiſtance of God as near now to us as ever? But let the Scriptures be hard; are they more hard, more crabbed, more abſtruſe then the Fathers? He that cannot underſtand the ſober, plain, and unaffected ſtile of the Scriptures, will be ten times more puzzl'd with the knotty Africaniſms, the pamper'd Metaphors, the intricat and involv'd Sentences of the Fathers, beſides the fantaſtick and declamatory flaſhes, the croſs-jingling Periods which cannot but diſturb, and come thwart a ſettl'd Devotion, worſe then the din of Bells and Rattles.

Now, Sir, for the love of holy Reformation, what can be ſaid more againſt theſe importunate Clients of Antiquity, then ſhe her ſelf their Patroneſs hath ſaid? Whether think ye would ſhe approve ſtill to dote upon immeaſurable, innumerable, and therefore unneceſſary and unmerciful Volumes, chuſing rather to err with the ſpecious Name of the Fathers, or to take a ſound Truth at the hand of a plain upright Man, that all his days hath been diligently reading the holy Scriptures, and thereto imploring God's Grace, while the admirers of Antiquity have bin beating their Brains about their Ambones, their Diptychs, and Meniaia's? Now, he that cannot tell of Stations and Indictions, nor has waſted his precious hours in the endleſs conferring of Councils and Conclaves that demoliſh one another, although I know many of thoſe that pretend to be great Rabbies in theſe ſtudies, have ſcarce ſaluted them from the Strings, and the Title Page; or to give 'em more, have bin but the Ferrets and Mouſ-hunts of an Index: Yet what Paſtor or Miniſter, how learned, religious, or diſcreet ſoever, does not now bring both his Cheeks full blown with Oecumenical and Synodical, ſhall be counted a lank, ſhallow, unſufficient Man, yea a Dunce, and not worthy to ſpeak about Reformation of Church-Diſcipline. But I truſt they for whom God hath reſerv'd the honour of reforming this Church, will eaſily perceive their Adverſaries drift in thus calling for Antiquity; they fear the plain Field of the Scriptures, the Chaſe is too hot; they ſeek the dark, the buſhy, the tangled Forreſt, they would imboſk: they feel themſelves ſtrook in the tranſparent Streams of Divine Truth, they would plunge, and tumble, and think to lie hid in the foul Weeds and muddy Waters, where no Plummet can reach the bottom. But let them beat themſelves like Whales, and ſpend their Oil till they be drag'd aſhoar: though wherefore ſhould the Miniſters give them ſo much Line for Shifts and Delays? Wherefore ſhould they not urge only the Goſpel, and hold it ever in their Faces like a Mirror of Diamond, till it dazle and pierce their miſty Eye-balls? maintaining it the honour of its abſolute Sufficiency and Supremacy inviolable: For if the Scripture be for Reformation, and Antiquity to boot, 'tis but an advantage to the Dozen, 'tis no winning Caſt: And though Antiquity be againſt it, while the Scriptures be for it, the Cauſe is as good as ought to be wiſht, Antiquity it ſelf ſitting Judg.

But to draw to an end; the ſecond ſort of thoſe that may be juſtly number'd among the hinderers of Reformation, are Libertines; theſe ſuggeſt that the Diſcipline ſought would be intolerable: For one Biſhop now in a Dioceſs we ſhould then have a Pope in every Pariſh. It will not be requiſite to anſwer theſe Men, but only to diſcover them, for Reaſon they have none, but Luſt and Licentiouſneſs, and therefore Anſwer can have none. It is not any Diſcipline that they could live under, it is the corruption and remiſneſs of Diſcipline that they ſeek. Epiſcopacy duly executed, yea, the Turkiſh and Jewiſh rigor againſt whoring and drinking; the dear and tender Diſcipline of a Father, the ſociable and loving Reproof of a Brother, the boſom Admonition of a Friend, is a Presbytery, and a Conſiſtory to them. 'Tis only the merry Frier in Chaucer can diſple them.

Full ſweetly heard he Confeſſion,
And pleaſant was his Abſolution,
He was an eaſy Man to give Pennance.

And ſo I leave them; and refer the political Diſcourſe of Epiſcopacy to a Second Book.

Of REFORMATION, &c.

The Second BOOK.

SIR,

IT is a work good and prudent to be able to guide one Man; of larger extended Vertue to order well one Houſe: but to govern a Nation piouſly and juſtly, which only is to ſay happily, is for a Spirit of the greateſt ſize, and divineſt mettle. And certainly of no leſs a mind, nor of leſs excellenee in another way, were they who by Writing laid the ſolid and true foundations of this Science; which being of greateſt importance to the Life of man, yet there is no Art that hath bin more canker'd in her Principles, more ſoil'd, and ſlubber'd with aphoriſming pedantry, then the art of Policy; and that moſt, where a man would think ſhould leaſt be in Chriſtian Commonwealths. They teach not, that to govern well, is to train up a Nation in true Wiſdom and Vertue, and that which ſprings from thence, Magnanimity, (take heed of that) and that which is our beginning, Regeneration, and happieſt end, likenes to God, which in one word we call Godlines; and that this is the true floriſhing of a Land, other things follow as the ſhadow does the Subſtance; to teach thus were meer pulpitry to them. This is the maſter-piece of a modern Politician, how to qualify and mould the ſufferance and ſubjection of the People to the length of that Foot that is to tread on their Necks; how Rapine may ſerve it ſelf with the fair and honourable pretences of publick Good; how the puny Law may be brought under the wardſhip and controul of Luſt and Will: in which attempt if they fall ſhort, then muſt a ſuperficial colour of Reputation by all means, direct or indirect, be gotten to waſh over the unſightly bruſe of Honour. To make men governable in this manner, their Precepts mainly tend to break a national Spirit and Courage, by countenancing open Riot, Luxury, and Ignorance, till having thus disfigur'd and made men beneath men, as Juno in the Fable of Io, they deliver up the poor transformed heifer of the Commonwealth to be ſtung and vext with the breeſe and goad of Oppreſſion, under the cuſtody of ſome Argus with a hundred eyes of Jealouſy. To be plainer, Sir, how to ſoder, how to ſtop a Leak, how to keep up the floting carcas of a craſy and diſeaſed Monarchy or State, betwixt wind and water, ſwimming ſtill upon her own dead Lees, that now is the deep deſign of a Politician. Alas, Sir! a Commonwealth ought to be but as one huge Chriſtian perſonage, one mighty growth and ſtature of an honeſt man, as big and compact in Vertue as in Body; for look what the grounds and cauſes are of ſingle Happineſs to one man, the ſame ye ſhall find them to a whole State, as Ariſtotle both in his Ethicks, and Politicks, from the principles of Reaſon lays down: by conſequence therefore that which is good and agreeable to Monarchy, will appear ſooneſt to be ſo, by being good and agreeable to the true welfare of every Chriſtian; and that which can be juſtly prov'd hurtful and offenſive to every true Chriſtian, will be evinc't to be alike hurtful to Monarchy: for God forbid, that we ſhould ſeparate and diſtinguiſh the end and good of a Monarch, from the end and good of the Monarchy, or that from Chriſtianity. How then this third and laſt ſort that hinder Reformation, will juſtify that it ſtands not with reaſon of State, I much muſe: For certain I am, the Bible is ſhut againſt them, as certain that neither Plato nor Ariſtotle is for their turns. What they can bring us now from the Schools of Loyola with his Jeſuits, or their Malvezzi, that can cut Tacitus into ſlivers and ſteaks, we ſhall preſently hear. They alledg, 1. That the Church-Government muſt be conformable to the civil Polity; next, that no form of Church-Government is agreeable to Monarchy, but that of Biſhops. Muſt Church-Government that is appointed in the Goſpel, and has chief reſpect ſpect to the Soul, be conformable and pliant to Civil, that is Arbitrary, and chiefly converſant about the viſible and external part of man? This is the very Maxim that moulded the Calvs of Bethel and of Dan; this was the quinteſſence of Jeroboams Policy, he made Religion conform to his politick Intereſts; and this was the Sin that watcht over the Iſraelites till their final Captivity. If this State-principle come from the Prelats, as they affect to be counted Statiſts, let them look back to Elutherius Biſhop of Rome, and ſee what he thought of the Policy of England; being requir'd by Lucius, the firſt Chriſtian King of this Iland, to gixe his Counſel for the founding of Religious Laws, little thought he of this ſage Caution, but bids him betake himſelf to the Old and New Teſtament, and receive direction from them how to adminiſter both Church and Commonwealth; that he was Gods Vicar, and therefore to rule by Gods Laws; that the Edicts of Cæſar we may at all times diſallow, but the Statutes of God for no reaſon we may reject. Now certain if Church-Government be taught in the Goſpel, as the Biſhops dare not deny, we may well conclude of what late ſtanding this Poſition is, newly calculated for the altitude of Biſhop-elevation, and lettice for their Lips. But by what example can they ſhew that the form of Church-Diſcipline muſt be minted, and modell'd out to ſecular pretences? The antient Republick of the Jews is evident to have run through all the changes of civil Eſtate, if we ſurvey the Story from the giving of the Law to the Herods; yet did one manner of Prieſtly Government ſerve without inconvenience to all theſe temporal Mutations; it ſerv'd the mild Ariſtocracy of elective Dukes, and heads of Tribes join'd with them; the dictatorſhip of the Judges, the eaſy or hard-handed Monarchy's, the domeſtick or foreign Tyrannies: Laſtly, The Roman Senat from without, the Jewiſh Senat at home, with the Galilean Tetrarch; yet the Levites had ſome right to deal in civil Affairs: but ſeeing the Evangelical Precept forbids Churchmen to intermedle with worldly Imployments, what interweavings, or interworkings can knit the Miniſter and the Magiſtrate in their ſeveral Functions, to the regard of any preciſe Correſpondency? Seeing that the Churchmans Office is only to teach men the Chriſtian Faith, to exhort all, to incourage the Good, to admoniſh the Bad, privately the leſs Offender, publickly the ſcandalous and ſtubborn; to cenſure and ſeparate from the Communion of Chriſts Flock, the contagious and incorrigible, to receive with Joy and fatherly Compaſſion the Penitent; all this muſt be done, and more then this, is beyond any Church Autority. What is all this either here or there, to the Temporal regiment of Wealpublick, whether it be Popular, Princely, or Monarchical? Where doth it intrench upon the temporal Governor? where does it come in his walk? Where does it make inrode upon his Juriſdiction? Indeed if the Miniſters part be rightly diſcharg'd, it renders him the People more conſcionable, quiet, and eaſy to be govern'd; if otherwiſe, his Life and Doctrine will declare him. If therefore the Conſtitution of the Church be already ſet down by divine Preſcript, as all ſides confeſs, then can ſhe not be a Handmaid to wait on civil Commodities, and Reſpects: and if the Nature and Limits of Church-Diſcipline be ſuch, as are either helpful to all political Eſtates indifferently, or have no particular relation to any, then is there no neceſſity, nor indeed poſſibility of linking the one with the other in a ſpecial conformation.

Now for their ſecond concluſion, That no form of Church-Government is agreeable to Monarchy, but that of Biſhops, although it fall to pieces of it ſelf by that which hath bin ſaid; yet to give them play, front and rear, it ſhall be my task to prove that Epiſcopacy, with that Autority which it challenges in England, is not only not agreeable, but tending to the deſtruction of Monarchy. While the Primitive Paſtors of the Church of God labour'd faithfully in their Miniſtry, tending only their Sheep, and not ſeeking, but avoiding all worldly matters as clogs, and indeed derogations and debaſements to their high Calling; little needed the Princes and Potentates of the Earth, which way ſoever the Goſpel was ſpread, to ſtudy ways how to make a Coherence between the Churches Polity, and theirs: therefore when Pilate heard once our Saviour Chriſt profeſſing that his Kingdom was not of this World, he thought the man could not ſtand much in Cæſars light, nor much indamage the Roman Empire: for if the Life of Chriſt be hid to this World, much more is his

Scepter unoperative, but in ſpiritual things. And thus liv'd for 2 or 3 Ages, the Succeſſors of the Apoſtles. But when through Conſtantines laviſh Superſtition they forſook their firſt love, and ſet themſelves up too in Gods ſtead; Mammon and their Belly, then taking advantage of the ſpiritual Power which they had on mens Conſciences, they began to caſt a longing eye to get the Body alſo, and bodily things into their command; upon which their carnal deſires, the Spirit daily quenching and dying in them, knew no way to keep themſelves up from falling to nothing, but by bolſtering and ſupporting their inward rottenes, by a carnal and outward Strength. For a while they rather privily ſought opportunity, then haſtily diſclos'd their Project; but when Conſtantine was dead, and 3 or 4 Emperors more, their drift became notorious and offenſive to the whole World; for while Theodoſius the younger reign'd, thus writes Socrates the Hiſtorian in his 7th Book Chap. 11. Now began an ill name to ſtick upon the Biſhops of Rome and Alexandria, who beyond their Prieſtly bounds now long ago had ſtept into Principality, and this was ſcarce 80 years ſince their raiſing from the meaneſt worldly Condition. Of courteſy now let any man tell me, if they draw to themſelves a temporal Strength and Power out of Cæſars Dominion, is not Cæſars Empire thereby diminiſht? But this was a ſtoln bit, hitherto he was but a Caterpiller ſecretly gnawing at Monarchy; the next time you ſhall ſee him a Wolf, a Lion, lifting his Paw againſt his Raiſer, as Petrarch expreſt it, and finally an open enemy and ſubverter of the Greek Empire. Philippicus and Leo, with divers other Emperors after them, not without the advice of their Patriarchs, and at length of a whole Eaſtern Council of three hundred thirty eight Biſhops, threw the Images out of Churches as being decreed Idolatrous.

Upon this goodly occaſion, the Biſhop of Rome not only ſeizes the City, and all the Territory about into his own Hands, and makes himſelf Lord thereof; which till then was govern'd by a Greek Magiſtrate, but abſolves all Italy of their Tribute and Obedience due to the Emperor, becauſe he obey'd Gods Commandment in aboliſhing Idolatry.

Mark, Sir, here how the Pope came by S. Peters Patrimony, as he feigns it; not the Donation of Conſtantine, but Idolatry and Rebellion got it him. Ye need but read Sigonius, one of his own Sect, to know the Story at large. And now to ſhroud himſelf againſt a Storm from the Greek Continent, and provide a Champion to bear him out in theſe practiſes, he takes upon him by Papal ſentence to unthrone Chilpericus the rightful King of France, and gives the Kingdom to Pepin for no other cauſe, but that he ſeem'd to him the more active man. If he were a Friend herein to Monarchy I know not, but to the Monarch I need not ask what he was.

Having thus made Pepin his faſt Friend, he calls him into Italy againſt Aiſtulphus the Lombard, that war'd upon him for his late Uſurpation of Rome, as belonging to Ravenna which he had newly won. Pepin, not unobedient to the Popes call, paſſing into Italy, frees him out of danger, and wins for him the whole Exarchat of Ravenna; which though it had been almoſt immediately before the hereditary Poſſeſſion of that Monarchy which was his chief Patron and Benefactor, yet he takes and keeps it to himſelf as lawful prize, and given to St. Peter. What a dangerous ſallacy is this, when a Spiritual man may ſnatch to himſelf any temporal Dignity or Dominion, under pretence of receiving it for the Churches uſe? thus he claims Naples, Sicily, England, and what not? To be ſhort, under ſhew of his zeal againſt the errors of the Greek Church, he never ceaſt baiting and goring the Succeſſors of his beſt Lord Conſtantine, what by his barking Curſes and Excommunications, what by his hindring the Weſtern Princes from aiding them againſt the Sarazens and Turks, unleſs when they humour'd him; ſo that it may be truly affirm'd, he was the ſubverſion and fall of that Monarchy, which was the hoiſting of him. This beſides Petrarch, whom I have cited, our Chaucer alſo hath obſerv'd, and gives from hence a caution to England, to beware of her Biſhops in time, for that their ends and aims are no more friendly to Monarchy, then the Popes.

Thus he brings in the Plow-man ſpeaking, Part 2. Stanz. 28.

The Emperor Yaſe the Pope ſometime
So high Lordſhip him about,
That at laſt the ſilly Kime,
The proud Pope put him out ;
So of this Realm is no doubt,
But Lords beware, and them defend ;
For now theſe Folks be wonders ſtout,
The King and Lords now this amend.

And in the next Stanza, which begins the third part of the Tale, he argues that they ought not to be Lords.

Moſes Law forbode it tho
That Prieſts ſhould no Lordſhips welde,
Chriſts Goſpel biddeth alſo
That they ſhould no Lordſhips held:
Ne Chriſts Apoſtles were never ſo bold
No ſuch Lordſhips to hem embrace,
But ſmeren her Sheep, and keep her Fold.

And ſo forward. Whether the Biſhops of England have deſerv'd thus to be fear'd by men ſo wiſe as our Chaucer is eſteem'd ; and how agreeable to our Monarchy, and Monarchs, their demeanour has been, he that is but meanly read in our Chronicles needs not be inſtructed. Have they not been as the Canaanites, and Philiſtins, to this Kingdom ? What Treaſons, what revolts to the Pope ? what Rebellions, and thoſe the baſeſt and moſt pretenceleſs, have they not been chief in ? What could Monarchy think, when Becket durſt challenge the Cuſtody of Rocheſter-Caſtle, and the Tower of London, as appertaining to his Signory ? To omit his other inſolencies and affronts to regal Majeſty, till the Laſhes inflicted on the anointed Body of the King, waſht off the holy Unction with his Blood drawn by the polluted hands of Biſhops, Abbots, and Monks.

What good upholders of Royalty were the Biſhops, when by their rebellious oppoſition againſt King John, Normandy was loſt, he himſelf depos'd, and this Kingdom made over to the Pope ? When the Biſhop of Wincheſter durſt tell the Nobles, the Pillars of the Realm, that there were no Peers in England, as in France, but that the King might do what he pleas'd. What could Tyranny ſay more ? It would be petty now, if I ſhould inſiſt upon the rendring up of Tournay by Woolſeys Treaſon, the Excommunications, Curſings, and Interdicts upon the whole Land : For haply I ſhall be cut off ſhort by a Reply, that theſe were the faults of the men and their Popiſh errors, not of Epiſcopacy, that hath now renounc't the Pope, and is a Proteſtant. Yes ſure ; as wiſe and famous men have ſuſpected and fear'd the Proteſtant Epiſcopacy in England, as thoſe that have fear'd the Papal.

You know, Sir, what was the judgment of Padre Paolo, the great Venetian Antagoniſt of the Pope, for it is extant in the hands of many men, whereby he declares his fear, that when the Hierarchy of England ſhall light into the hands of buſy and audacious men, or ſhall meet with Princes tractable to the Prelacy, then much miſchief is like to enſue. And can it be nearer hand, then when Biſhops ſhall openly affirm that, No Biſhop, no King ? A trim Paradox, and that ye may know where they have been a begging for it, I will fetch you the Twin-brother to it out of the Jeſuits Cell ; they feeling the Ax of Gods Reformation, hewing at the old and hollow trunk of Papacy, and finding the Spaniard their ſureſt friend, and ſafeſt refuge, to ſooth him up in his Dream of a fift Monarchy, and withal to uphold the decrepit Papalty, have invented this ſuper-politick Aphoriſm, as one terms it, One Pope, and one King.

Surely there is not any Prince in Chriſtendom, who hearing this rare Sophiſtry, can chooſe but ſmile ; and if we be not blind at home, we may as well perceive that this worthy Motto, No Biſhop, no King, is of the ſame batch, and infanted out of the ſame fears, a meer Ague-cake coagulated of a certain Fever they have, preſaging their time to be but ſhort: and now like thoſe that are ſinking, they catch round at that which is likelieſt to hold them up; and would perſwade Regal Power, that if they dive, he muſt after. But what greater debaſement can there be to Royal Dignity, whoſe towring and ſtedfaſt heigth reſts upon the unmovable foundations of Juſtice, and Heroick Vertue, then to chain it in a dependance of ſubſiſting, or ruining to the painted Battlements and gaudy rottenneſs of Prelatrie, which want but one puff of the Kings to blow them down like a paſt-bord Houſe built of Court-Cards. Sir, the little ado which methinks I find in untacking theſe pleaſant Sophiſms, puts me into the mood to tell you a Tale ere I proceed further; and Menenius Agrippa ſpeed us.

A Tale of the Head and a Wen.

Upon a time the Body ſummon'd all the Members to meet in the Guild for the common good (as Æſops Chronicles aver many ſtranger Accidents) the Head by right takes the firſt ſeat, and next to it a huge and monſtrous Wen little leſs then the Head it ſelf, growing to it by a narrower excreſcency. The Members amaz'd began to ask one another what he was that took place next their chief; none could reſolve. Whereat the Wen, though unweildy, with much ado gets up, and beſpeaks the Aſſembly to this purpoſe: That as in place he was ſecond to the Head, ſo by due of merit; that he was to it an ornament, and ſtrength, and of ſpecial near relation; and that if the Head ſhould fail, none were fitter then himſelf to ſtep into his place; therefore he thought it for the honour of the Body, that ſuch Dignities and rich Indowments ſhould be decreed him, as did adorn, and ſet out the nobleſt Members. To this was anſwer'd, that it ſhould be conſulted. Then was a wiſe and learned Philoſopher ſent for, that knew all the Charters, Laws and Tenures of the Body. On him it is impos'd by all, as chief Committee, to examine, and diſcuſs the Claim and Petition of Right put in by the Wen; who ſoon perceiving the matter, and wondring at the boldneſs of ſuch a ſwoln Tumor, Wilt thou (quoth he) that art but a bottle of vitious and harden'd Excrements, contend with the lawful and free-born Members, whoſe certain number is ſet by ancient, and unrepealable Statute? Head thou art none, though thou receive this huge ſubſtance from it: What Office beareſt thou? What good canſt thou ſhew by thee done to the Common-weal? The Wen not eaſily daſh't replies, that his Office was his Glory; for ſo oft as the Soul would retire out of the Head from over the ſteaming vapours of the lower parts to Divine Contemplation, with him ſhe found the pureſt and quieteſt retreat, as being moſt remote from ſoil, and diſturbance. Lourdan, quoth the Philoſopher, thy folly is as great as thy filth; know that all the faculties of the Soul are confin'd of old to their ſeveral veſſels and ventricles, from which they cannot part without diſſolution of the whole Body; and that thou containſt no good thing in thee, but a heap of hard and loathſome Uncleannes, and art to the head a foul disfigurment and burden; when I have cut thee off, and open'd thee, as by the help of theſe Implements I will do, all men ſhall ſee.

But to return whence was digreſs't: ſeeing that the Throne of a King, as the wiſe King Solomon often remembers us, is eſtabliſht in Juſtice, which is the univerſal Juſtice that Ariſtotle ſo much praiſes, containing in it all other Vertues, it may aſſure us that the fall of Prelacy, whoſe actions are ſo far diſtant from Juſtice, cannot ſhake the leaſt fringe that borders the royal Canopy; but that their ſtanding doth continually oppoſe and lay battery to regal ſafety, ſhall by that which follows eaſily appear. Amongſt many ſecondary and acceſſory Cauſes that ſupport Monarchy, theſe are not of leaſt reckoning, though common to all other States: the love of the Subjects, the multitude, and valour of the People, and ſtore of Treaſure. In all theſe things hath the Kingdom bin of late ſore weak'nd, and chiefly by the Prelates. Firſt, let any man conſider, that if any Prince ſhall ſuffer under him a commiſſion of Autority to be exerciz'd, till all the Land grone and cry out, as againſt a whip of Scorpions, whether this be not likely to leſſen, and keel the affections of the Subject. Next what numbers of faithful, and free-born Engliſhmen, and good Chriſtians have bin conſtrain'd to forſake their deareſt home, their friends, and kindred, whom nothing but the wide Ocean, and the ſavage Deſerts of America could hide and ſhelter from the fury of the Biſhops? O Sir, if we could but ſee the ſhape of our dear Mother England, as Poets are wont to give a perſonal form to what they pleaſe, how would ſhe appear, think ye, but in a mourning weed, with aſhes upon her Head, and tears abundantly flowing from her Eyes, to behold ſo many of her Children expos'd at once, and thruſt from things of deareſt neceſſity, becauſe their Conſcience could not aſſent to things which the Biſhops thought indifferent? What more binding then Conſcience? What more free then Indifferency? Cruel then muſt that Indifferency needs be, that ſhall violate the ſtrict neceſſity of Conſcience; merciles and inhuman that free choyſe and liberty that ſhall break aſunder the bonds of Religion. Let the Aſtrologer be diſmay'd at the portentous blaze of Comets, and impreſſions in the Air, as foretelling troubles and changes to States: I ſhall believe there cannot be a more ill-boding Sign to a Nation (God turn the Omen from us) then when the Inhabitants, to avoid inſufferable Grievances at home, are inforc'd by heaps to forſake their Native Country. Now whereas the only remedy and amends againſt the depopulation and thinneſs of a Land within, is the borrow'd ſtrength of firm alliance from without, theſe Prieſtly Policies of theirs having thus exhauſted our domeſtick Forces, have gone the way alſo to leave us as naked of our firmeſt and faithfulleſt Neighbours abroad, by diſparaging, and alienating from us all Proteſtant Princes, and Common-wealths, who are not ignorant that our Prelats, and as many as they can infect, account them no better then a ſort of ſacrilegious and puritanical Rebels, preferring the Spaniard our deadly Enemy before them, and ſet all Orthodox Writers at nought in compariſon of the Jeſuits, who are indeed the only corrupters of Youth, and good Learning; and I have heard many wiſe and learned men in Italy ſay as much. It cannot be that the ſtrongeſt knot of Confederacy ſhould not daily ſlak'n, when Religion, which is the chief ingagement of our League, ſhall be turn'd to their reproach. Hence it is that the proſperous and prudent States of the United Provinces, whom we ought to love, if not for themſelves, yet for our own good work in them, they having bin in a manner planted and erected by us, and having bin ſince to us the faithful watch-men and diſcoverers of many a Popiſh and Auſtrian complotted Treaſon, and with us the partners of many a bloody and victorious Battel; whom the ſimilitude of Manners and Language, the commodity of Traffick, which founded the old Burgundian League betwixt us, but chiefly Religion, ſhould bind to us immortally; even ſuch friends as theſe, out of ſome Principles inſtill'd into us by the Prelats, have bin often diſmiſt with diſtaſtful Anſwers, and ſometimes unfriendly Actions: nor is it to be conſider'd to the breach of confederate Nations, whoſe mutual Intereſt is of ſuch high conſequence, though their Merchants bicker in the Eaſt Indies; neither is it ſafe, or warie, or indeed chriſtianly, that the French King, of a different Faith, ſhould afford our neereſt Allies as good Protection as we. Sir, I perſwade my ſelf, if our zeal to true Religion, and the brotherly uſage of our trueſt Friends, were as notorious to the world, as our Prelatical Schiſm, and Captivity to Rochet Apopthegmes, we had ere this ſeen our old Conquerours, and afterwards Liegemen the Normans, together with the Britains our proper Colony, and all the Gaſcoins that are the rightful Dowry of our ancient Kings, come with cap and knee, deſiring the ſhadow of the Engliſh Scepter to defend them from the hot Perſecutions and Taxes of the French. But when they come hither, and ſee a Tympany of Spanioliz'd Biſhops ſwaggering in the fore-top of the State, and meddling to turn and dandle the Royal Ball with unskilful and Pedantick Palms, no marvel though they think it as unſafe to commit Religion and Liberty to their arbitrating as to a Synagogue of Jeſuits.

But what do I ſtand reck'ning upon Advantages and Gains loſt by the miſrule and turbulency of the Prelats? what do I pick up ſo thriftily their ſcatterings and diminiſhings of the meaner Subject, whilſt they by their ſeditious Practices have indanger'd to loſe the King one third of his main Stock? What have they not done to baniſh him from his own Native Country? But to ſpeak of this as it ought would ask a Volume by it ſelf.

Thus as they have unpeopl'd the Kingdom by expulſion of ſo many thouſands, as they have endeavour'd to lay the skirts of it bare by diſheartning and diſhonouring our loyalleſt Confederates abroad, ſo have they hamſtrung the Valour of the Subject by ſeeking to effeminate us all at home. Well knows every wiſe Nation that their Liberty conſiſts in manly and honeſt Labours, in ſobriety and rigorous honour to the Marriage-Bed, which in both Sexes ſhould be bred up from chaſt Hopes to loyal Enjoyments; and when the People ſlacken, and fall to Looſeneſs and Riot, then do they as much as if they laid down their Necks for ſome wily Tyrant to get up and ride. Thus learnt Cyrus to tame the Lydians, whom by Arms he could not whilſt they kept themſelves from Luxury; with one eaſy Proclamation to ſet up Stews, dancing, feaſting, and dicing, he made them ſoon his Slaves. I know not what drift the Prelats had, whoſe Brokers they were to prepare, and ſupple us either for a Foreign Invaſion or Domeſtick Oppreſſion; but this I am ſure they took the ready way to deſpoil us both of Manhood and Grace at once, and that in the ſhamefulleſt and ungodlieſt manner, upon that Day which God's Law, and even our own Reaſon hath conſecrated, that we might have one day at leaſt of ſeven ſet apart wherein to examin and encreaſe our knowledg of God, to meditate, and commune of our Faith, our Hope, our eternal City in Heaven, and to quick'n withal the ſtudy and exerciſe of Charity; at ſuch a time that Men ſhould be pluck't from their ſobereſt and ſaddeſt Thoughts, and by Biſhops, the pretended Fathers of the Church, inſtigated by publick Edict, and with earneſt indeavour puſht forward to gaming, jigging, waſſailing, and mixt dancing, is a horror to think. Thus did the Reprobate hireling Prieſt Balaam ſeek to ſubdue the Iſraelites to Moab, if not by force, then by this diveliſh Policy, to draw them from the Sanctuary of God to the luxurious and ribald Feaſts of Baal-peor. Thus have they treſpas't not only againſt the Monarchy of England, but of Heaven alſo, as others, I doubt not, can proſecute againſt them.

I proceed within my own bounds to ſhew you next what good Agents they are about the Revenues and Riches of the Kingdom, which declares of what moment they are to Monarchy, or what avail. Two Leeches they have that ſtill ſuck, and ſuck the Kingdom, their Ceremonies and their Courts. If any man will contend that Ceremonies be lawful under the Goſpel, he may be anſwer'd other where. This doubtleſs, that they ought to be many and over-coſtly, no true Proteſtant will affirm. Now I appeal to all wiſe Men, what an exceſſive waſt of Treaſury hath been within theſe few years in this Land, not in the expedient, but in the idolatrous erection of Temples beautified exquiſitely to out-vie the Papiſts, the coſtly and dear-bought Scandals and Snares of Images, Pictures, rich Coaps, gorgeous Altar-clothes: and by the courſes they took, and the opinions they held, it was not likely any ſtay would be, or any end of their madneſs, where a pious Pretext is ſo ready at hand to cover their inſatiate Deſires. What can we ſuppoſe this will come to? What other materials then theſe have built up the ſpiritual BABEL to the heigth of her Abominations? Believe it, Sir, right truly it may be ſaid, that Antichriſt is Mammons Son. The ſour Leven of human Traditions, mixt in one putrifi'd Maſs with the poiſonous dregs of Hypocriſie in the Hearts of Prelats, that lie basking in the ſunny warmth of Wealth and Promotion, is the Serpents Egg that will hatch an Antichriſt whereſoever, and ingender the ſame Monſter as big, or little, as the Lump is which breeds him. If the Splendor of Gold and Silver begin to lord it once again in the Church of England, we ſhall ſee Antichriſt ſhortly wallow here, though his chief Kennel be at Rome. If they had one thought upon God's Glory, and the advancement of Chriſtian Faith, they would be a means that with theſe Expences, thus profuſely thrown away in traſh, rather Churches and Schools might be built, where they cry out for want, and more added where too few are; a moderate Maintenance diſtributed to every painful Miniſter, that now ſcarce ſuſtains his Family with Bread, while the Prelats revel like Belſhazzar with their full carouſes in Goblets, and Veſſels of Gold ſnatcht from God's Temple: Which (I hope) the worthy Men of our Land will conſider. Now then for their COURTS. What a Maſs of Money is drawn from the Veins into the Ulcers of the Kingdom this way; their Extortions, their open Corruptions, the multitude of hungry and ravenous Harpies that ſwarm about their Offices declare ſufficiently. And what though all this go not over Sea? 'twere better it did: better a penurious Kingdom, then where exceſſive

Wealth flows into the graceleſs and injurious hands of common ſponges, to the impoveriſhing of good and loyal men, and that by ſuch execrable, ſuch irreligious courſes.

If the ſacred and dreadful works of holy Diſcipline, Cenſure, Penance, Excommunication, and Abſolution, where no prophane thing ought to have acceſs, nothing to be aſſiſtant but ſage and chriſtianly Admonition, brotherly Love, flaming Charity and Zeal; and then according to the effects, paternal Sorrow or paternal Joy, mild Severity, melting Compaſſion; if ſuch Divine Miniſteries as theſe, wherein the Angel of the Church repreſents the Perſon of Chriſt Jeſus, muſt lie proſtitute to ſordid Fees, and not paſs to and fro between our Saviour that of free Grace redeem'd us, and the ſubmiſſive Penitent, without the truccage of periſhing Coin, and the butcherly execution of Tormentors, Rooks and Rakeſhames ſold to lucre, then have the Babyloniſh Merchants of Souls juſt excuſe. Hitherto, Sir, you have heard how the Prelats have weaken'd and withdrawn the external Accompliſhments of Kingly proſperity, the love of the People, their multitude, their valour, their wealth; mining and ſapping the out-works and redoubts of Monarchy. Now hear how they ſtrike at the very heart and vitals.

We know that Monarchy is made up of two parts, the Liberty of the Subject, and the Supremacy of the King. I begin at the root. See what gentle and benign Fathers they have been to our Liberty. Their trade being, by the ſame Alchymy that the Pope uſes, to extract heaps of Gold and Silver out of the droſſie Bullion of the Peoples ſins; and juſtly fearing that the quick-ſighted Proteſtants eye, clear'd in great part from the miſt of Superſtition, may at one time or other look with a good judgment into theſe their deceitful Pedleries; to gain as many aſſociats of guiltineſs as they can, and to infect the temporal Magiſtrate with the like lawleſs, though not ſacrilegious extortion, ſee a while what they do; they ingage themſelves to preach, and perſwade an aſſertion for truth the moſt falſe, and to this Monarchy the moſt pernicious and deſtructive that could be choſen. What more baneful to Monarchy then a popular Commotion, for the diſſolution of Monarchy ſlides apteſt into a Democraty; and what ſtirs the Engliſhmen, as our wiſeſt Writers have obſerv'd, ſooner to Rebellion, then violent and heavy hands upon their goods and purſes? Yet theſe devout Prelats, ſpight of our great Charter, and the Souls of our Progenitors that wreſted their Liberties out of the Norman gripe with their deareſt blood and higheſt prowеſs, for theſe many years have not ceas't in their Pulpits wrinching and ſpraining the Text, to ſet at nought and trample under foot all the moſt ſacred and life-blood Laws, Statutes, and Acts of Parliament, that are the holy Cov'nant of Union and Marriage between the King and his Realm, by proſcribing and confiſcating from us all the right we have to our own Bodies, Goods and Liberties. What is this but to blow a trumpet, and proclaim a fire-croſs to a hereditary and perpetual Civil War? Thus much againſt the Subjects Liberty hath been aſſaulted by them. Now how they have ſpar'd Supremacy, or likely are hereafter to ſubmit to it, remains laſtly to be conſider'd.

The emulation that under the old Law was in the King toward the Prieſt, is now ſo come about in the Goſpel, that all the danger is to be fear'd from the Prieſt to the King. Whilſt the Prieſts Office in the Law was ſet out with an exteriour luſtre of Pomp and Glory, Kings were ambitious to be Prieſts; now Prieſts not perceiving the heavenly brightneſs and inward ſplendor of their more glorious Evangelick Miniſtery, with as great ambition affect to be Kings, as in all their courſes is eaſy to be obſerv'd. Their eyes ever imminent upon worldly matters, their deſires ever thirſting after worldly employments; inſtead of diligent and fervent ſtudy in the Bible, they covet to be expert in Canons and Decretals, which may inable them to judg and interpoſe in temporal Cauſes, however pretended Eccleſiaſtical. Do they not hord up Pelf, ſeek to be potent in ſecular Strength, in State Affairs, in Lands, Lordſhips, and Demeans, to ſway and carry all before them in High Courts and Privy Councils, to bring into their graſp the high and principal Offices of the Kingdom? have they not been bold of late to check the Common Law, to ſlight and brave the indiminiſhable Majeſty of our higheſt Court, the Law-giving and Sacred Parliament? Do they not plainly labour to exempt Churchmen from the Magiſtrate?

Yea, ſo preſumptuouſly as to queſtion and menace Officers that repreſent the King's Perſon for uſing their Authority againſt drunken Prieſts? The cauſe of protecting murderous Clergy-men was the firſt heart-burning that ſwell'd up the audacious Becket to the peſtilent and odious vexation of Henry the Second. Nay more, have not ſome of their devoted Scholers begun, I need not ſay to nibble, but openly to argue againſt the King's Supremacy? Is not the Chief of them accus'd out of his own Book, and his late Canons, to affect a certain unqueſtionable Patriarchat, independent and unſubordinate to the Crown? From whence having firſt brought us to a ſervile Eſtate of Religion and Manhood, and having prediſpos'd his Conditions with the Pope, that lays claim to this Land, or ſome Pepin of his own creating, it were all as likely for him to aſpire to the Monarchy among us, as that the Pope could find means ſo on the ſudden both to bereave the Emperor of the Roman Territory with the favour of Italy, and by an unexpected friend out of France, while he was in danger to loſe his new-got Purchaſe, beyond hope to leap into the fair Exarchat of Ravenna.

A good while the Pope ſutt'ly acted the Lamb, writing to the Emperor, my Lord Tiberius, my Lord Mauritius; but no ſooner did this his Lord pluck at the Images and Idols, but he threw off his Sheeps clothing, and ſtarted up a Wolf, laying his paws upon the Emperor's Right, as forfeited to Peter. Why may not we as well, having been forewarn'd at home by our renowned Chaucer, and from abroad by the great and learned Padre Paolo, from the like beginnings, as we ſee they are, fear the like events? Certainly a wiſe and provident King ought to ſuſpect a Hierarchy in his Realm, being ever attended, as it is, with two ſuch greedy Purveyers, Ambition and Uſurpation; I ſay, he ought to ſuſpect a Hierarchy to be as dangerous and derogatory from his Crown as a Tetrarchy or a Heptarchy. Yet now that the Prelats had almoſt attain'd to what their inſolent and unbridl'd minds had hurried them; to thruſt the Laitie under the deſpotical rule of the Monarch, that they themſelves might confine the Monarch to a kind of Pupillage under their Hierarchy, obſerve but how their own Principles combat one another, and ſupplant each one his fellow.

Having fitted us only for Peace, and that a ſervile Peace, by leſſening our numbers, dreining our Eſtates, enfeebling our Bodies, cowing our free Spirits by thoſe ways as you have heard, their impotent actions cannot ſuſtain themſelves the leaſt moment, unleſs they rouze us up to a War fit for Cain to be the Leader of; an abhorred, a curſed, a fraternal War. ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, deareſt Brothers both in Nature and in CHRIST, muſt be ſet to wade in one another's blood; and IRELAND our free Denizon upon the back of us both, as occaſion ſhould ſerve: a piece of Service that the Pope and all his Factors have been compaſſing to do ever ſince the Reformation.

But ever-bleſſed be he, and ever glorifi'd, that from his high watch-Tower in the Heav'ns, diſcerning the crooked ways of perverſe and cruel men, hath hitherto maim'd and infatuated all their damnable Inventions, and deluded their great Wizards with a deluſion fit for Fools and Children: had GOD been ſo minded, he could have ſent a Spirit of Mutiny amongſt us, as he did between Abimilech and the Sechemites, to have made our Funerals, and ſlain heaps more in number then the miſerable ſurviving remnant; but he, when we leaſt deſerv'd, ſent out a gentle gale and meſſage of Peace from the wings of thoſe his Cherubins that fan his Mercy-ſeat. Nor ſhall the Wiſdom, the Moderation, the Chriſtian Piety, the Conſtancy of our Nobility and Commons of England be ever forgotten, whoſe calm and temperat connivance could ſit ſtill and ſmile out the ſtormy bluſter of men more audacious and precipitant then of ſolid and deep reach, till their own fury had run it ſelf out of breath, aſſailing by raſh and heady Approaches the impregnable ſituation of our Liberty and Safety, that laught ſuch weak enginry to ſcorn, ſuch poor drifts to make a National War of a Surplice Brabble, a Tippet-ſcuffle, and ingage the unattainted Honour of Engliſh Knighthood to unfurl the ſtreaming Red Croſs, or to rear the horrid Standard of thoſe fatal guly Dragons for ſo unworthy a purpoſe, as to force upon their Fellow-Subjects that which themſelves are weary of, the Skeleton of a Maſs-Book. Nor muſt the Patience, the Fortitude, the firm Obedience of the Nobles and People of Scotland, ſtriving againſt manifold Provocations; nor muſt their ſincere and moderate proceedings hitherto be unremember'd, to the ſhameful Conviction of all their Detractors.

Go on both hand in hand, O NATIONS, never to be diſ-united; be the Praiſe and the Heroick Song of all POSTERITY; merit this, but ſeek only Vertue, not to extend your Limits; for what needs? to win a fading triumphant Lawrel out of the tears of wretched Men, but to ſettle the pure Worſhip of God in his Church, and Juſtice in the State: then ſhall the hardeſt difficulties ſmooth out themſelves before ye; Envy ſhall ſink to Hell, Craft and Malice be confounded, whether it be homebred miſchief or outlandiſh cunning: yea other Nations will then covet to ſerve ye, for Lordſhip and Victory are but the pages of Juſtice and Vertue. Commit ſecurely to true Wiſdom the vanquiſhing and uncaſing of craft and ſuttlety, which are but her two runnagates: join your invincible might to do worthy and Godlike deeds; and then he that ſeeks to break your Union, a cleaving Curſe be his inheritance to all Generations.

Sir, you have now at length this queſtion for the time, and as my memory would beſt ſerve me in ſuch a copious and vaſt Theme, fully handl'd, and you your ſelf may judg whether Prelacy be the only Church-government agreeable to MONARCHY. Seeing therefore the perillous and confuſed eſtate into which we are faln, and that to the certain knowledg of all men, through the irreligious Pride and hateful Tyranny of Prelats, (as the innumerable and grievous complaints of every Shire cry out) if we will now reſolve to ſettle affairs either according to pure Religion or ſound Policy, we muſt firſt of all begin roundly to caſhier and cut away from the publick body the noyſom and diſeaſed tumor of Prelacy, and come from Schiſm to Unity with our neighbour Reformed Siſter Churches, which with the bleſſing of Peace and pure Doctrine have now long time flouriſh'd; and doubtleſs with all hearty Joy and Gratulation will meet and welcome our Chriſtian Union with them, as they have bin all this while griev'd at our ſtrangeneſs, and little better then Separation from them. And for the Diſcipline propounded, ſeeing that it hath bin inevitably prov'd that the natural and fundamental cauſes of political Happineſs in all Governments are the ſame, and that this Church-diſcipline is taught in the Word of God, and, as we ſee, agrees according to wiſh with all ſuch States as have receiv'd it, we may infallibly aſſure our ſelves that it will as well agree with Monarchy, though all the Tribe of Aphoriſmers and Politicaſters would perſwade us there be ſecret and myſterious reaſons againſt it. For upon the ſetling hereof mark what nouriſhing and cordial reſtorements to the State will follow, the Miniſters of the Goſpel attending only to the work of Salvation, every one within his limited charge; beſides the diffuſive Bleſſings of God upon all our actions, the King ſhall ſit without an old Diſturber, a daily Incroacher and Intruder; ſhall rid his Kingdom of a ſtrong ſequeſter'd and collateral Power; a confronting Miter, whoſe potent Wealth and wakeful Ambition he had juſt cauſe to hold in jealouſie: not to repeat the other preſent evils which only their removal will remove, and becauſe things ſimply pure are inconſiſtent in the maſs of Nature, nor are the Elements or Humors in Man's Body exactly homogeneal; and hence the beſt founded Commonwealths and leaſt barbarous have aim'd at a certain mixture and temperament, partaking the ſeveral vertues of each other State, that each part drawing to it ſelf may keep up a ſteddy and ev'n uprightneſs in common.

There is no Civil Government that hath been known, no not the Spartan, not the Roman, though both for this reſpect ſo much prais'd by the wiſe Polybius, more divinely and harmoniouſly tun'd, more equally ballanc'd as it were by the hand and ſcale of Juſtice, then is the Commonwealth of England; where under a free and untutor'd Monarch, the nobleſt, worthieſt, and moſt prudent men, with full approbation and ſuffrage of the People, have in their power the ſupream and final determination of higheſt Affairs. Now if Conformity of Church-Diſcipline to the Civil be ſo deſir'd, there can be nothing more parallel, more uniform, then when under the Sovereign Prince, Chriſt's Vicegerent, uſing the Scepter of David, according to God's Law, the godlieſt, the wiſeſt, the learnedeſt Miniſters in their ſeveral charges have the inſtructing and diſciplining of God's People, by whoſe full and free Election they are conſecrated to that holy and equal Ariſtocracy. And why ſhould not the Piety and Conſcience of Engliſhmen, as Members of the Church, be truſted in the Election of Paſtors to Functions that nothing concern a Monarch, as well as their worldly Wiſdoms are privileg'd as Members of the State in ſuffraging their Knights and Burgeſſes to Matters that concern him nearly? And if in weighing theſe ſeveral Offices, their difference in time and quality be caſt in, I know they will not turn the beam of equal Judgment the moity of a Scruple. We therefore having already a kind of Apoſtolical and ancient Church-Election in our State, what a perverſneſs would it be in us of all others to retain forcibly a kind of imperious and ſtately Election in our Church? And what a blindneſs to think that what is already Evangelical, as it were by a happy chance in our Polity, ſhould be repugnant to that which is the ſame by divine Command in the Miniſtry? Thus then we ſee that our Eccleſial and Political choyſes may conſent and ſort as well together without any rupture in the STATE, as Chriſtians and Freeholders. But as for Honour, that ought indeed to be different and diſtinct, as either Office looks a ſeveral way; the Miniſter whoſe Calling and End is ſpiritual, ought to be honour'd as a Father and Phyſician to the Soul, (if he be found to be ſo) with a Son-like and Diſciple-like Reverence, which is indeed the deareſt and moſt affectionate Honour, moſt to be deſir'd by a wiſe man, and ſuch as will eaſily command a free and plentiful proviſion of outward neceſſaries, without his furder care of this World.

The Magiſtrate, whoſe Charge is to ſee to our Perſons and Eſtates, is to be honour'd with a more elaborate and perſonal Courtſhip, with large Salaries and Stipends, that he himſelf may abound in thoſe things whereof his legal Juſtice and watchful Care gives us the quiet Enjoyment. And this diſtinction of Honour will bring forth a ſeemly and graceful Uniformity over all the Kingdom.

Then ſhall the Nobles poſſeſs all the Dignities and Offices of temporal Honour to themſelves, ſole Lords without the improper mixture of ſcholaſtick and puſillanimous upſtarts; the Parliament ſhall void her Upper Houſe of the ſame annoyances; the Common and Civil Laws ſhall be both ſet free, the former from the controul, the other from the meer vaſſalage and Copy-hold of the Clergy.

And wheras temporal Laws rather puniſh men when they have tranſgreſs'd, then form them to be ſuch as ſhould tranſgreſs ſeldomeſt, we may conceive great hopes, through the ſhowers of Divine Benediction watering the unmoleſted and watchful pains of the Miniſtry, that the whole Inheritance of God will grow up ſo ſtraight and blameleſs, that the Civil Magiſtrate may with far leſs toyl and difficulty, and far more eaſe and delight, ſteer the tall and goodly Veſſel of the Commonwealth through all the guſts and tides of the World's mutability.

Here I might have ended, but that ſome Objections, which I have heard commonly flying about, preſs me to the endeavour of an Anſwer. We muſt not run, they ſay, into ſudden extreams. This is a fallacious Rule, unleſs underſtood only of the actions of Vertue about things indifferent: for if it be found that thoſe two extreams be Vice and Vertue, Falſhood and Truth, the greater extremity of Vertue and ſuperlative Truth we run into, the more vertuous and the more wiſe we become; and he that flying from degenerate and traditional Corruption, fears to ſhoot himſelf too far into the meeting Imbraces of a divinely warranted Reformation, had better not have run at all. And for the ſuddenneſs it cannot be fear'd. Who ſhould oppoſe it? The Papiſts? They dare not. The Proteſtants otherwiſe affected? They were mad. There is nothing will be remov'd but what to them is profeſs'dly indifferent. The long affection which the People have born to it, what for it ſelf, what for the odiouſneſs of Prelats, is evident: From the firſt year of Queen Elizabeth it hath ſtill been more and more propounded, deſir'd, and beſeech'd, yea ſometimes favourably forwarded by the Parliaments themſelves. Yet if it were ſudden and ſwift, provided ſtill it be from worſe to better, certainly we ought to hie us from evil like a torrent, and rid our ſelves of corrupt Diſcipline, as we would ſhake fire out of our boſoms.

Speedy and vehement were the Reformations of all the good Kings of Juda, though the People had been nuzzl'd in Idolatry never ſo long before; they fear'd not the bug-bear danger, nor the Lion in the way that the ſluggiſh and timorous Politician thinks he ſees; no more did our Brethren of the Reformed Churches abroad, they ventur'd (God being their guide) out of rigid Popery, into that which we in mockery call preciſe Puritaniſm, and yet we ſee no inconvenience befel them.

Let us not dally with God when he offers us a full Bleſſing, to take as much of it as we think will ſerve our ends, and turn him back the reſt upon his hands, leſt in his anger he ſnatch all from us again. Next they alledg the Antiquity of Epiſcopacy through all Ages. What it was in the Apoſtles time that queſtionleſs it muſt be ſtill, and therein I truſt the Miniſters will be able to ſatisfy the Parliament. But if Epiſcopacy be taken for Prelacy, all the Ages they can deduce it through will make it no more venerable then Papacy.

Moſt certain it is (as all our Stories bear witneſs) that ever ſince their coming to the See of Canterbury for near twelve hundred years, to ſpeak of them in general, they have been in England to our Souls a ſad and doleful ſucceſſion of illiterate and blind guides; to our purſes and goods a waſtful band of robbers, a perpetual havock and rapine; to our State a continual Hydra of miſchief and moleſtation, the forge of diſcord and rebellion: This is the Trophy of their Antiquity, and boaſted Succeſſion through ſo many ages. And for thoſe Prelat-Martyrs they glory of, they are to be judg'd what they were by the Goſpel, and not the Goſpel to be tried by them.

And it is to be noted, that if they were for Biſhopricks and Ceremonies, it was in their Proſperity and fulneſs of Bread; but in their Perſecution, which purifi'd them, and near their Death, which was their Garland, they plainly diſlik'd and condemn'd the Ceremonies, and threw away thoſe Epiſcopal Ornaments wherein they were inſtal'd as fooliſh and deteſtable, for ſo the words of Ridley at his Degradement, and his Letter to Hooper, expreſly ſhew. Neither doth the Author of our Church-Hiſtory ſpare to record ſadly the Fall (for ſo he terms it) and Infirmities of theſe Martyrs, though we would deify them. And why ſhould their Martyrdom more countenance corrupt Doctrine or Diſcipline, then their Subſcriptions juſtify their Treaſon to the Royal Blood of this Realm, by diverting and intaling the Right of the Crown from the true Heirs, to the houſes of Northumberland and Suffolk? which had it took effect, this preſent King had in all likelihood never ſat on this Throne, and the happy Union of this Iland had bin fruſtrated.

Laſtly, Whereas they add that ſome the learnedeſt of the Reformed abroad admire our Epiſcopacy; it had bin more for the ſtrength of the Argument to tell us, that ſome of the wiſeſt States-men admire it, for thereby we might gueſs them weary of the preſent Diſcipline, as offenſive to their State, which is the bug we fear: but being they are Church-men, we may rather ſuſpect them for ſome Prelatizing Spirits that admire our Biſhopricks, not Epiſcopacy. The next Objection vaniſhes of it ſelf, propounding a doubt, whether a greater Inconvenience would not grow from the corruption of any other Diſcipline then from that of Epiſcopacy. This ſeems an unſeaſonable foreſight, and out of order to defer and put off the moſt needful Conſtitution of one right Diſcipline, while we ſtand ballancing the Diſcommodities of two corrupt ones. Firſt conſtitute that which is right, and of it ſelf it will diſcover and rectify that which ſwerves, and eaſily remedy the pretended fear of having a Pope in every Pariſh, unleſs we call the zealous and meek cenſure of the Church a Popedom, which who ſo does, let him adviſe how he can reject the Paſtorly Rod and Sheep-hook of Christ, and thoſe Cords of Love, and not fear to fall under the iron Scepter of his Anger, that will daſh him to pieces like a Potſherd.

At another Doubt of theirs I wonder, whether this Diſcipline which we deſire be ſuch as can be put in practiſe within this Kingdom; they ſay it cannot ſtand with the common Law nor with the King's Safety, the Government of Epiſcopacy is now ſo weav'd into the common Law. In God's name let it weave out again; let not humane Quillets keep back divine Authority. 'Tis not the common Law, nor the civil, but Piety and Juſtice that are our foundreſſes; they ſtoop not, neither change colour for Ariſtocracy, Democraty, or

Monarchy, nor yet at all interrupt their juſt Courſes; but far above the taking notice of theſe inferior Niceties with perfect Sympathy, where-ever they meet, kiſs each other. Laſtly, they are fearful that the Diſcipline which will ſucceed cannot ſtand with the King's Safety. Wherefore? it is but Epiſcopacy reduc'd to what it ſhould be: were it not that the Tyranny of Prelats under the name of Biſhops hath made our ears tender, and ſtartling, we might call every good Miniſter a Biſhop, as every Biſhop, yea the Apoſtles themſelves are call'd Miniſters, and the Angels miniſtring Spirits, and the Miniſters again Angels. But wherein is this propounded Government ſo ſhrewd? Becauſe the Government of Aſſemblies will ſucceed. Did not the Apoſtles govern the Church by Aſſemblies? how ſhould it elſe be Catholick, how ſhould it have Communion? We count it Sacrilege to take from the rich Prelats their Lands and Revenus, which is Sacrilege in them to keep, uſing them as they do; and can we think it ſafe to defraud the living Church of God of that right which God has given her in Aſſemblies? O but the Conſequence! Aſſemblies draw to them the Supremacy of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. No ſurely, they draw no Supremacy, but that Authority which Christ, and Saint Paul in his Name confers upon them. The King may ſtill retain the ſame Supremacy in the Aſſemblies, as in the Parliament; here he can do nothing alone againſt the Common Law, and there neither alone, nor with conſent againſt the Scriptures. But is this all? No, this Eccleſiaſtical Supremacy draws to it the Power to excommunicate Kings; and then follows the worſt that can be imagin'd. Do they hope to avoid this, by keeping Prelats that have ſo often done it? Not to exemplify the malapert Inſolence of our own Biſhops in this kind towards our Kings, I ſhall turn back to the Primitive and pure Times, which the Objectors would have the Rule of Reformation to us.

Not an Aſſembly, but one Biſhop alone, Saint Ambrose of Millan, held Theodoſius the moſt Chriſtian Emperor, under Excommunication above eight months together, drove him from the Church in the preſence of his Nobles; which the good Emperor bore with heroick humility, and never ceas't by Prayers and Tears, till he was abſolv'd; for which coming to the Biſhop with Supplication into the Salutatory, ſome out Porch of the Church, he was charg'd by him of tyrannical madneſs againſt God, for coming into holy Ground. At laſt upon Conditions abſolv'd, and after great humiliation approaching to the Altar to offer, (as thoſe thrice pure times then thought meet) he had ſcarce withdrawn his hand, and ſtood awhile, when a bold Arch-deacon comes in the Biſhop's name, and chaces him from within the Rails, telling him peremptorily that the place wherein he ſtood, was for none but the Prieſts to enter, or to touch; and this is another peece of pure Primitive Divinity. Think ye then our Biſhops will forgo the Power of Excommunication on whomſoever? No certainly, unleſs to compaſs ſiniſter Ends, and then revoke when they ſee their time. And yet this moſt mild, though withal dreadful and inviolable Prerogative of Chriſts Diadem, Excommunication, ſervs for nothing with them, but to prog and pander for Fees, or to diſplay their Pride, and ſharpen their Revenge, debarring Men the protection of the Law; and I remember not whether in ſome Caſes it bereave not Men all right to their worldly Goods and Inheritances, beſides the denial of Chriſtian burial. But in the Evangelical, and reformed uſe of this ſacred Cenſure, no ſuch Proſtitution, no ſuch Iſcariotical Drifts are to be doubted, as that ſpiritual Doom and Sentence ſhould invade worldly poſſeſſion, which is the rightful Lot and Portion even of the wickedeſt Men, as frankly beſtow'd upon them by the al-diſpenſing Bounty, as Rain and Sunſhine. No, no, it ſeeks not to bereave or deſtroy the Body; it ſeeks to ſave the Soul by humbling the Body, not by impriſonment, or pecuniary Mulct, much leſs by Stripes, or Bonds, or diſinheritance, but by fatherly Admoniſhment and chriſtian Rebuke, to caſt it into godly Sorrow, whoſe End is Joy, and ingenuous baſhfulneſs to Sin: If that cannot be wrought, then as a tender Mother takes her Child and holds it over the Pit with ſcarring words, that it may learn to fear where Danger is; ſo doth Excommunication as dearly and as freely, without Money, uſe her wholſome and ſaving Terrors, ſhe is inſtant, ſhe beſeeches, by all the dear and ſweet Promiſes of Salvation ſhe entices and woes, by all the Threatnings and Thunders of the Law, and rejected Goſpel, ſhe charges, and adjures; this is all her Armory, her Munition, her Artillery, then ſhe awaits with long-ſufferance, and yet ardent Zeal. In brief, there is no Act in all the Errand of Gods Miniſters to Mankind, wherein paſſes more loverlike conteſtation between Christ and the Soul of a regenerate Man lapſing, then before, and in, and after the Sentence of Excommunication. As for the fogging Proctorage of Money, with ſuch an eye as ſtrook Gehezi with Leproſy, and Simon Magus with a Curſe; ſo does ſhe look, and ſo threaten her firy Whip againſt that banking Den of Thieves that dare thus baffle, and buy and ſell the awful and majeſtick wrincles of her Brow. He that is rightly and apoſtolically ſped with her inviſible Arrow, if he can be at peace in his Soul, and not ſmel within him the Brimſtone of Hell, may have fair leave to tell all his Bags over undiminiſh't of the leaſt Farding, may eat his Dainties, drink his Wine, uſe his Delights, enjoy his Lands and Liberties, not the leaſt Skin rais'd, not the leaſt Hair miſplac't for all that Excommunication has done: Much more may a King enjoy his Rights and Prerogatives undeflour'd, untouch'd, and be as abſolute and compleat a King, as all his Royalties and Revenu's can make him. And therefore little did Theodoſius fear a Plot upon his Empire, when he ſtood excommunicat by St. Ambroſe, though it were done either with much haughty Pride, or ignorant Zeal. But let us rather look upon the reformed Churches beyond the Seas, the Grizons, the Swiſſes, the Hollanders, the French, that have a Supremacy to live under as well as we; where do the Churches in all theſe places ſtrive for Supremacy? where do they claſh and juſtle Supremacies with the Civil Magiſtrate? In France, a more ſevere Monarchy then ours, the Proteſtants under this Church-Government, carry the name of the beſt Subjects the King has; and yet Presbytery, if it muſt be ſo call'd, does there all that it deſires to do: How eaſy were it, if there be ſuch great ſuſpicion, to give no more ſcope to it in England. But let us not, for fear of a Scare-crow, or elſe through hatred to be reform'd, ſtand hankering and politizing, when God with ſpread hands teſtifies to us, and points us out the way to our Peace.

Let us not be ſo overcredulous, unleſs God hath blinded us, as to truſt our deer Souls into the hands of Men that beg ſo devoutly for the pride and gluttony of their own Backs and Bellies, that ſue and ſollicit ſo eagerly, not for the ſaving of Souls, the conſideration of which can have here no place at all, but for their Biſhopricks, Deaneries, Prebends, and Chanonies: how can theſe Men not be corrupt, whoſe very cauſe is the Bribe of their own pleading, whoſe mouths cannot open without the ſtrong breath and loud ſtench of Avarice, Simony, and Sacrilege, embezling the Treaſury of the Church on painted and guilded Walls of Temples, wherein God hath teſtified to have no delight, warming their Palace Kitchins, and from thence their unctuous and epicurean Paunches, with the Alms of the Blind, the Lame, the Impotent, the Aged, the Orfan, the Widow? for with theſe the Treaſury of Christ ought to be, here muſt be his Jewels beſtow'd, his rich Cabinet muſt be emptied here; as the conſtant Martyr Saint Laurence taught the Roman Prætor. Sir, would you know what the Remonſtrance of theſe Men would have, what their Petition implies? They intreat us that we would not be weary of thoſe inſupportable Grievances that our Shoulders have hitherto crackt under, they beſeech us that we would think 'em fit to be our Juſtices of Peace, our Lords, our higheſt Officers of State, though they come furniſh't with no more experience then they learnt between the Cook and the Manciple, or more profoundly at the Colledg Audit, or the Regent Houſe, or to come to their deepeſt inſight at their Patrons Table; they would requeſt us to indure ſtill the ruſling of their ſilken Caſſocks, and that we would burſt our Midriffs, rather then laugh to ſee them under Sail in all their Lawn and Sarcenet, their Shrouds and Tackle, with a Geometrical Rhomboides upon their Heads: they would bear us in hand that we muſt of duty ſtill appear before them once a Year in Jeruſalem, like good circumciz'd Males and Females, to be taxt by the Poul, to be ſcons't our Head-money, our Tuppences in their Chaunlerly Shop-book of Eaſter. They pray us that it would pleaſe us to let them ſtill hale us, and worry us with their Band-dogs and Purſivants; and that it would pleaſe the Parliament that they may yet have the whipping, fleecing, and fleaing of us in their diabolical Courts, to tear the Fleſh from our Bones, and into our wide wounds inſtead of Balm, to pour in the Oil of Tartar, Vitriol, and Mercury;

ſurely a right reaſonable, innocent and ſoft-hearted Petition. O the relenting Bowels of the Fathers! Can this be granted them, unleſs GOD have ſmitten us with Frenſie from above, and with a dazling giddineſs at noon day? Should not thoſe Men rather be heard that come to plead againſt their own Preferments, their worldly Advantages, their own Abundance; for Honour and Obedience to God's Word, the Converſion of Souls, the Chriſtian Peace of the Land, and Union of the Reformed Catholick Church, the unappropriating and unmonopolizing the Rewards of Learning and Induſtry, from the greaſy clutch of Ignorance, and high feeding. We have tri'd already, and miſerably felt what Ambition, worldly Glory and immoderate Wealth can do, what the boiſtrous and contradictional hand of a temporal, earthly, and corporeal Spirituality can avail to the edifying of Chriſt's holy Church; were it ſuch a deſperate hazard to put to the venture the univerſal Votes of Chriſt's Congregation, the fellowly and friendly Yoke of a teaching and laborious Miniſtry, the Paſtor-like and Apoſtolick imitation of meek and unlordly Diſcipline, the gentle and benevolent Mediocrity of Church-maintenance, without the ignoble Hucſterage of pidling Tithes? Were it ſuch an incurable miſchief to make a little trial, what all this would do to the flouriſhing and growing up of Chriſt's myſtical Body? As rather to uſe every poor ſhift, and if that ſerve not, to threaten Uproar and Combuſtion, and ſhake the Brand of Civil Diſcord?

O, Sir, I do now feel my ſelf inwrapt on the ſudden into thoſe Mazes and Labyrinths of dreadful and hideous thoughts, that which way to get out, or which way to end, I know not, unleſs I turn mine eyes, and with your help lift up my hands to that eternal and propitious Throne, where nothing is readier then Grace and Refuge to the diſtreſſes of mortal Suppliants: And it were a ſhame to leave theſe ſerious thoughts leſs piouſly then the Heathen were wont to conclude their graver Diſcourſes.

Thou therefore that ſitſt in Light and Glory unapproachable, Parent of Angels and Men! next thee I implore Omnipotent King, Redeemer of that loſt Remnant whoſe Nature thou didſt aſſume, ineffable and everlaſting Love! And thou the third ſubſiſtence of Divine Infinitude, illumining Spirit, the Joy and Solace of created Things! one Tri-perſonal GODHEAD! look upon this thy poor and almoſt ſpent and expiring Church, leave her not thus a Prey to theſe importunate Wolves, that wait and think long till they devour thy tender Flock; theſe wild Boars that have broke into thy Vineyard, and left the print of their polluting Hoofs on the Souls of thy Servants. O let them not bring about their damned Deſigns, that ſtand now at the entrance of the bottomleſs Pit, expecting the Watch-word to open and let out thoſe dreadful Locuſts and Scorpions, to re-involve us in that pitchy Cloud of infernal Darkneſs, where we ſhall never more ſee the Sun of thy Truth again, never hope for the chearful dawn, never more hear the Bird of Morning ſing. Be mov'd with pity at the afflicted ſtate of this our ſhaken Monarchy, that now lies labouring under her Throws, and ſtruggling againſt the Grudges of more dreaded Calamities.

O thou that after the impetuous rage of five bloody Inundations, and the ſucceeding Sword of inteſtine War, ſoaking the Land in her own Gore, didſt pity the ſad and ceaſleſs Revolution of our ſwift and thick-coming Sorrows, when we were quite breathleſs, of thy free Grace didſt motion Peace, and terms of Cov'nant with us; and having firſt well-nigh freed us from Antichriſtian Thraldom, didſt build up this Britannick Empire to a glorious and enviable height, with all her Daughter-Ilands about her; ſtay us in this Felicity, let not the Obſtinacy of our half-Obedience and Will-worſhip, bring forth that Viper of Sedition, that for theſe fourſcore Years hath been breeding to eat through the Entrals of our Peace; but let her caſt her Abortive Spawn without the danger of this travelling and throbbing Kingdom. That we may ſtill remember in our ſolemn Thankſgivings, how for us, the Northern Ocean even to the frozen Thule, was ſcatter'd with the proud Shipwracks of the Spaniſh Armado, and the very Maw of Hell ranſack't, and made to give up her conceal'd Deſtruction, ere ſhe could vent it in that horrible and damned blaſt.

O how much more glorious will thoſe former Deliverances appear, when we ſhall know them not only to have ſav'd us from greateſt Miſeries paſt, but to have reſerv'd us for greateſt happineſs to come? Hitherto thou haſt but freed us, and that not fully, from the unjuſt and tyrannous Claim of thy Foes, now unite us intirely, and appropriate us to thy ſelf, tie us everlaſtingly in willing Homage to the Prerogative of thy Eternal Throne.

And now we know, O thou our moſt certain Hope and Defence, that thine Enemies have been conſulting all the Sorceries of the great Whore, and have joyn'd their Plots with that ſad Intelligencing Tyrant that miſchiefs the World with his Mines of Ophir, and lies thirſting to revenge his naval Ruins that have larded our Seas: but let them all take Counſel together, and let it come to nought; let them decree, and do thou cancel it; let them gather themſelves, and be ſcattered; let them imbattle themſelves, and be broken; let them imbattel, and be broken, for thou art with us.

Then amidſt the Hymns and Hallelujahs of Saints, ſome one may perhaps be heard offering at high Strains in new and lofty Meaſures, to ſing and celebrate thy divine Mercies, and marvelous Judgments in this Land throughout all AGES; whereby this great and warlike Nation, inſtructed and inur'd to the fervent and continual practice of Truth and Righteouſneſs, and caſting far from her the Rags of her old Vices, may preſs on hard to that high and happy Emulation to be found the ſobereſt, wiſeſt, and moſt Chriſtian People at that day, when thou the Eternal and ſhortly-expected King, ſhalt open the Clouds to judg the ſeveral Kingdoms of the World, and diſtributing National Honours and Rewards to religious and juſt Common-wealths, ſhalt put an end to all earthly Tyrannies, proclaiming thy univerſal and mild Monarchy through Heaven and Earth. Where they undoubtedly, that by their Labours, Counſels and Prayers, have been earneſt for the common Good of Religion and their Country, ſhall receive above the inferior Orders of the Bleſſed, the regal Addition of Principalities, Legions, and Thrones into their glorious Titles, and in ſupereminence of beatifick Viſion, progreſſing the dateleſs and irrevoluble Circle of Eternity, ſhall claſp inſeparable Hands with Joy and Bliſs, in over meaſure for ever.

But they contrary, that by the impairing and diminution of the true Faith, the Diſtreſſes and Servitude of their Country, aſpire to high Dignity, Rule and Promotion here, after a ſhameful end in this Life, (which God grant them) ſhall be thrown down eternally into the darkeſt and deepeſt Gulf of HELL, where under the deſpiteful Controul, the Trample and Spurn of all the other Damned, that in the anguiſh of their Torture, ſhall have no other eaſe then to exerciſe a raving and beſtial Tyranny over them as their Slaves and Negroes, they ſhall remain in that plight for ever, the baſeſt, the lowermoſt, the moſt dejected, moſt underfoot and down-trodden Vaſſals of Perdition.

To the Parliament of ENGLAND, with the Aſſembly.

IF it were ſeriouſly aſkt, and it would be no untimely Queſtion, Renowned Parliament, Select Aſſembly, Who of all Teachers and Maſters that ever have taught, hath drawn the moſt Diſciples after him, both in Religion and in Manners? it might not be untruly anſwer'd, Cuſtom. Though Vertue be commended for the moſt perſwaſive in her Theory, and Conſcience in the plain demonſtration of the Spirit finds moſt evincing, yet whether it be the ſecret of Divine Will, or the original blindneſs we are born in, ſo it happens for the moſt part, that Cuſtom ſtill is ſilently receiv'd for the beſt inſtructor. Except it be, becauſe her method is ſo glib and eaſie, in ſome manner like to that Viſion of Ezekiel, rowling up her ſudden book of implicit Knowledge, for him that will, to take and ſwallow down at pleaſure; which proving but of bad nouriſhment in the concoction, as it was heedleſs in the devouring, puffs up unhealthily a certain big face of pretended learning, miſtaken among credulous men for the wholſom habit of ſoundneſs and good conſtitution, but is indeed no other than that ſwoln viſage of counterfeit knowledge and literature, which not only in private mars our Education, but alſo in publick is the common Climer into every chair, where either Religion is preach't, or Law reported, filling each eſtate of Life and Profeſſion with abject and ſervile principles, depreſſing the high and Heaven-born ſpirit of man, far beneath the condition wherein either God created him, or Sin hath ſunk him. To purſue the Allegory, Cuſtom being but a meer face, as Eccho is a meer voice, reſts not in her unaccompliſhment, until by ſecret inclination ſhe accorporate her ſelf with Error, who being a blind and ſerpentine body without a head, willingly accepts what he wants, and ſupplies what her Incompleatneſs went ſeeking. Hence it is, that Error ſupports Cuſtom, Cuſtom countenances Error: and theſe two between them would perſecute and chaſe away all truth and ſolid wiſdom out of humane Life, were it not that God, rather than Man, once in many Ages, calls together the prudent and religious Counſels of men, deputed to repreſs the incroachments, and to work off the inveterate blots and obſcurities wrought upon our minds by the ſubtle inſinuating of Error and Cuſtom; who with the numerous and vulgar train of their Followers, make it their chief deſign to envy and cry down the induſtry of free reaſoning, under the terms of humour and innovation; as if the Womb of teeming Truth were to be cloſ'd up, if ſhe preſume to bring forth ought that ſorts not with their unchew'd notions and ſuppoſitions. Againſt which notorious injury and abuſe of mans free ſoul, to teſtifie and oppoſe the utmoſt that ſtudy and true labour can attain, heretofore the incitement of men reputed grave, hath led me among others; and now the duty and the right of an inſtructed Chriſtian calls me thro the chance of good or evil report, to be the ſole Advocate of a diſcountenanc't truth; a high enterpriſe, Lords and Commons, a high enterpriſe and a hard, and ſuch as every 7th Son of a 7th Son does not venture on. Nor have I amidſt the clamour of ſo much envy and impertinence, whither to appeal, but to the concourſe of ſo much Piety and Wiſdom here aſſembled. Bringing in my hands an ancient and moſt neceſſary, moſt charitable, and yet moſt injur'd Statute of Moſes; not repeal'd ever by him who had the Authority, but thrown aſide with much inconſiderat Neglect, under the Rubbiſh of Canonical Ignorance, as once the whole Law was by ſome ſuch like conveyance in Joſiah's time. And he who ſhall indeavor the amendment of any old neglected Grievance in Church or State, or in the daily courſe of Life, if he be gifted with abilities of mind that may raiſe him to ſo high an undertaking, I grant he hath already much whereof not to repent him; yet let me arreed him, not to be the foreman of any miſ-judg'd Opinion, unleſs his Reſolutions be firmly ſeated in a ſquare and conſtant mind, not conſcious to it ſelf of any deſerved blame, and regardleſs of ungrounded ſuſpicions. For this let him be ſure he ſhall be boorded preſently by the ruder ſort, but not by diſcreet and well-nurtur'd men, with a thouſand idle Deſcants and Surmiſes. Who when they cannot confute the leaſt joynt or ſinew of any paſſage in the Book; yet God forbid that truth ſhould be truth, becauſe they have a boiſtrous conceit of ſome pretences in the Writer. But were they not more buſie and inquiſitive than the Apoſtle commends, they would hear him at leaſt, rejoycing ſo the truth be preacht, whether of envy or other pretence whatſoever: for Truth is as impoſſible to be ſoil'd by any outward touch, as the Sun beam; though this ill hap wait on her Nativity, that ſhe never comes into the World, but like a Baſtard, to the ignominy of him that brought her forth; till Time, the Midwife rather than the Mother of Truth, have waſht and ſalted the Infant, declar'd her legitimate, and church't the Father of his young Minerva, from the needleſs cauſes of his Purgation. Your ſelves can beſt witneſs this, worthy Patriots, and better will, no doubt, hereafter: for who among ye of the foremoſt that have travail'd in her behalf to the good of Church or State, hath not been often traduc't to be the Agent of his own by-ends, under pretext of Reformation? So much the more I ſhall not be unjuſt to hope, that however Infamy or Envy may work in other men to do her fretful Will againſt this Diſcourſe, yet that the experience of your own uprightneſs miſ-interpreted, will put ye in mind to give it free Audience and generous Conſtruction. What though the blood of Belial, the draffe of men, to whom no Liberty is pleaſing, but unbridl'd and vagabond Luſt without pale or partition, will laugh abroad perhaps, to ſee ſo great a ſtrength of Scripture muſtering up in favour, as they ſuppoſe, of their Debaucheries; they will know better when they ſhall hence learn, that honeſt Liberty is the greateſt foe to diſhoneſt Licence. And what though others, out of a wateriſh and queaſie Conſcience, becauſe ever crazy and never yet ſound, will rail and fancy to themſelves, that Injury and Licence is the beſt of this Book? Did not the Diſtemper of their own Stomachs affect them with a dizzy Megrim, they would ſoon tie up their Tongues, and diſcern themſelves, like that Aſſyrian Blaſphemer, all this while reproaching not Man but the Almighty, the Holy One of Iſrael, whom they do not deny to have belawgiv'd his own ſacred People with this very allowance, which they now call Injury and Licence, and dare cry ſhame on, and will do yet a while, till they get a little cordial Sobriety to ſettle their qualming Zeal. But this Queſtion concerns not us perhaps: indeed mans diſpoſition though prone to ſearch after vain Curioſities, yet when points of difficulty are to be diſcuſt, appertaining to the removal of unreaſonable wrong and burden from the perplext life of our Brother, it is incredible how cold, how dull, and far from all fellow-feeling we are, without the ſpur of ſelf-concernment. Yet if the Wiſdom, the Juſtice, the Purity of God be to be clear'd from fouleſt Imputations which are not yet avoided; if Charity be not to be degraded and trodden down under a civil Ordinance; if Matrimony be not to be advanc'd like that exalted Perdition written of to the Theſſalonians, above all that is called God, or Goodneſs, nay againſt them both; then I dare affirm there will be

ſound in the Contents of this Book, that which may concern us all. You it concerns chiefly, Worthies in Parliament, on whom, as on our Deliverers, all our Grievances and Cares, by the merit of your eminence and fortitude, are devolv'd. Me it concerns next, having with much labour and faithful diligence firſt ſound out, or at leaſt with a fearleſs and communicative candor firſt publiſht to the manifeſt good of Chriſtendom, that which calling to witneſs every thing mortal and immortal, I believe unfainedly to be true. Let not other men think their Conſcience bound to ſearch continually after truth, to pray for enlightning from above, to publiſh what they think they have ſo obtain'd, and debar me from conceiving my ſelf ty'd by the ſame duties. Ye have now, doubtleſs by the favour and appointment of God, ye have now in your hands a great and populous Nation to reform; from what corruption, what blindneſs in Religion, ye know well; in what a degenerate and fall'n Spirit from the apprehenſion of native Liberty, and true Manlineſs, I am ſure ye find; with what unbounded licence ruſhing to Whoredoms and Adulteries, needs not long enquiry: inſomuch that the Fears which men have of too ſtrict a Diſcipline, perhaps exceed the Hopes that can be in others, of ever introducing it with any great ſucceſs. What if I ſhould tell ye now of Diſpenſations and Indulgences, to give a little the reins, to let them play and nibble with the bait a while; a People as hard of heart as that Egyptian Colony that went to Canaan. This is the common Doctrine that adulterous and injurious Divorces were not conniv'd only, but with eye open allow'd of old for hardneſs of heart. But that Opinion, I truſt, by then this following Argument hath been well read, will be left for one of the Myſteries of an indulgent Antichriſt, to farm out Inceſt by, and thoſe his other tributary pollutions. What middle way can be taken then, may ſome interrupt, if we muſt neither turn to the right, nor to the left, and that the People hate to be reform'd? Mark then, Judges and Law-givers, and ye whoſe Office it is to be our Teachers, for I will utter now a Doctrine, if ever any other, though neglected or not underſtood, yet of great and powerful importance to the governing of Mankind. He who wiſely would reſtrain the reaſonable Soul of Man within due bounds, muſt firſt himſelf know perfectly, how far the Territory and Dominion extends of juſt and honeſt Liberty. As little muſt he offer to bind that which God hath looſn'd, as to looſ'n that which he hath bound. The ignorance and miſtake of this high point, hath heapt up one huge half of all the miſery that hath been ſince Adam. In the Goſpel we ſhall read a ſupercilious crew of Maſters, whoſe Holineſs, or rather whoſe evil eye, grieving that God ſhould be ſo facil to Man, was to ſet ſtraiter limits to Obedience than God had ſet, to enſlave the dignity of Man, to put a garriſon upon his neck of empty and over-dignifi'd Precepts: And we ſhall read our Saviour never more griev'd and troubl'd, than to meet with ſuch a pieviſh Madneſs among men againſt their own freedom. How can we expect him to be leſs offended with us, when much of the ſame folly ſhall be found yet remaining where it leaſt ought, to the periſhing of thouſands? The greateſt burden in the world is Superſtition, not only of Ceremonies in the Church, but of imaginary and ſcarecrow Sins at home. What greater weakning, what more ſubtle ſtratagem againſt our Chriſtian Warfare, when beſides the groſs body of real Tranſgreſſions to incounter, we ſhall be terrifi'd by a vain and ſhadowy menacing of faults that are not: When things indifferent ſhall be ſet to over-front us under the Banners of Sin, what wonder if we be routed, and by this art of our Adverſary, fall into the ſubjection of worſt and deadlieſt Offences? The Superſtition of the Papiſt is, touch not, taſt not, when God bids both; and ours is, part not, ſeparate not, when God and Charity both permits and commands. Let all your things be done with charity, ſaith S. Paul; and his Maſter ſaith, She is the fulfilling of the Law. Yet now a civil, an indifferent, a ſometime diſſwaded Law of Marriage, muſt be forc't upon us to fulfil, not only without Charity, but againſt her. No place in Heav'n or Earth, except Hell, where Charity may not enter: yet Marriage, the Ordinance of our Solace and Contentment, the Remedy of our Lonelineſs, will not admit now either of Charity or Mercy, to come in and mediate, or pacifie the fierceneſs of this gentle Ordinance, the unremedied lonelineſs of this Remedy. Adviſe ye well, Supreme Senate, if Charity be thus excluded and expulſt, how ye will defend the untainted Honour of your own Actions and Proceedings. He who marries, intends as little to conſpire his own ruin, as he that ſwears Allegiance: and as a whole People is in proportion to an ill Government, ſo is one Man to an ill Marriage. If they, againſt any Authority, Cov'nant, or Statute, may by the ſoveraign Edict of Charity, ſave not only their Lives but honeſt Liberties from unworthy Bondage, as well may he againſt any private Cov'nant, which he never enter'd to his miſchief, redeem himſelf from unſupportable Diſturbances to honeſt Peace, and juſt Contentment: And much the rather, for that to reſiſt the higheſt Magiſtrate though tyrannizing, God never gave us expreſs allowance, only he gave us Reaſon, Charity, Nature, and good Example to bear us out; but in this Economical misfortune thus to demean our ſelves, beſides the Warrant of thoſe four great Directors, which doth as juſtly belong hither, we have an expreſs Law of God, and ſuch a Law, as whereof our Saviour with a ſolemn Threat forbid the abrogating. For no effect of Tyranny can be more heavy on the Common-wealth, than this houſhold unhappineſs on the Family. And farewel all hope of true Reformation in the State, while ſuch an evil as this lies undiſcern'd or unregarded in the houſe. On the redreſs whereof depends not only the ſpiritual and orderly life of our grown men, but the willing and careful education of our children. Let this therefore be now examin'd, this tenure and freehold of mankind, this native and domeſtick Charter giv'n us by a greater Lord than that Saxon King the Confeſſor. Let the ſtatutes of God be turn'd over, be ſcann'd anew, and conſidered not altogether by the narrow intellectuals of Quotationiſts and common Places, but (as was the ancient right of Councils) by men of what liberal profeſſion ſoever, of eminent ſpirit and breeding, joyn'd with a diffuſe and various knowledge of divine and human things; able to ballance and define good and evil, right and wrong, throughout every ſtate of life; able to ſhew us the ways of the Lord ſtrait and faithful as they are, not full of cranks and contradictions, and pit-falling diſpences, but with divine inſight and benignity meaſured out to the proportion of each mind and ſpirit, each temper and diſpoſition created ſo different each from other, and yet by the skill of wiſe conducting, all to become uniform in vertue. To expedite theſe knots were worthy a learned and memorable Synod; while our enemies expect to ſee the expectation of the Church tir'd out with dependencies and independencies how they will compound, and in what Calends. Doubt not, worthy Senators, to vindicate the ſacred Honour and Judgment of Moſes your predeceſſor, from the ſhallow commenting of Scholaſticks and Canoniſts. Doubt not after him to reach out your ſteady hands to the miſ-inform'd and wearied life of man; to reſtore this his loſt heritage, into the houſhold ſtate; wherewith be ſure that peace and love, the beſt ſubſiſtance of a Chriſtian family, will return home from whence they are now baniſht; places of proſtitution will be leſs haunted, the neighbors bed leſs attempted, the yoke of prudent and manly diſcipline will be generally ſubmitted to; ſober and well ordered living will ſoon ſpring up in the Common-wealth. Ye have an Author great beyond exception, Moſes; and one yet greater, he who hedg'd in from aboliſhing every ſmalleſt jot and tittle of precious equity contain'd in that Law, with a more accurate and laſting Maſoreth, than either the Synagogue of Ezra or the Galilæan School at Tiberias hath left us. Whatever elſe ye can exact, will ſcarce concern a third part of the Brittiſh name: but the benefit and good of this your magnanimous example, will eaſily ſpread far beyond the banks of Tweed and the Norman Iles. It would not be the firſt, or ſecond time, ſince our ancient Druides, by whom this Iland was the Cathedral of Philoſophy to France, left off their Pagan Rites, that England hath had this honour vouchſaft from Heav'n, to give out Reformation to the world. Who was it but our Engliſh Conſtantine that baptiz'd the Roman Empire? Who was it but the Northumbrian Willibrode, and Winifride of Devon with their followers, were the firſt Apoſtles of Germany? who but Alcuin and Wicklef our Countreymen open'd the eyes of Europe, the one in arts, the other in Religion? Let not England forget her precedence of teaching Nations how to live.

Know Worthies, know and excerciſe the priviledge of your honour'd Countrey. A greater title I here bring ye, then is either in the power or in the policy of Rome to give her Monarchs; this glorious Act will ſtile ye the defenders of Charity. Nor is this yet the higheſt inſcription that will adorn ſo religious and ſo holy a defence as this, behold here the pure and ſacred Law of God, and his yet purer and more ſacred Name offring themſelves to you firſt, of all Chriſtian Reformers to be acquitted from the long ſuffer'd ungodly attribute of patronizing Adultery. Defer not to wipe off inſtantly theſe imputative blurrs and ſtains caſt by rude fancies upon the throne and beauty it ſelf of inviolable Holineſs; leſt ſome other people more devout and wiſe than we bereave us this offer'd immortal glory, or wonted prerogative, of being the firſt aſſertors in every great vindication. For me as far as my part leads me, I have already my greateſt gain, aſſurance, and inward ſatisfaction to have done in this nothing unworthy of an honeſt life, and ſtudies well employ'd. With what event among the wiſe and right underſtanding handful of men, I am ſecure. But how among the drove of Cuſtom and Prejudice this will be reliſht by ſuch whoſe capacity ſince their youth run ahead into the eaſy creek of a Syſtem or a Medulla, ſails there at will under the blown Phyſiognomy of their unlabour'd audiments; for them, what their taſte will be, I have alſo ſurety ſufficient, from the entire league that hath been ever between formal ignorance and grave obſtinacy. Yet when I remember the little that our Saviour could prevail about this doctrine of Charity againſt the crabbed Textuiſts of his time, I make no wonder, but reſt confident that whoſo prefers either Matrimony or other Ordinance before the good of man and the plain exigence of Charity, let him profeſs Papiſt or Proteſtant or what he will, he is no better than a Phariſe, and underſtands not the Goſpel: whom as a miſinterpreter of Chriſt I openly proteſt againſt; and provoke him to the trial of the truth before all the world: and let him bethink him withal how he will ſoder up the ſhifting flaws of his ungirt permiſſions, his venial and unvenial diſpences, wherewith the Law of God pardoning and unpardoning hath bin ſhamefully branded for want of heed in gloſſing, to have eluded and baffl'd out all Faith and Chaſtity from the Marriage-bed of that holy Seed, with politick and judicial Adulteries. I ſeek not to ſeduce the ſimple and illiterate; my errand is to find out the choiceſt and the learnedeſt, who have this high gift of wiſdom to anſwer ſolidly, or to be convinc'd. I crave it from the piety, the learning, and the prudence which is hous'd in this place. It might perhaps more fitly have been written in another tongue: and I had done ſo, but that the eſteem I have of my Countries judgment, and the love I bear to my native language to ſerve it firſt with what I endeavour, made me ſpeak it thus, ere I aſſay the verdict of outlandiſh Readers. And perhaps alſo here I might have ended nameleſs, but that the addreſs of theſe lines chiefly to the Parliament of England might have ſeem'd ingrateful not to acknowledge by whoſe religious Care, unwearied Watchfulneſs, courageous and heroick Reſolutions, I enjoy the peace and ſtudious leiſure to remain,

BOOK I.

The PREFACE.

That Man is the occaſion of his own Miſeries, in moſt of thoſe Evils which he imputes to Gods inflicting. The abſurdity of our Canoniſts in their Decrees about Divorce. The Chriſtian Imperial Laws framed with more Equity. The Opinion of Hugo Grotius and Paulus Fagius: And the purpoſe in general of this Diſcourſe.

MAny men, whether it be their fate, or fond opinion, eaſily perſwade themſelves, if God would but be pleas'd a while to withdraw his juſt puniſhments from us, and to reſtrain what power either the Devil or any earthly enemy hath to work us woe, that then mans Nature would find immediate reſt and releaſement from all Evils. But verily they who think ſo, if they be ſuch as have a mind large enough to take into their thoughts a general ſurvey of humane things, would ſoon prove themſelves in that Opinion far deceiv'd. For though it were granted us by divine Indulgence to be exempt from all that can be harmful to us from without, yet the perverſeneſs of our Folly is ſo bent, that we ſhould never lin hammering out of our own hearts, as it were out of a flint, the ſeeds and ſparkles of new Miſery to our ſelves, till all were in a blaze again. And no marvel if out of our own hearts, for they are evil; but even out of thoſe things which God meant us, either for a principal Good, or a pure Contentment, we are ſtill hatching and contriving upon our ſelves matter of continual ſorrow and perplexity. What greater good to man than that revealed Rule, whereby God vouchſafes to ſhew us how he would be worſhipt? And yet that not rightly underſtood, became the cauſe that once a famous man in Iſrael could not but oblige his Conſcience to be the Sacrificer; or if not, the Jaylor of his innocent and only Daughter: And was the cauſe oft times that Armies of valiant men have given up their Throats to a heatheniſh enemy on the Sabbath-day; fondly thinking their defenſive reſiſtance to be as then a thing unlawful. What thing more inſtituted to the ſolace and delight of man than Marriage? and yet the miſ-interpreting of ſome Scipture directed mainly againſt the abuſers of the Law for Divorce given by Moſes, hath chang'd the bleſſing of Matrimony not ſeldom into a familiar and co-inhabiting miſchief; at leaſt into a drooping and diſconſolate houſhold Captivity, without refuge or redemption. So ungovern'd and ſo wild a race doth Superſtition run us, from one extream of abuſed Liberty into the other of unmerciful Reſtraint. For although God in the firſt ordaining of Marriage, taught us to what end he did it, in the words expreſly implying the apt and chearful Converſation of Man with Woman, to comfort and refreſh him of the evil and ſolitary life, not mentioning the purpoſe of Generation till afterwards, as being but a ſecondary end in dignity, tho not in neceſſity; yet now, if any two be but once handed in the Church, and have taſted in any ſort the nuptial Bed, let them find themſelves never ſo miſtak'n in their diſpoſitions through any Error, Concealment, or Miſadventure, that through their different Tempers, Thoughts, and Conſtitutions, they can neither be to one another a remedy againſt Lonelineſs, nor live in any Union or Contentment all their dayes, yet they ſhall, ſo they be but found ſuitably weapon'd to the leaſt poſſibility of ſenſual Enjoyment, be made, ſpight of Antipathy, to fadge together, and combine as they may to their unſpeakable weariſomneſs, and deſpair of all ſociable delight in the Ordinance which God eſtabliſht to that very end. What a calamity is this, and as the wiſe-man, if he were alive, would ſigh out in his own Phraſe, what a ſore evil is this under the Sun! All which we can refer juſtly to no other Author than the Canon Law and her Adherents, not conſulting with Charity, the Interpreter and Guide of our Faith, but reſting in the meer element of the Text; doubtleſs by the policy of the Devil to make that gracious Ordinance become unſupportable, that what with men not daring to venture upon Wedlock, and what with men wearied out of it, all inordinate Licence might abound. It was for many Ages that Marriage lay in diſgrace with moſt of the ancient Doctors, as a work of the fleſh, almoſt a defilement, wholly deny'd to Prieſts, and the ſecond time diſſwaded to all, as he that reads Tertullian or Jerom may ſee at large. Afterwards it was brought ſo Sacramental, that no Adultery or Deſertion could diſſolve it; and this is the ſenſe of our Canon Courts in England to this day, but no other reformed Church elſe: yet there remains in them alſo a burden on it as heavy as the other two were diſgraceful or ſuperſtitious, and of as much iniquity, croſſing a Law not onely written by Moſes, but character'd in us by nature, of more antiquity and deeper ground than Marriage it ſelf; which Law is to force nothing againſt the faultleſs proprieties of Nature: yet that this may be colourably done, our Saviours words touching Divorce, are as it were congeal'd into a ſtony rigor, inconſiſtent both with his Doctrine and his Office; and that which he preacht onely to the Conſcience, is by Canonical tyranny ſnatcht into the compulſive Cenſure of a Judicial Court, where Laws are impos'd even againſt the venerable and ſecret power of Natures impreſſion, to love, whatever cauſe be found to loath. Which is a hainous barbariſme both againſt the honour of Marriage, the dignity of Man and his Soul, the goodneſs of Chriſtianity, and all the humane reſpects of civility. Notwithſtanding that ſome the wiſeſt and graveſt among the Chriſtian Emperors, who had about them, to conſult with, thoſe of the Fathers then living; who for their Learning and Holineſs of Life, are ſtill with us in great renown, have made their ſtatutes and edicts concerning this Debate far more eaſie and relenting in many neceſſary caſes, wherein the Canon is inflexible. And Hugo Grotius, a man of theſe times, one of the beſt learned, ſeems not obſcurely to adhere in his perſwaſion to the equity of thoſe Imperial Decrees, in his notes upon the Evangeliſts; much allaying the outward roughneſs of the Text, which hath for the moſt part been too immoderately expounded; and excites the diligence of others to inquire further into this queſtion, as containing many points that have not yet been explain'd. Which ever likely to remain intricate and hopeleſs upon the ſuppoſitions commonly ſtuck to the authority of Paulus Fagius, one ſo learned and ſo eminent in England once, if it might perſwade, would ſtraite acquaint us with a ſolution of theſe differences, no leſs prudent then compendious. He in his Comment on the Pentateuch, doubted not to maintain that Divorces might be as lawfully permitted by the Magiſtrate to Chriſtians, as they were to the Jews. But becauſe he is but brief, and theſe things of great conſequence not to be kept obſcure, I ſhall conceive it nothing above my duty, either for the difficulty or the cenſure that may paſs thereon, to communicate ſuch thoughts as I alſo have had, and do offer them now in this general labour of Reformation, to the candid view of both Church and Magiſtrate, eſpecially becauſe I ſee it the hope of good men, that thoſe irregular and unſpiritual Courts have ſpun their utmoſt date in this Land, and ſome better courſe muſt now be conſtituted. This therefore ſhall be the task and period of this diſcourſe to prove, firſt, that other reaſons of Divorce, beſides Adultery, were by the Law of Moſes, and are yet to be allow'd by the Chriſtian Magiſtrate as a piece of Juſtice, and that the words of Chriſt are not hereby contraried. Next, that to prohibit abſolutely any Divorce whatſoever, except thoſe which Moſes excepted, is againſt the reaſon of Law, as in due place I ſhall ſhew out of Fagius with many additions. He therefore who by adventuring, ſhall be ſo happy as with ſucceſs to light the way of ſuch an expedient liberty and truth as this, ſhall reſtore the much-wrong'd and over-ſorrowed ſtate of Matrimony, not only to thoſe merciful and life-giving remedies of Moſes, but as much as may be, to that ſerene and bliſful condition it was in at the beginning, and ſhall deſerve of all apprehenſive men ( conſidering the troubles and diſtempers which for want of this inſight have been ſo oft in Kingdoms, in States and Families ) ſhall deſerve to be reckon'd among the publick Benefactors of civil and humane life, above the Inventors of Wine and Oyl; for this is a far dearer, far nobler, and more deſirable cheriſhing to mans life, unworthily expoſed to Sadneſs and Miſtake, which he ſhall vindicate. Not that licence, and levety, and unconſented breach of Faith ſhould herein be countenanc't, but that ſome conſcionable and tender pitty might be had of thoſe who have unwarily, in a thing they never practis'd before, made themſelves the Bondmen of a luckleſs and helpleſs Matrimony. In which Argument, he whoſe courage can ſerve him to give the firſt onſet muſt look for two ſeveral oppoſitions; the one from them who have ſworn themſelves to long Cuſtom, and the letter of the Text, will not out of the road: the other from thoſe whoſe groſs and vulgar apprehenſions conceit but low of matrimonial purpoſes, and in the work of Male and Female think they have all. Nevertheleſs, it ſhall be here ſought by due ways to be made appear, that thoſe Words of God in the Inſtitution, promiſing a meet help againſt Lonelineſs, and thoſe Words of Chriſt, That his yoke is eaſie, and his burden light, were not ſpoken in vain; for if the knot of Marriage may in no caſe be diſſolv'd but for Adultery, all the burdens and ſervices of the Law are not ſo intolerable. This only is deſir'd of them who are minded to judge hardly of thus maintaining, that they would be ſtill, and hear all out, nor think it equal to anſwer deliberate reaſon with ſudden heat and noiſe; remembring this, that many Truths now of reverend eſteem and credit, had their birth and beginning once from ſingular and private thoughts, while the moſt of men were otherwiſe poſſeſt, and had the fate at firſt to be generally exploded and exclaim'd on by many violent oppoſers: yet I may erre perhaps in ſoothing my ſelf, that this preſent truth reviv'd, will deſerve on all hands to be not ſiniſterly receiv'd, in that it undertakes the cure of an inveterate diſeaſe crept into the beſt part of humane Society; and to do this with no ſmarting corroſive, but with a ſmooth and pleaſing leſſon, which receiv'd, hath the virtue to ſoften and diſpel rooted and knotty ſorrows, and without inchantment if that be fear'd, or ſpell us'd, hath regard at once both to ſerious pitty and upright honeſty; that tends to the redeeming and reſtoring of none but ſuch as are the object of compaſſion, having in an ill hour hamper'd themſelves to the utter diſpatch of all their moſt beloved Comforts and Repoſe for this lifes term. But if we ſhall obſtinately diſlike this new overture of unexpected Eaſe and Recovery, what remains but to deplore the frowardneſs of our hopeleſs condition, which neither can indure the eſtate we are in, nor admit of remedy either ſharp or ſweet. Sharp we our ſelves diſtaſte; and ſweet, under whoſe hands we are, is ſcrupl'd and ſuſpected as too luſhious. In ſuch a poſture Chriſt found the Jews, who were neither won with the Auſterity of John the Baptiſt, and thought it too much licence to follow freely the charming pipe of him who ſounded and proclaim'd Liberty and Relief to all Diſtreſſes: yet Truth in ſome Age or other will find her witneſs, and ſhall be juſtifi'd at laſt by her own children.

CHAP. I.

The Poſition prov'd by the Law of Moſes. That Law expounded and aſſerted to a moral and charitable uſe, firſt by Paulus Fagius, next with other Additions.

TO remove therefore, if it be poſſible, this great and ſad Oppreſſion which thro the ſtrictneſs of a literal interpreting hath invaded and diſturb'd the deareſt and moſt peaceable eſtate of houſhold Society, to the over-burthening, if not the overwhelming of many Chriſtians better worth than to be ſo deſerted of the Churches conſiderate care, this Poſition ſhall be laid down, firſt proving, then anſwering what may be objected either from Scripture or light of Reaſon.

That indiſpoſition, unfitneſs, or contrariety of mind, ariſing from a cauſe in nature unchangeable, hindring, and ever likely to hinder the main benefits of conjugal Society which are Solace and Peace, is a greater reaſon of Divorce than natural Frigidity, eſpecially if there be no Children, and that there be mutual conſent.

This I gather from the Law in Deut. 24. 1. When a man hath tak'n a wife and married her, and it come to paſs that ſhe find no favour in his eyes, becauſe he hath found ſome uncleanneſs in her, let him write her a bill of Divorcement, and give it in her hand, and ſend her out of his houſe, &c. This Law, if the words of Chriſt may be admitted into our belief, ſhall never while the World ſtands, for him be abrogated. Firſt therefore I here ſet down what learned Fagius hath obſerv'd on this Law; The Law of God, ſaith he, permitted Divorce for the help of humane weakneſs. For every one that of neceſſity ſeparates, cannot live ſingle. That Chriſt deny'd Divorce to his own, hinders not; for what is that to the unregenerate, who hath not attain'd ſuch Perfection? Let not the remedy be deſpis'd which was giv'n to weakneſs. And when Chriſt ſaith, who marries the Divorc't commits adultery, it is to be underſtood if he had any plot in the Divorce. The reſt I reſerve until it be diſputed, how the Magiſtrate is to do herein. From hence we may plainly diſcern a two-fold Conſideration in this Law, firſt the End of the Law-giver, and the proper Act of the Law, to command or to allow ſomething juſt and honeſt, or indifferent. Secondly, his ſufferance from ſome accidental reſult of evil by this allowance, which the Law cannot remedy. For if this Law have no other End or Act but onely the allowance of a Sin, though never to ſo good intention, that Law is no Law, but Sin muffl'd in the robe of Law, or Law diſguis'd in the looſe garment of Sin. Both which are two foul Hypotheſes to ſave the Phænomenon of our Saviours anſwer to the Phariſees about this matter. And I truſt anon by the help of an infallible guide to perfect ſuch Prutenick Tables as ſhall mend the Aſtronomy of our wide Expoſitors.

The cauſe of Divorce mention'd in the Law, is tranſlated ſome uncleanneſs, but in the Hebrew it ſounds nakedneſs of ought, or any real nakedneſs: which by all the learned Interpreters is referr'd to the Mind as well as to the Body. And what greater nakedneſs or unfitneſs of mind than that which hinders ever the ſolace and peaceful ſociety of the married couple, and what hinders that more than the unfitneſs and defectiveneſs of an unconjugal Mind? The cauſe therefore of Divorce expreſt in the Poſition, cannot but agree with that deſcrib'd in the beſt and equalleſt ſence of Moſes's Law. Which being a matter of pure Charity, is plainly moral, and more now in force than ever, therefore ſurely lawful. For if under the Law ſuch was God's gracious Indulgence, as not to ſuffer the Ordinance of his goodneſs and favour through any error to be ſear'd and ſtigmatiz'd upon his Servants to their miſery and thraldom; much leſs will he ſuffer it now under the Covenant of Grace, by abrogating his former grant of remedy and relief. But the firſt inſtitution will be objected to have ordain'd Marriage unſeparable. To that a little patience until this firſt part have amply diſcours'd the grave and pious Reaſons of this divorſive Law; and then I doubt not but with one gentle ſtroaking to wipe away ten thouſand Tears out of the life of Man. Yet thus much I ſhall now inſiſt on, that whatever the Inſtitution were, it could not be ſo enormous, nor ſo rebellious againſt both Nature and Reaſon as to exalt it ſelf above the End and Perſon for whom it was inſtituted.

CHAP II.

The firſt Reaſon of this Law grounded on the prime Reaſon of Matrimony. That no Cov'nant whatſoever obliges againſt the main End both of it ſelf, and of the Parties cov'nanting.

FOR all Senſe and Equity reclaims that any Law or Cov'nant how ſolemne or ſtrait ſoever, either between God and Man, or Man and Man, though of Gods joyning, ſhould bind againſt a prime and principal ſcope of its own inſtitution, and of both or either Party cov'nanting: neither can it be of force to ingage a blameleſs Creature to his own perpetual Sorrow, miſtak'n for his expected ſolace, without ſuffering Charity to ſtep in and do a confeſt good work of parting thoſe, whom nothing hold together but this of Gods joyning, falſly ſuppos'd againſt the expreſs end of his own Ordinance. And what this chief end was of creating Woman to be joyn'd with Man, his own inſtituting words declare, and are infallible to inform us what is Marriage, and what is no Marriage; unleſs we can think them ſet there to no purpoſe: It is not good, ſaith he, that man ſhould be alone, I will make him a help meet for him. From which words ſo plain, leſs cannot be concluded, nor is by any learned Interpreter, than that in Gods intention a meet and happy Converſation is the cheifeſt and the nobleſt end of Marriage: for we find here no Expreſſion ſo neceſſarily implying carnal Knowledg, as this prevention of Lonelineſs to the mind and ſpirit of man. To this, Fagius, Calvin, Pareus, Rivetus, as willingly and largely aſſent as can be wiſht. And indeed it is a greater bleſſing from God, more worthy ſo excellent a Creature as Man is, and a higher end to honour and ſanctifie the league of Marriage, when as the ſolace and ſatisfaction of the Mind is regarded and provided for before the ſenſitive pleaſing of the Body. And with all generous perſons married thus it is, that where the Mind and Perſon pleaſes aptly, there ſome unaccompliſhment of the Bodies delight may be better born with, than when the Mind hangs off in an uncloſing diſproportion, though the Body be as it ought; for there all corporal delight will ſoon become unſavoury and contemptible. And the ſolitarineſs of Man, which God had namely and principally order'd to prevent by Marriage, hath no remedy, but lies under a worſe condition than the lonelieſt ſingle life; for in ſingle life the abſence and remoteneſs of a Helper might inure him to expect his own comforts out of himſelf, or to ſeek with hope: but here the continual ſight of his deluded thoughts without cure, muſt needs be to him, if eſpecially his complexion incline him to Melancholy, a daily trouble and pain of loſs, in ſome degree like that which Reprobates feel. Leſt therefore ſo noble a creature as Man ſhould be ſhut up incurably under a worſe evil by an eaſie miſtake in that Ordinance which God gave him to remedy a leſs evil, reaping to himſelf Sorrow while he went to rid away Solitarineſs, it cannot avoid to be concluded, that if the Woman be naturally ſo of diſpoſition, as will not help to remove, but help to increaſe that ſame God-forbidd'n lonelineſs, which will in time draw on with it a general diſcomfort and dejection of mind, not beſeeming either Chriſtian profeſſion, or Moral converſation, unprofitable and dangerous to the Common-wealth, when the houſhold eſtate, out of which muſt flouriſh forth the vigor and ſpirit of all publick enterprizes, is ſo ill contented and procur'd at home, and cannot be ſupported: ſuch a Marriage can be no Marriage, whereto the moſt honeſt End is wanting; and the agrieved perſon ſhall do more manly, to be extraordinary and ſingular in claiming the due right whereof he is fruſtrated, than to piece up his loſt contentment by viſiting the Stews, or ſtepping to his neighbour's Bed; which is the common ſhift in this misfortune: or elſe by ſuffering his uſeful life to waſte away, and be loſt under a ſecret Affliction of an unconſcionable ſize to humane ſtrength. Againſt all which Evils, the Mercy of this Moſaick Law was graciouſly exhibited.

CHAP. III.

The Ignorance and Iniquity of Canon Law, providing for the right of the Body in Marriage, but nothing for the wrongs and grievances of the Mind. An Objection, That the Mind ſhould be better lookt to before Contract, anſwered.

HOw vain therefore is it, and how prepoſterous in the Canon Law, to have made ſuch careful proviſion againſt the impediment of carnal performance, and to have had no care about the unconverſing inability of Mind, ſo defective to the pureſt and moſt ſacred end of Matrimony; and that the Veſſel of voluptuous enjoyment muſt be made good on him that has taken it upon truſt, without any caution; when as the Mind, from whence muſt flow the acts of Peace and Love, a far more precious mixture than the quinteſſence of an excrement, though it be found never ſo deficient and unable to perform the beſt duty of Marriage in a cheerful and agreeable Converſation, ſhall be thought good enough, however flat and melancholious it be, and muſt ſerve, though to the eternal diſturbance and languiſhing of him that complains him? Yet Wiſdom and Charity weighing Gods own Inſtitution, would think that the pining of a ſad Spirit wedded to Lonelineſs, ſhould deſerve to be freed, as well as the Impatience of a ſenſual Deſire ſo providently reliev'd. 'Tis read to us in the Liturgy, that we muſt not marry to ſatisfy the fleſhly appetite, like brute beaſts, that have no underſtanding: but the Canon ſo runs, as if it dreamt of no other matter than ſuch an appetite to be ſatisfi'd; for if it happen that Nature hath ſtopt or extinguiſht the veins of Senſuality, that Marriage was annull'd. But though all the Faculties of the underſtanding and converſing part after trial appear to be ſo ill and ſo averſly met through Natures unalterable working, as that neither Peace, nor any ſociable Contentment can follow, 'tis as nothing, the Contract ſhall ſtand as firm as ever, betide what will. What is this but ſecretly to inſtruct us, that however many grave Reaſons are pretended to the married life, yet that nothing indeed is thought worth regard therein, but the preſcrib'd ſatisfaction of an irrational Heat? which cannot be but ignominious to the ſtate of Marriage, diſhonourable to the undervalu'd Soul of Man, and even to Chriſtian Doctrine it ſelf. While it ſeems more mov'd at the diſappointing of an impetuous Nerve, than at the ingenuous grievance of a Mind unreaſonably yoakt; and to place more of Marriage in the Channel of Concupiſcence, than in the pure influence of Peace and Love, whereof the Souls lawful Contentment is the one onely fountain.

But ſome are ready to object, That the Diſpoſition ought ſeriouſly to be conſidered before. But let them know again that for all the warineſs can be us'd, it may yet befal a diſcreet man to be miſtak'n in his Choice, and we have plenty of Examples. The ſobreſt and beſt govern'd men are leaſt practiz'd in theſe Affairs; and who knows not that the baſhful muteneſs of a Virgin may oft-times hide all the unlivelineſs and natural ſloth which is really unfit for Converſation; nor is there that freedom of acceſs granted or preſum'd, as may ſuffice to a perfect diſcerning till too late: and where any Diſpoſition is ſuſpected, what more uſual than the perſwaſion of Friends, that Acquaintance as it increaſes, will amend all? And laſtly, it is not ſtrange though many who have ſpent their Youth chaſtly, are in ſome things not ſo quick-ſighted, while they haſt ſo eagerly to light the nuptial Torch; nor is it therefore that for a modeſt Error a man ſhould forfeit ſo great a happineſs, and no charitable means to releaſe him: Since they who have liv'd moſt looſely by reaſon of their bold accuſtoming, prove moſt ſucceſsful in their Matches, becauſe their wild Affections unſetling at will, have been as ſo many Divorces to teach them experience. When as the ſober Man honouring the appearance of Modeſty, and hopeing well of every ſocial vertue under the vail, may eaſily chance to meet, if not with a Body impenetrable, yet often with a Mind to all other due Converſation inacceſſible, and to all the more eſtimable and ſuperiour purpoſes of Matrimony uſeleſs and almoſt liveleſs: and what a ſolace, what a fit help ſuch a Conſort would be through the whole Life of a Man, is leſs pain to conjecture than to have experience.

CHAP. IV.

The ſecond Reaſon of this Law, becauſe without it, Marriage as it happ'ns oft is not a remedy of that which it promiſes, as any rational creature would expect. That Marriage, if we pattern from the beginning, as our Saviour bids, was not properly the remedy of Luſt, but the fulfilling of conjugal Love and Helpfulneſs.

AND that we may further ſee what a violent cruel thing it is to force the continuing of thoſe together, whom God and Nature in the gentleſt end of Marriage never joyn'd, divers evils and extremities that follow upon ſuch a compulſion, ſhall here be ſet in view. Of evils, the firſt and greateſt is, that hereby a moſt abſurd and raſh imputation is fixt upon God and his holy Laws, of conniving and diſpencing with open and common Adultery among his choſen people; a thing which the rankeſt Politician would think it ſhame and diſworſhip that his Laws ſhould countenance: how and in what manner that comes to paſs, I ſhall reſerve till the courſe of method brings on the unfolding of many Scriptures. Next the Law and Goſpel are hereby made liable to more than one contradiction, which I refer alſo thither. Laſtly, the ſupreme dictate of Charity is hereby many ways neglected and violated; which I ſhall forthwith addreſs to prove. Firſt, we know S. Paul ſaith, It is better to marry than to burn. Marriage therefore was giv'n as a remedy of that trouble; but what might this burning mean? Certainly not the meer motion of carnal luſt, not the meer goad of a ſenſitive deſire, God does not principally take care for ſuch Cattle. What is it then but that deſire which God put into Adam in Paradiſe before he knew the ſin of Incontinence; that deſire which God ſaw it was not good that Man ſhould be left alone to burn in, the deſire and longing to put off an unkindly ſolitarineſs by uniting another body, but not without a fit ſoul to his in the chearful ſociety of Wedlock? Which if it were ſo needful before the fall, when Man was much more perfect in himſelf, how much more is it needful now againſt all the ſorrows and caſualties of this life to have an intimate and ſpeaking help, a ready and reviving aſſociate in marriage? whereof who miſſes, by chancing on a mute and ſpiritleſs mate, remains more alone than before, and in a burning leſs to be contain'd then that which is fleſhly; and more to be conſider'd, as being more deeply rooted even in the faultleſs innocence of nature. As for that other burning, which is but as it were the venome of a luſty and over-abounding concoction, ſtrict life and labour, with the abatement of a full diet, may keep that low and obedient enough: but this pure and more inbred deſire of joyning to it ſelf in conjugal fellowſhip a fit converſing ſoul (which deſire is properly called love) is ſtronger than death, as the ſpouſe of Chriſt thought; many waters cannot quench it, neither can the floods drown it. This is that rational burning that Marriage is to remedy, not to be allay'd with faſting, nor with any penance to be ſubdu'd; which how can he aſſwage who by miſ-hap hath met the moſt unmeet and unſutable mind? Who hath the power to ſtruggle with an intelligible flame, not in Paradiſe to be reſiſted, become now more ardent by being fail'd of what in reaſon it lookt for; and even then moſt unquencht, when the importunity of a provender-burning is well enough appeas'd; and yet the ſoul hath obtained nothing of what it juſtly deſires. Certainly ſuch a one forbidden to divorce, is in effect forbidden to marry, and compell'd to greater difficulties than in a ſingle life: for if there be not a more humane burning which Marriage muſt ſatisfie, or elſe may be diſſolv'd, than that of copulation, Marriage cannot be honourable for the meet reducing and terminating luſt between two: ſeeing many beaſts in voluntary and choſen couples, live together as unadulterouſly, and are as truly married in that reſpect. But all ingenuous Men will ſee that the dignity and bleſſing of Marriage is plac'd rather in the mutual enjoyment of that which the wanting ſoul needfully ſeeks, than of that which the plenteous body would joyfully give away. Hence it is that Plato in his Feſtival diſcourſe brings in Socrates relating what he fain'd to have learnt from the Propheteſs Diotima, how Love was the ſon of Penury, begot of Plenty in the Garden of Jupiter. Which divinely ſorts with that which in effect Moſes tells us, that Love was the ſon of Lonelineſs, begot in Paradice by that ſociable and helpful aptitude which God implanted between Man and Woman toward each other. The ſame alſo is that burning mentioned by S. Paul, whereof Marriage ought to be the remedy ; the Fleſh hath other mutual and eaſie curbs which are in the power of any temperate Man. When therefore this original and ſinleſs Penury or Lonelineſs of the ſoul cannot lay it ſelf down by the ſide of ſuch a meet and acceptable union as God ordain'd in Marriage, at leaſt in ſome proportion, it cannot conceive and bring forth Love, but remains utterly unmarried under a formal Wedlock, and ſtill burns in the proper meaning of S. Paul. Then enters Hate, not that Hate that ſins, but that which onely is natural diſſatisfaction, and the turning aſide from a miſtaken object: if that miſtake have done injury, it fails not to diſmiſs with recompence ; for to retain ſtill and not be able to love, is to heap up more injury. Thence this wiſe and pious Law of Diſmiſſion now defended took beginning : He therefore who lacking of his due in the moſt native and humane end of Marriage, thinks it better to part than to live ſadly and injuriouſly to that cheerful Cov'nant (for not to be belov'd, and yet retain'd, is the greateſt injury to a gentle ſpirit) he I ſay, who therefore ſeeks to part, is one who highly honours the married life, and would not ſtain it : and the reaſons which now move him to divorce, are equal to the beſt of thoſe that could firſt warrant him to marry ; for, as was plainly ſhewn, both the hate which now diverts him, and the lonelineſs which leads him ſtill powerfully to ſeek a fit help, hath not the leaſt grain of a ſin in it, if he be worthy to underſtand himſelf.

CHAP. V.

The third Reaſon of this Law, becauſe without it, he who has happn'd where he finds nothing but remedileſs offences and diſcontents, is in more and greater temptations than ever before.

THirdly, Yet it is next to be fear'd, if he muſt be ſtill bound without reaſon by a deaf rigor, that when he perceives the juſt expectance of his mind defeated, he will begin even againſt Law to caſt about where he may find his ſatisfaction more compleat, unleſs he be a thing heroically vertuous, and that are not the common lump of Men for whom chiefly the Laws ought to be made, though not to their ſins, yet to their unſinning weakneſſes, it being above their ſtrength to endure the lonely eſtate, which while they ſhun'd, they are fal'n into. And yet there follows upon this a worſe temptation ; for if he be ſuch as hath ſpent his youth unblamably, and laid up his chiefeſt earthly comforts in the enjoyments of a contented Marriage, nor did neglect that furtherance which was to be obtain'd therein by conſtant prayers, when he ſhall find himſelf bound faſt to an uncomplying diſcord of nature, or, as it oft happens, to an Image of Earth and Fleam, with whom he lookt to be the Copartner of a ſweet and gladſome ſociety, and ſees withal that his bondage is now inevitable ; though he be almoſt the ſtrongeſt Chriſtian, he will be ready to deſpair in vertue, and mutiny againſt Divine Providence ; and this doubtleſs is the reaſon of thoſe lapſes and that melancholly deſpair which we ſee in many wedded perſons, though they underſtand it not, or pretend other cauſes, becauſe they know no remedy, and is of extream danger : therefore when humane frailty ſurcharg'd, is at ſuch a loſs, charity ought to venture much, and uſe bold Phyſick, leſt an over-toſt faith indanger to ſhipwrack.

CHAP. VI.

The fourth Reaſon of this Law, that God regards Love and Peace in the Family, more than a compulſive performance of Marriage, which is more broke by a grievous Continuance, than by a needful Divorce.

FOurthly, Marriage is a Cov'nant, the very being whereof conſiſts not in a forc'd cohabitation, and counterfeit performance of duties, but in unfeigned love and peace: And of Matrimonial love, no doubt but that was chiefly meant, which by the ancient Sages was thus parabl'd; That Love, if he be not twin-born, yet hath a brother wondrous like him, call'd Anteros; whom while he ſeeks all about, his chance is to meet with many falls and feigning deſires that wander ſingly up and down in her likeneſs: By them in their borrow'd garb, Love though not wholly blind, as Poets wrong him, yet having but one eye, as being born an Archer aiming, and that eye not the quickeſt in this dark Region here below, which is not Loves proper Sphere, partly out of the ſimplicity and credulity which is native to him, often deceiv'd, imbraces and conſorts him with theſe obvious and ſuborned Striplings, as if they were his Mothers own Sons; for ſo he thinks them, while they ſubtily keep themſelves moſt on his blind ſide. But after a while, as his manner is, when ſoaring up into the high Tower of his Apogaum, above the ſhadow of the Earth, he darts out the direct rays of his then moſt piercing eye-ſight upon the impoſtures, and trim diſguizes that were us'd with him, and diſcerns that this is not his genuine brother, as he imagin'd. He has no longer the power to hold fellowſhip with ſuch a perſonal Mate; for ſtrait his arrows looſe their golden heads, and ſhed their purple feathers, his ſilk'n Breads untwine, and ſlip their knots, and that original and fiery virtue giv'n him by Fate all on a ſudden goes out, and leaves him undeifi'd and deſpoil'd of all his force, till finding Anteros at laſt, he kindles and repairs the almoſt faded ammunition of his Deity by the reflection of a coequal and homogeneal fire. Thus mine Author ſung it to me; and by the leave of thoſe who would be counted the only grave ones, this is no meer amatorious novel (though to be wiſe and skilful in theſe matters, Men heretofore of greateſt name in vertue, have eſteemed it one of the higheſt Arks that humane Contemplation circling upwards, can make from the globy Sea whereon ſhe ſtands:) but this is a deep and ſerious verity, ſhewing us that Love in Marriage cannot live nor ſubſiſt unleſs it be mutual; and where Love cannot be, there can be left of Wedlock nothing but the empty husk of an outſide Matrimony, as undelightful and unpleaſing to God, as any other kind of hypocriſie. So far is his Command from tying Men to the obſervance of Duties which there is no help for, but they muſt be diſſembl'd. If Solomon's advice be not over-frolick, Live joyfully, ſaith he, with the Wiſe whom thou loveſt, all thy days, for that is thy portion. How then, where we find it impoſſible to rejoyce or to love, can we obey this Precept? how miſerably do we defraud our ſelves of that comfortable portion which God gives us, by ſtriving vainly to glue an error together, which God and Nature will not joyn, adding but more vexation and violence to that bliſsful ſociety by our importunate ſuperſtition, that will not hearken to S. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. who ſpeaking of Marriage and Divorce, determines plain enough in general, that God therein hath call'd us to peace, and not to bondage. Yea, God himſelf commands in his Law more than once, and by his Prophet Malachy, as Calvin and the beſt Tranſlations read, that he who hates, let him divorce, that is, he who cannot love. Hence is it that the Rabbins, and Maimonides famous among the reſt in a Book of his ſet forth by Buxtorſius, tells us, that Divorce was permitted by Moſes to preſerve peace in Marriage, and quiet in the Family. Surely the Jews had their ſaving Peace about them as well as we, yet care was tak'n that this wholeſome proviſion for houſhold Peace ſhould alſo be allow'd them; and muſt this be deni'd to Chriſtians? O perverſeneſs! that the Law ſhould be made more provident of peace-making than the Goſpel! that the Goſpel ſhould be put to beg a moſt neceſſary help of Mercy from the Law, but muſt not have it; and that to grind in the Mill of an undelighted and ſervile copulation, muſt be the only forc'd work of a Chriſtian Marriage oft-times with ſuch a yoke-fellow, from whom both Love and Peace, both Nature and Religion mourns to be ſeparated. I cannot therefore be ſo diffident, as not ſecurely to conclude, that he who can receive nothing of the moſt important helps in Marriage, being thereby diſinabl'd to return that duty which is his, with a clear and hearty countenance; and thus continues to grieve whom he would not, and is no leſs griev'd, that Man ought even for Love's ſake and Peace to move Divorce upon good and liberal conditions to the divorc'd. And it is a leſs breach of Wedlock to part with wiſe and quiet conſent betimes, than ſtill to ſoil and profane that myſtery of joy and union with a polluting ſadneſs and perpetual diſtemper; for it is not the outward continuing of Marriage that keeps whole that Cov'nant, but whatſoever does moſt according to Peace and Love, whether in Marriage or in Divorce, he it is that breaks Marriage leaſt; it being ſo often written, that Love onely is the fulfilling of every Commandment.

CHAP. VII.

The fifth Reaſon, that nothing more hinders and diſturbs the whole life of a Chriſtian, than a Matrimony found to be uncurably unfit, and doth the ſame in effect that an Idolatrous match.

Fifthly, As thoſe Prieſts of old were not to be long in ſorrow, or if they were, they could not rightly execute their function; ſo every true Chriſtian in a higher order of Prieſthood is a perſon dedicate to joy and peace, offering himſelf a lively ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving, and there is no Chriſtian duty that is not to be ſeaſon'd and ſet off with cheriſhneſs; which in a thouſand outward and intermitting croſſes may yet be done well, as in this vale of tears: but in ſuch a boſom-affliction as this, cruſhing the very foundation of his inmoſt nature, when he ſhall be forc'd to love againſt a poſſibility, and to uſe a diſſimulation againſt his ſoul in the perpetual and ceaſeleſs duties of a Husband, doubtleſs his whole duty of ſerving God muſt needs be blurr'd and tainted with a ſad unpreparedneſs and dejection of ſpirit, wherein God has no delight. Who ſees not therefore how much more Chriſtianity it would be to break by divorce that which is more broken by undue and forcible keeping, rather than to cover the Altar of the Lord with continual tears, ſo that he regardeth not the offering any more; rather than that the whole Worſhip of a Chriſtian man's life ſhould languiſh and fade away beneath the weight of an immeaſurable grief and diſcouragement? And becauſe ſome think the Children of a ſecond Matrimony ſucceeding a Divorce, would not be a holy Seed, it hinder'd not the Jews from being ſo; and why ſhould we not think them more holy than the off-ſpring of a former ill-twiſted Wedlock, begott'n only out of a beaſtial neceſſity, without any true love or contentment, or joy to their Parents? ſo that in ſome ſenſe we may call them the Children of wrath and anguiſh, which will as little conduce to their ſanctifying, as if they had been Baſtards: for nothing more than diſturbance of mind ſuſpends us from approaching to God, ſuch a diſturbance eſpecially, as both aſſaults our faith and truſt in God's providence, and ends, if there be not a miracle of vertue on either ſide, not only in bitterneſs and wrath, the Canker of Devotion, but in a deſperate and vicious careleſneſs, when he ſees himſelf without fault of his, train'd by a deceitful bait into a ſnare of miſery, betray'd by an alluring Ordinance, and then made the thrall of heavineſs and diſcomfort by an undivorcing Law of God, as he erroniouſly thinks, but of Man's iniquity, as the truth is: for that God prefers the free and chearful Worſhip of a Chriſtian, before the grievous and exacted obſervance of an unhappy Marriage, beſides that the general maximes of Religion aſſure us, will be more manifeſt by drawing a parallel Argument from the ground of divorcing an Idolatreſs, which was, leſt he ſhould alienate his heart from the true worſhip of God: and what difference is there whether ſhe pervert him to ſuperſtition by her inticing Sorcery, or diſinable him in the whole ſervice of God through the diſturbance of her unhelpful and unfit ſociety, and ſo drive him at laſt, through murmuring and deſpair, to thoughts of Atheiſm? Neither doth it leſſen the cauſe of ſeparating, in that the one willingly allures him from the Faith, the other perhaps unwillingly drives him; for in the account of God it comes all to one, that the Wife looſes him a ſervant; and therefore by all the united force of the Decalogue ſhe ought to be diſbanded, unleſs we muſt ſet Marriage above God and Charity, which is the Doctrine of Devils, no leſs than forbidding to marry.

CHAP VIII.

That an Idolatrous Heretick ought to be divorc'd after a convenient ſpace giv'n to hope of Converſion. That place of 1 Corinth. 7. reſtor'd from a twofold erronious Expoſition; and that the common Expoſitors flatly contradict the Moral Law.

AND here by the way, to illuſtrate the whole queſtion of Divorce, e're this Treatiſe end, I ſhall not be loth to ſpend a few lines in hope to give a full reſolve of that which is yet ſo much controverted, whether an Idolatrous Heretick ought to be divorc't. To the reſolving whereof we muſt firſt know, that the Jews were commanded to divorce an unbelieving Gentile for two cauſes: Firſt, becauſe all other Nations, eſpecially the Canaanites, were to them unclean. Secondly, to avoid ſeducement. That other Nations were to the Jews impure, even to the ſeparating of Marriage, will appear out of Exod. 34. 16. Deut. 7. 3, 6. compar'd with Ezra 9. 2. alſo Chap. 10. 10, 11. Nehem. 13. 30. This was the ground of that doubt rais'd among the Corinthians by ſome of the Circumciſion; Whether an Unbeliever were not ſtill to be counted an unclean thing, ſo as that they ought to divorce from ſuch a perſon. This doubt of theirs S. Paul removes by an Evangelical reaſon, having reſpect to that Viſion of S. Peter, wherein the diſtinction of clean and unclean being aboliſht, all living Creatures were ſanctified to a pure and Chriſtian uſe, and mankind eſpecially, now invited by a general call to the Covenant of Grace. Therefore ſaith S. Paul, The unbelieving Wife is ſanctified by the Husband; that is, made pure and lawful to his uſe, ſo that he need not put her away for fear leſt her unbelief ſhould defile him; but that if he found her love ſtill towards him, he might rather hope to win her. The ſecond reaſon of that Divorce was to avoid ſeducement, as is prov'd by comparing thoſe places of the Law, to that which Ezra and Nehemiah did by Divine Warrant in compelling the Jews to forgo their Wives. And this reaſon is moral and perpetual in the rule of Chriſtian Faith without evaſion; therefore ſaith the Apoſtle, 2 Cor. 6. Miſ-yoke not together with Infidels, which is interpreted of Marriage in the firſt place. And although the former legal pollution be now done off, yet there is a ſpiritual contagion in Idolatry as much to be ſhun'd; and though ſeducement were not to be fear'd, yet where there is no hope of converting, there always ought to be a certain religious averſation and abhorring, which can no way ſort with Marriage: Therefore ſaith S. Paul, What fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs? what communion hath light with darkneſs? what concord hath Chriſt with Belial? what part hath he that believeth with an Infidel? And in the next verſe but one, he moralizes, and makes us liable to that command of Iſaiah; Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye ſeparate, ſaith the Lord; touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive ye. And this Command thus Goſpelliz'd to us, hath the ſame force with that whereon Ezra grounded the pious neceſſity of divorcing. Neither had he other Commiſſion for what he did, then ſuch a general Command in Deut. as this, nay not ſo direct; for he is bid there not to marry, but not bid to divorce, and yet we ſee with what a zeal and confidence he was the Author of a general Divorce between the faithful and unfaithful ſeed. The Goſpel is more plainly on his ſide, according to three of the Evangeliſts, then the words of the Law; for where the caſe of Divorce is handled with ſuch a ſeverity as was fitteſt to aggravate the fault of unbounded licence, yet ſtill in the ſame Chapter, when it comes into queſtion afterwards, whether any civil reſpect, or natural relation which is deareſt, may be our plea to divide, or hinder, or but delay our duty to Religion, we hear it determin'd, that Father, and Mother, and Wife alſo, is not only to be hated, but forſak'n, if we mean to inherit the great Reward there promis'd. Nor will it ſuffice to be put off by ſaying we muſt forſake them only by not conſenting or not complying with them; for that were to be done, and roundly too, though being of the ſame faith, they ſhould but ſeek out of a fleſhly tenderneſs to weak'n our Chriſtian fortitude with worldly perſwaſions, or but to unſettle our conſtancy with timorous and ſoftning ſuggeſtions; as we may read with what a vehemence Job, the patienteſt of Men, rejected the deſperate counſels of his wife; and

Moſes, the meekeſt, being throughly offended with the prophane ſpeeches of Zippora, ſent her back to her father. But if they ſhall perpetually at our elbow ſeduce us from the true Worſhip of God, or defile and daily ſcandalize our Conſcience by their hopeleſs continuance in misbelief, then ev'n in the due progreſs of Reaſon, and that ever-equal proportion which Juſtice proceeds by, it cannot be imagin'd that this cited place commands leſs than a total and final ſeparation from ſuch an Adherent, at leaſt that no force ſhould be us'd to keep them together; while we remember that God commanded Abraham to ſend away his irreligious Wife and her Son for the offences which they gave in a pious family. And it may be gueſt that David for the like cauſe diſpos'd of Michal in ſuch a ſort, as little differ'd from a diſmiſſion. Therefore againſt reiterated ſcandals and ſeducements, which never ceaſe, much more can no other remedy or retirement be found but abſolute departure. For what kind of Matrimony can that remain to be, what one duty between ſuch can be perform'd as it ſhould be from the heart, when their thoughts and ſpirits fly aſunder as far as Heaven from Hell, eſpecially if the time that hope ſhould ſend forth her expected bloſſoms be paſt in vain? It will eaſily be true, that a Father or Brother may be hated zealouſly, and lov'd civily or naturally; for thoſe duties may be performed at diſtance, and do admit of any long abſence: but how the peace and perpetual cohabitation of Marriage can be kept, how that benevolent and intimate communion of body can be held with one that muſt be hated with a moſt operative hatred, muſt be forſak'n and yet continually dwelt with and accompanied, he who can diſtinguiſh, hath the gift of an affection very odly divided and contriv'd; while others both juſt and wiſe, and Solomon among the reſt, if they may not hate and forſake as Moſes enjoyns, and the Goſpel imports, will find it impoſſible not to love otherwiſe then will ſort with the love of God, whoſe jealouſie brooks no corrival. And whether is more likely, that Chriſt bidding to forſake Wife for Religion, meant it by Divorce as Moſes meant it, whoſe Law grounded on moral Reaſon, was both his office and his eſſence to maintain; or that he ſhould bring a new morality into Religion, not only new, but contrary to an unchangeable Command, and dangerouſly derogating from our love and worſhip of God? As if when Moſes had bid Divorce abſolutely, and Chriſt had ſaid, hate and forſake, and his Apoſtle had ſaid, no communication with Chriſt and Belial; yet that Chriſt after all this could be underſtood to ſay, Divorce not, no not for Religion, ſeduce, or ſeduce not. What mighty and inviſible Remora is this in Matrimony able to demur, and to contemne all the divorſive engines in Heaven or Earth! Both which may now paſs away, if this be true, for more than many jots or tittles a whole moral Law is aboliſht. But if we dare believe it is not, then in the method of Religion, and to ſave the honour and dignity of our Faith, we are to retreat and gather up our ſelves from the obſervance of an inferior and civil Ordinance, to the ſtrict maintaining of a general and religious Command, which is written, Thou ſhalt make no Cov'nant with them, Deut. 7. 2, 3. and that Cov'nant which cannot be lawfully made, we have directions and examples lawfully to diſſolve. Alſo 2 Chron. 19. 2. Shouldeſt thou love them that hate the Lord? No doubtleſs: for there is a certain ſcale of Duties, there is a certain Hierarchy of upper and lower Commands, which for want of ſtudying in right order, all the world is in confuſion.

Upon theſe principles I anſwer, that a right Believer ought to divorce an idolatrous Heretick, unleſs upon better hopes: however that it is in the Believers choice to divorce or not.

The former part will be manifeſt thus; firſt, an apoſtate Idolater, whether Huſband or Wife ſeducing, was to die by the decree of God, Deut. 13. 6, 9. that Marriage therefore God himſelf disjoyns: for others born Idolaters, the moral reaſon of their dangerous keeping, and the incommunicable antagony that is between Chriſt and Belial, will be ſufficient to inforce the Commandment of thoſe two inſpir'd Reformers, Ezra and Nehemiah, to put an Idolater away as well under the Goſpel.

The latter part, that although there be no ſeducement fear'd, yet if there be no hope giv'n, the Divorce is lawful, will appear by this, that idolatrous Marriage is ſtill hateful to God, therefore ſtill it may be divorc'd by the pattern of that Warrant that Ezra had, and by the ſame everlaſting Reaſon: Neither can any man give an account wherefore, if thoſe whom God joyns no man can ſeparate, it ſhould not follow, that whom he joyns not, but hates to joyn, thoſe men ought to ſeparate. But ſaith the Lawyer, That which ought not have been done, once done, avails. I anſwer, this is but a Crotchet of the Law, but that brought againſt it is plain Scripture. As for what Chriſt ſpake concerning divorce, 'tis confeſt by all knowing men, he meant only between them of the ſame faith. But what ſhall we ſay then to S. Paul, who ſeems to bid us not divorce an Infidel willing to ſtay? We may ſafely ſay thus, that wrong Collections have been hitherto made out of thoſe words by modern Divines. His drift, as was heard before, is plain; not to command our ſtay in Marriage with an Infidel, that had been a flat renouncing of the religious and moral Law; but to inform the Corinthians that the Body of an unbeliever was not defiling, if his deſire to live in Chriſtian Wedlock ſhew'd any likelihood that his heart was opening to the faith; and therefore adviſes to forbear departure ſo long, till nothing have been neglected to ſet forward a converſion: this I ſay he adviſes, and that with certain cautions, not commands, if we can take up ſo much credit for him as to get him believ'd upon his own word: for what is this elſe but his counſel in a thing indifferent, to the reſt ſpeak I, not the Lord? for though it be true that the Lord never ſpake it, yet from S. Paul's mouth we ſhould have took it as a command, had not himſelf forewarn'd us, and diſclaim'd, which notwithſtanding if we ſhall ſtill avouch to be a command, he palpably denying it, this is not to expound S. Paul, but to outface him. Neither doth it follow, but that the Apoſtle may interpoſe his judgment in a caſe of Chriſtian liberty, without the guilt of adding to God's word. How do we know Marriage or ſingle life to be of choice, but by ſuch like words as theſe, I ſpeak this by permiſſion, not of commandment; I have no command of the Lord, yet I give my judgment? Why ſhall not the like words have leave to ſignifie a freedom in this our preſent queſtion, though Beza deny? Neither is the Scripture hereby leſs inſpir'd, becauſe S. Paul confeſſes to have writt'n therein what he had not of command; for we grant that the Spirit of God led him thus to expreſs himſelf to Chriſtian prudence, in a matter which God thought beſt to leave uncommanded. Beza therefore muſt be warily read, when he taxes S. Auſtin of Blaſphemy, for holding that S. Paul ſpake here as of a thing indifferent. But if it muſt be a command, I ſhall yet the more evince it to be a command that we ſhould herein be left free, and that out of the Greek word us'd in the 12. v. which inſtructs us plainly, there muſt be a joynt aſſent and good liking on both ſides; he that will not deprave the Text, muſt thus render it; If a brother have an unbelieving Wife, and ſhe joyn in conſent to dwell with him (which cannot utter leſs to us than a mutual agreement) let him not put her away for the meer ſurmize of Judaical uncleanneſs: and the reaſon follows, for the body of an Infidel is not polluted, neither to benevolence, nor to procreation. Moreover, this note of mutual complacency forbids all offer of ſeducement, which to a perſon of zeal cannot be attempted without great offence: if therefore ſeducement be fear'd, this place hinders not Divorce. Another caution was put in this ſuppoſed command, of not bringing the believer into bondage hereby, which doubtleſs might prove extreme, if Chriſtian liberty and conſcience were left to the humor of a Pagan ſtaying at pleaſure to play with, and to vex and wound with a thouſand ſcandals and burdens, above ſtrength to bear: If therefore the conceived hope of gaining a ſoul come to nothing, then Charity commands that the believer be not wearied out with endleſs waiting under many grievances ſore to his ſpirit, but that reſpect be had rather to the preſent ſuffering of a true Chriſtian, than the uncertain winning of an obdur'd Heretick. The counſel we have from S. Paul to hope, cannot countermand the moral and Evangelick charge we have from God to fear ſeducement, to ſeparate from the miſbeliever, the unclean, the obdurate. The Apoſtle wiſheth us to hope, but does not ſend us a wool-gathering after vain hope; he ſaith, How knoweſt thou, O Man, whether thou ſhalt ſave thy Wife? that is, till he try all due means, and ſet ſome reaſonable time to himſelf, after which he may give over waſhing an Ethiope, if he will hear the advice of the Goſpel; Caſt not Pearls before Swine, ſaith Chriſt himſelf. Let him be to thee as a Heathen. Shake the duſt off thy feet. If this be not enough, hate and forſake, what relation ſoever. And this alſo that follows muſt appertain to the Precept, Let every man wherein he is call'd, therein abide with God, v. 24. that is, ſo walking in his inferiour calling of Marriage, as not by dangerous ſubjection to that Ordinance, to hinder and diſturb the higher calling of his Chriſtianity. Laſt, and never too oft remembred, whether this be a Command, or an Advice, we muſt look that it be ſo underſtood, as not to contradict the leaſt point of moral Religion that God hath formerly commanded, otherwiſe what do we but ſet the moral Law and the Goſpel at civil War together? and who then ſhall be able to ſerve thoſe two Maſters?

CHAP. IX.

That Adultery is not the greateſt breach of Matrimony; that there may be other Violations as great.

NOW whether Idolatry or Adultery be the greateſt violation of Marriage, if any demand, let him thus conſider, that among Chriſtian Writers touching Matrimony, there be three chief Ends thereof agreed on; godly ſociety, next civil, and thirdly, that of the Marriage-bed. Of theſe the firſt in name to be the higheſt and moſt excellent, no baptiz'd Man can deny, nor that Idolatry ſmites directly againſt this prime End; nor that ſuch as the violated End is, ſuch is the Violation: but he who affirms Adultery to be the higheſt breach, affirms the Bed to be higheſt of Marriage, which is in truth a groſs and boriſh Opinion, how common ſoever; as far from the countenance of Scripture, as from the light of all clean Philoſophy, or civil Nature. And out of queſtion the chearful help that may be in Marriage toward ſanctity of life, is the pureſt, and ſo the nobleſt end of that contract: but if the particular of each perſon be conſider'd, then of thoſe three ends which God appointed, that to him is greateſt which is moſt neceſſary; and Marriage is then moſt brok'n to him, when he utterly wants the fruition of that which he moſt ſought therein, whether it were religious, civil, or corporal ſociety. Of which wants to do him right by Divorce only for the laſt and meaneſt, is a perverſe injury, and the pretended reaſon of it as frigid as Frigidity it ſelf, which the Code and Canon are only ſenſible of. Thus much of this controverſie. I now return to the former argument. And having ſhewn that diſproportion, contrariety, or numneſs of mind may juſtly be divorc'd, by proving already, that the prohibition thereof oppoſes the expreſs end of God's Inſtitutions, ſuffers not Marriage to ſatisfie that intellectual and innocent deſire which God himſelf kindl'd in Man to be the Bond of Wedlock, but only to remedy a ſublunary and beaſtial burning, which frugal Diet, without Marriage, would eaſily chaſt'n. Next, that it drives many to tranſgreſs the Conjugal Bed, while the ſoul wanders after that ſatisfaction which it had hope to find at home, but hath miſt; or elſe it ſits repining, even to Atheiſm, finding it ſelf hardly dealt with, but miſdeeming the cauſe to be in God's Law, which is in man's unrighteous ignorance. I have ſhewn alſo how it untyes the inward knot of Marriage, which is Peace and Love ( if that can be unty'd which was never knit ) while it aims to keep faſt the outward formality; how it lets periſh the Chriſtian Man, to compel impoſſibly the married Man.

CHAP. X.

The ſixth Reaſon of this Law; that to prohibit Divorce ſought for natural caſes, is againſt Nature.

THE ſixth place declares this Prohibition to be as reſpectleſs of humane Nature, as it is of Religion, and therefore is not of God. He teaches, that an unlawful Marriage may be lawfully divorc'd: And that thoſe who having throughly diſcern'd each others diſpoſition, which oft-times cannot be till after Matrimony, ſhall then find a powerful reluctance and recoil of Nature on either ſide, blaſting all the content of their mutual ſociety, that ſuch perſons are not lawfully married ( to uſe the Apoſtle's words) Say I theſe things as a Man, or ſaith not the Law alſo the ſame? for it is writt'n, Deut. 22. Thou ſhalt not ſow the Vineyard with divers ſeeds, leſt thou defile both. Thou ſhalt not plow with an Oxe and an Aſs together, and the like. I follow the pattern of S. Paul's reaſoning, Doth God care for Aſſes and Oxen, how ill they yoke together, or is it not ſaid altogether for our ſakes? for our ſakes no doubt this is writt'n. Yea the Apoſtle himſelf in the forecited 2 Cor. 6. 14. alludes from that place of Deut. to forbid miſyoking Marriage, as by the Greek word is evident; though he inſtance but in one Example of miſmatching with an Infidel, yet next to that, what can be a fouler incongruity, a greater violence to the reverend ſecret of Nature, than to force a mixture of Minds that cannot unite, and to ſow the furrow of Man's Nativity with ſeed of two incoherent and uncombining diſpoſitions: which act being kindly and voluntary, as it ought, the Apoſtle in the Language he wrote call'd Eunoia, and the Latines Benevolence, intimating the original thereof to be in the underſtanding, and the will; if not, ſurely there is nothing which might more properly be call'd a malevolence rather, and is the moſt injurious and unnatural Tribute that can be extorted from a perſon indu'd with reaſon, to be made pay out the beſt ſubſtance of his body, and of his ſoul too, as ſome think, when either for juſt and powerful cauſes he cannot like, or from unequal cauſes finds not recompence. And that there is a hidden efficacy of love and hatred in Man as well as in other kinds, not moral, but natural, which though not always in the choice, yet in the ſucceſs of Mariage will ever be moſt predominant, beſides daily experience, the Author of Eccleſiaſticus, whoſe wiſdom hath ſet him next the Bible, acknowledges, 13. 16. A man, ſaith he, will cleave to his like. But what might be the cauſe, whether each ones allotted Genius or proper Star, or whether the ſupernatural influence of Schemes and angular Aſpects, or this elemental Craſis here below, whether all theſe joyntly or ſingly meeting friendly, or unfriendly in either party, I dare not, with the men I am like to claſh, appear ſo much a Philoſopher as to conjecture. The antient Proverb in Homer leſs obſtruſe entitles this work of leading each like perſon to his like, peculiarly to God himſelf: which is plain enough alſo by his naming of a meet or like help in the firſt Eſpouſal inſtituted; and that every Woman is meet for every Man, none ſo abſurd as to affirm. Seeing then there is indeed a two-fold Seminary or Stock in nature, from whence are deriv'd the iſſues of love and hatred, diſtinctly flowing through the whole maſs of created things, and that God's doing ever is to bring the due likeneſſes and harmonies of his works together, except when out of two contraries met to their own deſtruction, he moulds a third exiſtence; and that it is error, or ſome evil Angel which either blindly or maliciouſly hath drawn together in two perſons ill imbarkt in Wedlock the ſleeping diſcords and enmities of Nature lull'd on purpoſe with ſome falſe bait, that they may wake to agony and ſtrife, later than prevention could have wiſht, if from the bent of juſt and honeſt intentions beginning what was begun, and ſo continuing, all that is equal, all that is fair and poſſible hath been tri'd, and no accommodation likely to ſucceed; what folly is it ſtill to ſtand combating and battering againſt invincible cauſes and effects, with evil upon evil, till either the beſt of our days be linger'd out, or ended with ſome ſpeeding ſorrow. The wiſe Eccleſiaſticus adviſes rather, 37. 27. My ſon prove thy ſoul in thy life, ſee what is evil for it, and give not that unto it. Reaſon he had to ſay ſo; for if the noiſomneſs or diſfigurement of body can ſoon deſtroy the ſympathy of mind to Wedlock duties, much more will the annoyance and trouble of mind infuſe it ſelf into all the faculties and acts of the body, to render them invalid, unkindly, and even unholy againſt the Fundamental Law-book of Nature, which Moſes never thwarts, but reverences: therefore he commands us to force nothing againſt ſympathy or natural order, no, not upon the moſt abject Creatures; to ſhew that ſuch an indignity cannot be offer'd to Man without an impious crime. And certainly thoſe divine meditating words of finding out a meet and like help to Man, have in them a conſideration of more than the indefinite likeneſs of Womanhood; nor are they to be made waſte-paper on, for the dulneſs of Canon-Divinity, no, nor thoſe other Allegorick Precepts of Beneficence fetcht out of the Cloſet of Nature, to teach us goodneſs and compaſſion in not compelling together unmatchable Societies; or if they meet through miſchance, by all conſequence to disjoyn them, as God and Nature ſignifies, and lectures to us not only by thoſe recited Decrees, but ev'n by the firſt and laſt of all his viſible works; when by his divorcing Command the World firſt roſe out of Chaos, nor can be renewed again out of confuſion, but by the ſeparating of unmeet Conſorts.

CHAP. XI.

The ſeventh Reaſon, That ſometimes continuance in Marriage may be evidently the ſhortning or indangering of life to either party; both Law and Divinity concluding, that Life is to be preferr'd before Marriage, the intended ſolace of Life.

SEventhly, The Canon-Law and Divines conſent, that if either party be found contriving againſt anothers life, they may be ſever'd by Divorce: for a ſin againſt the life of Marriage, is greater than a ſin againſt the Bed; the one deſtroys, the other but defiles. The ſame may be ſaid touching thoſe perſons who being of a penſive nature and courſe of life, have ſum'd up all their ſolace in that free and lightſome converſation which God and Man intends in Marriage; whereof when they ſee themſelves depriv'd by meeting an unſociable Conſort, they oft-times reſent one anothers miſtake ſo deeply, that long it is not e're grief end one of them. When therefore this danger is foreſeen, that the life is in peril by living together, what matter is it whether helpleſs grief, or wilful practice be the cauſe? This is certain, that the preſervation of life is more worth than the compulſory keeping of Marriage; and it is no leſs than cruelty, to force a Man to remain in that ſtate as the ſolace of his life, which he and his friends know will be either the undoing or the diſheartning of his life. And what is life without the vigour and ſpiritual exerciſe of life? how can it be uſeful either to private or publick imployment? ſhall it therefore be quite dejected, though never ſo valuable, and left to moulder away in heavineſs for the ſuperſtitious and impoſſible performance of an ill-driv'n bargain? Nothing more inviolable than vows made to God; yet we read in Numbers, that if a Wife had made ſuch a vow, the meer will and authority of her Husband might break it: how much more may he break the error of his own bonds with an unfit and miſtak'n Wife, to the ſaving of his welfare, his life, yea his faith and vertue, from the hazard of over-ſtrong temptations? for if Man be Lord of the Sabbath, to the curing of a Fever, can he be leſs than Lord of Marriage in ſuch important cauſes as theſe?

CHAP. XII.

The eighth Reaſon, It is probable, or rather certain, that every one who happ'ns to marry, hath not the calling; and therefore upon unfitneſs found and conſider'd, force ought not to be us'd.

EIghtly, It is moſt ſure that ſome even of thoſe who are not plainly defective in body, yet are deſtitute of all other marriageable gifts, and conſequently have not the calling to marry, unleſs nothing be requiſite thereto but a meer inſtrumental body; which to affirm, is to that unanimous Covenant a reproach: yet it is as ſure that many ſuch, not of their own deſire, but by the perſwaſion of friends, or not knowing themſelves, do often enter into Wedlock; where finding the difference at length between the duties of a married life, and the gifts of a ſingle life, what unfitneſs of mind, what weariſomneſs, what ſcruples and doubts to an incredible offence and diſpleaſure are like to follow between, may be ſoon imagined; whom thus to ſhut up, and immure, and ſhut up together, the one with a miſchoſen Mate, the other in a miſtaken calling, is not a courſe that Chriſtian wiſdom and tenderneſs ought to uſe. As for the cuſtome that ſome Parents and Guardians have of forcing Marriages, it will be better to ſay nothing of ſuch a ſavage inhumanity, but only thus, that the Law which gives not all freedom of Divorce to any Creature indued with reaſon, ſo aſſaſſinated, is next in cruelty.

CHAP. XIII.

The ninth Reaſon; Becauſe Marriage is not a meer carnal Coition, but a humane Society: where that cannot reaſonably be had, there can be no true Matrimony. Marriage compar'd with all other Cov'nants and Vows warrantably broken for the good of Man. Marriage the Papiſts Sacrament, and unfit Marriage the Proteſtants Idol.

NInthly, I ſuppoſe it will be allow'd us that Marriage is a humane Society, and that all humane ſociety muſt proceed from the mind rather than the body, elſe it would be but a kind of animal or beaſtiſh meeting; if the mind therefore cannot have that due company by Marriage that it may reaſonably and humanly deſire, that Marriage can be no humane ſociety, but a certain formality; or guilding over of little better then a brutiſh congreſs, and ſo in very wiſdom and pureneſs to be diſſolv'd.

But Marriage is more than humane, the Covenant of God, Prov. 2. 17. therefore Man cannot diſſolve it. I anſwer, if it be more than humane, ſo much the more it argues the chief ſociety thereof to be in the ſoul rather then in the body, and the greateſt breach thereof to be unfitneſs of mind rather then defect of body: for the body can have leaſt affinity in a Cov'nant more than humane, ſo that the reaſon of diſſolving holds good the rather. Again, I anſwer, that the Sabbath is a higher Inſtitution, a Command of the firſt Table, for the breach whereof God hath far more and oftner teſtify'd his anger, than for Divorces, which from Moſes to Malachy he never took diſpleaſure at, nor then neither, if we mark the Text; and yet as oft as the good of Man is concern'd, he not only permits, but commands to break the Sabbath. What Cov'nant more contracted with God, and leſs in mans power, than the Vow which hath once paſt his lips? yet if it be found raſh, if offenſive, if unfruitful either to God's glory or the good of Man, our Doctrine forces not error and unwillingneſs irkſomly to keep it, but counſels Wiſdom and better thoughts boldly to break it; therefore to enjoyn the indiſſoluble keeping of a Marriage found unfit againſt the good of Man both ſoul and body, as hath been evidence'd, is to make an Idol of Marriage, to advance it above the Worſhip of God and the good of Man, to make it a tranſcendent Command, above both the ſecond and firſt Table, which is a moſt prodigious Doctrine.

Next, whereas they cite out of the Proverbs, that it is the Cov'nant of God, and therefore more than humane, that Conſequence is manifeſtly falſe: for ſo the Cov'nant which Zedekiah made with the Infidel King of Babel, is call'd the Covenant of God, Ezek. 17. 19. which would be ſtrange to hear counted more than a humane Cov'nant. So every Cov'nant between Man and Man, bound by Oath, may be call'd the Cov'nant of God, becauſe God therein is atteſted. So of Marriage he is the author and the witneſs; yet hence will not follow any divine aſtriction more than what is ſubordinate to the glory of God, and the main good of either party: for as the glory of God, and their eſteemed fitneſs one for the other, was the motive which led them both at firſt to think without other revelation that God had joyned them together; ſo when it ſhall be found by their apparent unfitneſs, that their continuing to be Man and Wife is againſt the glory of God and their mutual happineſs, it may aſſure them that God never joyn'd them, who hath reveal'd his gracious Will not to ſet the Ordinance above the Man for whom it was ordain'd; not to canonize Marriage either as a Tyranneſs or a Goddeſs over the enfranchis'd life and ſoul of Man: For wherein can God delight, wherein be worſhip'd, wherein be glorifi'd by the forcible continuing of an improper and ill-yoking couple? He that loved not to ſee the diſparity of ſeveral cattel at the Plow, cannot be pleaſed with any vaſt unmeetneſs in Marriage. Where can be the peace and love which muſt invite God to ſuch a houſe? may it not be feared that the not divorcing of ſuch a helpleſs diſagreement, will be the divorcing of God finally from ſuch a place? But it is a trial of our patience they ſay: I grant it; but which of Job's afflictions were ſent him with that Law, that he might not uſe means to remove any of them if he could? And what if it ſubvert our patience and our faith too? Who ſhall anſwer for the periſhing of all thoſe ſouls periſhing by ſtubborn expoſitions of particular and inferior precepts againſt the general and ſupreme rule of Charity? They dare not affirm that Marriage is either a Sacrament or a Myſtery, though all thoſe ſacred things give place to Man; and yet they inveſt it with ſuch an awful ſanctity, and give it ſuch adamantine chains to bind with, as if it were to be worſhipt like ſome Indian Deity, when it can confer no bleſſing upon us, but works more and more to our miſery. To ſuch teachers the ſaying of S. Peter at the Council of Jeruſalem will do well to be applied: Why tempt ye God to put a yoke upon the necks of Chriſtian men, which neither the Jews, God's antient people, nor we are able to bear, and nothing but unwary expounding hath brought upon us?

CHAP. XIV.

Conſiderations concerning Familiſm, Antinomianiſm; and why it may be thought that ſuch Opinions may proceed from the undue reſtraint of ſome juſt liberty, than which no greater cauſe to contemn Diſcipline.

TO theſe Conſiderations this alſo may be added as no improbable conjecture, ſeeing that ſort of Men who follow Anabaptiſm, Familiſm, Antinomianiſm, and other fanatick dreams (if we underſtand them not amiſs) be ſuch moſt commonly as are by nature addicted to Religion, of life alſo not debaucht, and that their Opinions having full ſwinge, do end in ſatiſfaction of the fleſh, it may be come with reaſon into the thoughts of a wiſe Man, whether all this proceed not partly, if not chiefly, from the reſtraint of ſome lawful liberty which ought to be giv'n Men, and is deny'd them. As by Phyſick we learn in menſtruous bodies, where Natures current hath been ſtopt, that the ſuffocation and upward forcing of ſome lower part, affects the head and inward ſenſe with dotage and idle fancies. And on the other hand, whether the reſt of vulgar men not ſo religiouſly profeſſing, do not give themſelves much the more to Whoredom and Adulteries, loving the corrupt and venial Diſcipline of Clergy-Courts, but hating to hear of perfect Reformation; when as they foreſee that then Fornication ſhall be auſterely cenſur'd, Adultery puniſht, and Marriage the appointed refuge of nature, though it hap to be never ſo incongruous and diſpleaſing, muſt yet of force be worn out, when it can be to no other purpoſe but of ſtrife and hatred, a thing odious to God. This may be worth the ſtudy of skilful Men in Theology, and the reaſon of things. And laſtly, to examine whether ſome undue and ill-grounded ſtrictneſs upon the blameleſs Nature of Man, be not the cauſe in thoſe places where already Reformation is, that the Diſcipline of the Church, ſo often and ſo unavoidably brok'n, is brought into contempt and deriſion. And if it be thus, let thoſe who are ſtill bent to hold this obſtinate literality, ſo prepare themſelves, as to ſhare in the account for all theſe tranſgreſſions, when it ſhall be demanded at the laſt day, by one who will ſcan and ſift things with more than a literal wiſdom of equity: for if theſe reaſons be duly ponder'd, and that the Goſpel is more jealous of laying on exceſſive burdens than ever the Law was, leſt the ſoul of a Chriſtian which is ineſtimable, ſhould be over-tempted and caſt away; conſidering alſo that many properties of Nature, which the power of Regeneration it ſelf never alters, may cauſe diſlike of converſing, even between the moſt ſanctifi'd; which continually grating in harſh tune together, may breed ſome jar and diſcord, and that end in rancor and ſtrife, a thing ſo oppoſite both to Marriage, and to Chriſtianity, it would perhaps be leſs ſcandal to divorce a natural diſparity, than to link violently together an unchriſtian diſſention, committing two inſnared ſouls inevitably to kindle one another, not with the fire of love, but with a hatred irreconcileable; who were they diſſevered, would be ſtraight friends in any other relation. But if an alphabetical ſervility muſt be ſtill urged, it may ſo fall out, that the true Church may unwittingly uſe as much cruelty in forbidding to divorce, as the Church of Antichriſt doth wilfully in forbidding to marry.

BOOK II.

CHAP. I.

The Ordinance of Sabbath and Marriage compar'd. Hyperbole no unfrequent figure in the Goſpel. Exceſs cur'd by contrary exceſs. Chriſt neither did, nor could abrogate the Law of Divorce, but only reprieve the abuſe thereof.

Hitherto the Poſition undertaken hath been declar'd, and proved by a Law of God, that Law proved to be moral, and unaboliſhable, for many reaſons equal, honeſt, charitable, juſt, annext thereto. It follows now, that thoſe places of Scripture which have a ſeeming to revoke the prudence of Moſes, or rather that merciful Decree of God, be forthwith explain'd and reconcil'd. For what are all theſe reaſonings worth, will ſome reply, when as the words of Chriſt are plainly againſt all Divorce, except in caſe of Fornication? To whom he whoſe mind were to anſwer no more but this, except alſo in caſe of Charity, might ſafely appeal to the more plain words of Chriſt in defence of ſo excepting. Thou ſhalt do no manner of work, ſaith the Commandment of the Sabbath. Yes, ſaith Chriſt, works of Charity. And ſhall we be more ſevere in paraphraſing the conſiderate and tender Goſpel, than he was in expounding the rigid and peremptory Law? What was ever in all appearance leſs made for Man, and more for God alone, than the Sabbath? yet when the good of Man comes into the Scales, we hear that voice of infinite goodneſs and benignity, that Sabbath was made for Man, not Man for Sabbath. What thing ever was more made for Man alone and leſs for God than Marriage? And ſhall we load it with a cruel and ſenceleſs bondage utterly againſt both the good of Man, and the glory of God? Let whoſo will now liſten, I want neither Pall nor Mitre, I ſtay neither for Ordination or Induction; but in the firm faith of a knowing Chriſtian, which is the beſt and trueſt endowment of the Keys, I pronounce, the Man who ſhall bind ſo cruelly a good and gracious Ordinance of God, hath not in that the Spirit of Chriſt. Yet that every text of Scripture ſeeming oppoſite may be attended with a due expoſition, this other part enſues, and makes account to find no ſlender arguments for this aſſertion out of thoſe very Scriptures, which are commonly urg'd againſt it.

Firſt therefore let us remember, as a thing not to be deny'd, that all places of Scripture wherein juſt reaſon of doubts ariſes from the letter, are to be expounded by conſidering upon what occaſion every thing is ſet down, and by comparing other Texts. The occaſion which induc'd our Saviour to ſpeak of Divorce, was either to convince the extravagance of the Phariſes in that point, or to give a ſharp and vehement anſwer to a tempting queſtion. And in ſuch caſes that we are not to repoſe all upon the literal terms of ſo many words, many inſtances will teach us: Wherein we may plainly diſcover how Chriſt meant not to be tak'n word for word, but like a wiſe Phyſician, adminiſtring one exceſs againſt another, to reduce us to a permiſs; where they were too remiſs, he ſaw it needful to ſeem moſt ſevere: in one place he cenſures an unchaſt look to be adultery already committed; another time he paſſes over actual adultery with leſs reproof then for an unchaſt look; not ſo heavily condemning ſecret weakneſs, as open malice: So here he may be juſtly thought to have giv'n this rigid ſentence againſt Divorce, not to cut off all remedy from a good man who finds himſelf conſuming away in a diſconſolate and uninjoyn'd Matrimony, but to lay a bridle upon the bold abuſes of thoſe over-weening Rabbies; which he could not more effectually do, then by a counterſway of reſtraint curbing their wild exorbitance almoſt into the other extream; as when we bow things the contrary way, to make them come to their natural ſtraitneſs. And that this was the only intention of Chriſt is moſt evident, if we attend but to his own words and proteſtation made in the ſame Sermon, not many verſes before he treats of Divorcing, that he came not to abrogate from the Law one jot or tittle, and denounce againſt them that ſhall ſo teach.

But S. Luke the verſe immediately before-going that of Divorce, inſerts the ſame caveat, as if the latter could not be underſtood without the former; and as a witneſs to produce againſt this our wilful miſtake of abrogating, which muſt needs confirm us that whatever elſe in the political Law of more ſpecial relation to the Jews might ceaſe to us; yet that of thoſe Precepts concerning Divorce, not one of them was repeal'd by the Doctrine of Chriſt, unleſs we have vow'd not to believe his own cautious and immediate profeſſion: for if theſe our Saviour's words inveigh againſt all Divorce, and condemn it as Adultery, except it be for Adultery, and be not rather underſtood againſt the abuſe of thoſe Divorces permitted in the Law, then is that Law of Moſes, Deut. 24. 1. not onely repeal'd and wholly annull'd againſt the promiſe of Chriſt, and his known profeſſion not to meddle in matters Judicial; but that which is more ſtrange, the very ſubſtance and purpoſe of that Law is contradicted and convinc'd both of injuſtice and impurity, as having authoriz'd and maintain'd legal Adultery by ſtatute. Moſes alſo cannot ſcape to be guilty of unequal and unwiſe decrees, puniſhing one act of ſecret Adultery by death, and permitting a whole life of open Adultery by Law. And albeit Lawyers write that ſome political Edicts, though not approv'd, are yet allow'd to the ſcum of the people, and the neceſſity of the times; theſe excuſes have but a weak pulſe: For firſt, we read, not that the ſcoundrel people, but the choiceſt, the wiſeſt, the holieſt of that Nation have frequently us'd theſe Laws, or ſuch as theſe in the beſt and holieſt times. Secondly, be it yielded, that in matters not very bad or impure, a human Lawgiver may ſlacken ſomething of that which is exactly good, to the diſpoſition of the people and the times: but if the perfect, the pure, the righteous Law of God, for ſo are all his ſtatutes and his judgments, be found to have allow'd ſmoothly, without any certain reprehenſion, that which Chriſt afterward declares to be Adultery, how can we free this Law from the horrible inditement of being both impure, unjuſt, and fallacious?

CHAP. II.

How Divorce was permitted for hardneſs of heart, cannot be underſtood by the common Expoſition. That the Law cannot permit, much leſs enact a permiſſion of ſin.

NEither will it ſerve to ſay this was permitted for the hardneſs of their hearts, in that ſenſe as is uſually explain'd; for the Law were then but a corrupt and erroneous School-maſter, teaching us to daſh againſt a vital Maxim of Religion, by doing foul evil in hope of ſome uncertain good.

This only Text is not to be matcht again throughout the whole Scripture, whereby God in his perfect Law ſhould ſeem to have granted to the hard hearts of his holy people, under his own hand, a civil immunity and free charter to live and die in a long ſucceſſive Adultery, under a covenant of works, till the Meſſiah, and then that indulgent permiſſion to be ſtrictly deny'd by a covenant of grace; beſides the incoherence of ſuch a doctrine, cannot, muſt not be thus interpreted, to the raiſing of a Paradox never known till then, onely hanging by the twin'd thread of one doubtful Scripture, againſt ſo many other rules and leading principles of religion, of juſtice, and purity of life. For what could be granted more either to the fear, or to the luſt of any Tyrant or Expliticiat, than this authority of Moſes thus expounded; which opens him a way at will to damm up juſtice, and not onely to admit of any Romiſh or Auſtrian diſpences, but to enact a ſtatute of that which he dares not ſeem to approve, ev'n to the legitimate vices, to make ſin it ſelf, the ever alien and vaſſal ſin, a free Citizen of the Commonwealth, pretending onely theſe or theſe plauſible reaſons? And well he might, all the while that Moſes ſhall be alledged to have done as much without ſhewing any reaſon at all. Yet this could not enter into the heart of David, Pſal. 94. 20. how any ſuch authority as endeavours to faſhion wickedneſs by a Law, ſhould derive it ſelf from God. And Iſaiah layes wo upon them that decree unrighteous decrees, ch. 10. 1. Now which of theſe two is the better Law-giver, and which deſerves moſt a wo, he that gives out an edict ſingly unjuſt, or he that confirms to generations a fixt and unmoleſted impunity of that which is not only held to be unjuſt, but alſo unclean, and both in a high degree, not only as they themſelves affirm, an injurious expulſion of one Wife, but alſo an unclean freedom by more than a patent to wed another adulterouſly? How can we therefore with ſafety thus dangerouſly confine the free ſimplicity of our Saviours meaning to that which meerly amounts from ſo many Letters, when as it can conſiſt neither with his former and cautionary Word, nor with other more pure and holy Principles, nor finally with the ſcope of Charity, commanding by his expreſs Commiſſion in a higher grain. But all rather of neceſſity muſt be underſtood as only againſt the abuſe of that wiſe and ingenuous liberty which Moſes gave, and to terrifie a roaving Conſcience from ſinning under that pretext.

CHAP. III.

That to allow Sin by Law, is againſt the nature of Law, the end of the Law-giver, and the good of the People. Impoſſible therefore in the Law of God. That it makes God the Author of Sin more than any thing objected by the Jeſuits or Arminians againſt Predeſtination.

BUT let us yet further examine upon what Conſideration a Law of Licence could be thus giv'n to a holy People for the hardneſs of Heart. I ſuppoſe all will anſwer, that for ſome good end or other. But here the contrary ſhall be prov'd. Firſt, that many ill effects, but no good end of ſuch a Sufferance can be ſhewn; next, that a thing unlawful can for no good end what-ever be either done or allow'd by a poſitive Law. If there were any good end aim'd at, that end was then good either to the Law or to the Lawgiver licencing; or as to the perſon licenc'd. That it could not be the end of the Law, whether Moral or Judicial, to licenſe a Sin, I prove eaſily out of Rom. 5. 20. The Law enter'd, that the offence might abound, that is, that Sin might be made abundantly manifeſt to be hainous and diſpleaſing to God, that ſo his offer'd Grace might be the more eſteem'd. Now if the Law inſtead of aggravating and terrifying Sin, ſhall give out Licence, it foils it ſelf, and turns recreant from its own end: it foreſtalls the pure Grace of Chriſt which is through Righteouſneſs, with impure indulgences which are through Sin. And inſtead of diſcovering Sin, for by the Law is the knowledge thereof, ſaith S. Paul, and that by certain and true light for Men to walk in ſafely, it holds out falſe and dazling fires to ſtumble Men; or like thoſe miſerable flies to run into with delight and be burnt: for how many Souls might eaſily think that to be lawful which the Law and Magiſtrate allow'd them? Again, we read 1 Tim. 1. 5. The end of the Commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conſcience, and of faith unfained. But never could that be Charity to allow a People what they could not uſe with a pure Heart, but with Conſcience and Faith both deceiv'd, or elſe deſpis'd. The more particular end of the Judicial Law is ſet forth to us clearly Rom. 13. That God hath giv'n to that Law a Sword not in vain, but to be a terror to evil works, a revenge to execute wrath upon him that doth evil. If this terrible Commiſſion ſhould but forbear to puniſh wickedneſs, were it other to be accounted than partial and unjuſt? but if it begin to write indulgence to vulger Uncleanneſs, can it do more to corrupt and ſhame the end of its own being? Laſtly, if the Law allow Sin, it enters into a kind of covenant with Sin; and if it do, there is not a greater Sinner in the World than the Law it ſelf. The Law, to uſe an Allegory ſomething different from that in Philo Judæus concerning Amaleck, though haply more ſignificant, the Law is the Iſraelite, and hath this abſolute charge given it, Deut. 25. To blot out the memory of Sin the Amalekite from under heav'n, not to forget it. Again, the Law is the Iſraelite, and hath this expreſs repeated Command to make no Cov'nant with Sin the Canaanite, but to expel him, leſt he prove a ſnare. And to ſay truth, it were too rigid and reaſonleſs to proclaim ſuch an enmity between Man and Man, were it not the the type of a greater enmity between Law and Sin. I ſpeak ev'n now, as if Sin were condemn'd in a perpetual villenage never to be free by Law, never to be manumited: but ſure Sin can have no tenure by Law at all, but is rather an eternal Outlaw, and in hoſtility with Law paſt all atonement: both diagonial Contraries, as much allowing one another, as Day and Night together both in one Hemiſphere. Or if it be poſſible, that Sin with his darkneſs may come to compoſition, it cannot be without a ſoul eclipſe and twilight to the Law, whoſe brightneſs ought to ſurpaſs the Noon. Thus we ſee how this unclean permittance defeats the ſacred and glorious end both of the Moral and Judicial Law.

As little good can the Lawgiver propoſe to equity by ſuch a laviſh remiſneſs as this; if to remedy hardneſs of heart Paræus and other Divines confeſs, it more increaſes by this Liberty, than is leſſn'd: and how is it probable that their hearts were more hard in this, that it ſhould be yielded to, than in any other Crime? Their hearts were ſet upon Uſury, and are to this day, no Nation more; yet that which was the endamaging only of their Eſtates was narrowly forbid; this which is thought the extream injury and diſhonour of their Wives and Daughters, with the defilement alſo of themſelves, is bounteouſly allow'd. Their hearts were as hard under their beſt Kings to offer in high places, tho to the true God; yet that but a ſmall thing, is ſtrictly forewarn'd; this accounted a high offence againſt one of the greateſt moral Duties, is calmly permitted and eſtabliſht. How can it be evaded but that the heavy cenſure of Chriſt ſhould fall worſe upon this Lawgiver of theirs, than upon all the Scribes and Phariſees? For they did but omit Judgment and Mercy to trifle in Mint and Cummin, yet all according to Law; but this their Law-giver, altogether as punctual in ſuch niceties, goes marching on to Adulteries, through the violence of Divorce by Law againſt Law. If it were ſuch a curſed act of Pilat a ſubordinate Judge to Cæſar, over-ſwayed by thoſe hard hearts with much ado to ſuffer one tranſgreſſion of Law but once, what is it then with leſs ado to publiſh a Law of tranſgreſſion for many Ages? Did God for this come down and cover the Mount of Sinai whith his Glory, uttering in Thunder thoſe his ſacred Ordinances out of the bottomleſs Treaſures of his Wiſdom and infinite Pureneſs, to patch up an ulcerous and rott'n Common-wealth with ſtrict and ſtern Injunctions, to waſh the skin and garments for every unclean touch, and ſuch eaſie permiſſion giv'n to pollute the Soul with Adulteries by publick authority, without diſgrace or queſtion? No, it had been better that man had never known Law or Matrimony, then that ſuch foul iniquity ſhould be faſtn'd upon the Holy One of Iſrael, the Judge of all the earth, and ſuch a piece of folly as Belzebub would not commit, to divide againſt himſelf, and pervert his own ends; or if he to compaſs more certain miſchief, might yield perhaps to fain ſome good deed, yet that God ſhould enact a Licence of certain evil for uncertain good againſt his own glory and pureneſs, is abominable to conceive. And as it is deſtructive to the end of Law, and blaſphemous to the honour of the Lawgiver licenſing, ſo is it as pernicious to the perſon licenc't. If a private Friend admoniſh not, the Scripture ſaith, he hates his brother, and lets him periſh; but if he ſooth him and allow him in his faults, the Proverbs teach us he ſpreads a net for his neighbours feet, and worketh ruin. If the Magiſtrate or Prince forget to adminiſter due juſtice, and reſtrain not Sin; Eli himſelf could ſay, it made the Lords people to tranſgreſs. But if he countenance them againſt Law by his own example, what havock it makes both in Religion and Vertue among the People, may be gueſt by the anger it brought upon Hophni and Phineas, not to be appeas'd with ſacrifice nor offring for ever. If the Law be ſilent to declare Sin, the People muſts needs generally go aſtray, for the Apoſtle himſelf ſaith, he had not known luſt but by the law: and ſurely ſuch a Nation ſeems not to be under the illuminating guidance of Gods Law, but under the horrible doom rather of ſuch as deſpiſe the Goſpel, he that is filthy let him be filthy ſtill. But where the Law it ſelf gives a warrant for Sin, I know not what condition of miſery to imagine miſerable enough for ſuch a people, unleſs that portion of the wicked, or rather of the damned, on whom God threatens in 21 Pſalm, to rain ſnares: but that queſtionleſs cannot be by any Law, which the Apoſtles ſaith is a miniſtery ordain'd of God for our Good, and not ſo many wayes and in ſo high a degree to our Deſtruction, as we have now bin graduating. And this is all the good can come to the Perſon licenc'd in his hardneſs of heart.

I am next to mention that, which becauſe it is a ground in Divinity, Rom. 3. will ſave the labour of demonſtrating, unleſs her giv'n Axioms be more doubted than in other Arts (although it be no leſs firm in the precepts of Philoſophy) that a thing unlawful can for no good whatſoever be done, much leſs allow'd by a poſitive Law. And this is the matter why Interpreters upon that paſſage in Hoſea will not conſent it to be a true ſtory, that the Prophet took a Harlot to wife, becauſe God being a pure Spirit, could not command a thing repugnant to his own nature, no not for ſo good an end as to exhibit more to the life a wholſome and perhaps a converting parable to many an Iſraelite. Yet that he commanded the allowance of adulterous and injurious Divorces for hardneſs of heart, a reaſon obſcure and in a wrong ſenſe, they can very ſavourily perſwade ſwade themſelves; ſo tenacious is the leven of an old conceit. But they ſhift it, he permitted only. Yet ſilence in the Law is conſent, and conſent is acceſſory; why then is not the Law being ſilent, or not active againſt a crime, acceſſory to its own conviction, it ſelf judging? For though we ſhould grant, that it approves not, yet it wills; and the Lawyers Maxim is, that the will compell'd is yet the will. And though Ariſtotle in his Ethicks call this a mixt Action, yet he concludes it to be voluntary and inexcuſable, if it be evil. How juſtly then might human Law and Philoſophy riſe up againſt the righteouſneſs of Moſes, if this be true which our vulgar Divinity fathers upon him, yea upon God himſelf, not ſilently and only negatively to permit, but in his Law to divulge a written and general priviledge to commit and perſiſt in unlawful Divorces with a high hand, with ſecurity and no ill fame: for this is more than permitting and contriving, this is maintaining: this is warranting, this is protecting, yea this is doing evil, and ſuch an evil as that reprobate Law-giver did, whoſe laſting infamy is ingrav'n upon him like a ſurname, he who made Iſrael to ſin. This is the loweſt pitch contrary to God that publick fraud and injuſtice can deſcend.

If it be affirm'd, that God, as being Lord, may do what he will: yet we muſt know that God hath not two Wills, but one Will, much leſs two contrary. If he once will'd Adultery ſhould be ſinful, and to be puniſht by Death, all his Omnipotence will not allow him to will the allowance that his holieſt People might as it were by his own Antimonie, or counter-ſtatute, live unreprov'd in the ſame fact as he himſelf eſteem'd it, according to our common Explainers. The hidden ways of his Providence we adore and ſearch not, but the Law is his revealed Will, his compleat, his evident and certain Will; herein he appears to us as it were in humane ſhape, enters into Cov'nant with us, ſwears to keep it, binds himſelf like a juſt Law-giver to his own Preſcriptions, gives himſelf to be underſtood by men, judges and is judg'd, meaſures and is commenſurate to the right reaſon; cannot require leſs of us in one cantle of his Law than in another, his legal Juſtice cannot be ſo fickle and ſo variable, ſometimes like a devouring fire, and by and by connivent in the embers, or, if I may ſo ſay, oſcitant and ſupine. The vigor of his Law could no more remit, than the hallowed fire upon his Altar could be let go out. The Lamps that burnt before him might need ſnuffing, but the light of his Law never. Of this alſo more beneath, in diſcuſſing a Solution of Rivetus.

The Jeſuits, and that Sect among us which is nam'd of Arminius, are wont to charge us of making God the Author of Sin, in two degrees eſpecially, not to ſpeak of his Permiſſion: 1. Becauſe we hold that he hath decreed ſome to Damnation, and conſequently to Sin, ſay they; next, becauſe thoſe means which are of ſaving knowledge to others, he makes to them an occaſion of greater Sin. Yet conſidering the perfection wherein Man was created, and might have ſtood, no Decree neceſſitating his Free-will, but ſubſequent, though not in time, yet in order to Cauſes, which were in his own power, they might methinks be perſwaded to abſolve both God and us. Whenas the Doctrine of Plato and Chryſippus, with their Followers the Academics and the Stoics, who knew not what a conſummat and moſt adorned Pandora was beſtow'd upon Adam to be the Nurſe and Guide of his arbitrary happineſs and perſeverance, I mean his native innocence and perfection, which might have kept him from being our true Epimetheus; and though they taught of Vertue and Vice to be both the gift of divine Deſtiny, they could yet give reaſons not invalid, to juſtifie the Councils of God and Fate from the inſulſity of mortal tongues: That Mans own will ſelf-corrupted, is the adequat and ſufficient cauſe of his Diſobedience beſides Fate; as Homer alſo wanted not to expreſs, both in his Iliad and Odiſſei. And Manilius the Poet, although in his fourth Book he tells of ſome created both to Sin and Puniſhment; yet without murmuring, and with an induſtrious cheerfulneſs acquits the Deity. They were not ignorant in their Heathen lore, that it is moſt God-like to puniſh thoſe who of his Creatures became his enemies with the greateſt puniſhment; and they could attain alſo to think that the greateſt, when God himſelf throws a man fartheſt from him; which then he held they did, when he blinded, hardn'd, and ſtirr'd up his Offenders to finiſh and pile up their deſperate work ſince they had undertak'n it. To baniſh for ever unto a local Hell, whether in the Air or in the Center, or in that uttermoſt and bottomleſs gulph of Chaos, deeper from holy Bliſs than the World's Diameter multipli'd; they thought not a puniſhing ſo proper and proportionate for God to inflict, as to puniſh Sin with Sin. Thus were the common ſort of Gentiles wont to think, without any wry thoughts caſt upon divine Governance. And therefore Cicero, not in his Tuſculan or Companian retirements among the learned Wits of that Age, but ev'n in the Senat to a mixt Auditory ( though he were ſparing otherwiſe to broach his Philoſophy among Statiſts and Lawyers ) yet as to this point both in his Oration againſt Piſo, and in that which is about the Anſwers of the Sooth-ſayers againſt Clodius, he declares it publickly as no paradox to common Ears, That God cannot puniſh man more, nor make him more miſerable, than ſtill by making him more ſinful. Thus we ſee how in this Controverſy the Juſtice of God ſtood upright ev'n among Heathen Diſputers. But if any one be truly, and not pretendedly zealous for Gods honour, here I call him forth before Men and Angels, to uſe his beſt and moſt adviſed ſkill, leſt God more unavoidably than ever yet, and in the guiltieſt manner, be made the Author of Sin: if he ſhall not only deliver over and incite his enemies by rebuke to ſin as a puniſhment, but ſhall by patent under his own broad-ſeal allow his friend whom he would ſanctifie and ſave, whom he would unite to himſelf and not disjoin, whom he would correct by wholſome chaſtning, and not puniſh as he doth the damned by lewd ſinning, if he ſhall allow theſe in his Law the perfect rule of his own pureſt Will, and our moſt edify'd Conſcience, the perpetrating of an odious and manifold Sin without the leaſt conteſting. 'Tis wonder'd how there can be in God a ſecret and reveal'd Will; and yet what wonder, if there be in man two anſwerable Cauſes. But here there muſt be two revealed Wills grappling in a fraternal war with one another without any reaſonable cauſe apprehended. This cannot be leſs than to ingraft Sin into the ſubſtance of the Law, which Law is to provoke Sin by croſſing and forbidding, not by complying with it. Nay this is, which I tremble in uttering, to incarnate Sin into the unpuniſhing and well-pleas'd Will of God. To avoid theſe dreadful conſequences that tread upon the heels of thoſe allowances to Sin, will be a task of far more difficulty than to appeaſe thoſe minds which perhaps out of a vigilant and wary Conſcience except againſt Predeſtination. Thus finally we may conclude, that a Law wholly giving licence cannot upon any good conſideration be given to a holy people for hardneſs of heart in the vulgar ſenſe.

CHAP. IV.

That if Divorce be no Command, no more is Marriage. That Divorce could be no Diſpenſation if it were lawful. The Solution of Rivetus, That God diſpenc'd by ſome unknown way, ought not to ſatisfie a Chriſtian mind.

OThers think to evade the matter by not granting any Law of Divorce, but only a Diſpenſation, which is contrary to the words of Chriſt, who himſelf calls it a Law, Mark. 10. 5. or if we ſpeak of a command in the ſtricteſt Definition, then Marriage it ſelf is no more a Command then Divorce, but only a free Permiſſion to him who cannot contain. But as to diſpenſation I affirm, the ſame as before of the Law, that it can never be given to the allowance of Sin, God cannot give it neither in reſpect of himſelf, nor in reſpect of man: not in reſpect of himſelf, being a moſt pure Eſſence, the juſt avenger of ſin; neither can he make that ceaſe to be a Sin, which is in it ſelf unjuſt and impure, as all Divorces they ſay were which were not for Adultery. Not in reſpect of Man, for then it muſt be either to his good or to his evil. Not to his good; for how can that be imagined any good to a Sinner whom nothing but rebuke and due correction can ſave, to hear the determinate Oracle of Divine Law louder then any reproof diſpenſing and providing for the impunity and convenience of Sin; to make that doubtful, or rather lawful, which the end of the Law was to make moſt evidently hateful? Nor to the evil of man can a Diſpence be given; for if the Law were ordain'd unto life, Rom. 7. 10. how can the ſame God publiſh Diſpences againſt that Law, which muſt needs be unto death? Abſurd and monſtrous would that Diſpence be, if any Judge or Law ſhould give it a man to cut his own throat, or to damn himſelf. Diſpence therefore preſuppoſes full Pardon, or elſe it is not a Diſpence but a moſt baneful and bloudy ſnare. And why ſhould God enter Covenant with a People to be holy, as the Command is holy, and juſt, and good, Rom. 7. 12. and yet ſuffer an impure and treacherous Diſpence to miſlead and betray them under the vizard of Law to a legitimate practiſe of uncleanneſs? God is no Covenant-breaker; he cannot do this.

Rivetus, a diligent and learned Writer, having well weighed what hath been written by thoſe Founders of Diſpence, and finding the ſmall Agreement among them, would fain work himſelf aloof theſe Rocks and Quickſands, and thinks it beſt to conclude that God certainly did diſpence, but by ſome way to us unknown, and ſo to leave it. But to this I oppoſe, that a Chriſtian by no means ought reſt himſelf in ſuch an ignorance; whereby ſo many Abſurdities will ſtrait reflect both againſt the Purity, Juſtice, and Wiſdom of God, the end alſo both of Law and Goſpel, and the compariſon of them both together. God indeed in ſome ways of his Providence is high and ſecret, paſt finding out: but in the delivery and execution of his Law, eſpecially in the managing of a duty ſo daily and ſo familiar as this is whereof we reaſon, hath plainly enough revealed himſelf, and requires the obſervance thereof not otherwiſe, then to the Law of nature and of equity imprinted in us ſeems correſpondent. And he hath taught us to love and to extol his Laws, not only as they are his, but as they are juſt and good to every wiſe and ſober underſtanding. Therefore Abraham, even to the face of God himſelf, ſeemed to doubt of divine Juſtice, if it ſhould ſwerve from that irradiation wherewith it had enlightned the mind of man, and bound it ſelf to obſerve its own rule. Wilt thou deſtroy the righteous with the wicked? that be far from thee; ſhall not the Judge of the earth do right? thereby declaring that God hath created a righteouſneſs in right it ſelf, againſt which he cannot do. So David, Pſ. 119. The teſtimonies which thou haſt commanded are righteous and very faithful; thy word is very pure, therefore thy ſervant loveth it. Not only then for the Authors ſake, but for its own purity. He is faithful, ſaith S. Paul, he cannot deny himſelf; that is, cannot deny his own Promiſes, cannot but be true to his own Rules. He often pleads with men the uprightneſs of his ways by their own Principles. How ſhould we imitate him elſe, to be perfect as he is perfect? If at pleaſure he can diſpence with golden Poetick Ages of ſuch pleaſing licence, as in the fabled Reign of old Saturn, and this perhaps before the Law might have ſome covert, but under ſuch an undiſpencing Covenant as Moſes made with them, and not to tell us why and wherefore, indulgence cannot give quiet to the breaſt of any intelligent man. We muſt be reſolved how the Law can be pure and perſpicuous, and yet throw a polluted ſkirt over theſe Eleuſinian Myſteries, that no man can utter what they mean: worſe in this then the worſt Obſcenities of Heathen Superſtition; for their filthineſs was hid, but the myſtick reaſon thereof known to their Sages. But this Jewiſh imputed filthineſs was daily and open, but the reaſon of it is not known to our Divines. We know of no deſign the Goſpel can have to impoſe new Righteouſneſs upon works, but to remit the old by faith without works, if we mean juſtifying works: We know no myſtery our Saviour could have to lay new Bonds upon Marriage in the Covenant of Grace which himſelf had looſned to the ſeverity of Law. So that Rivetus may pardon us if we cannot be contented with his non-ſolution, to remain in ſuch a peck of uncertainties and doubts, ſo dangerous and gaſtly to the fundamentals of our faith.

CHAP. V.

VVhat a Diſpenſation is.

THerefore to get ſome better ſatisfaction, we muſt proceed to inquire as diligently as we can what a Diſpenſation is, which I find to be either properly ſo call'd, or improperly. Improperly ſo call'd, is rather a particular and exceptive Law, abſolving and diſobliging from a more general Command for ſome juſt and reaſonable cauſe. As Numb. 9. they who were unclean, or in a journey, had leave to keep the Paſſeover in the ſecond Month, but otherwiſe ever in the firſt. As for that in Leviticus of marrying the brothers wife, it was a penal ſtatute rather than a diſpence; and commands nothing injurious or in it ſelf unclean, only prefers a ſpecial reaſon of Charity before an inſtitutive Decency, and perhaps is meant for life-time onely, as is expreſt beneath in the prohibition of taking two ſiſters. What other Edict of Moſes, carrying but the ſemblance of a Law in any other kind, may bear the name of a Diſpence, I have not readily to inſtance. But a Diſpenſation moſt properly is ſome particular accident rarely hapning, and therefore not ſpecified in the Law, but left to the deciſion of Charity, even under the bondage of Jewiſh Rites, much more under the liberty of the Goſpel.

Thus did David enter into the houſe of God, and did eat the Shewbread, he and his followers, which was ceremonially unlawful. Of ſuch diſpences as theſe it was that Verdune the French Divine ſo gravely diſputed in the Council of Trent againſt Friar Adrian, who held that the Pope might diſpenſe with any thing. It is a fond perſuaſion, ſaith Verdune, that diſpenſing is a favour; nay it is as good diſtributive juſtice as what is moſt, and the Prieſt ſins if he gives it not, for it is nothing elſe but a right interpretation of Law. Thus far that I can learn touching this matter wholſomly decreed. But that God, who is the giver of every good and perfect gift, Jam. 1. ſhould give out a rule and directory to ſin by, ſhould enact a Diſpenſation as long liv'd as a Law, whereby to live in privileg'd Adultery for hardneſs of heart; and this obdurate diſeaſe cannot be conceived how it was the more amended by this unclean remedy, is the moſt deadly and Scorpion-like gift that the enemy of mankind could have given to any miſerable ſinner, and is rather ſuch a Diſpence as that was which the Serpent gave to our firſt parents. God gave Quails in his wrath, and Kings in his wrath, yet neither of theſe things evil in themſelves; but that he whoſe eyes cannot behold impurity, ſhould in the book of his holy Covenant, his moſt unpaſſionate Law, give licence and ſtatute for uncontrolled Adultery, although it go for the receiv'd Opinion, I ſhall ever diſſuade my ſoul from ſuch a Creed, ſuch an Indulgence as the ſhop of Antichriſt never forg'd a baſer.

CHAP. VI.

That the Jew had no more right to this ſuppoſed Diſpence than the Chriſtian hath, and rather not ſo much.

BUT if we muſt needs diſpence, let us for awhile ſo far diſpence with Truth, as to grant that ſin may be diſpenc'd; yet there will be copious reaſon found to prove that the Jew had no more right to ſuch a ſuppos'd Indulgence than the Chriſtian, whether we look at the clear knowledge wherein he liv'd, or the ſtrict performance of works whereto he was bound. Beſides Viſions and Propheſies, they had the Law of God, which in the Pſalms and Proverbs is chiefly prais'd for ſureneſs and certainty, both eaſie and perfect to the enlightning of the ſimple. How could it be ſo obſcure then, or they ſo ſottiſhly blind in this plain, moral, and houſhold duty? They had the ſame Precepts about Marriage; Chriſt added nothing to their clearneſs, for that had argued them imperfect; he opens not the Law, but removes the Phariſaick miſts rais'd between the Law and the peoples eyes: the only ſentence which he adds, What God hath joyn'd let no man put aſunder, is as obſcure as any clauſe fetch'd out of Geneſis, and hath encreas'd a yet undecided Controverſie of clandeſtine Marriages. If we examine over all his Sayings, we ſhall find him not ſo much interpreting the Law with his words, as referring his own words to be interpreted by the Law, and oftner obſcures his mind in ſhort, and vehement, and compact ſentences, to blind and puzzle them the more who would not underſtand the Law. The Jews therefore were as little to be diſpenc'd with for lack of moral knowledge as we.

Next, none I think will deny, but that they were as much bound to perform the Law as any Chriſtian. That ſevere and rigorous knife not ſparing the tender foreskin of any male infant, to carve into his fleſh the mark of that ſtrict and pure Covenant whereinto he entered, might give us to underſtand enough againſt the fancy of diſpenſing. S. Paul teſtifies, that every circumcis'd Man is a debtor to the whole Law, Gal. 5. or elſe circumciſion is in vain, Ro. 2. 25. How vain then, and how prepoſterous muſt it needs be to exact a circumciſion of the fleſh from an infant unto an outward ſign of purity, and to diſpence an uncircumciſion in the ſoul of a grown man to an inward and real impurity? How vain again was that Law to impoſe tedious expiations for every ſlight ſin of ignorance and error, and to privilege without penance or diſturbance an odious crime whether of ignorance or obſtinacy? How unjuſt alſo inflicting death and extirpation for the mark of circumſtantial pureneſs omitted, and proclaiming all honeſt and liberal indemnity to the act of a ſubſtantial impureneſs committed, making void the Covenant that was made againſt it? Thus if we conſider the tenor of the Law, to be circumcis'd and to perform all, not pardoning ſo much as the ſcapes of error and ignorance, and compare this with the condition of the Goſpel, pel, Believe and be baptized, I ſuppoſe it cannot be long ere we grant that the Jew was bound as ſtrictly to the performance of every duty as was poſſible, and therefore could not be diſpenc'd with more than the Chriſtian, perhaps not ſo much.

CHAP. VII.

That the Goſpel is apter to diſpence than the Law: Paræus anſwered.

IF then the Law will afford no reaſon why the Jew ſhould be more gently dealt with than the Chriſtian, then ſurely the Goſpel can afford as little why the Chriſtian ſhould be leſs gently dealt with than the Jew. The Goſpel indeed exhorts to higheſt perfection, but bears with weakeſt infirmity more than the Law. Hence thoſe indulgences, All cannot receive this ſaying, Every man hath his proper gift, with expreſs charges not to lay on yokes which our forefathers could not bear. The nature of Man ſtill is as weak, and yet as hard, and that weakneſs and hardneſs as unfit and as unteachable to be harſhly uſed as ever. I but, ſaith Paraus, there is a greater portion of ſpirit poured upon the Goſpel, which requires from us perfecter obedience. I anſwer, This does not prove that the Law therefore might give allowance to ſin more then the Goſpel; and if it were no ſin, we know it the work of the Spirit to mortifie our corupt deſires and evil concupiſcence; but not to root up our natural affections and diſaffections, moving to and fro even in wiſeſt men upon juſt and neceſſary reaſon, which were the true ground of that Moſaick Diſpence, and is the utmoſt extent of our pleading. What is more or leſs perfect we diſpute not, but what is ſin or no ſin. And in that I ſtill affirm the Law required as perfect obedience as the Goſpel. Beſides, that the prime end of the Goſpel is not ſo much to exact our obedience as to reveal Grace, and the ſatisfaction of our diſobedience. What is now exacted from us, it is the accuſing Law that does it, even yet under the Goſpel, but cannot be more extreme to us now than to the Jews of old; for the Law ever was of Works, and the Goſpel ever was of Grace.

Either then the Law by harmleſs and needful Diſpences, which the Goſpel is now made to deny, muſt have anticipated and exceeded the Grace of the Goſpel, or elſe muſt be found to have given politick and ſuperficial Graces without real pardon, ſaying in general, Do this and live, and yet deceiving and damning under-hand with unſound and hollow permiſſions, which is utterly abhorring from the end of all Law, as hath been ſhewed. But if thoſe Indulgences were ſafe and ſinleſs, out of tenderneſs and compaſſion, as indeed they were, and yet ſhall be abrogated by the Goſpel, then the Law, whoſe end is by rigor to magnifie Grace, ſhall it ſelf give Grace, and pluck a fair plume from the Goſpel, inſtead of haſtning us thither, alluring us from it. And whereas the terror of the Law was as a ſervant to amplifie and illuſtrate the mildneſs of Grace: now the unmildneſs of Evangelick Grace ſhall turn ſervant to declare the Grace and Mildneſs of the rigorous Law. The Law was harſh to extol the Grace of the Goſpel, and now the Goſpel by a new affected ſtrictneſs of her own ſhall extenuate the Grace which her ſelf offers. For by exacting a duty which the Law diſpens'd, if we perform it, then is Grace diminiſh'd, by how much performance advances, unleſs the Apoſtle argue wrong: if we perform it not, and periſh for not performing, then are the conditions of Grace harder than thoſe of Rigor. If through Faith and Repentance we periſh not, yet Grace ſtill remains the leſs, by requiring that which Rigor did not require, or at leaſt not ſo ſtrictly. Thus much therefore to Paraus, that if the Goſpel require perfecter Obedience than the Law as a Duty, it exalts the Law and debaſes it ſelf, which is diſhonourable to the work of our Redemption. Seeing therefore that all the cauſes of any allowance that the Jews might have, remain as well to the Chriſtians; this is a certain rule, that ſo long as the cauſes remain, the allowance ought. And having thus at length inquired the truth concerning Law and Diſpence, their ends, their uſes, their limits, and in what manner both Jew and Chriſtian ſtand liable to the one, or capable of the other, we may ſafely conclude, that to affirm the giving of any Law or Lawlike Diſpence to ſin for hardneſs of heart, is a doctrine of that extravagance from the ſage principles of Piety, that whoſo conſiders throughly, cannot but admire how this hath been digeſted all this while.

CHAP. VIII.

The true ſenſe how Moſes ſuffered Divorce for hardneſs of heart.

WHat may we do then to ſalve this ſeeming inconſiſtence? I muſt not diſſemble that I am confident it can be done no other way than this:

Moſes, Deut. 24. 1. eſtabliſht a grave and prudent Law, full of moral equity, full of due conſideration towards Nature, that cannot be reſiſted, a Law conſenting with the Laws of wiſeſt Men and civileſt Nations; That when a Man hath married a Wiſe, if it come to paſs he cannot love her by reaſon of ſome diſpleaſing natural quality or unfitneſs in her, let him write her a Bill of Divorce. The intent of which Law undoubtedly was this, that if any good and peaceable Man ſhould diſcover ſome helpleſs diſagreement or diſlike either of mind or body, whereby he could not cheerfully perform the duty of a Husband without the perpetual diſſembling of offence and diſturbance to his ſpirit; rather than to live uncomfortably and unhappily both to himſelf and to his Wife, rather than to continue undertaking a duty which he could not poſſibly diſcharge, he might diſmiſs her whom he could not tolerably and ſo not conſcionably retain. And this Law the Spirit of God by the mouth of Solomon, Prov. 30. 21, 23. teſtifies to be a good and a neceſſary Law, by granting it that A hated Woman (for ſo the Hebrew word ſignifies, rather than odious, though it come all to one) that A hated Woman, when ſhe is married, is a thing that the Earth cannot bear. What follows then but that the charitable Law muſt remedy what Nature cannot undergo? Now that many licentious and hard-hearted Men took hold of this Law to cloke their bad purpoſes, is nothing ſtrange to believe. And theſe were they, not for whom Moſes made the Law, God forbid, but whoſe hardneſs of heart taking ill advantage by this Law, he held it better to ſuffer as by accident, where it could not be detected, rather then good men ſhould loſe their juſt and lawful privilege of remedy: Chriſt therefore having to anſwer theſe tempting Phariſes, according as his cuſtom was, not meaning to inform their proud ignorance what Moſes did in the true intent of the Law, which they had ill cited, ſuppreſſing the true cauſe for which Moſes gave it, and extending it to every ſlight matter, tells them their own, what Moſes was forc'd to ſuffer by their abuſe of his Law. Which is yet more plain if we mark that our Saviour in Matth. 5. cites not the Law of Moſes, but the Phariſaical tradition falſly grounded upon that Law. And in thoſe other places, Chap. 19. and Mark 10. the Phariſes cite the Law, but conceal the wiſe and humane reaſon there expreſt; which our Saviour corrects not in them, whoſe pride deſerv'd not his inſtruction, only returns them what is proper to them; Moſes for the hardneſs of your heart ſuffer'd you, that is ſuch as you, to put away your wives; and to you he wrote this precept for that cauſe, which (to you) muſt be read with an impreſſion, and underſtood limitedly of ſuch as cover'd ill purpoſes under that Law: and it was ſeaſonable that they ſhould hear their own unbounded licence rebuk'd, but not ſeaſonable for them to hear a good man's requiſite liberty explain'd. But us he hath taught better, if we have ears to hear. He himſelf acknowledg'd it to be a Law, Mark 10. and being a Law of God, it muſt have an undoubted end of charity, which may be us'd with a pure heart, a good conſcience, and faith unfeigned, as was heard: it cannot allow ſin, but is purpoſely to reſiſt ſin, as by the ſame chap. to Timothy appears. There we learn alſo that the Law is good, if a man uſe it lawfully. Out of doubt then there muſt be a certain good in this Law which Moſes willingly allow'd, and there might be an unlawful uſe made thereof by hypocrites; and that was it which Moſes unwillingly ſuffer'd, foreſeeing it in general, but not able to diſcern it in particulars. Chriſt therefore mentions not here what Moſes and the Law intended, for good Men might know that by many other rules: and the ſcornful Phariſes were not fit to be told, until they could imploy that knowledge they had leſs abuſively. Only he acquaints them with what Moſes by them was put to ſuffer.

CHAP. IX.

The words of the Inſtitution how to be underſtood; and of our Saviour's Anſwer to his Diſciples.

AND to entertain a little their overweening arrogance as beſt befitted, and to amaze them yet further, becauſe they thought it no hard matter to fulfil the Law, he draws them up to that unſeparable inſtitution which God ordain'd in the beginning before the fall, when Man and Woman were both perfect, and could have no cauſe to ſeparate: juſt as in the ſame Chap. he ſtands not to contend with the arrogant young Man who boaſted his obſervance of the whole Law, whether indeed he had kept it or not, but ſkrues him up higher to a task of that perfection, which no man is bound to imitate. And in like manner that patern of the firſt inſtitution he ſet before the opinionative Phariſees, to dazle them, and not to bind us. For this is a ſolid rule, that every command given with reaſon, binds our obedience no otherwiſe then that reaſon holds. Of this ſort was that command in Eden; Therefore ſhall a Man cleave to his Wife, and they ſhall be one fleſh: which we ſee is no abſolute command, but with an inference, Therefore: the reaſon then muſt be firſt conſider'd, that our obedience be not miſobedience. The firſt is, for it is not ſingle, becauſe the Wife is to the Husband fleſh of his fleſh, as in the verſe going before. But this reaſon cannot be ſufficient of it ſelf; for why then ſhould he for his Wife leave his Father and Mother, with whom he is far more fleſh of fleſh, and bone of bone, as being made of their ſubſtance? And beſides, it can be but a ſorry and ignoble ſociety of life, whoſe inſeparable injunction depends meerly upon fleſh and bones. Therefore we muſt look higher, ſince Chriſt himſelf recalls us to the beginning, and we ſhall find that the primitive reaſon of never divorcing, was that ſacred and not vain promiſe of God to remedy man's Lonelineſs by making him a meet help for him, though not now in perfection, as at firſt; yet ſtill in proportion as things now are. And this is repeated verſ. 20. when all other creatures were fitly aſſociated and brought to Adam, as if the divine power had bin in ſome care and deep thought, becauſe there was not yet found a help meet for Man. And can we ſo ſlightly depreſs the all-wiſe purpoſe of a deliberating God, as if his conſultation had produc'd no other good for Man but to joyn him with an accidental companion of propagation, which his ſudden word had already made for every beaſt? nay a far leſs good to Man it will be found, if ſhe muſt at all adventures be faſtned upon him individually. And therefore even plain ſenſe and equity, and, which is above them both, the all interpreting voice of Charity her ſelf cries loud that this primitive reaſon, this conſulted promiſe of God to make meet help, is the only cauſe that gives authority to this command of not divorcing, to be a command. And it might be further added, that if the true definition of a Wife were ask'd in good earneſt, this clauſe being a meet help would ſhew it ſelf ſo neceſſary, and ſo eſſential in that demonſtrative argument, that it might be logically concluded: therefore ſhe who naturally and perpetually is no meet help, can be no Wife; which clearly takes away the difficulty of diſmiſſing ſuch a one. If this be not thought enough, I anſwer yet further, that Marriage, unleſs it mean a fit and tolerable Marriage, is not inſeparable neither by nature nor inſtitution. Not by nature, for then thoſe Moſaick Divorces had been againſt nature, if ſeparable and inſeparable be contraries, as who doubts they be? and what is againſt nature is againſt Law, if ſoundeſt Philoſophy abuſe us not: by this reckoning Moſes ſhould be moſt unmoſaick, that is moſt illegal, not to ſay moſt unnatural. Nor is it inſeparable by the firſt inſtitution: for then no ſecond inſtitution in the ſame Law for ſo many cauſes could diſſolve it; it being moſt unworthy a humane (as Plato's judgment is in the fourth book of his Laws) much more a divine Lawgiver, to write two ſeveral Decrees upon the ſame thing. But what would Plato have deemed if the one of theſe were good, the other evil to be done? Laſtly, ſuppoſe it be inſeparable by inſtitution, yet in competition with higher things, as Religion and Charity in maineſt manners, and when the chief end is fruſtrate for which it was ordained, as hath been ſhewn, if ſtill it muſt remain inſeparable, it holds a ſtrange and lawleſs propriety from all other works of God under Heaven. From theſe many conſiderations we may ſafely gather, that ſo much of the firſt inſtitution as our Saviour mentions, for he mentions not all, was but to quell and put to nonplus the tempting Phariſees, and to lay open their ignorance and ſhallow underſtanding of the Scriptures. For, ſaith he, Have ye not read that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female, and ſaid, for this cauſe ſhall a man cleave to his Wife? which theſe blind uſurpers of Moſes Chair could not gainſay: as if this ſingle reſpect of male and female were ſufficient againſt a thouſand inconveniences and miſchiefs, to clog a rational creature to his endleſs ſorrow unrelinquiſhably, under the guileful ſuperſcription of his intended ſolace and comfort. What if they had thus anſwer'd? Maſter, if thou mean to make Wedlock as inſeparable as it was from the beginning, let it be made alſo a fit ſociety, as God meant it, which we ſhall ſoon underſtand it ought to be, if thou recite the whole reaſon of the Law. Doubtleſs our Saviour had applauded their juſt anſwer. For then they had expounded his command of Paradiſe, even as Moſes himſelf expounds it by his Laws of Divorce, that is, with due and wiſe regard had to the Premiſes and Reaſons of the firſt command; according to which, without unclean and temporizing permiſſions, he inſtructs us in this imperfect ſtate what we may lawfully do about Divorce.

But if it be thought that the Diſciples, offended at the rigor of Chriſt's anſwer, could yet obtain no mitigation of the former ſentence pronounc'd to the Phariſees, it may be fully anſwered, that our Saviour continues the ſame reply to his Diſciples, as men leavened with the ſame cuſtomary licence which the Phariſees maintained, and diſpleaſed at the removing of a traditional abuſe, whereto they had ſo long not unwillingly been uſed: it was no time then to contend with their ſlow and prejudicial belief, in a thing wherein an ordinary meaſure of light in Scripture, with ſome attention, might afterwards inform them well enough. And yet ere Chriſt had finiſhed this argument, they might have pick'd out of his own concluding words an anſwer more to their minds, and in effect the ſame with that which hath been all this while intreating audience: All men, ſaid he, cannot receive this ſaying, ſave they to whom it is given; he that is able to receive it, let him receive it. What ſaying is this which is left to a man's choice to receive, or not receive? what but the married life? Was our Saviour ſo mild and ſo favourable to the weakneſs of a ſingle Man, and is he turn'd on the ſudden ſo rigorous and inexorable to the diſtreſſes and extremities of an ill-wedded Man? Did he ſo graciouſly give leave to change the better ſingle life for the worſe married life? Did he open ſo to us this hazardous and accidental door of Marriage to ſhut upon us like the gate of death, without retracting or returning, without permitting to change the worſt, moſt inſupportable, moſt unchriſtian miſchance of Marriage, for all the miſchiefs and ſorrows that can enſue, being an Ordinance which was eſpecially given as a Cordial and exhilarating Cup of ſolace, the better to bear our other croſſes and afflictions? Queſtionleſs this were a hard-heartedneſs of undivorcing, worſe than that in the Jews, which they ſay extorted the allowance from Moſes, and is utterly diſſonant from all the Doctrine of our Saviour. After theſe conſiderations therefore, to take a Law out of Paradiſe given in time of original perfection, and to take it barely without thoſe juſt and equal inferences and reaſons which mainly eſtabliſh it, nor ſo much as admitting thoſe needful and ſafe allowances wherewith Moſes himſelf interprets it to the faln condition of Man, argues nothing in us but raſhneſs and contempt of thoſe means that God left us in his pure and chaſt Law, without which it will not be poſſible for us to perform the ſtrict impoſition of this command: or if we ſtrive beyond our ſtrength, we ſhall ſtrive to obey it otherwiſe than God commands it. And lamented Experience daily teaches the bitter and vain fruits of this our preſumption, forcing Men in a thing wherein we are not able to judg either of their ſtrength or of their ſufferance. Whom neither one vice or other by natural addiction, but only Marriage ruins, which doubtleſs is not the fault of that Ordinance, for God gave it as a bleſſing, not always of man's miſchuſing; it being an error above wiſdom to prevent, as examples of wiſeſt men ſo miſtaken manifeſt: it is the fault therefore of a perverſe Opinion that will have it continued in deſpight of Nature and Reaſon, when indeed it was never ſo truly joyn'd. All thoſe Expoſitors upon the fifth of Matthew confeſs the Law of Moſes to be the Law of the Lord, wherein no addition or diminution hath place; yet coming to the point of Divorce, as if they fear'd not to be call'd leaſt in the Kingdom of Heaven, any ſlight evaſion will content them to reconcile thoſe contradictions which they make between Chriſt and Moſes, between Chriſt and Chriſt.

The vain ſhift of thoſe who make the Law of Divorce to be only the Premiſes of a ſucceeding Law.

SOme will have it no Law, but the granted premiſes of another Law following, contrary to the words of Chriſt, Mark 10. 5. and all other Tranſlations of graveſt Authority, who render it in form of a Law; agreeable to Mal. 2. 16. as it is moſt ancient and modernly expounded. Beſides, the bill of Divorce, and the particular occaſion therein mention'd, declares it to be orderly and legal. And what avails this to make the matter more righteous, if ſuch an adulterous condition ſhall be mention'd to build a Law upon, without either Puniſhment or ſo much as forbidding? they pretend it is implicitly reprov'd in theſe words, Deut. 24. 4. after ſhe is defiled; but who ſees not that this defilement is only in reſpect of returning to her former Huſband after an intermixt Marriage? elſe why was not the defiling condition firſt forbidden, which would have ſaved the labour of this after Law? nor is it ſeemly or piouſly attributed to the Juſtice of God and his known hatred of Sin, that ſuch a heinous fault as this through all the Law ſhould be only whipp'd with an implicite and oblique touch, (which yet is falſly ſuppos'd) and that his peculiar People ſhould be let wallow in adulterous Marriages almoſt two thouſand years, for want of a direct Law to prohibit them: 'tis rather to be confidently aſſumed that this was granted to apparent neceſſities, as being of unqueſtionable right and reaſon in the Law of Nature, in that it ſtill paſſes without inhibition, even when greateſt cauſe is given to us to expect it ſhould be directly forbidden.

CHAP. XI.

The other ſhift of ſaying Divorce was permitted by Law, but not approv'd. More of the Inſtitution.

BUT it was not approv'd. So much the worſe that it was allow'd; as if Sin had overmaſter'd the Word of God, to conform her ſteddy and ſtrait rule to Sins crookedneſs, which is impoſſible. Beſides, what needed a poſitive grant of that which was not approv'd? it reſtrain'd no liberty to him that could but uſe a little fraud, it had been better ſilenc'd unleſs it were approved in ſome caſe or other. But ſtill it was not approv'd. Miſerable Excuſers! He who doth evil that good may come thereby, approves not what he doth; and yet the grand Rule forbids him, and counts his damnation juſt if he do it. The Sorcereſs Medea did not approve her own evil doings, yet look'd not to be excus'd for that: and it is the conſtant Opinion of Plato's Protagoras, and other of his Dialogues agreeing with that Proverbial Sentence among the Greeks, that No man is wicked willingly. Which alſo the Peripateticks do rather diſtinguiſh then deny. What great thank then if any man, reputed wiſe and conſtant, will neither do, nor permit others under his charge to do that which he approves not, eſpecially in matter of Sin? But for a Judge, but for a Magiſtrate and Shepherd of his People, to ſurrender up his approbation againſt Law and his own Judgment, to the obſtinacy of his heart, what more un-Judge-like, more un-Magiſtrate-like, and in War more un-Commander-like? Twice in a ſhort time it was the undoing of the Roman State, firſt when Pompey, next when Marcus Brutus, had not magnanimity enough but to make ſo poor a reſignation of what they approv'd, to what the boiſterous Tribunes and Souldiers bawl'd for. Twice it was the ſaving of two the greateſt Common-wealths in the World, of Athens by Themiſtocles at the Sea fight of Salamis; of Rome by Fabius Maximus in the Punick War, for that theſe two matchleſs Generals had the fortitude at home againſt the raſhneſs and the clamours of their own Captains and Confederates, to withſtand the doing, or permitting of what they could not approve in their duty of their great command. Thus far of civil prudence. But when we ſpeak of Sin, let us look again upon the old reverend Eli; who in his heavy Puniſhment found no difference between the doing and permitting of what he did not approve. If hardneſs of heart in the people may be an excuſe, why then is Pilat branded through all memory? He approv'd not what he did, he openly proteſted, he waſh'd his hands, and laboured not a little ere he would yield to the hard hearts of a whole People, both Princes and Plebeans, importuning and tumulting even to the fear of a revolt. Yet is there any will undertake his cauſe? If therefore Pilat for ſuffering but one act of cruelty againſt Law, though with much unwillingneſs teſtify'd, at the violent demand of a whole Nation, ſhall ſtand ſo black upon record to all poſterity? Alas for Moſes! what ſhall we ſay for him while we are taught to believe he ſuffer'd not one act onely both of cruelty and uncleanneſs in one Divorce, but made it a plain and laſting Law againſt Law, whereby ten thouſand acts, accounted both cruel and unclean, might be daily committed, and this without the leaſt ſuit or petition of the People that we can read of.

And can we conceive without vile thoughts, that the Majeſty and Holineſs of God could endure ſo many Ages to gratifie a ſtubborn people in the practice of a foul polluting Sin? and could he expect they ſhould abſtain, he not ſignifying his mind in a plain command, at ſuch time eſpecially when he was framing their Laws and them to all poſſible perfection? But they were to look back to the firſt inſtitution; nay rather why was not that individual inſtitution brought out of Paradiſe, as was that of the Sabbath, and repeated in the Body of the Law, that men might have underſtood it to be a command? for that any ſentence that bears the reſemblance of a precept, ſet there ſo out of place in another World, at ſuch a diſtance from the whole Law, and not once mention'd there, ſhould be an obliging command to us, is very diſputable, and perhaps it might be deny'd to be a command without further diſpute: however, it commands not abſolutely, as hath bin clear'd, but only with reference to that precedent promiſe of God, which is the very ground of his inſtitution; if that appear not in ſome tolerable ſort, how can we affirm ſuch a matrimony to be the ſame which God inſtituted? In ſuch an accident it will beſt behoove our ſoberneſs to follow rather what moral Sinai preſcribes equal to our ſtrength, then fondly to think within our ſtrength all that loſt Paradiſe relates.

CHAP. XII.

The third ſhift of them who eſteem it a meer Judicial Law. Prov'd again to be a Law of moral equity.

ANother while it ſhall ſuffice them, that it was not a moral but a judicial Law, and ſo was abrogated: nay rather not abrogated becauſe judicial; which Law the Miniſtry of Chriſt came not to deal with. And who put it in mans power to exempt, where Chriſt ſpeaks in general of not abrogating the leaſt jot or tittle, and in ſpecial not that of Divorce, becauſe it follows among thoſe Laws which he premis'd expreſly not to abrogate, but to vindicate from abuſive Traditions? which is moſt evidently to be ſeen in the 16th of Luke, where this caution of not abrogating is inſerted immediately, and not otherwiſe then purpoſely, when no other point of Law is touch'd but that of Divorce. And if we mark the 31ſt verſe of Mat. 5. he there cites not the Law of Moſes, but the licentious Gloſs which traduc'd the Law; that therefore which he cited, that he abrogated, and not only abrogated but diſallowed and flatly condemned, which could not be the Law of Moſes, for that had been foully to the rebuke of his great Servant. To abrogate a Law made with Gods allowance, had been to tell us only that ſuch a Law was now to ceaſe: but to refute it with an ignominious note of civilizing Adultery, caſts the reproof, which was meant only to the Phariſees, even upon him that made the Law. But yet if that be judicial which belongs to a Civil Court, this Law is leſs judicial than nine of the ten Commandments: for Antiquaries affirm, that Divorces proceeded among the Jews without knowledge of the Magiſtrate, onely with Hands and Seals under the teſtimony of ſome Rabbi's to be then preſent. Perkins in a Treatiſe of Conſcience grants, that what in the Judicial Law is of common equity, binds alſo the Chriſtian: and how to judge of this preſcrib[illegible] two ways; If wiſe Nations have enacted the like Decree: Or if it maintain the go[illegible]f Family, Church, or Common-wealth. This therefore is a pure moral œconomical Law, too haſtily imputed of tolerating Sin; being rather ſo clear in nature and reaſon, that it was left to a mans own arbitrement to be determined between God and his own conſcience; not only among the Jews, but in every wiſe Nation: the reſtraint whereof, who is not too thick-ſighted, may ſee how hurtful and diſtractive it is to the Houſe, the Church, and Common-wealth. And that power which Chriſt never took from the Maſter of a Family, but rectified onely to a right and wary uſe at home; that power the undiſcerning Canoniſt hath improperly uſurpt into his Court-leet, and beſcribbl'd with a thouſand trifling impertinencies, which yet have fill'd the life of man with ſerious trouble and calamity. Yet grant it were of old a judicial Law, it need not be the leſs moral for that, being converſant as it is about Vertue or Vice. And our Saviour diſputes not here the Judicature, for that was not his Office, but the Morality of Divorce, whether it be Adultery or no; if therefore he touch the Law of Moſes at all, he touches the moral part thereof, which is abſurd to imagine, that the Covenant of Grace ſhould reform the exact and perfect Law of Works, eternal and immutable; or if he touch not the Law at all, then is not the Allowance thereof diſallow'd to us.

CHAP. XIII.

The ridiculous Opinion that Divorce was permitted from the Cuſtom in Ægypt. That Moſes gave not this Law unwillingly. Perkins confeſſes this Law was not abrogated.

OThers are ſo ridiculous as to allege that this Licenſe of divorcing was given them becauſe they were ſo accuſtom'd in Ægypt. As if an ill Cuſtom were to be kept to all poſterity; for the Diſpenſation is both univerſal and of time unlimited, and ſo indeed no Diſpenſation at all: for the over-dated Diſpenſation of a thing unlawful, ſerves for nothing but to increaſe hardneſs of heart, and makes men but wax more incorrigible, which were a great reproach to be ſaid of any Law or Allowance that God ſhould give us. In theſe Opinions it would be more Religion to adviſe well, leſt we make our ſelves juſter then God, by cenſuring raſhly that for Sin which his unſpotted Law without rebukes allows, and his People without being conſcious of diſpleaſing him have us'd. And if we can think ſo of Moſes, as that the Jewiſh obſtinacy could compel him to write ſuch impure Permiſſions againſt the Word of God and his own Judgment, doubtleſs it was his part to have proteſted publickly what ſtraits he was driven to, and to have declar'd his Conſcience when he gave any Law againſt his mind: for the Law is the Touchſtone of Sin and of Conſcience, and muſt not be intermix'd with corrupt Indulgences; for then it loſes the greateſt praiſe it has of being certain and infallible, not leading into error, as the Jews were led by this Connivence of Moſes, if it were a Connivence. But ſtill they fly back to the primitive Inſtitution, and would have us re-enter Paradiſe againſt the Sword that guards it. Whom I again thus reply to, that the place in Geneſis contains the deſcription of a fit and perfect Marriage, with an interdict of ever divorcing ſuch a Union; but where Nature is diſcover'd to have never join'd indeed, but vehemently ſeeks to part, it cannot be there conceived that God forbids it, nay he commands it both in the Law and in the Prophet Malachy, which is to be our rule. And Perkins upon this Chapter of Matthew deals plainly, that our Saviour here confutes not Moſes Law, but the falſe Gloſſes that deprav'd the Law; which being true, Perkins muſt needs grant, that ſomething then is left to that Law which Chriſt found no fault with; and what can that be but the conſcionable uſe of ſuch liberty, as the plain words import? So that by his own Inference, Chriſt did not abſolutely intend to reſtrain all Divorces to the only cauſe of Adultery. This therefore is the true ſcope of our Saviour's will, that he who looks upon the Law concerning Divorce, ſhould alſo look back upon the Inſtitution, that he may endeavour what is perfecteſt: and he that looks upon the Inſtitution ſhall not refuſe as ſinful and unlawful thoſe Allowances which God affords him in his following Law, leſt he make himſelf purer than his Maker, and preſuming above ſtrength, ſlip into temptations irrecoverably. For this is wonderful, that in all thoſe Decrees concerning Marriage God ſhould never once mention the prime Inſtitution to diſſuade them from divorcing, and that he ſhould forbid ſmaller Sins as oppoſite to the hardneſs of their hearts, and let this adulterous matter of Divorce paſs ever unreproved.

This is alſo to be marvelled, that ſeeing Chriſt did not condemn whatever it was that Moſes ſuffered, and that thereupon the Chriſtian Magiſtrate permits Uſury and open Stews, and here with us Adultery to be ſo ſlightly puniſhed, which was puniſhed by death to theſe hard-hearted Jews, why we ſhould ſtrain thus at the matter of Divorce, which may ſtand ſo much with Charity to permit, and make no ſcruple to allow Uſury eſteem'd to be ſo much againſt Charity. But this it is to embroyl our ſelves againſt the righteous and all-wiſe Judgments and Statutes of God; which are not variable and contrarious, as we would make them, one while permitting, and another while forbidding, but are moſt conſtant and moſt harmonious each to other. For how can the uncorrupt and majeſtick Law of God, bearing in her hand the wages of life and death, harbour ſuch a repugnance within her ſelf, as to require an unexemted and impartial Obedience to all her Decrees, either from us or from our Mediator, and yet debaſe her ſelf to faulter ſo many Ages with circumcis'd Adulteries by unclean and ſlubbering Permiſſions?

CHAP. XIV.

That Beza's Opinion of regulating Sin by Apoſtolick Law cannot be ſound.

YET Beza's Opinion is, that a politick Law (but what politick Law I know not, unleſs one of Matchiavel's) may regulate Sin; may bear indeed, I grant with imperfection for a time, as thoſe Canons of the Apoſtles did in Ceremonial things: but as for Sin, the eſſence of it cannot conſiſt with rule; and if the Law fail to regulate Sin, and not to take it utterly away, it neceſſarily confirms and eſtabliſhes Sin. To make a regularity of Sin by Law, either the Law muſt ſtreighten Sin into no Sin, or Sin muſt crook the Law into no Law. The Judicial Law can ſerve to no other end than to be the Protector and Champion of Religion and honeſt Civility, as is ſet down plainly Rom. 13. and is but the arm of Moral Law, which can no more be ſeparate from Juſtice then Juſtice from Vertue. Their office alſo in a different manner ſteers the ſame courſe; the one teaches what is good by precept, the other unteaches what is bad by puniſhment. But if we give way to politick Diſpenſations of lewd Uncleanneſs, the firſt good conſequence of ſuch a relax will be the juſtifying of Papal Stews, join'd with a toleration of epidemick Whoredom. Juſtice muſt revolt from the end of her Authority, and become the Patron of that whereof ſhe was created the Puniſher. The example of Uſury, which is commonly alleged, makes againſt the Allegation which it brings, as I touch'd before. Beſides that Uſury, ſo much as is permitted by the Magiſtrate, and demanded with common equity, is neither againſt the word of God, nor the rule of Charity, as hath been often diſcuſs'd by men of eminent Learning and Judgment. There muſt be therefore ſome other example found out to ſhew us wherein civil Policy may with warrant from God ſettle Wickedneſs by Law, and make that lawful which is lawleſs. Although I doubt not but upon deeper conſideration, that which is true in Phyſick will be found as true in Policy, that as of bad Pulſes thoſe that beat moſt in order are much worſe than thoſe that keep the moſt inordinate circuit, ſo of popular Vices thoſe that may be committed legally, will be more pernicious than thoſe that are left to their own courſe at peril, not under a ſtinted privilege to ſin orderly and regularly, which is an implicite contradiction, but under due and fearleſs execution of puniſhment.

The political Law, ſince it cannot regulate Vice, is to reſtrain it by uſing all means to root it out. But if it ſuffer the weed to grow up to any pleaſurable or contented height upon what pretext ſoever, it faſtens the root, it prunes and dreſſes Vice, as if it were a good Plant. Let no man doubt therefore to affirm, that it is not ſo hurtful or diſhonourable to a Commonwealth, nor ſo much to the hardening of hearts, when thoſe worſe faults pretended to be feared are committed, by who ſo dares under ſtrict and executed Penalty, as when thoſe leſs faults tolerated for fear of greater harden their faces, not their hearts only, under the protection of publick Authority. For what leſs Indignity were this, then as if Juſtice her ſelf, the Queen of Vertues (deſcending from her Sceptred Royalty) inſtead of conquering ſhould compound and treat with Sin, her eternal Adverſary and Rebel, upon ignoble terms? or as if the Judicial Law were like that untruſty Steward in the Goſpel, and inſtead of calling in the debts of his moral Maſter, ſhould give out ſubtle and ſly Acquittances to keep himſelf from begging? Or let us perſon him like ſome wretched Itinerary Judge, who to gratifie his Delinquents before him, would let them baſely break his head, leſt they ſhould pull him from the Bench, and throw him over the Bar. Unleſs we had rather think both Moral and Judicial, full of malice and deadly purpoſe, conſpir'd to let the Debtor Iſraelite, the Seed of Abraham, run on upon a bankrupt ſcore, flattered with inſufficient and enſnaring Diſcharges, that ſo he might be haled to a more cruel forſeit for all the indulgent arrears which thoſe Judicial Acquitments had engaged him in. No no, this cannot be, that the Law, whoſe integrity and faithfulneſs is next to God, ſhould be either the ſhameleſs broker of our impunities, or the intended inſtrument of our deſtruction. The method of holy correction, ſuch as became the Commonwealth of Iſrael, is not to bribe ſin with ſin, to capitulate and hire out one crime with another; but, with more noble and graceful ſeverity then Popilius the Roman Legat uſed with Antiochus, to limit and level out the direct way from vice to vertue, with ſtreighteſt and exacteſt lines on either ſide, not winding or indenting ſo much as to the right hand of fair pretences. Violence indeed and Inſurrection may force the Law to ſuffer what it cannot mend; but to write a Decree in allowance of ſin, as ſoon can the hand of Juſtice rot off. Let this be ever concluded as a truth that will outlive the faith of thoſe that ſeek to bear it down.

CHAP. XV.

That Divorce was not given for VVives only, as Beza and Paræus write. More of the Inſtitution.

LAſtly, If Divorce were granted, as Beza and others ſay, not for Men, but to releaſe afflicted Wives; certainly it is not onely a Diſpenſation, but a moſt merciful Law; and why it ſhould not yet be in force, being wholly needful, I know not what can be in cauſe but ſenſleſs cruelty. But yet to ſay, Divorce was granted for relief of Wives rather than of Husbands, is but weakly conjectur'd, and is manifeſtly the extreme ſhift of a huddled Expoſition. Whenas it could not be found how hardneſs of heart ſhould be leſſen'd by liberty of Divorce, a fancy was deviſ'd to hide the flaw, by commenting that Divorce was permitted onely for the help of Wives. Palpably uxorious! who can be ignorant that Woman was created for Man, and not Man for Woman; and that a Husband may be injur'd as inſufferably in Marriage as a Wife? What an injury is it after Wedlock not to be belov'd, what to be ſlighted, what to be contented with in point of houſe-rule who ſhall be the head; not for any parity of wiſdom, for that were ſomething reaſonable, but out of a female pride? I ſuffer not ſaith S. Paul, the Woman to uſurp autority over the Man. If the Apoſtle could not ſuffer it, into what mould is he mortified that can? Solomon ſaith, That a bad Wife is to her Husband as rotteneſs to his bones, a continual dropping. Better dwell in the corner of the houſe top, or in the wilderneſs, than with ſuch a one. Whoſo hideth her, hideth the wind, and one of the four miſchiefs that the earth cannot bear. If the Spirit of God wrote ſuch aggravations as theſe, and ( as may be gueſt by theſe ſimilitudes ) counſels the Man rather to divorce than to live with ſuch a collegue; and yet on the other ſide expreſſes nothing of the Wifes ſuffering with a bad Husband: Is it not moſt likely that God in his Law had more pity towards Man thus wedlock'd, than towards the Woman that was created for another? The ſame Spirit relates to us the courſe which the Medes and Perſians took by occaſion of Vaſhti, whoſe meer denial to come at her Husbands ſending, loſt her the being Queen any longer, and ſet up a wholeſom Law, that every man ſhould bear rule in his own houſe. And the Divine Relater ſhews us not the leaſt ſign of diſliking what was done; how ſhould he, if Moſes long before was nothing leſs mindful of the honour and pre-eminence due to Man? So that to ſay Divorce was granted for Woman rather than Man, was but fondly invented. Eſteeming therefore to have aſſerted thus an injur'd Law of Moſes from the unwarranted and guilty name of a Diſpenſation, to be again a moſt equal and requiſite Law, we have the Word of Chriſt himſelf, that he came not to alter the leaſt tittle of it; and ſignifies no ſmall diſpleaſure againſt him that ſhall teach to do ſo. On which relying, I ſhall not much waver to affirm, that thoſe words which are made to intimate as if they forbad all Divorce but for Adultery, ( though Moſes have conſtituted otherwiſe) thoſe words taken circumſcriptly, without regard to any precedent Law of Moſes, or atteſtation of Chriſt himſelf, or without care to preſerve thoſe his fundamental and ſuperiour Laws of Nature and Charity, to which all other Ordinances give up their Seal, are as much againſt plain Equity and the Mercy of Religion, as thoſe words of Take, eat, this is my body, elementally underſtood, are againſt Nature and Senſe.

And ſurely the reſtoring of this degraded Law hath well recompenc'd the diligence was us'd by enlightning us further to find out wherefore Chriſt took off the Phariſees from alledging the Law, and referr'd them to the firſt Inſtitution; not condemning, altering, or aboliſhing this Precept of Divorce, which is plainly moral, for that were againſt his Truth, his Promiſe, and his prophetick Office; but knowing how fallaciouſly they had cited and conceal'd the particular and natural reaſon of the Law, that they might juſtifie any froward reaſon of their own, he lets go that Sophiſtry unconvinc'd, for that had been to teach them elſe, which his purpoſe was not. And ſince they had taken a liberty which the Law gave not, he amuſes and repels their tempting pride with a perfection of Paradiſe, which the Law requir'd not; not thereby to oblige our performance to that whereto the Law never enjoyn'd the fallen eſtate of Man: for if the firſt Inſtitution muſt make Wedlock, whatever happen, inſeparable to us, it muſt make it alſo as perfect as meetly helpful, and as comfortable as God promis'd it ſhould be, at leaſt in ſome degree; otherwiſe it is not equal or proportionable to the ſtrength of Man, that he ſhould be reduc'd into ſuch indiſſoluble bonds to his aſſured miſery, if all the other conditions of that Covenant be manifeſtly alter'd.

CHAP. XVI.

How to be underſtood that they muſt be one fleſh; and how that thoſe whom God hath joyn'd, Man ſhould not ſunder.

NExt he ſaith, they muſt be one fleſh; which, when all conjecturing is done, will be found to import no more but to make legitimate and good the carnal act, which elſe might ſeem to have ſomething of pollution in it; and infers thus much over, that the fit union of their ſouls be ſuch as may even incorporate them to love and amity: but that can never be where no Correſpondent is of the mind; nay, inſtead of being one fleſh, they will be rather two carcaſes chain'd unnaturally together; or, as it may happen, a living ſoul bound to a dead corps, a puniſhment too like that inflicted by the Tyrant Mezentius, ſo little worthy to be received as that remedy of lonelineſs which God meant us. Since we know it is not the joyning of another body will remove lonelineſs, but the uniting of another compliable mind; and that it is no bleſſing but a torment, nay a baſe and brutiſh condition to be one fleſh, unleſs where a nature can in ſome nature fix a unity of diſpoſition. The meaning therefore of theſe words, For this cauſe ſhall a man leave his father and his mother, and ſhall cleave to his wife, was firſt to ſhew us the dear affection which naturally grows in every not unnatural Marriage, even to the leaving of Parents, or other familiarity whatſoever. Next, it juſtifies a man in ſo doing, that nothing is done undutifully to Father or Mother. But he that ſhould be here ſternly commanded to cleave to his error, a diſpoſition which to his he finds will never cement, a quotidian of ſorrow and diſcontent in his houſe; let us be excus'd to pauſe a little, and bethink us every way round ere we lay ſuch a flat Soleciſm upon the gracious, and certainly not inexorable, not ruſhleſs and flinty Ordinance of Marriage. For if the meaning of theſe words muſt be thus block'd up within their own letters from all equity and fair deduction, they will ſerve then well indeed their turn, who affirm Divorce to have been granted onely for Wives; whenas we ſee no word of this Text binds Women, but Men only, what it binds. No marvel then if Salomith (Siſter to Herod) ſent a Writ of Eaſe to Caſtobarus her Husband, which (as Joſephus there atteſts) was lawful only to Men. No marvel though Placidia, the Siſter of Honorius, threatned the like to Earl Conſtantius for a trivial cauſe, as Photius relates from Olympiodorus. No marvel any thing, if Letters muſt be turn'd into Paliſadoes, to ſtake out all requiſite ſence from entring to their due enlargement.

Laſtly, Chriſt himſelf tells who ſhould not be put aſunder, namely, thoſe whom God hath joyn'd. A plain ſolution of this great controverſie, if men would but uſe their eyes; for when is it that God may be ſaid to joyn? when the parties and their friends conſent? No ſurely, for that may concur to lewdeſt ends. Or is it when Churches Rites are finiſh'd? Neither; for the efficacy of thoſe depends upon the preſuppoſed fitneſs of either party. Perhaps after carnal knowledge: Leaſt of all; for that may joyn perſons whom neither Law nor Nature dares joyn: 'tis left, that only then when the minds are fitly diſpoſed and enabled to maintain a chearful converſation, to the ſolace and love of each other, according as God intended and promiſed in the very firſt foundation of Matrimony, I will make him a help-meet for him; for ſurely what God intended and promiſed, that only can be thought to be his joyning, and not the contrary. So likewiſe the Apoſtle witneſſeth 1 Cor. 7. 15. that in Marriage God hath called us to peace. And doubtleſs in what reſpect he hath call'd us to Marriage, in that alſo he hath joyn'd us. The reſt, whom either diſproportion or deadneſs of ſpirit, or ſomething diſtaſteful and averſe in the immutable bent of Nature renders conjugal, Error may have joyn'd, but God never joyn'd againſt the meaning of his own Ordinance. And if he joyn'd them not, then is there no power above their own conſent to hinder them from unjoyning, when they cannot reap the ſobreſt ends of being together in any tolerable ſort. Neither can it be ſaid properly that ſuch twain were ever divorc'd, but only parted from each other, as two perſons unconjunctive and unmarriable together. But if, whom God hath made a fit help, frowardneſs or private injuries hath made unfit, that being the ſecret of Marriage, God can better judge than Man, neither is Man indeed fit or able to decide this matter: however it be, undoubtedly a peaceful Divorce is a leſs evil, and leſs in ſcandal than a hateful, hard-hearted, and deſtructive continuance of Marriage in the judgment of Moſes and of Chriſt, that juſtifies him in chuſing the leſs evil; which if it were an honeſt and civil prudence in the Law, what is there in the Goſpel forbidding ſuch a kind of legal wiſdom, though we ſhould admit the common Expoſitors?

CHAP. XVII.

The Sentence of Chriſt concerning Divorce how to be expounded. VVhat Grotius hath obſerved. Other Additions.

Having thus unfolded thoſe ambiguous Reaſons, wherewith Chriſt (as his wont was) gave to the Phariſees that came to ſound him ſuch an anſwer as they deſerv'd, it will not be uneaſie to explain the Sentence it ſelf now that follows; Whoſoever ſhall put away his Wife, except it be for fornication, and ſhall marry another, committeth adultery. Firſt therefore I will ſet down what is obſerv'd by Grotius upon this point, a Man of general learning. Next I produce what mine own thoughts gave me before I had ſeen his Annotations. Origen, ſaith he, notes that Chriſt nam'd Adultery rather as one example of other like caſes, then as one only exception; and that it is frequent not only in humane but in divine Laws, to expreſs one kind of fact, whereby other cauſes of like nature may have the like plea, as Exod. 21. 18, 19, 20, 26. Deut. 19. 5. And from the Maxims of Civil Law he ſhews, that even in ſharpeſt penal Laws the ſame reaſon hath the ſame right; and in gentler Laws, that from like cauſes to like the Law interprets rightly. But it may be objected, ſaith he, that nothing deſtroys the end of Wedlock ſo much as Adultery. To which he anſwers, that Marriage was not ordain'd only for copulation, but for mutual help and comfort of life: and if we mark diligently the nature of our Saviours commands, we ſhall find that both their beginning and their end conſiſts in charity; whoſe will is that we ſhould be ſo good to others, as that we be not cruel to our ſelves. And hence it appears why Mark and Luke, and S. Paul to the Corinthians, mentioning this precept of Chriſt, add no exception, becauſe exceptions that ariſe from natural equity are included ſilently under general terms: it would be conſider'd therefore whether the ſame equity may not have place in other caſes leſs frequent. Thus far he. From hence is what I add: firſt, that this ſaying of Chriſt, as it is uſually expounded, can be no Law at all, that a Man for no cauſe ſhould ſeparate but for adultery, except it be a ſupernatural Law, not binding us as we are; had it been the Law of nature, either the Jews, or ſome other wiſe and civil nation would have preſs'd it: or let it be ſo, yet that Law, Deut. 24. 1. whereby a Man hath leave to part, when as for juſt and natural cauſe diſcover'd he cannot love, is a Law ancienter and deeper ingraven in blameleſs nature then the other: therefore the inſpired Lawgiver Moſes took care that this ſhould be ſpecified and allowed; the other he let vaniſh in ſilence, not once repeated in the volum of his Law, even as the reaſon of it vaniſh'd with Paradiſe. Secondly, this can be no new command, for the Goſpel enjoyns no new morality, ſave only the infinite enlargment of charity, which in this reſpect is called the new commandment by S. John, as being the accompliſhment of every command. Thirdly, it is no command of perfection further then it partakes of Charity, which is the bond of perfection. Thoſe commands therefore which compell us to ſelf-cruelty above our ſtrength, ſo hardly will help forward to perfection, that they hinder and ſet backward in all the common rudiments of Chriſtianity, as was prov'd. It being thus clear, that the words of Chriſt can be no kind of command as they are vulgarly taken, we ſhall now ſee in what ſenſe they may be a command, and that an excellent one, the ſame with that of Moſes, and no other. Moſes had granted, that only for a natural annoyance, defect, or diſlike, whether in body or mind, (for ſo the Hebrew words plainly note) which a Man could not force himſelf to live with, he might give a bill of Divorce, thereby forbidding any other cauſe wherein amendment or reconciliation might have place. This Law the Phariſees depraving, extended to any ſlight contentious cauſe whatſoever. Chriſt therefore ſeeing where they halted, urges the negative part of that Law, which is neceſſarily underſtood (for the determinate permiſſion of Moſes binds them from further licence) and checking their ſupercilious drift, declares that no accidental, temporary, or reconcilable offence (except fornication) can juſtifie a Divorce. He touches not here thoſe natural and perpetual hindrances of ſociety, whether in body or mind, which are not to be remov'd; for ſuch as they are apteſt to cauſe an unchangeable offence, ſo are they not capable of reconcilement, becauſe not of amendment: they do not break indeed, but they annihilate the bands of Marriage more then Adultery. For that fault committed argues not always a hatred either natural or incidental againſt whom it is committed; neither does it infer a diſability of future helpfulneſs, or loyalty, or loving agreement, being once paſt and pardon'd, where it can be pardon'd: but that which naturally diſtaſtes, and finds no favour in the eyes of Matrimony, can never be conceal'd, never appeas'd, never intermitted, but proves a perpetual nullity of love and contentment, a ſolitude and dead vacation of all acceptable converſing. Moſes therefore permits Divorce, but in caſes only that have no hands to joyn, and more need ſeparating then Adultery. Chriſt forbids it, but in matters only that may accord, and thoſe leſs then Fornication. Thus is Moſes Law here plainly confirm'd, and thoſe cauſes which he permitted not a jot gainſaid. And that this is the true meaning of this place I prove by no other Author than S. Paul himſelf, 1 Cor. 7. 10, 11. upon which Text Interpreters agree that the Apoſtle only repeats the precept of Chriſt: where while he ſpeaks of the Wifes reconcilement to her Husband, he puts it out of controverſie, that our Saviour meant chiefly matters of ſtrife and reconcilement; of which ſort he would not that any difference ſhould be the occaſion of Divorce, except Fornication. And that we may learn better how to value a grave and prudent Law of Moſes, and how unadviſely we ſmatter with our lips, when we talk of Chriſts aboliſhing any Judicial Law of his great Father, except in ſome circumſtances which are Judaical rather then Judicial, and need no aboliſhing, but ceaſe of themſelves: I ſay again, that this recited Law of Moſes contains a cauſe of Divorce greater beyond compare then that for Adultery; and whoſo cannot ſo conceive it, errs and wrongs exceedingly a Law of deep wiſdom for want of well fadoming. For let him mark, no man urges the juſt divorcing of Adultery as it is a ſin, but as it is an injury to Marriage; and though it be but once committed, and that without malice, whether through importunity or opportunity, the Goſpel does not therefore diſſuade him who would therefore divorce; but that natural hatred, whenever it ariſes, is a greater evil in Marriage then the accident of Adultery, a greater defrauding, a greater injuſtice, and yet not blameable, he who underſtands not after all this repreſenting, I doubt his Will like a hard Spleen draws faſter then his Underſtanding can well ſanguifie. Nor did that man ever know or feel what it is to love truly, nor ever yet comprehend in his thoughts what the true intent of Marriage is. And this alſo will be ſomewhat above his reach, but yet no leſs a truth for lack of his perſpective, that as no man apprehends what vice is ſo well as he who is truly vertuous, no man knows Hell like him who converſes moſt in Heaven; ſo there is none that can eſtimate the evil and the affliction of a natural hatred in Matrimony, unleſs he have a ſoul gentle enough and ſpacious enough to contemplate what is true love.

And the reaſon why men ſo diſeſteem this wiſe judging Law of God, and count hate, or the not finding of favour, as it is there term'd, a humorous, a diſhoneſt, and ſlight cauſe of Divorce, is becauſe themſelves apprehend ſo little of what true concord means: for if they did, they would be juſter in their balancing between natural hatred and caſual adultery; this being but a tranſient injury, and ſoon amended, I mean as to the party againſt whom the treſpaſs is: but that other being an unſpeakable and unremitting ſorrow and offence, whereof no amends can be made, no cure, no ceaſing but by Divorce, which like a divine touch in one moment heals all, and (like the Word of God) in one inſtant huſhes outrageous tempeſts into a ſudden ſtilneſs and peaceful calm. Yet all this ſo great a good of God's own enlarging to us, is by the hard rains of them that ſit us, wholly diverted and imbezelled from us. Maligners of mankind! But who hath taught you to mangle thus, and make more gaſhes in the miſeries of a blameleſs creature, with the leaden daggers of your literal Decrees, to whoſe eaſe you cannot add the tithe of one ſmall atom, but by letting alone your unhelpful Surgery. As for ſuch as think wandring concupiſcence to be here newly and more preciſely forbidden then it was before, if the Apoſtle can convince them, we know that we are to know luſt by the Law, and not by any new diſcovery of the Law. The Law of Moſes knew what it permitted, and the Goſpel knew what it forbid; he that under a peeviſh conceit of debarring concupiſcence ſhall go about to make a Novice of Moſes, (not to ſay a worſe thing for reverence ſake) and ſuch a one of God himſelf as is a horror to think, to bind our Saviour in the default of a downright promiſe breaking, and to bind the diſunions of complaining nature in chains together, and curb them with a Canon bit, 'tis he that commits all the whoredom and adultery which himſelf adjudges, beſides the former guilt ſo manifold that lies upon him. And if none of theſe Conſiderations, with all their weight and gravity, can avail to the diſpoſſeſſing him of his precious Literaliſm, let ſome one or other intreat him but to read on in the ſame 19th of Math. till he come to that place that ſays, Some make themſelves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heavens ſake. And if then he pleaſe to make uſe of Origens Knife, he may do well to be his own Carver.

CHAP. XVIII.

VVhether the word of our Saviour be rightly expounded only of actual Fornication to be the cauſe of Divorce. The Opinion of Grotius, with other Reaſons.

BUT becauſe we know that Chriſt never gave a Judicial Law, and that the word Fornication is variouſly ſignificant in Scripture, it will be much right done to our Saviours words, to conſider diligently whether it be meant here that nothing but actual Fornication prov'd by witneſs can warrant a Divorce, for ſo our Canon Law judges. Nevertheleſs, as I find that Grotius on this place hath obſerv'd the Chriſtian Emperours, Theodoſius the ſecond and Juſtinian, men of high Wiſdom and reputed Piety, decreed it to be a divorcive Fornication, if the Wife attempted either againſt the knowledge, or obſtinately againſt the will of her Husband, ſuch things as gave open ſuſpitions of adulterizing, as the wilful haunting of Feaſts, and Invitations with men not of her near Kindred, the lying forth of her Houſe without probable cauſe, the frequenting of Theatres againſt her Husbands mind, her endeavour to prevent or deſtroy Conception. Hence that of Jerom, Where Fornication is ſuſpected the Wife may lawfully be divorc'd: not that every motion of a jealous mind ſhould be regarded, but that it ſhould not be exacted to prove all things by a viſibility of Law witneſſing, or elſe to hoodwink the mind: for the Law is not able to judge of theſe things but by the rule of Equity, and by permitting a wiſe man to walk the middle way of prudent circumſpection, neither wretchedly jealous, nor ſtupidly and tamely patient. To this purpoſe hath Grotius in his Notes. He ſhews alſo that Fornication is taken in Scripture for ſuch a continual headſtrong Behaviour, as tends to plain contempt of the Husband, and proves out of Judges 19. 2. where the Levites Wife is ſaid to have plaid the whore againſt him; which Joſephus and the Septuagint, with the Chaldean, interpret only of Stubbornneſs and Rebellion againſt her Husband: and to this I add, that Kimchi, and the two other Rabbies who gloſs the Text, are in the ſame Opinion. Ben Gerſom reaſons, that had it been Whoredom, a Jew and a Levite would have diſdain'd to fetch her again. And this I ſhall contribute, that had it been Whoredom, ſhe would have choſen any other place to run to then to her Fathers houſe, it being ſo infamous for an Hebrew Woman to play the Harlot, and ſo opprobrious to the Parents. Fornication then in this place of the Judges is underſtood for ſtubborn Diſobedience againſt the Husband, and not for Adultery. A Sin of that ſudden activity, as to be already committed, when no more is done, but only lookt unchaſtely: which yet I would be loth to judge worthy a Divorce, though in our Saviours Language it be called Adultery. Nevertheleſs when palpable and frequent ſigns are given, the Law of God, Num. 5. ſo far gave way to the Jealouſie of a man, as that the Woman, ſet before the Sanctuary with her head uncovered, was adjur'd by the Prieſt to ſwear whether ſhe were falſe or no, and conſtrain'd to drink that bitter water with an undoubted curſe of rottenneſs and tympany to follow, unleſs ſhe were innocent. And the jealous man had not been guiltleſs before God, as ſeems by the laſt Verſe, if having ſuch a ſuſpicion in his head, he ſhould neglect his trial; which if to this day it be not to be us'd, or be thought as uncertain of effect as our antiquated Law of Ordalium, yet all equity will judge that many adulterous demeanours, which are of lewd ſuſpicion and example, may be held ſufficient to incur a Divorce, though the act it ſelf hath not been prov'd. And ſeeing the Generoſity of our Nation is ſo, as to account no reproach more abominable then to be nick-nam'd the Husband of an Adultereſs, that our Law ſhould not be as ample as the Law of God, to vindicate a man from that ignoble ſufferance, is our barbarous unskilfulneſs, not conſidering that the Law ſhould be exaſperated according to our eſtimation of the injury. And if it muſt be ſuffer'd till the act be viſibly prov'd, Solomon himſelf, whoſe judgment will be granted to ſurpaſs the acuteneſs of any Canoniſt, confeſſes, Prov. 30. 19, 20. that for the act of Adultery it is as difficult to be found as the track of an eagle in the air, or the way of a ſhip in the ſea; ſo that a man may be put to unmanly indignities ere it be found out. This therefore may be enough to inform us, that divorcive Adultery is not limited by our Saviour to the utmoſt act, and that to be atteſted always by eye-witneſs, but may be extended alſo to divers obvious actions, which either plainly lead to Adultery, or give ſuch preſumption whereby ſenſible men may ſuſpect the deed to be already done. And this the rather may be thought, in that our Saviour choſe to uſe the word Fornication, which word is found to ſignifie other matrimonial Tranſgreſſions of main breach to that Covenant beſides actual Adultery. For that ſin needed not the riddance of Divorce, but of Death by the Law, which was active even till then by the example of the Woman taken in Adultery; or if the Law had been dormant, our Saviour was more likely to have told them of their neglect, then to have let a capital crime ſilently ſcape into a Divorce: or if it be ſaid, his buſineſs was not to tell them what was criminal in the civil Courts, but what was ſinful at the Bar of Conſcience, how dare they then, having no other ground than theſe our Saviours words, draw that into trial of Law, which both Moſes and our Saviour have left to the juriſdiction of Conſcience? But we take from our Saviour, ſay they, only that it was Adultery, and our Law of it ſelf applies the Puniſhment. But by their leave that ſo argue, the great Lawgiver of all the world, who knew beſt what was Adultery both to the Jew and to the Gentile, appointed no ſuch applying, and never likes when mortal men will be vainly preſuming to outſtrip his Juſtice.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIX.

Chriſts manner of teaching. S. Paul adds to this matter of Divorce without command, to ſhew the matter to be of equity, not of rigour. That the bondage of a Chriſtian may be as much, and in Peace as little, in ſome other Marriages beſides Idolatrous. If thoſe Arguments therefore be good in that one caſe, why not in thoſe other? Therefore the Apoſtle himſelf adds ἐν τοῖς τοιούτοις.

THus at length we ſee both by this and by other places, that there is ſcarce any one Saying in the Goſpel but muſt be read with limitations and diſtinctions to be rightly underſtood; for Chriſt gives no full Comments or continued Diſcourſes, but (as Demetrius the Rhetorician phraſes it) ſpeaks oft in Monoſyllables, like a Maſter ſcattering the heavenly grain of his Doctrine like Pearls here and there, which requires a skilful and laborious Gatherer, who muſt compare the words he finds with other precepts, with the end of every Ordinance, and with the general Analogy of Evangelick Doctrine: otherwiſe many particular Sayings would be but one repugnant Riddle, and the Church would offend in granting Divorce for Frigidity, which is not here accepted with Adultery, but by them added. And this was it undoubtedly which gave reaſon to S. Paul of his own Authority, as he profeſſes, and without command from the Lord, to enlarge the ſeeming conſtruction of thoſe places in the Goſpel, by adding a caſe wherein a perſon deſerted, which is ſomething leſs then divorc'd, may lawfully marry again. And having declar'd his Opinion in one caſe, he leaves a further liberty for Chriſtian prudence to determine in caſes of like importance, uſing words ſo plain as are not to be ſhifted off, that a brother or a ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes; adding alſo, that God hath called us to peace in Marriage.

Now if it be plain that a Chriſtian may be brought into unworthy bondage, and his religious peace not onely interrupted now and then, but perpetually and finally hinder'd in Wedlock, by miſ-yoking with a diverſity of Nature as well as of Religion, the reaſons of S. Paul cannot be made ſpecial to that one caſe of Infidelity, but are of equal moment to a Divorce, where-ever Chriſtian Liberty and Peace are without fault equally obſtructed: That the Ordinance which God gave to our comfort, may not be pinn'd upon us to our undeſerved thraldom, to be coop'd up as it were in mockery of Wedlock, to a perpetual betrothed Lonelineſs and Diſcontent, if nothing worſe enſue. There being nought elſe of Marriage left between ſuch but a diſpleaſing and forc'd remedy againſt the ſting of a brute deſire: which fleſhly accuſtoming without the Souls union and commixture of intellectual delight, as it is rather a ſoiling then a fulfilling of Marriage Rites, ſo is it enough to abaſe the mettle of a generous ſpirit, and ſinks him to a low and vulgar pitch of endeavour in all his actions, or (which is worſe) leaves him in a deſpairing plight of abject and hardned thoughts: which condition rather then a good man ſhould fall into, a man uſeful in the ſervice of God and Mankind, Chriſt himſelf hath taught us to diſpence with the moſt ſacred Ordinance of his Worſhip, even for a bodily healing to diſpence with that holy and ſpeculative reſt of Sabbath, much more then with the erroneous obſervance of an ill knotted Marriage, for the ſuſtaining of an overcharged faith and perſeverance.

CHAP. XX.

The meaning of S. Paul, that Charity believeth all things. VVhat is to be ſaid to the Licence which is vainly fear'd will grow hereby. VVhat to thoſe who never have done preſcribing patience in that caſe. The Papiſt moſt ſevere againſt Divorce, yet moſt eaſie to all Licence. Of all the miſeries in Marriage God is to be clear'd, and the faults to be laid on mans unjuſt Laws.

AND though bad cauſes would take licence by this pretext, if that cannot be remedied, upon their Conſcience be it who ſhall ſo do. This was that hardneſs of heart, and abuſe of a good Law, which Moſes was content to ſuffer, rather then good men ſhould not have it at all to uſe needfully. And he who to run after one loſt ſheep left ninety nine of his own flock at random in the wilderneſs, would little perplex his thoughts for the obduring of nine hundred and ninety ſuch as will daily take worſe liberties, whether they have permiſſion or not. To conclude, as without charity God hath given no commandment to men, ſo without it neither can men rightly believe any commandment given. For every act of true Faith, as well that whereby we believe the Law, as that whereby we endeavour the Law, is wrought in us by Charity, according to that in the Divine Hymn of S. Paul, 1 Cor. 13. Charity believeth all things; not as if ſhe were ſo credulous, which is the Expoſition hitherto current, for that were a trivial Praiſe, but to teach us that Charity is the high Governeſs of our Belief, and that we cannot ſafely aſſent to any precept written in the Bible, but as Charity commends it to us. Which agrees with that of the ſame Apoſtle to the Epheſ. 4. 14, 15. where he tells us that the way to get a ſure undoubted knowledge of things, is to hold that for Truth which accords moſt with Charity. Whoſe unerring guidance and conduct having follow'd as a Loadſtar, with all diligence and fidelity in this queſtion, I truſt (through the help of that illuminating Spirit which hath favour'd me) to have done no every days work, in aſſerting after many Ages the words of Chriſt, with other Scriptures of great concernment, from burdenſom and remorſleſs obſcurity, tangled with manifold repugnancies to their native luſtre and conſent between each other; hereby alſo diſſolving tedious and Gordian difficulties, which have hitherto moleſted the Church of God, and are now decided not with the Sword of Alexander but with the immaculate hands of Charity, to the unſpeakable good of Chriſtendom. And let the extreme Literaliſt ſit down now, and revolve whether this in all neceſſity be not the due reſult of our Saviours words; or if he perſiſt to be otherwiſe opinion'd, let him well adviſe, leſt thinking to gripe faſt the Goſpel, he be found inſtead with the Canon Law in his fiſt: whoſe boiſterous Edicts tyrannizing the bleſſed Ordinance of Marriage into the quality of a moſt unnatural and unchriſtianly yoke, have given the fleſh this advantage to hate it, and turn aſide, oft-times unwillingly, to all diſſolute uncleanneſs, even till puniſhment it ſelf is weary and overcome by the incredible frequency of trading Luſt and uncontrolled Adulteries. Yet men whoſe Creed is Cuſtom, I doubt not but will be ſtill endeavouring to hide the ſloth of their own timorous Capacities with this pretext, that for all this 'tis better to endure with patience and ſilence this affliction which God hath ſent. And I agree 'tis true, if this be exhorted and not enjoined; but withal it will be wiſely done to be as ſure as may be, that what mans iniquity hath laid on be not imputed to Gods ſending, leſt under the colour of an affected patience we detain our ſelves at the gulphs mouth of many hideous Temptations, not to be withſtood without proper gifts, which (as Perkins well notes) God gives not ordinarily, no not to moſt earneſt Prayers. Therefore we pray, Lead us not into Temptation; a vain Prayer, if having led our ſelves thither, we love to ſtay in that perilous condition. God ſends remedies as well as evils, under which he who lies and groans, that may lawfully acquit himſelf, is acceſſory to his own ruine; nor will it excuſe him though he ſuffer through a ſluggiſh fearfulneſs to ſearch throughly what is lawful, for fear of diſquieting a ſecure falſity of an old Opinion. Who doubts not but that it may be piouſly ſaid, to him who would diſmiſs his frigidity, Bear your trial, take it as if God would have you live this life of continence? if he exhort this, I hear him as an Angel, though he ſpeak without warrant; but if he would compel me, I know him for Satan. To him who divorces an Adultreſs, Piety might ſay, Pardon her; you may ſhew much mercy, you may win a Soul: yet the Law both of God and Man leaves it freely to him; for God loves not to plow out the heart of our endeavours with over-hard and ſad tasks. God delights not to make a drudge of Vertue, whoſe Actions muſt be all elective and unconſtrained. Forc'd Vertue is as a Bolt over-ſhot, it goes neither forward nor backward, and does no good as it ſtands. Seeing therefore that neither Scripture nor Reaſon hath laid this unjuſt auſterity upon Divorce, we may reſolve that nothing elſe hath wrought it but that letter-bound Servility of the Canon Doctors, ſuppoſing Marriage to be a Sacrament, and out of the art they have to lay unneceſſary burdens upon all men, to make a fair ſhew in the fleſhly obſervance of Matrimony, though Peace and Love with all other conjugal reſpects fare never ſo ill. And indeed the Papiſts, who are the ſtricteſt forbidders of Divorce, are the eaſieſt Libertines to admit of groſſeſt Uncleanneſs; as if they had a deſign, by making Wedlock a ſupportleſs yoke, to violate it moſt, under colour of preſerving it moſt inviolable; and withal delighting (as their myſtery is) to make men the day-labourers of their own afflictions, as if there were ſuch a ſcarcity of miſeries from abroad, that we ſhould be made to melt our choiceſt home Bleſſings, and coin them into Croſſes, for want whereby to hold commerce with patience. If any therefore who ſhall hap to read this Diſcourſe, hath been through miſadventure ill engaged in this contracted evil here complain'd of, and finds the fits and workings of a high impatience frequently upon him, of all thoſe wild words which men in miſery think to eaſe themſelves by uttering, let him not open his lips againſt the Providence of Heaven, or tax the ways of God and his divine Truth; for they are equal, eaſie, and not burdenſome; nor do they ever croſs the juſt and reaſonable deſires of men, nor involve this our portion of mortal life into a neceſſity of ſadneſs and malecontent, by Laws commanding over the unreducible Antipathies of Nature ſooner or later found, but allow us to remedy and ſhake off thoſe evils into which human error hath led us through the midſt of our beſt intentions, and to ſupport our incident extremities by that authentick precept of ſoveraign Charity, whoſe grand commiſſion is to do and to diſpoſe over all the Ordinances of God to Man, that love and truth may advance each other to everlaſting. While we, literally ſuperſtitious through cuſtomary faintneſs of heart, not venturing to pierce with our free thoughts into the full latitude of Nature and Religion, abandon our ſelves to ſerve under the tyranny of uſurp'd Opinions, ſuffering thoſe Ordinances which were allotted to our ſolace and reviving, to trample over us, and hale us into a multitude of ſorrows, which God never meant us. And where he ſets us in a fair allowance of way, with honeſt liberty and prudence to our guard, we never leave ſubtilizing and caſuiſting till we have ſtraitned and pared that liberal path into a Razors edge to walk on, between a precipice of unneceſſary miſchief on either ſide; and ſtarting at every falſe Alarm, we do not know which way to ſet a foot forward with manly confidence and Chriſtian reſolution, through the confuſed ringing in our ears of panick ſcruples and amazements.

CHAP. XXI.

That the matter of Divorce is not to be tried by Law, but by Conſcience, as many other Sins are. The Magiſtrate can only ſee that the condition of Divorce be juſt and equal. The Opinion of Fagius, and the Reaſons of this Aſſertion.

ANother act of Papal encroachment it was, to pluck the power and arbitrement of Divorce from the Maſter of the Family, into whoſe hands God and the Law of all Nations had put it, and Chriſt ſo left it, preaching only to the Conſcience, and not authorizing a Judicial Court to toſs about and divulge the unaccountable and ſecret reaſon of diſaffections between Man and Wife, as a thing moſt improperly anſwerable to any ſuch kind of trial. But the Popes of Rome, perceiving the great Revenue and high Authority it would give them even over Princes, to have the judging and deciding of ſuch a main conſequence in the life of Man as was Divorce, wrought ſo upon the Superſtition of thoſe Ages, as to diveſt them of that right which God from the beginning had entruſted to the Husband: by which means they ſubjected that ancient and naturally domeſtick Prerogative to an external and unbefitting Judicature. For although differences in Divorce about Dowries, Joyntures, and the like, beſides the puniſhing of Adultery, ought not to paſs without referring if, need be, to the Magiſtrate, yet that the abſolute and final hindring of Divorce cannot belong to any civil or earthly power, againſt the will and conſent of both parties, or of the Husband alone, ſome reaſons will be here urg'd as ſhall not need to decline the touch. But firſt I ſhall recite what hath been already yielded by others in favour of this Opinion. Grotius and many more agree, that notwithſtanding what Chriſt ſpake therein to the Conſcience, the Magiſtrate is not thereby enjoyn'd ought againſt the preſervation of civil peace, of equity, and of convenience. Among theſe Fagius is moſt remarkable, and gives the ſame liberty of pronouncing Divorce to the Chriſtian Magiſtrate as the Moſaick had. For whatever (ſaith he) Chriſt ſpake to the regenerate, the Judge hath to deal with the vulgar: if therefore any through hardneſs of heart will not be a tolerable Wife to her Husband, it will be lawful as well now as of old to paſs the bill of Divorce, not by private, but by publick authority. Nor doth Man ſeparate them then, but God by his Law of Divorce given by Moſes. What can hinder the Magiſtrate from ſo doing, to whoſe government all outward things are ſubject, to ſeparate and remove from perpetual vexation, and no ſmall danger, thoſe bodies whoſe minds are already ſeparate; it being his office to procure peaceable and convenient living in the Commonwealth; and being as certain alſo, that they ſo neceſſarily ſeparated cannot all receive a ſingle life? And this I obſerve, that our Divines do generally condemn ſeparation of bed and board, without the liberty of ſecond choice: if that therefore in ſome caſes be moſt purely neceſſary, as who ſo blockiſh to deny? then is this alſo as needful. Thus far by others is already well ſtept, to inform us that Divorce is not a matter of Law but of Charity: if there remain a furlong yet to end the queſtion, theſe following reaſons may ſerve to gain it with any apprehenſion not too unlearned or too wayward. Firſt becauſe oft times the cauſes of ſeeking Divorce reſide ſo deeply in the radical and innocent affections of Nature, as is not within the dioceſe of Law to tamper with. Other relations may aptly enough be held together by a civil and vertuous love: but the duties of Man and Wife are ſuch as are chiefly converſant in that love, which is moſt ancient and meerly natural, whoſe two prime ſtatutes are to joyn it ſelf to that which is good, and acceptable, and friendly; and to turn aſide and depart from what is diſagreeable, diſpleaſing, and unlike: of the two this later is the ſtrongeſt, and moſt equal to be regarded; for although a Man may often be unjuſt in ſeeking that which he loves, yet he can never be unjuſt or blameable in retiring from his endleſs trouble and diſtaſte, whenas his tarrying can redound to no true content on either ſide. Hate is of all things the mightieſt divider, nay it is diviſion it ſelf. To couple hatred therefore, though wedlock try all her golden links, and borrow to her aid all the iron manacles and fetters of Law, it does but ſeek to twiſt a rope of ſand, which was a task they ſay that pos'd the Devil: and that ſluggiſh fiend in hell, Ocnus, whom the Poems tell us of, brought his idle cordage to as good effect, which never ſerv'd to bind with, but to feed the Aſs that ſtood at his elbow. And that the reſtrictive Law againſt Divorce attains as little to bind any thing truly in a disjoynted Marriage, or to keep it bound, but ſerves only to feed the ignorance and definitive impertinence of a doltiſh Canon, were no abſurd alluſion. To hinder therefore thoſe deep and ſerious regreſſes of Nature in a reaſonable ſoul, parting from that miſtaken help which he juſtly ſeeks in a perſon created for him, recollecting himſelf from an unmeet help which was never meant, and to detain him by compulſion in ſuch an unpredeſtin'd miſery as this, is in a diameter againſt both Nature and Inſtitution: but to interpoſe a Juriſdictive Power over the inward and irremediable diſpoſition of Man, to command love and ſympathy, to forbid diſlike againſt the guiltleſs inſtinct of Nature, is not within the Province of any Law to reach, and were indeed an uncommodious rudeneſs, not a juſt power: for that Law may bandy with Nature, and traverſe her ſage motions, was an error in Callicles the Rhetorician, whom Socrates from high principles confutes in Plato's Gorgias. If therefore Divorce may be ſo natural, and that Law and Nature are not to go contrary; then to forbid Divorce compulſively, is not only againſt Nature, but againſt Law.

Next, it muſt be remembred that all Law is for ſome good that may be frequently attain'd, without the admixture of a worſe inconvenience; and therefore many groſs faults, as ingratitude and the like, which are too far within the ſoul to be cur'd by conſtraint of Law, are left only to be wrought on by conſcience and perſuaſion. Which made Ariſtotle in the 10th of his Ethicks to Nicomachus, aim at a kind of diviſion of Law into private or perſuaſive, and publick or compulſive. Hence it is that the Law forbidding Divorce, never attains to any good end of ſuch Prohibition, but rather multiplies evil. For if Nature's reſiſtleſs ſway in love or hate be once compell'd, it grows careleſs of it ſelf, vitious, uſeleſs to friends, unſerviceable and ſpiritleſs to the Commonwealth. Which Moſes rightly foreſaw, and all wiſe Lawgivers that ever knew Man, what kind of creature he was. The Parliament alſo and Clergy of England were not ignorant of this, when they conſented that Harry the 8th might put away his Queen Anne of Cleve, whom he could not like after he had been wedded half a year; unleſs it were that contrary to the Proverb, they made a neceſſity of that which might have been a vertue in them to do: for even the freedom and eminence of Man's creation gives him to be a Law in this matter to himſelf, being the head of the other ſex which was made for him; whom therefore though he ought not to injure, yet neither ſhould he be forc'd to retain in ſociety to his own overthrow, nor to hear any Judge therein above himſelf. It being alſo an unſeemly affront to the ſequeſtr'd and vail'd modeſty of that Sex, to have her unpleaſingneſs and other concealments bandied up and down, and aggravated in open Court by thoſe hir'd maſters of Tongue-fence. Such uncomely exigencies it befell no leſs a Majeſty than Henry the VIII. to be reduc'd to, who finding juſt reaſon in his conſcience to forgo his brothers Wife, after many indignities of being deluded, and made a boy of by thoſe two Cardinal Judges, was conſtrain'd at laſt, for want of other proof that ſhe had been carnally known by Prince Arthur, even to uncover the nakedneſs of that vertuous Lady, and to recite openly the obſcene evidence of his Brother's Chamberlain. Yet it pleas'd God to make him ſee all the Tyranny of Rome, by diſcovering this which they exercis'd over Divorce, and to make him the beginner of a Reformation to this whole Kingdom, by firſt aſſerting into his familiary Power the right of juſt Divorce. 'Tis true, an Adultreſs cannot be ſham'd enough by any publick proceeding; but the Woman whoſe honour is not impeach'd, is leſs injur'd by a ſilent diſmiſſion, being otherwiſe not liberally dealt with, then to endure a clamouring debate of utterleſs things, in a buſineſs of that civil ſecrecy and difficult diſcerning, as not to be over-much queſtion'd by neareſt friends. Which drew that anſwer from the greateſt and worthieſt Roman of his time, Paulus Emilius, being demanded why he would put away his Wife for no viſible reaſon? This Shoo (ſaid he, and held it out on his foot) is a neat ſhoo, a new ſhoo, and yet none of you know where it wrings me: much leſs by the unfamiliar cognizance of a fee'd Gameſter can ſuch a private difference be examin'd, neither ought it.

Again, if Law aim at the firm eſtabliſhment and preſervation of matrimonial faith, we know that cannot thrive under violent means, but is the more violated. Is it not when two unfortunately met are by the Canon forc'd to draw in that yoke an unmerciful days work of ſorrow till death unharneſs 'em, that then the Law keeps Marriage moſt unviolated and unbroken? but when the Law takes order that Marriage be accountant and reſponſible to perform that ſociety, whether it be religious, civil, or corporal, which may be conſcionably requir'd and claim'd therein, or elſe to be diſſolv'd if it cannot be undergone. This is to make Marriage moſt indiſſoluble, by making it a juſt and equal dealer, a performer of thoſe due helps which inſtituted the Covenant, being otherwiſe a moſt unjuſt contract, and no more to be maintain'd under tuition of Law then the vileſt fraud, or cheat, or theft that may be committed. But becauſe this is ſuch a ſecret kind of fraud or theft, as cannot be diſcern'd by Law, but only by the Plaintiff himſelf; therefore to divorce was never counted a political or civil offence neither to Jew nor Gentile, nor by any Judicial intendment of Chriſt, further then could be diſcern'd to tranſgreſs the allowance of Moſes, which was of neceſſity ſo large, that it doth all one as if it ſent back the matter undeterminable at Law, and intractable by rough dealing, to have inſtructions and admonitions beſtow'd about it by them whoſe ſpiritual office is to adjure and to denounce, and ſo left to the Conſcience. The Law can only appoint the juſt and equal conditions of Divorce, and is to look how it is an injury to the divorc'd, which in truth it can be none, as a meer ſeparation; for if ſhe conſent, wherein has the Law to right her? or conſent not, then is it either juſt, and ſo deſerved; or if unjuſt, ſuch in all likelihood was the Divorcer: and to part from an unjuſt Man is a happineſs, and no injury to be lamented. But ſuppoſe it to be an injury, the Law is not able to amend it, unleſs ſhe think it other then a miſerable redreſs to return back from whence ſhe was expell'd, or but intreated to be gone, or elſe to live apart ſtill married without Marriage, a married Widow. Laſt, if it be to chaſten the Divorcer, what Law puniſhes a deed which is not moral but natural, a deed which cannot certainly be found to be an injury? or how can it be puniſh'd by prohibiting the Divorce, but that the Innocent muſt equally partake both in the ſhame and in the ſmart? So that which way ſoever we look, the Law can to no rational purpoſe forbid Divorce, it can only take care that the conditions of Divorce be not injurious. Thus then we ſee the trial of Law how impertinent it is to this queſtion of Divorce, how helpleſs next, and then how hurtful.

CHAP. XXII.

The laſt Reaſon why Divorce is not to be reſtrained in Law, it being againſt the Law of Nature and of Nations. The larger proof whereof referred to Mr. Selden's Book De Jure Naturali & Gentium. An Objection of Paræus anſwered. How it ought to be ordered by the Church. That this will not breed any worſe inconvenience, nor ſo bad as is now ſuffered.

THerefore the laſt Reaſon why it ſhould not be, is the example we have, not only from the nobleſt and wiſeſt Commonwealths, guided by the cleareſt light of humane knowledge, but alſo from the Divine Teſtimonies of God himſelf, lawgiving in perſon to a ſanctified people. That all this is true, whoſo deſires to know at large with leaſt pains, and expects not over-long rehearſals of that which is by others already ſo judiciouſly gather'd, let him haſten to be acquainted with that noble Volum written by our Learned Selden, Of the Law of Nature and Nations, a Work more uſeful and more worthy to be perus'd by whoſoever ſtudies to be a great Man in wiſdom, equity, and juſtice, than all thoſe Decretals and ſumleſs Sums, which the Pontifical Clerks have doted on, ever ſince that unfortunate Mother famouſly ſinn'd thrice, and died impenitent of her bringing into the World thoſe two misbegotten Infants, and for ever Infants, Lombard and Gratian, him the Compiler of Canon iniquity, t'other the Tubalcain of Scholaſtick Sophiſtry, whoſe overſpreading Barbariſm hath not only infus'd their own baſtardy upon the fruitfulleſt part of humane Learning, not only diſſipated and dejected the clear light of Nature in us, and of Nations, but hath tainted alſo the fountains of Divine Doctrine, and render'd the pure and ſolid Law of God unbeneficial to us by their calumnious Dunceries. Yet this Law which their unskilfulneſs hath made liable to all ignominy, the purity and wiſdom of this Law ſhall be the buckler of our diſpute. Liberty of Divorce we claim not, we think not but from this Law; the dignity, the faith, the authority thereof is now grown among Chriſtians, O aſtoniſhment! a labour of no mean difficulty and envy to defend. That it ſhould not be counted a faltring diſpence, a flattering permiſſion of ſin, the bill of Adultery, a ſnare, is the expence of all this Apology. And all that we ſolicit is, that it may be ſuffered to ſtand in the place where God ſet it, amidſt the Firmament of his holy Laws, to ſhine, as it was wont, upon the weakneſſes and errors of Men, periſhing elſe in the ſincerity of their honeſt purpoſes: for certain there is no memory of Whoredoms and Adulteries left among us now, when this warranted freedom of Gods own giving is made dangerous and diſcarded for a ſcrole of licence. It muſt be your ſuffrages and votes, O Engliſhmen, that this exploded Decree of God and Moſes may ſcape and come off fair, without the cenſure of a ſhameful abrogating: which, if yonder Sun ride ſure, and means not to break word with us to morrow, was never yet abrogated by our Saviour. Give ſentence, if you pleaſe, that the frivolus Canon may reverſe the infallible judgment of Moſes and his great Director. Or if it be the Reformed Writers whoſe Doctrine perſuades this rather, their Reaſons I dare affirm are all ſilenc'd, unleſs it be only this. Paraeus on the Corinthians would prove that hardneſs of heart in Divorce is no more now to be permitted, but to be amerc'd with Fine and Impriſonment. I am not willing to diſcover the forgettings of Reverend men, yet here I muſt: What article or clauſe of the whole new Covenant can Paraeus bring to exaſperate the Judicial Law, upon any infirmity under the Goſpel? (I ſay infirmity, for if it were the high hand of ſin, the Law as little would have endur'd it as the Goſpel) it would not ſtretch to the dividing of an Inheritance; it refus'd to condemn Adultery, not that theſe things ſhould not be done at Law, but to ſhew that the Goſpel hath not the leaſt influence upon Judicial Courts, much leſs to make them ſharper and more heavy, leaſt of all to arraign before a Temporal Judge that which the Law without Summons acquitted. But (ſaith he) the Law was the time of youth, under violent affections; the Goſpel in us is mature age, and ought to ſubdue affections. True, and ſo ought the Law too, if they be found inordinate, and not meerly natural and blameleſs. Next I diſtinguiſh, that the time of the Law is compar'd to Youth and Pupillage in reſpect of the Ceremonial part, which led the Jews as children through corporal and gariſh rudiments, until the fulneſs of time ſhould reveal to them the higher leſſons of Faith and Redemption. This is not meant of the moral part, therein it ſoberly concern'd them not to be Babies, but to be Men in good earneſt: the ſad and awful Majeſty of that Law was not to be jeſted with: to bring a bearded Nonage with laſcivious Diſpenſations before that Throne, had been a lewd affront, as it is now a groſs miſtake. But what Diſcipline is this, Paræus, to nouriſh violent affections in Youth, by cockering and wanton Indulgences, and to chaſtiſe them in mature age with a boyiſh rod of correction? How much more coherent is it to Scripture, that the Law as a ſtrict Schoolmaſter ſhould have puniſh'd every treſpaſs without indulgence ſo baneful to Youth, and that the Goſpel ſhould now correct that by admonition and reproof only, in free and mature Age, which was puniſh'd with ſtripes in the childhood and bondage of the Law. What therefore it allow'd then ſo fairly, much leſs is to be whipp'd now, eſpecially in Penal Courts: and if it ought now to trouble the Conſcience, why did that angry accuſer and condemner Law reprieve it? So then, neither from Moſes nor from Chriſt hath the Magiſtrate any authority to proceed againſt it. But what, ſhall then the diſpoſal of that power return again to the Maſter of a Family? Wherefore not, ſince God there put it, and the preſumptuous Canon thence bereft it? This only muſt be provided, that the ancient manner be obſerv'd in the preſence of the Miniſter and other grave ſelected Elders, who after they ſhall have admoniſh'd and preſs'd upon him the words of our Saviour, and he ſhall have proteſted in the Faith of the eternal Goſpel, and the hope he has of happy Reſurrection, that otherwiſe than thus he cannot do, and thinks himſelf and this his caſe not contain'd in that Prohibition of Divorce which Chriſt pronounc'd, the matter not being of malice, but of nature, and ſo not capable of reconciling; to conſtrain him further were to unchriſten him, to unman him, to throw the Mountain of Sinai upon him, with the weight of the whole Law to boot, flat againſt the liberty and eſſence of the Goſpel, and yet nothing available either to the ſanctity of Marriage, the good of Husband, Wife, or Children, nothing profitable either to Church or Commonwealth, but hurtful and pernicious to all theſe reſpects. But this will bring in confuſion: yet theſe cautious miſtruſters might conſider, that what they thus object lights not upon this Book, but upon that which I engage againſt them, the Book of God and Moſes, with all the wiſdom and providence which had forecaſt the worſt of confuſion that could ſucceed, and yet thought fit of ſuch a permiſſion. But let them be of good cheer, it wrought ſo little diſorder among the Jews, that from Moſes till after the Captivity, not one of the Prophets thought it worth the rebuking; for that of Malachy well look'd into will appear to be not againſt divorcing, but rather againſt keeping ſtrange Concubines, to the vexation of their Hebrew Wives. If therefore we Chriſtians may be thought as good and tractable as the Jews were, and certainly the Prohibiters of Divorce preſume us to be better, then leſs confuſion is to be fear'd for this among us than was among them. If we be worſe, or but as bad, which lamentable examples confirm we are, then have we more, or at leaſt as much, need of this permitted Law, as they to whom God therefore gave it (as they ſay) under a harſher Covenant. Let not therefore the frailty of man go on thus inventing needleſs troubles to it ſelf, to groan under the falſe imagination of a ſtrictneſs never impos'd from above; enjoining that for duty which is an impoſſible and vain ſupererogating. Be not righteous overmuch, is the counſel of Eccleſiaſtes; why ſhouldſt thou deſtroy thy ſelf? Let us not be thus over-curious to ſtrain at atoms, and yet to ſtop every vent and cranny of permiſſive liberty, leſt Nature wanting thoſe needful pores and breathing places which God hath not debarr'd our weakneſs, either ſuddenly break out into ſome wide rupture of open Vice and frantick Hereſie, or elſe inwardly feſter with repining and blaſphemous thoughts, under an unreaſonable and fruitleſs rigor of unwarranted Law. Againſt which evils nothing can more beſeem the Religion of the Church, or the Wiſdom of the State, then to conſider timely and provide. And in ſo doing let them not doubt but they ſhall vindicate the miſreputed Honour of God and his great Lawgiver, by ſuffering him to give his own Laws according to the condition of mans nature beſt known to him, without the unſufferable imputation of diſpenſing legally with many ages of ratified Adultery. They ſhall recover the miſattended words of Chriſt to the ſincerity of their true ſenſe from manifold Contradictions, and ſhall open them with the key of Charity. Many helpleſs Chriſtians they ſhall raiſe from the depth of ſadneſs and diſtreſs, utterly unfitted as they are to ſerve God or Man: many they ſhall reclaim from obſcure and giddy Sects, many regain from diſſolute and brutiſh Licence, many from deſperate hardneſs, if ever that were juſtly pleaded. They ſhall ſet free many Daughters of Iſrael, not wanting much of her ſad plight whom Satan had bound eighteen years. Man they ſhall reſtore to his juſt Dignity and Prerogative in Nature, preferring the Souls free peace before the promiſcuous draining of a carnal rage. Marriage from a perillous hazard and ſnare, they ſhall reduce to be a more certain haven and retirement of happy Society; when they ſhall judge according to God and Moſes, and how not then according to Chriſt? when they ſhall judge it more wiſdom and goodneſs to break that Covenant ſeemingly, and keep it really, then compulſion of Law to keep it ſeemingly, and by compulſion of blameleſs Nature to break it really, at leaſt if it were ever truly join'd. The vigor of Diſcipline they may then turn with better ſucceſs upon the proſtitute looſneſs of the times, when men finding in themſelves the infirmities of former Ages, ſhall not be conſtrain'd above the gift of God in them, to unprofitable and impoſſible Obſervances, never required from the civileſt, the wiſeſt, the holieſt Nations, whoſe other Excellencies in moral vertue they never yet could equal. Laſt of all, to thoſe whoſe mind is ſtill to maintain textual reſtriction, whereof the bare ſound cannot conſiſt ſometimes with Humanity, much leſs with Charity, I would ever anſwer by putting them in remembrance of a command above all commands, which they ſeem to have forgot, and who ſpake it; in compariſon whereof, this which they ſo exalt is but a petty and ſubordinate Precept. Let them go therefore with whom I am loth to couple them, yet they will needs run into the ſame blindneſs with the Phariſees; let them go therefore and conſider well what this leſſon means, I will have mercy and not ſacrifice; for on that ſaying all the Law and Prophets depend, much more the Goſpel, whoſe end and excellence is mercy and peace: or if they cannot learn that, how will they hear this? which yet I ſhall not doubt to leave with them as a Concluſion, That God the Son hath put all other things under his own feet, but his Commandments he hath left all under the feet of Charity.

To the Parlament.

THAT which I knew to be the part of a good Magiſtrate, aiming at true liberty through the right information of religious and civil life, and that which I ſaw, and was partaker of, your Vows and ſolemn Cov'nants, Parlament of England, your actions alſo manifeſtly tending to exalt the Truth, and to depreſs the tyranny of Error, and ill Cuſtom, with more conſtancy and proweſſe then ever yet any, ſince that Parlament which put the firſt Scepter of this Kingdom into his hand whom God and extraordinary Vertue made their Monarch, were the cauſes that mov'd me, one elſe not placing much in the eminence of a Dedication, to preſent your high notice with a Diſcourſe, conſcious to it ſelf of nothing more then of diligence, and firm affection to the publick good. And that ye took it ſo as wiſe and impartial men, obtaining ſo great power and dignitie, are wont to accept, in matters both doubtful and important, what they think offer'd them well meant, and from a rational ability, I had no leſs then to perſwade me. And on that perſwaſion am returned, as to a famous and free port, my ſelf alſo bound by more then a maritime Law, to expoſe as freely what fraughtage I conceave to bring of no trifles. For although it be generally known, how and by whom ye have been inſtigated to a hard cenſure of that former book entitl'd, The Doctrine and Diſcipline of Divorce, an opinion held by ſome of the beſt among reformed Writers without ſcandal or confutement, tho now thought new and dangerous by ſome of our ſevere Gnoſtics, whoſe little reading, and leſs meditating holds ever with hardeſt obſtinacy that which it took up with eaſieſt credulity; I do not find yet that ought, for the furious incitements which have been us'd, hath iſſu'd by your appointment, that might give the leaſt interruption or diſrepute either to the Author, or to the Book. Which he who will be better adviſ'd then to call your neglect, or connivence at a thing imagin'd ſo perilous, can attribute it to nothing more juſtly, then to the deep and quiet ſtream of your direct and calm deliberations, that gave not way either to the fervent raſhneſs, or the immaterial gravity of thoſe who ceas'd not to exaſperate without cauſe. For which uprightneſs and incorrupt refuſal of what ye were incens'd to, Lords and Commons, ( though it were don to juſtice, not to me, and was a peculiar demonſtration how far your ways are different from the raſh vulgar ) beſides thoſe allegiances of Oath and Duty, which are my public debt to your public Labours, I have yet a ſtore of gratitude laid up, which cannot be exhauſted ; and ſuch thanks perhaps they may live to be, as ſhall more then whiſper to the next ages. Yet that the Author may be known to ground himſelf upon his own innocence, and the merit of his cauſe, not upon the favour of a diverſion, or a delay to any juſt cenſure, but wiſhes rather he might ſee thoſe his detracters at any fair meeting, as learned debatements are privileg'd with a due freedom under equal Moderators, I ſhall here briefly ſingle one of them ( becauſe he hath oblig'd me to it ) who I perſwade me having ſcarſe read the book, nor knowing him who writ it, or at leaſt faining the latter, hath not forborn to ſcandalize him, unconferr'd with, unadmoniſht, undealt with by any Paſtorly or brotherly convincement, in the moſt open and invective manner, and at the moſt bitter opportunity that drift or ſet deſign could have invented. And this, when as the Canon Law, though commonly moſt favouring the boldneſs of their Prieſts, puniſhes the naming or traducing of any perſon in the Pulpit, was by him made no ſcruple. If I ſhall therefore take licence by the right of nature, and that liberty wherein I was born, to defend my ſelf publicly againſt a printed Calumny, and do willingly appeal to thoſe Judges to whom I am accus'd, it can be no immoderate, or unallowable courſe of ſeeking ſo juſt and needful reparations. Which I had don long ſince, had not theſe employments, which are now viſible, deferr'd me. It was preacht before ye, Lords and Commons, in Auguſt laſt upon a ſpecial day of Humiliation, that there was a wicked Book abroad, and ye were taxt of ſin that it was yet uncenſur'd, the Book deſerving to be burnt ; and Impudence alſo was charg'd upon the Author, who durſt ſet his name to it, and dedicate it to your ſelves. Firſt, Lords and Commons, I pray to that God, before whom ye then were proſtrate, ſo to forgive ye thoſe omiſſions and treſpaſſes, which ye deſire moſt ſhould find forgivneſs, as I ſhall ſoon ſhew to the World how eaſily ye abſolve your ſelves of that which this man calls your Sin, and is indeed your Wiſdom, and your Nobleneſs, whereof to this day ye have don well not to repent. He terms it a wicked Book, and why but for allowing other Cauſes of Divorce, then Chriſt and his Apoſtles mention ? and with the ſame cenſure condemns of wickedneſs not only Martin Bucer, that elect Inſtrument of Reformation, highly honour'd and had in reverence by Edward the ſixth, and his whole Parlament, whom alſo I had publiſht in Engliſh by a good providence, about a week before this calumnious digreſſion was preach'd ; ſo that if he knew not Bucer then, as he ought to have known, he might at leaſt have known him ſome months after, ere the Sermon came in print, wherein notwithſtanding he perſiſts in his former ſentence, and condemns again of wickedneſs, either ignorantly or wilfully, not only Martin Bucer, and all the choiſeſt and holieſt of our Reformers, but the whole Parlament and Church of England in thoſe beſt and pureſt times of Edward the ſixth. All which I ſhall prove with good evidence, at the end of theſe Explanations. And then let it be judg'd and ſeriouſly conſider'd with what hope the affairs of our Religion are committed to one among others, who hath now only left him which of the twain he will chooſe, whether this ſhall be his palpable ignorance, or the ſame wickedneſs of his own Book, which he ſo laviſhly imputes to the writings of other men : and whether this of his, that thus peremptorily defames and attaints of wickedneſs unſpotted Churches, unblemiſht Parlaments, and the moſt eminent Reſtorers of Chriſtian Doctrine, deſerve not to be burnt firſt. And if his heat had burſt out only againſt the Opinion, his wonted paſſion had no doubt bin ſilently born with wonted patience. But ſince, againſt the charity of that ſolemn place and meeting, it ſerv'd him furder to inveigh opprobriouſly againſt the perſon, branding him with no leſs then impudence, only for ſetting his name to what he had writt'n, I muſt be excus'd not to be ſo wanting to the defence of an honeſt Name, or to the reputation of thoſe good Men who afford me their ſociety, but to be ſenſible of ſuch a foul endeavour'd diſgrace : not knowing ought either in mine own deſerts, or the Laws of this Land, why I ſhould be ſubject, in ſuch a notorious and illegal manner, to the intemperances of this mans preaching choler. And indeed to be ſo prompt and ready in the midſt of his humbleneſs, to toſs reproaches of this bulk and ſize, argues as if they were the weapons of his exerciſe, I am ſure not of his Miniſtery, or of that days work. Certainly to ſubſcribe my name at what I was to own, was what the State had order'd and requires. And he who liſts not to be malicious, would call it ingenuity, clear conſcience, willingneſs to avouch what might be queſtion'd, or to be better inſtructed. And if God were ſo diſpleas'd with thoſe, Iſa. 58. who on the ſolemn faſt were wont to ſmite with the fiſt of wickedneſs, it could be no ſign of his own humiliation accepted, which diſpos'd him to ſmite ſo keenly with a reviling tongue. But if only to have writ my name muſt be counted impudence, how doth this but juſtifie another, who might affirm with as good warrant, that the late Diſcourſe of Scripture and Reaſon, which is certain to be chiefly his own draught, was publiſht without a name, out of baſe fear, and the ſly avoidance of what might follow to his detriment, if the party at Court ſhould hap to reach him? And I, to have ſet my name, where he accuſes me to have ſet it, am ſo far from recanting, that I offer my hand alſo if need be, to make good the ſame opinion which I there maintain, by inevitable conſequences drawn parallel from his own principal arguments in that of Scripture and Reaſon: which I ſhall pardon him, if he can deny, without ſhaking his own compoſition to pieces. The impudence therefore, ſince he waigh'd ſo little what a groſs revile that was to give his equal, I ſend him back again for a phylactery to ſtitch upon his arrogance, that cenſures not only before conviction ſo bitterly without ſo much as one reaſon giv'n, but cenſures the Congregation of his Governors to their faces, for not being ſo haſty as himſelf to cenſure.

And whereas my other crime is, that I addreſs'd the Dedication of what I had ſtudied, to the Parlament, how could I better declare the loyalty which I owe to that ſupreme and majeſtick Tribunal, and the opinion which I have of the high-entruſted judgment, and perſonal worth aſſembl'd in that place? With the ſame affections therefore, and the ſame addicted fidelity, Parlament of England, I here again have brought to your peruſal on the ſame argument theſe following Expoſitions of Scripture. The former book, as pleas'd ſome to think, who were thought judicious, had of reaſon in it to a ſufficiency; what they requir'd, was that the Scriptures there alleg'd might be diſcuſs'd more fully. To their deſires, thus much furder hath been labour'd in the Scriptures. Another ſort alſo who wanted more autorities, and citations, have not been here unthought of. If all this attain not to ſatisfie them, as I am confident that none of thoſe our great controverſies at this day hath had a more demonſtrative explaining, I muſt confeſs to admire what it is, for doubtleſs it is not reaſon now adays that ſatisfies, or ſuborns the common credence of men, to yield ſo eaſily, and grow ſo vehement in matters much more diſputable, and far leſs conducing to the daily good and peace of life. Some whoſe neceſſary ſhifts have long enur'd them to cloak the defects of their unſtudied years, and hatred now to learn, under the appearance of a grave ſolidity, which eſtimation they have gain'd among weak perceivers, find the eaſe of ſlighting what they cannot refute, and are determin'd, as I hear, to hold it not worth the anſwering. In which number I muſt be forc'd to reck'n that Doctor, who in a late equivocating Treatiſe plauſibly ſet afloat againſt the Dippers, diving the while himſelf with a more deep prelatical malignance againſt the preſent State and Church-government, mentions with ignominy the Tractate of Divorce; yet anſwers nothing, but inſtead thereof (for which I do not commend his marſhalling) ſets Moſes alſo among the crew of his Anabaptiſts, as one who to a holy Nation, the Common-wealth of Iſrael, gave Laws breaking the bonds of Marriage to inordinate luſt. Theſe are no mean ſurges of blaſphemy, not only dipping Moſes the divine Lawgiver, but daſhing with a high hand againſt the juſtice and purity of God himſelf; as theſe enſuing Scriptures plainly and freely handl'd ſhall verifie to the launcing of that old apoſtemated error. Him therefore I leave now to his repentance.

Others, which is their courteſie, confeſs that wit and parts may do much to make that ſeem true which is not (as was objected to Socrates by them who could not reſiſt his efficacy, that he ever made the worſe cauſe ſeem the better) and thus thinking themſelves diſcharg'd of the difficulty, love not to wade furder into the fear of a convincement. Theſe will be their excuſes to decline the full examining of this ſerious point. So much the more I preſs it and repeat it, Lords and Commons, that ye beware while time is, ere this grand ſecret, and only art of ignorance affecting tyranny, grow powerful, and rule among us. For if ſound argument and reaſon ſhall be thus put off, either by an undervaluing ſilence, or the maſterly cenſure of a rayling word or two in the Pulpit, or by rejecting the force of truth, as the meer cunning of Eloquence and Sophiſtry, what can be the end of this, but that all good learning and knowledge will ſuddenly decay? Ignorance, and illiterate preſumption, which is yet but our diſeaſe, will turn at length into our very conſtitution, and prove the hectic evil of this age: worſe to be fear'd, if it get once to reign over us, than any fiſt Monarchy. If this ſhall be the courſe, that what was wont to be a chief commendation, and the ground of other mens confidence in an Author, his diligence, his learning, his elocution whether by right, or by ill meaning granted him, ſhall be turn'd now to a diſadvantage and ſuſpicion againſt him, that what he writes, though unconfuted, muſt therefore be miſtruſted, therefore not receiv'd for the induſtry, the exactneſs, the labour in it, confeſs'd to be more then ordinary; as if wiſdom had now forſak'n the thirſty and laborious inquirer to dwell againſt her nature with the arrogant and ſhallow babler, to what purpoſe all thoſe pains and that continual ſearching requir'd of us by Solomon to the attainment of underſtanding; why are men bred up with ſuch care and expence to a life of perpetual ſtudies, why do your ſelves with ſuch endeavour ſeek to wipe off the imputation of intending to diſcourage the progreſs and advance of learning? He therefore whoſe heart can bear him to the high pitch of your noble enterpriſes, may eaſily aſſure himſelf that the prudence and far-judging circumſpectneſs of ſo grave a Magiſtracy ſitting in Parlament, who have before them the prepar'd and purpos'd Act of their moſt religious predeceſſors to imitate in this queſtion, cannot reject the clearneſs of theſe reaſons, and theſe allegations both here and formerly offer'd them; nor can over-look the neceſſity of ordaining more wholſomly and more humanly in the caſualties of Divorce, then our Laws have yet eſtabliſht: if the moſt urgent and exceſſive grievances hapning in domeſtick life, be worth the laying to heart, which, unleſs Charity be far from us, cannot be neglected. And that theſe things both in the right conſtitution, and in the right reformation of a Common-wealth call for ſpeedieſt redreſs, and ought to be the firſt conſider'd, anough was urg'd in what was prefac'd to that monument of Bucer which I brought to your remembrance, and the other time before. Henceforth, except new cauſe be giv'n, I ſhall ſay leſs and leſs. For if the Law make not timely proviſion, let the Law, as reaſon is, bear the cenſure of thoſe conſequences, which her own default now more evidently produces. And if men want manlineſs to expoſtulate the right of their due ranſom, and to ſecond their own occaſions, they may ſit hereafter and bemoan themſelves to have neglected through faintneſs the only remedy of their ſufferings, which a ſeaſonable and well-grounded ſpeaking might have purchas'd them. And perhaps in time to come, others will know how to eſteem what is not every day put into their hands, when they have markt events, and better weigh'd how hurtful and unwiſe it is, to hide a ſecret and pernicious rupture under the ill counſel of a baſhful ſilence. But who would diſtruſt ought, or not be ample in his hopes of your wiſe and Chriſtian determinations? who have the prudence to conſider, and ſhould have the goodneſs like Gods, as ye are call'd, to find out readily, and by juſt Law to adminiſter thoſe redreſſes which have of old, not without God ordaining, bin granted to the adverſities of mankind, ere they who needed, were put to ask. Certainly, if any other have enlarg'd his thoughts to expect from this Government ſo juſtly undertak'n, and by frequent aſſiſtances from Heaven ſo apparently upheld, glorious changes and renovations both in Church and State, he among the formoſt might be nam'd, who prays that the fate of England may tarry for no other Deliverers.

Expoſitions upon the four chief Places in Scripture which treat of Marriage, or Nullities in Marriage.

Gen. I. 27.

So God created Man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

28. And God bleſſed them, and God ſaid unto them, Be fruitful, &c.

Gen. II. 18.

And the Lord God ſaid, It is not good that Man ſhould be alone, I will make him a help meet for him.

23. And Adam ſaid, This is now bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh; ſhe ſhall be called Woman, becauſe ſhe was taken out of Man.

24. Therefore ſhall a Man leave his Father and his Mother, and ſhall cleave unto his Wife, and they ſhall be one fleſh.

Gen. I. 27.

SO God created Man in his own image.] To be inform'd aright in the whole Hiſtory of Marriage, that we may know for certain, not by a forc'd yoke, but by an impartial definition, what Marriage is, and what is not Marriage; it will undoubtedly be ſafeſt, faireſt, and moſt with our obedience, to enquire, as our Saviours direction is, how it was in the beginning. And that we begin ſo high as Man created after Gods own Image, there want not earneſt cauſes. For nothing now adays is more degenerately forgott'n, then the true dignity of Man, almoſt in every reſpect, but eſpecially in this prime inſtitution of Matrimony, wherein his native pre-eminence ought moſt to ſhine. Although if we conſider that juſt and natural privileges men neither can rightly ſeek, nor dare fully claim, unleſs they be ally'd to inward goodneſs, and ſtedfaſt knowledge, and that the want of this quells them to a ſervile ſenſe of their own conſcious unworthineſs, it may ſave the wondring why in this age many are ſo oppoſite both to humane and to Chriſtian liberty, either while they underſtand not, or envy others that do; contenting, or rather priding themſelves in a ſpecious humility and ſtrictneſs bred out of low ignorance, that never yet conceiv'd the freedom of the Goſpel; and is therefore by the Apoſtle to the Coloſſians rankt with no better company, then Will-worſhip and the meer ſhew of wiſdom. And how injurious herein they are, if not to themſelves, yet to their neighbours, and not to them only, but to the all-wiſe and bounteous Grace offer'd us in our redemption, will orderly appear.

In the Image of God created he him.] It is enough determin'd, that this Image of God wherein Man was created, is meant Wiſdom, Purity, Juſtice, and Rule over all creatures. All which being loſt in Adam, was recover'd with gain by the merits of Chriſt. For albeit our firſt parent had Lordſhip over Sea, and Land, and Air, yet there was a Law without him, as a guard ſet over him. But Chriſt having cancell'd the hand-writing of Ordinances which was againſt us, Coloſſ. 2. 14. and interpreted the fulfilling of all through charity, hath in that reſpect ſet us over Law, in the free cuſtody of his love, and left us victorious under the guidance of his living Spirit, not under the dead letter; to follow that which moſt edifies, moſt aids and furders a religious life, makes us holieſt and likeſt to his immortal Image, not that which makes us moſt conformable and captive to civil and ſubordinat precepts; whereof the ſtricteſt obſervance may oft-times prove the deſtruction not only of many innocent perſons and families, but of whole Nations. Although indeed no Ordinance humane or from heav'n can bind againſt the good of Man; ſo that to keep them ſtrictly againſt that end, is all one with to break them. Men of moſt renowned vertue have ſometimes by tranſgreſſing, moſt truly kept the Law; and wiſeſt Magiſtrates have permitted and diſpenc'd it; while they lookt not peeviſhly at the letter, but with a greater ſpirit at the good of mankind, if always not writt'n in the characters of Law, yet engrav'n in the heart of Man by a divine impreſſion. This Heathens could ſee, as the well-read in ſtory can recount of Solon and Epaminondas, whom Cicero in his firſt Book of Invention nobly defends. All law, ſaith he, we ought refer to the common good, and interpret by that, not by the ſcrowl of letters. No man obſerves Law for Laws ſake, but for the good of them for whom it was made. The reſt might ſerve well to lecture theſe times, deluded through belly-doctrines into a devout ſlavery. The Scripture alſo affords us David in the ſhew-bread, Hezechiah in the paſſover, ſound and ſafe tranſgreſſors of the litteral command, which alſo diſpenc'd not ſeldom with it ſelf; and taught us on what juſt occaſions to do ſo: until our Saviour, for whom that great and God-like work was reſerv'd, redeem'd us to a ſtate above preſcriptions, by diſſolving the whole Law into Charity. And have we not the ſoul to underſtand this, and muſt we againſt this glory of God's tranſcendent Love towards us be ſtill the ſervants of a literal indightment?

Created he him.] It might be doubted why he ſaith, In the Image of God created he him, not them, as well as male and female them; eſpecially ſince that Image might be common to them both, but male and female could not, however the Jews fable, and pleaſe themſelves with the accidental concurrence of Plato's wit, as if Man at firſt had bin created Hermaphrodite: but then it muſt have bin male and female created he him. So had the Image of God bin equally common to them both, it had no doubt bin ſaid, In the Image of God created he them. But St. Paul ends the controverſie, by explaining that the Woman is not primarily and immediately the Image of God, but in reference to the Man. The head of the Woman, ſaith he, 1 Cor. 11. is the Man: he the image and glory of God, ſhe the glory of the Man; he not for her, but ſhe for him. Therefore his precept is, Wives be ſubject to your Husbands as is fit in the Lord, Coloſſ. 3. 18. In every thing, Eph. 5. 24. Nevertheleſs man is not to hold her as a ſervant, but receives her into a part of that empire which God proclaims him to, though not equally, yet largely, as his own image and glory: for it is no ſmall glory to him, that a creature ſo like him, ſhould be made ſubject to him. Not but that particular exceptions may have place, if ſhe exceed her Husband in prudence and dexterity, and he contentedly yield; for then a ſuperior and more natural Law comes in, that the wiſer ſhould govern the leſs wiſe, whether male or female. But that which far more eaſily and obediently follows from this verſe, is that, ſeeing Woman was purpoſely made for Man, and he her head, it cannot ſtand before the breath of this divine utterance, that Man the portraiture of God, joyning to himſelf for his intended good and ſolace an inferior ſex, ſhould ſo become her thrall, whoſe wilfulneſs or inability to be a wife fruſtrates the occaſional end of her creation, but that he may acquit himſelf to freedom by his natural birth-right, and that indelible character of priority which God crown'd him with. If it be urg'd that ſin hath loſt him this, the anſwer is not far to ſeek, that from her the ſin firſt proceeded, which keeps her juſtly in the ſame proportion ſtill beneath. She is not to gain by being firſt in the tranſgreſſion, that Man ſhould further looſe to her, becauſe already he hath loſt by her means. Oft it happens that in this matter he is without fault; ſo that his puniſhment herein is cauſeleſs: and God hath the praiſe in our ſpeeches of him, to ſort his puniſhment in the ſame kind with the offence. Suppoſe he err'd; it is not the intent of God or Man, to hunt an error ſo to the death with a revenge beyond all meaſure and proportion. But if we argue thus, this affliction is befaln him for his ſin, therefore he muſt bear it, without ſeeking the only remedy; firſt it will be falſe that all affliction comes for ſin, as in the caſe of Job, and of the Man born blind, Joh. 9. 3. was evident: next by that reaſon, all miſeries coming for ſin, we muſt let them all lie upon us like the vermin of an Indian Cathariſt, which his fond Religion forbids him to moleſt. Were it a particular puniſhment inflicted through the anger of God upon a perſon, or upon a land, no Law hinders us in that regard, no Law but bids us remove it if we can; much more if it be a dangerous temptation withall; much more yet, if it be certainly a temptation, and not certainly a puniſhment, though a pain. As for what they ſay we muſt bear with patience; to bear with patience, and to ſeek effectual remedies, implies no contradiction. It may no leſs be for our diſobedience, our unfaithfulneſs, and other ſins againſt God, that wives become adulterous to the bed; and queſtionleſs we ought to take the affliction as patiently as Chriſtian prudence would wiſh ; yet hereby is not loſt the right of divorcing for adultery. No you ſay, becauſe our Saviour excepted that only. But why, if he were ſo bent to puniſh our ſins, and try our patience in binding on us a diſaſtrous Marriage, why did he except Adultery ? Certainly to have bin bound from Divorce in that caſe alſo had bin as plentiful a puniſhment to our Sins, and not too little work for the patienteſt. Nay perhaps they will ſay it was too great a ſufferance, and with as ſlight a reaſon, for no wiſe man but would ſooner pardon the act of Adultery once and again committed by a perſon worth pity and forgivnes, then to lead a weariſom life of unloving and unquiet converſation with one who neither affects nor is affected, much leſs with one who exerciſes all bitternes, and would commit Adultery too, but for envy leſt the perſecuted condition ſhould thereby get the benefit of his freedom. 'Tis plain therefore, that God enjoyns not this ſuppoſed ſtrictnes of not divorcing either to puniſh us, or to try our patience.

Moreover, if Man be the image of God, which conſiſts in holineſs, and Woman ought in the ſame reſpect to be the image and companion of Man, in ſuch wiſe to be lov'd as the Church is belov'd of Chriſt ; and if, as God is the head of Chriſt, and Chriſt the head of Man, ſo Man is the head of Woman ; I cannot ſee by this golden dependance of headſhip and ſubjection, but that Piety and Religion is the main tye of Chriſtian Matrimony : ſo as if there be found between the pair a notorious diſparity either of wickednes or hereſie, the Husband by all manner of right is diſingag'd from a creature, not made and inflicted on him to the vexation of his righteouſneſs ; the Wife alſo, as her ſubjection is terminated in the Lord, being her ſelf the redeem'd of Chriſt, is not ſtill bound to be the vaſſal of him, who is the bondſlave of Satan : ſhe being now neither the image nor the glory of ſuch a perſon, nor made for him, nor left in bondage to him ; but hath recours to the wing of Charity, and protection of the Church, unles there be a hope on either ſide ; yet ſuch a hope muſt be meant, as may be a rational hope, and not an endleſs ſervitude. Of which hereafter.

But uſually it is objected, that if it be thus, then there can be no true Marriage between misbelievers and irreligious perſons. I might anſwer, let them ſee to that who are ſuch ; the Church hath no commiſſion to judge thoſe without, 1 Cor. 5. But this they will ſay perhaps, is but penuriouſly to reſolv a doubt. I anſwer therefore, that where they are both irreligious, the Marriage may be yet true enough to them in a civil relation. For there are left ſom remains of Gods image in man, as he is meerly man ; which reaſon God gives againſt the ſhedding of mans bloud, Gen. 9. as being made in Gods image, without expreſſion whether he were a good man or a bad, to exempt the ſlayer from puniſhment. So that in thoſe Marriages where the parties are alike void of Religion, the Wife owes a civil homage and ſubjection, the Husband owes a civil loyalty. But where the yoke is miſ-yok't, heretick with faithful, godly with ungodly, to the grievance and manifeſt endangering of a brother or ſiſter, reaſons of a higher ſtrain then matrimonial bear ſway ; unleſs the Goſpel inſtead of freeing us, debaſe it ſelf to make us bondmen, and ſuffer evil to controul good.

Male and Female created he them.] This contains another end of matching Man and Woman, being the right and lawfulneſs of the Marriage-bed ; though much inferior to the former end of her being his image and help in religious ſociety. And who of weakeſt inſight may not ſee that this creating of them Male and Female, cannot in any order of Reaſon, or Chriſtianity, be of ſuch moment againſt the better and higher purpoſes of their creation, as to enthral Husband or Wife to duties or to ſufferings, unworthy and unbeſeeming the image of God in them ? Now whenas not only men, but good men, do ſtand upon their right, their eſtimation, their dignity, in all other actions and deportments, with warrant anough and good Conſcience, as having the image of God in them, it will not be difficult to determin what is unworthy and unſeemly for a man to do or ſuffer in Wedlock ; and the like proportionally may be found for woman, if we love not to ſtand diſputing below the principles of humanity. He that ſaid, Male and female created he them, immediatly before that ſaid alſo in the ſame verſe, In the image of God created he him, and redoubl'd it, that our thoughts might not be ſo full of dregs as to urge this poor conſideration of male and female, without remembring the noblenes of that former Repetition ; leſt when God ſends a wiſe eye to examin our trivial gloſſes, they be found extremely to creep upon the ground : eſpecially ſince they confeſs that what here concerns Marriage is but a brief touch, only preparative to the Inſtitution which follows more expreſly in the next Chapter ; and that Chriſt ſo took it, as deſiring to be briefeſt with them who came to tempt him, account ſhall be given in due place.

V. 28. And God bleſſed them, and God ſaid unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and repleniſh the earth, &c.

This declares another end of Matrimony, the propagation of Mankind; and is again repeated to Noah and his ſons. Many things might be noted on this place not ordinary, nor unworth the noting; but I undertook not a general Comment. Hence therefore we ſee the deſire of children is honeſt and pious; if we be not leſs zealous in our Chriſtianity, then Plato was in his heatheniſm; who in the ſixt of his Laws, counts off-ſpring therefore deſirable, that we may leav in our ſtead ſons of our ſons, continual ſervants of God: a religious and prudent deſire, if people knew as well what were requir'd to breeding as to begetting; which deſire perhaps was a cauſe why the Jews hardly could endure a barren wedlock: and Philo in his book of ſpecial Laws, eſteems him only worth pardon that ſends not barrennes away. Carvilius, the firſt recorded in Rome to have ſought Divorce, had it granted him for the barrennes of his wife, upon his oath that he married to the end he might have children; as Dionyſius and Gellius are authors. But to diſmiſs a wife only for barrennes, is hard: and yet in ſom the deſire of children is ſo great, and ſo juſt, yea ſometime ſo neceſſary, that to condemn ſuch a one to a childles age, the fault apparently not being in him, might ſeem perhaps more ſtrict then needed. Sometimes inheritances, crowns, and dignities are ſo intereſted and annext in their common peace and good to ſuch or ſuch lineal deſcent, that it may prove of great moment both in the affairs of men and of Religion, to conſider throughly what might be don herein, notwithſtanding the waywardnes of our School Doctors.

Gen. II. 18.

And the Lord ſaid, It is not good that man ſhould be alone; I will make him a help meet for him.

V. 23. And Adam ſaid, &c. V. 24. Therefore ſhall a man leave, &c.

THis 2*d* Chapter is granted to be a Commentary on the 1*ſt*; and theſe verſes granted to be an expoſition of that former verſe, Male and female created he them: and yet when this male and female is by the explicite words of God himſelf here declar'd to be not meant other than a fit help, and meet ſociety, ſome who would ingroſs to themſelves the whole trade of interpreting, will not ſuffer the cleer text of God to do the office of explaining it ſelf.

And the Lord God ſaid, It is not good.] A man would think that the conſideration of who ſpake, ſhould raiſe up the intention of our minds to enquire better, and obey the purpos of ſo great a Speaker: for as we order the buſines of Marriage, that which he here ſpeaks is all made vain; and in the deciſion of matrimony, or not matrimony, nothing at all regarded. Our preſumption hath utterly chang'd the ſtate and condition of this ordinance: God ordain'd it in love and helpfulneſs to be indiſſoluble, and we in outward act and formality to be a forc't bondage; ſo that being ſubject to a thouſand errors in the beſt men, if it prove a bleſſing to any, it is of meer accident, as mans Law hath handl'd it, and not of inſtitution.

It is not good for man to be alone.] Hitherto all things that have bin nam'd, were approv'd of God to be very good: lonelineſs is the firſt thing which Gods eye nam'd not good: whether it be a thing, or the want of ſomthing, I labour not; let it be their tendance, who have the art to be induſtriouſly idle. And here alone is meant alone without woman; otherwiſe Adam had the company of God himſelf, and Angels to convers with; all creatures to delight him ſeriouſly, or to make him ſport. God could have created him out of the ſame mould a thouſand friends and brother Adams to have bin his conſorts; yet for all this till Eve was giv'n him, God reckon'd him to be alone.

It is not good.] God here preſents himſelf like to a man deliberating; both to ſhew us that the matter is of high conſequence, and that he intended to found it according to natural reaſon, not impulſive command, but that the duty ſhould ariſe from the reaſon of it, not the reaſon be ſwallow'd up in a reaſonleſs duty. Not good, was as much to Adam before his fall, as not pleaſing, not expedient; but ſince the coming of Sin into the world, to him who hath not receiv'd the continence, it is not only not expedient to be alone, but plainly ſinful. And therefore he who wilfully abſtains from Marriage, not being ſupernaturally gifted, and he who by making the yoke of Marriage unjuſt and intolerable, cauſes men to abhor it, are both in a diabolical ſin, equal to that of Antichriſt who forbids to marry. For what difference at all whether he abſtain men from marrying, or reſtrain them in a Marriage hapning totally diſcommodious, diſtaſtful, diſhoneſt and pernicious to him without the appearance of his fault? For God does not heer preciſely ſay, I make a female unto this male, as he did briefly before; but expounding himſelf heer on purpos, he ſaith, becauſe it is not good for man to be alone, I make him therefore a meet help. God ſupplies the privation of not good, with the perfect gift of a real and poſitive good; it is mans pervers cooking who hath turn'd this bounty of God into a Scorpion, either by weak and ſhallow conſtructions, or by proud arrogance and cruelty to them who neither in their purpoſes nor in their actions have offended againſt the due honour of wedlock.

Now whereas the Apoſtle ſpeaking in the Spirit, 1 Cor. 7. pronounces quite contrary to this word of God, It is good for a man not to touch a woman, and God cannot contradict himſelf, it inſtructs us that his commands and words, eſpecially ſuch as bear the manifeſt title of ſom good to man, are not to be ſo ſtrictly wrung, as to command without regard to the moſt natural and miſerable neceſſities of mankind. Therefore the Apoſtle adds a limitation in the 26 v. of that chap. for the preſent neceſſity it is good; which he gives us doubtleſs as a pattern how to reconcile other places by the general rule of Charity.

For man to be alone.] Som would have the ſenſe heerof to be in reſpect of procreation only: and Auſtin conteſts that manly friendſhip in all other regards had bin a more becoming ſolace for Adam, then to ſpend ſo many ſecret years in an empty world with one woman. But our Writers deſervedly reject this crabbed opinion; and defend that there is a peculiar comfort in the married ſtate beſides the genial bed, which no other ſociety affords. No mortal nature can endure either in the actions of Religion, or ſtudy of Wiſdom, without ſometime ſlackning the cords of intenſe thought and labour: which leſt we ſhould think faulty, God himſelf conceals us not his own recreations before the World was built; I was, ſaith the eternal Wiſdom, daily his delight, playing always before him. And to him indeed Wiſdom is as a high towr of pleaſure, but to us a ſteep hill, and we toyling ever about the bottom: he executes with eaſe the exploits of his Omnipotence, as eaſie as with us it is to will: but no worthy enterpriſe can be done by us without continual plodding and weariſomneſs to our faint and ſenſitive abilities. We cannot therefore always be contemplative, or pragmatical abroad, but have need of ſom delightful intermiſſions, wherin the enlarg'd ſoul may leav off a while her ſevere ſchooling; and like a glad youth in wandring vacancy, may keep her hollidaies to joy and harmleſs paſtime: which as ſhe cannot well do without company, ſo in no company ſo well as where the different ſex in moſt reſembling unlikenes, and moſt unlike reſemblance, cannot but pleaſe beſt, and be pleas'd in the aptitude of that variety. Wherof leſt we ſhould be too timorous, in the aw that our flat Sages would form us and dreſs us, wiſeſt Solomon among his graveſt Proverbs countenances a kind of raviſhment and erring fondnes in the entertainment of wedded leiſures; and in the Song of Songs, which is generally beleev'd, even in the jollieſt expreſſions to figure the Spouſals of the Church with Chriſt, ſings of a thouſand raptures between thoſe two lovely ones far on the hither ſide of carnal enjoyment. By theſe inſtances, and more which might be brought, we may imagine how indulgently God provided againſt mans Lonelines; that he approv'd it not, as by himſelf declar'd not good; that he approv'd the remedy thereof, as of his own ordaining, conſequently good: and as he ordain'd it, ſo doubtles proportionably to our fal'n eſtate he gives it; elſe were his ordinance at leaſt in vain, and we for all his gift ſtill empty handed. Nay ſuch an unbounteous giver we ſhould make him, as in the Fables Jupiter was to Ixion, giving him a cloud inſtead of Juno, giving him a monſtrous iſſue by her, the breed of Centaurs, a neglected and unlov'd race, the fruits of a deluſive Marriage; and laſtly giving him her with a damnation to that wheel in Hell, from a life thrown into the midſt of temptations and diſorders. But God is no deceitful giver, to beſtow that on us for a remedy of Lonelines, which if it bring not a ſociable mind as well as a conjunctive body, leaves us no leſs alone then before; and if it bring a mind perpetually avers and diſagreeable, betrays us to a wors condition then the moſt deſerted Lonelineſs. God cannot in the juſtice of his own promiſe and inſtitution ſo unexpectedly mock us by forcing that upon us as the remedy of Solitude, which wraps us in a miſery worſe than any Wilderneſs, as the Spirit of God himſelf judges, Prov. 19. eſpecially knowing that the beſt and wiſeſt men amidſt the ſincere and moſt cordial deſigns of their heart, do daily err in chooſing.

We may conclude therefore, ſeeing orthodoxal Expoſitors confeſs to our hands, that by Lonelineſs is not only meant the want of Copulation, and that Man is not leſs alone by turning in a body to him, unleſs there be within it a mind anſwerable, that it is a work more worthy the care and conſultation of God to provide for the worthieſt part of man which is his Mind, and not unnaturally to ſet it beneath the formalities and reſpects of the body, to make it a ſervant of its own vaſſal; I ſay, we may conclude that ſuch a Marriage, wherein the mind is ſo diſgrac't and vilify'd below the bodies intereſt, and can have no juſt or tolerable contentment, is not of Gods inſtitution, and therefore no Marriage. Nay in concluding this, I ſay we conclude no more then what the common Expoſiters themſelves give us, both in that which I have recited, and much more hereafter. But the truth is, they give us, in ſuch a manner, as they who leav their own mature poſitions like the eggs of an Oſtrich in the duſt; I do but lay them in the ſun; their own pregnancies hatch the truth; and I am taxt of novelties and ſtrange producements, while they, like that inconſiderate bird, know not that theſe are their own natural breed.

I will make him a help meet for him.] Heer the heav'nly Inſtituter, as if he labour'd not to be miſtak'n by the ſupercilious hypocriſie of thoſe that love to maiſter their brethren, and to make us ſure that he gave us not now a ſervil yoke, but an amiable knot, contents not himſelf to ſay, I will make him a wife, but reſolving to give us firſt the meaning before the name of a wife, ſaith graciouſly, I will make him a help meet for him. And heer again, as before, I do not require more full and fair deductions then the whole conſent of our Divines uſually raiſe from this text, that in Matrimony there muſt be firſt a mutual help to Piety, next to civil fellowſhip of Love and Amity, then to Generation, ſo to houſhold Affairs, laſtly the remedy of Incontinence. And commonly they reck'n them in ſuch order, as leaves generation and incontinence to be laſt conſidered. This I amaze me at, that though all the ſuperior and nobler ends both of Marriage and of the married perſons be abſolutely fruſtrat, the matrimony ſtirs not, loſes no hold, remains as rooted as the center: but if the body bring but in a complaint of frigidity, by that cold application only, this adamantine Alp of Wedlock has leav to diſſolve; which els all the machinations of religious or civil Reaſon at the ſuit of a diſtreſſed mind, either for divine worſhip or humane converſation violated, cannot unfaſten. What courts of Concupiſcence are theſe, wherin fleſhly appetite is heard before right reaſon, luſt before love or devotion? They may be pious Chriſtians together, they may be loving and friendly, they may be helpful to each other in the family, but they cannot couple, that ſhall divorce them tho either party would not. They can neither ſerv God together, nor one be at peace with the other, nor be good in the Family one to other, but live as they were dead, or live as they were deadly enemies in a cage together; 'tis all one, they can couple, they ſhall not divorce till death, no though this ſentence be their death. What is this, beſides tyranny, but to turn nature upſide down, to make both religion, and the mind of man wait upon the ſlaviſh errands of the body, and not the body to follow either the ſanctity, or the ſovranty of the mind, unſpeakably wrong'd, and with all equity complaining? What is this but to abuſe the ſacred and myſterious bed of Marriage to be the compulſive ſtie of an ingrateful and malignant luſt, ſtirr'd up only from a carnal acrimony, without either love or peace, or regard to any other thing holy or human. This I admire how poſſibly it ſhould inhabit thus long in the ſenſe of ſo many diſputing Theologians, unleſs it be the loweſt lees of a canonical infection livergrown to their ſides; which perhaps will never uncling, without the ſtrong abſterſive of ſom heroick Magiſtrat, whoſe Mind, equal to his high Office, dares lead him both to know and do without their frivolous caſe-putting. For certain he ſhall have God and this Inſtitution plainly on his ſide. And if it be true both in Divinity and Law, that conſent alone, though copulation never follow, makes a Marriage, how can they diſſolv it for the want of that which made it not, and not diſſolv it for that not continuing which made it, and ſhould preſerve it in love and reaſon, and difference it from a brute conjugality?

Meet for him.] The original here is more expreſſive then other languages word for word can render it; but all agree effectual conformity of diſpoſition and affection to be hereby ſignify'd; which God as it were, not ſatisfy'd with the naming of a help, goes on deſcribing another ſelf, a ſecond ſelf, a very ſelf it ſelf. Yet now there is nothing in the life of man, through our miſconſtruction, made more uncertain, more hazardous and full of chance then this divine bleſſing with ſuch favorable ſignificance heer conferr'd upon us; which if we do but err in our choice, the moſt unblamable error that can be, err but one minute, one moment after thoſe mighty Syllables pronounc'd, which take upon them to joyn Heav'n and Hell together unpard'nably till Death pardon: this divine Bleſſing that lookt but now with ſuch a human ſmile upon us, and ſpoke ſuch gentle reaſon, ſtrait vaniſhes like a fair Sky, and brings on ſuch a ſcene of Cloud and Tempeſt, as turns all to ſhipwrack without hav'n or ſhoar, but to a ranſomleſs Captivity. And then they tell us it is our ſin: but let them be told again, that ſin through the mercy of God hath not made ſuch waſt upon us, as to make utterly void to our uſe any temporal benefit, much leſs any ſo much availing to a peaceful and ſanctify'd life, meerly for a moſt incident error which no warineſs can certainly ſhun. And wherefore ſerves our happy redemption, and the liberty we have in Chriſt, but to deliver us from calamitous yokes, not to be liv'd under without the endangerment of our ſouls, and to reſtore us in ſome competent meaſure to a right in every good thing both of this life, and the other? Thus we ſee how treatably and diſtinctly God hath here taught us what the prime ends of Marriage are, mutual ſolace and help. That we are now, upon the moſt irreprehenſible miſtake in chooſing, defeated and defrauded of all this original benignity, was begun firſt through the ſnare of Antichriſtian Canons long ſince obtruded upon the Church of Rome, and not yet ſcour'd off by reformation, out of a lingring vain-glory that abides among us to make fair ſhews in formal Ordinances, and to enjoyn Continence and bearing of Croſſes in ſuch a garb as no Scripture binds us, under the thickeſt Arrows of temptation, where we need not ſtand. Now we ſhall ſee with what acknowledgment and aſſent Adam receiv'd this new aſſociate which God brought him.

V. 23. And Adam ſaid, This is now bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh; ſhe ſhall be called Woman, becauſe ſhe was tak'n out of Man.

That there was a nearer Alliance between Adam and Eve, than could be ever after between Man and Wife, is viſible to any. For no other Woman was ever moulded out of her Husband's Rib, but of meer Strangers for the moſt part they come to have that conſanguinity which they have by Wedlock. And if we look nearly upon the matter, though Marriage be moſt agreeable to holineſs, to purity and juſtice, yet is it not a natural, but a civil and ordain'd relation. For if it were in nature, no law or crime could diſanul it, to make a Wife, or Husband, otherwiſe than ſtill a Wife or Husband, but only Death; as nothing but that can make a Father no Father, or a Son no Son. But Divorce for Adultery or Deſertion, as all our Churches agree but England, not only ſeparates, but nullifies, and extinguiſhes the relation it ſelf of Matrimony, ſo that they are no more Man and Wife; otherwiſe the innocent party could not marry elſewhere, without the guilt of Adultery; next were it meerly natural, why was it here ordain'd more than the reſt of moral Law to Man in his original rectitude, in whoſe breaſt all that was natural or moral was engrav'n without external Conſtitutions and Edicts? Adam therefore in theſe words does not eſtabliſh an indiſſoluble bond of Marriage in the carnal ligaments of fleſh and bones; for if he did, it would belong only to himſelf in the literal ſenſe, every one of us being nearer in fleſh of fleſh, and bone of bones to our Parents than to a Wife; they therefore were not to be left for her in that reſpect. But Adam, who had the wiſdom giv'n him to know all creatures, and to name them according to their properties, no doubt but had the gift to diſcern perfectly that which concern'd him much more; and to apprehend at firſt ſight the true fitneſs of that Conſort which God provided him. And therefore ſpake in reference to thoſe words which God pronounc'd before; as if he had ſaid, This is ſhe by whoſe meet help and ſociety I ſhall no more be alone; this is ſhe who was made my image, ev'n as I the Image of God; not ſo much in body, as in unity of mind and heart. And he might as eaſily know what were the words of God, as he knew ſo readily what had bin done with his Rib, while he ſlept ſo ſoundly. He might well know, if God took a Rib out of his inſide, to form of it a double good to him, he would far ſooner disjoyn it from his outſide, to prevent a treble miſchief to him; and far ſooner cut it quite off from all relation for his undoubted eaſe, than nail it into his body again, to ſtick for ever there a thorn in his heart. When as Nature teaches us to divide any limb from the body to the ſaving of its fellows, though it be the maiming and deformity of the whole; how much more is it her doctrine to ſever by inciſion, not a true limb ſo much, though that be lawful, but an adherent, a ſore, the gangrene of a limb, to the recovery of a whole Man? But if in theſe words we ſhall make Adam to erect a new eſtabliſhment of Marriage in the meer fleſh, which God ſo lately had inſtituted, and founded in the ſweet and mild familiarity of love and ſolace, and mutual fitneſs; what do we but uſe the mouth of our general parent, the firſt time it opens to an arrogant oppoſition, and correcting of God's wiſer Ordinance? Theſe words therefore cannot import any thing new in Marriage, but either that which belongs to Adam only, or to us in reference only to the inſtituting words of God, which made a meet help againſt lonelineſs. Adam ſpake like Adam the words of fleſh and bones, the ſhell and rind of Matrimony; but God ſpake like God, of love and ſolace and meet help, the ſoul both of Adam's words and of Matrimony.

V. 24. Therefore ſhall a man leave his father and his mother, and ſhall cleave unto his wife; and they ſhall be one fleſh.

This verſe, as our common herd expounds it, is the great knot-tier, which hath undon by tying, and by tangling, millions of guiltleſs conſciences: this is that griſly Porter, who having drawn men and wiſeſt men by ſuttle allurement within the train of an unhappy matrimony, claps the dungeon-gate upon them, as irrecoverable as the grave. But if we view him well, and hear him with not too haſty and prejudicant ears, we ſhall find no ſuch terror in him. For firſt, it is not here ſaid abſolutely without all reaſon he ſhall cleave to his wife, be it to his weal or to his deſtruction as it happens, but he ſhall do this upon the premiſes and conſiderations of that meet help and ſociety before mention'd, Therefore he ſhall cleave to his wife, no otherwiſe a wife then a fit help. He is not bid to leave the dear cohabitation of his father, mother, brothers and ſiſters, to link himſelf inſeparably with the meer carcaſs of a Marriage, perhaps an enemy. This joyning particle Therefore is in all equity, nay in all neceſſity of conſtruction to comprehend firſt and moſt principally what God ſpake concerning the inward eſſence of Marriage in his inſtitution, that we may learn how far to attend what Adam ſpake of the outward materials thereof in his approbation. For if we ſhall bind theſe words of Adam only to a corporal meaning, and that the force of this injunction upon all us his ſons to live individually with any woman which hath befaln us in the moſt miſtak'n wedlock, ſhall conſiſt not in theſe moral and relative cauſes of Eves creation, but in the meer anatomy of a rib, and that Adams inſight concerning wedlock reacht no furder, we ſhall make him as very an idiot as the Socinians make him; which would not be reverently done of us. Let us be content to allow our great forefather ſo much wiſdom, as to take the inſtituting words of God along with him into this ſentence, which if they be well minded, will aſſure us that fleſh and ribs are but of a weak and dead efficacy to keep Marriage united where there is no other fitneſs. The rib of Marriage, to all ſince Adam, is a relation much rather then a bone; the nerves and the ſinews thereof are love and meet help, they knit not every couple that marries, and where they knit they ſeldom break; but where they break, which for the moſt part is where they never truly joyn'd, to ſuch at the ſame inſtant both fleſh and rib ceaſe to be in common: ſo that here they argue nothing to the continuance of a falſe or violated Marriage, but muſt be led back again to receive their meaning from thoſe inſtitutive words of God which gave them all the life and vigour they have.

Therefore ſhall a man leave his father, &c.] What to a man's thinking more plain by this appoinment, that the fatherly power ſhould give place to conjugal prerogative? yet it is generally held by reformed writers againſt the Papiſt, that though in perſons at diſcretion the Marriage in it ſelf be never ſo fit, though it be fully accompliſht with benediction, board and bed, yet the father not conſenting, his main will without diſpute ſhall diſſolve all. And this they affirm only from collective reaſon, not any direct law; for that in Exod. 22. 17. which is moſt particular, ſpeaks that a father may refuſe to marry his daughter to one who hath deflour'd her, not that he may take her away from one who hath ſoberly married her. Yet becauſe the general honour due to parents is great, they hold he may, and perhaps hold not amiſs. But again when the queſtion is of harſh and rugged parents who defer to beſtow their children ſeaſonably, they agree joyntly that the Church or Magiſtrate may beſtow them, though without the Father's conſent: and for this they have no expreſs autority in Scripture. So that they may ſee by their own handling of this very place, that it is not the ſtubborn letter muſt govern us, but the divine and ſoftning breath of charity which turns and winds the dictate of every poſitive command, and ſhapes it to the good of mankind. Shall the outward acceſſory of a Father's will wanting, rend the fitteſt and moſt affectionat Marriage in twain, after all nuptial conſummations; and ſhall not the want of love and the privation of all civil and religious concord, which is the inward eſſence of Wedlock, do as much to part thoſe who were never truly wedded? Shall a Father have this power to vindicate his own wilful honour and autority to the utter breach of a moſt dearly-united Marriage, and ſhall not a man in his own power have the permiſſion to free his Soul, his Life, and all his comfort of life from the diſaſter of a no-marriage? Shall fatherhood, which is but man, for his own pleaſure diſſolve matrimony; and ſhall not matrimony, which is God's Ordinance, for its own honour and better conſervation, diſſolve it ſelf, when it is wrong, and not fitted to any of the chief ends which it owes us?

And they ſhall be one fleſh.] Theſe words alſo infer that there ought to be an individualty in Marriage; but without all queſtion preſuppoſe the joyning cauſes. Not a rule yet that we have met with, ſo univerſal in this whole inſtitution, but hath admitted limitations and conditions according to humane neceſſity. The very foundation of Matrimony, though God laid it ſo deliberately, that it is not good for man to be alone, holds not always, if the Apoſtle can ſecure us. Soon after we are bid leave Father and Mother, and cleave to a Wife, but muſt underſtand the Fathers conſent withall, elſe not. Cleave to a Wife, but let her be a wife, let her be a meet help, a ſolace, not a nothing, not an adverſary, not a deſertrice; can any law or command be ſo unreaſonable as to make men cleave to calamity, to ruin, to perdition? In like manner here, They ſhall be one fleſh; but let the cauſes hold, and be made really good, which only have the poſſibility to make them one fleſh. We know that fleſh can neither joyn, nor keep together two bodies of it ſelf; what is it then muſt make them one fleſh, but likeneſs, but fitneſs of mind and diſpoſition, which may breed the Spirit of concord, and union between them? If that be not in the nature of either, and that there has bin a remedileſs miſtake, as vain we go about to compel them into one fleſh, as if we undertook to weav a garment of dry ſand. It were more eaſy to compel the vegetable and nutritive power of nature to aſſimilations and mixtures which are not alterable each by other; or force the concoctive ſtomac to turn that into fleſh which is ſo totally unlike that ſubſtance, as not to be wrought on. For as the unity of mind is nearer and greater then the union of bodies, ſo doubtleſs is the diſſimilitude greater, and more dividual, as that which makes between bodies all difference and diſtinction. Eſpecially when as beſides the ſingular and ſubſtantial differences of every Soul, there is an intimate quality of good or evil, through the whole Progeny of Adam, which like a radical heat, or mortal chilneſs, joyns them, or disjoyns them irreſiſtibly. In whom therefore either the will, or the faculty is found to have never joyn'd, or now not to continue ſo, 'tis not to ſay, they ſhall be one fleſh, for they cannot be one fleſh. God commands not impoſſibilities; and all the Eccleſiaſtical glue, that Liturgy or Laymen can compound, is not able to ſoder up two ſuch incongruous Natures into the one fleſh of a true beſeeming Marriage. Why did Moſes then ſet down their uniting into one fleſh? And I again aſk, why the Goſpel ſo oft repeats the eating of our Saviour's fleſh, the drinking of his blood? That we are one body with him, the members of his body, fleſh of his fleſh, and bone of his bone, Epheſ. 5. Yet leſt we ſhould be Capernaitans, as we are told there, that the fleſh profiteth nothing; ſo we are told here, if we be not as deaf as Adders, that this union of the fleſh proceeds from the union of a fit help and ſolace. We know that there was never a more ſpiritual myſtery then this Goſpel taught us under the terms of body and fleſh; yet nothing leſs intended then that we ſhould ſtick there. What a ſtupidneſs then is it, that in Marriage, which is the neareſt reſemblance of our union with Chriſt, we ſhould deject our ſelves to ſuch a ſluggiſh and underfoot Philoſophy, as to eſteem the validity of Marriage meerly by the fleſh, though never ſo brok'n and disjoynted from love and peace, which only can give a humane qualification to that act of the fleſh, and diſtinguiſh it from beſtial. The Text therefore uſes this phraſe, that they ſhall be one fleſh, to juſtify and make legitimate the rites of Marriage-bed; which was not unneedful, if for all this warrant they were ſuſpected of pollution by ſome ſects of Philoſophy, and Religions of old, and latelier among the Papiſts, and other Heretics elder than they. Some think there is a high myſtery in thoſe words, from that which Paul ſaith of them, Epheſ. 5. This is a great myſtery, but I ſpeak of Chriſt and the Church: and thence they would conclude Marriage to be inſeparable. For me I diſpute not now whether Matrimony be a myſtery or no; if it be of Chriſt and his Church, certainly it is not meant of every ungodly and miſwedded Marriage, but then only myſterious, when it is a holy, happy, and peaceful match. But when a Saint is joyn'd with a Reprobate, or both alike, wicked with wicked, fool with fool, a he drunkard with a ſhe; when the bed hath bin nothing elſe for twenty years or more, but an old haunt of luſt and malice mixt together, no love, no goodneſs, no loyalty, but counterplotting, and ſecret wiſhing one anothers diſſolution; this is to me the greateſt myſtery in the world, if ſuch a Marriage as this can be the myſtery of ought, unleſs it be the myſtery of iniquity: According to that which Paræus cites out of Chryſoſtom, that a bad Wife is a help for the Devil, and the like may be ſaid of a bad Husband. Since therefore none but a fit and pious Matrimony can ſignify the union of Chriſt and his Church, there cannot hence be any hindrance of divorce to that Wedlock wherein there can be no good myſtery. Rather it might to a Chriſtian Conſcience be matter of finding it ſelf ſo much leſs ſatisfy'd then before, in the continuance of an unhappy yoke, wherein there can be no repreſentation either of Chriſt, or of his Church.

Thus having enquir'd the Inſtitution how it was in the beginning, both from the 1 Chap. of Gen. where it was only mention'd in part, and from the ſecond, where it was plainly and evidently inſtituted; and having attended each clauſe and word neceſſary with a diligence not drouſy, we ſhall now fix with ſome advantage, and by a ſhort view backward gather up the ground we have gone, and ſum up the ſtrength we have, into one argumentative Head, with that organic force that Logic proffers us. All Arts acknowledg that then only we know certainly, when we can define; for Definition is that which refines the pure eſſence of things from the circumſtance. If therefore we can attain in this our Controverſy to define exactly what Marriage is, we ſhall ſoon learn when there is a nullity thereof, and when a divorce.

The part therefore of this Chapter which hath bin here treated, doth orderly and readily reſolve it ſelf into a definition of Marriage, and a conſectary from thence. To the definition theſe words chiefly contribute; It is not good, &c. I will make, &c. Where the conſectary begins this connexion, Therefore informs us, Therefore ſhall a Man, &c. Definition is decreed by Logicians to conſiſt only of cauſes conſtituting the eſſence of a thing. What is not therefore among the cauſes conſtituting Marriage, muſt not ſtay in the definition. Thoſe cauſes are concluded to be matter, and, as the Artiſt calls it, Form. But inaſmuch as the ſame thing may be a cauſe more ways then one, and that in relations and inſtitutions which have no corporal ſubſiſtence, but only a reſpective being, the Form by which the thing is what it is, is oft ſo ſlender and undiſtinguiſhable, that it would ſoon confuſe, were it not ſuſtain'd by the efficient and final cauſes, which concur to make up the form invalid otherwiſe of it ſelf, it will be needful to take in all the four Cauſes into the definition. Firſt therefore the material cauſe of Matrimony is Man and Woman; the Author and efficient, God and their conſent; the internal Form and ſoul of this relation, is conjugal love ariſing from a mutual fitneſs to the final cauſes of Wedlock, help and ſociety in religious, civil and domeſtick converſation, which includes as an inferior end the fulfilling of natural deſire, and ſpecifical increaſe; theſe are the final cauſes both moving the efficient, and perfeting the form. And although copulation be conſider'd among the ends of Marriage, yet the act thereof in a right eſteem can no longer be matrimonial, then it is an effect of conjugal love. When love finds it ſelf utterly unmatcht, and juſtly vaniſhes, nay rather cannot but vaniſh, the fleſhly act indeed may continue, but not holy, not pure, not beſeeming the ſacred bond of Marriage; being at beſt but an animal excretion, but more truly worſe and more ignoble than that mute kindlineſs among the herds and flocks: in that proceeding as it ought from intellective principles, it participates of nothing rational, but that which the field and the fold equals. For in human actions the ſoul is the agent, the body in a manner paſſive. If then the body do out of ſenſitive force, what the ſoul complies not with, how can Man, and not rather ſomething beneath Man, be thought the doer?

But to proceed in the purſuit of an accurate definition, it will avail us ſomething, and whet our thoughts, to examine what fabrick hereof others have already rear'd. Paræus on Gen. defines Marriage to be an indiſſoluble conjunction of one Man and one Woman to an individual and intimate converſation, and mutual benevolence, &c. Wherein is to be markt his placing of intimate converſation before bodily benevolence; for bodily is meant, though indeed benevolence rather ſounds will then body. Why then ſhall divorce be granted for want of bodily performance, and not for want of fitneſs to intimate converſation, when as corporal benevolence cannot in any humane faſhion be without this? Thus his definition places the ends of Marriage in one order, and eſteems them in another. His Tautology alſo of indiſſoluble and individual is not to be imitated; eſpecially ſince neither indiſſoluble nor individual hath ought to do in the exact definition, being but a conſectary flowing from thence, as appears by plain Scripture, Therefore ſhall a Man leave, &c. For Marriage is not true Marriage by being individual, but therefore individual, if it be true Marriage. No argument but cauſes enter the definition; a Conſectary is but the effect of thoſe cauſes. Beſides, that Marriage is indiſſoluble, is not Catholickly true; we know it diſſoluble for Adultery, and for Deſertion by the verdit of all Reformed Churches. Dr. Ames defines it an individual conjunction of one man and one woman, to communion of body and mutual ſociety of life: But this perverts the Order of God, who in the inſtitution places meet help and ſociety of life before communion of body. And vulgar eſtimation undervalues beyond compariſon all ſociety of life and communion of mind beneath the communion of body; granting no divorce, but to the want, or miſcommunicating of that. Hemingius, an approved Author, Melanchton's Scholar, and who, next to Bucer and Eraſmus, writes of Divorce moſt like a Divine, thus compriſes, Marriage is a conjunction of one man and one woman lawfully conſenting, into one fleſh, for mutual helps ſake, ordain'd of God. And in his explanation ſtands punctually upon the conditions of conſent, that it be not in any main matter deluded, as being the life of Wedlock, and no true Marriage without a true conſent. Into one fleſh he expounds into one mind, as well as one body, and makes it the formal cauſe: Herein only miſſing, while he puts the effect into his definition inſtead of the cauſe which the Text affords him. For one fleſh is not the formal eſſence of Wedlock, but one end, or one effect of a meet help: The end oft-times being the effect and fruit of the form, as Logick teaches: Elſe many aged and holy Matrimonies, and more eminently that of Joſeph and Mary, would be no true Marriage. And that maxim generally receiv'd, would be falſe, that conſent alone, though copulation never follow, makes the Marriage. Therefore to conſent lawfully into one fleſh, is not the formal cauſe of Matrimony, but only one of the effects. The Civil Lawyers, and firſt Juſtinian or Tribonian defines Matrimony a conjunction of man and woman containing individual accuſtom of life. Wherein firſt, individual is not ſo bad as indiſſoluble put in by others: And although much cavil might be made in the diſtinguiſhing between indiviſible, and individual, yet the one tak'n for poſſible, the other for actual, neither the one nor the other can belong to the eſſence of Marriage; eſpecially when a Civilian defines, by which Law Marriage is actually divorc'd for many cauſes, and with good leave, by mutual conſent. Therefore where conjunction is ſaid, they who comment the Inſtitutes, agree that conjunction of mind is by the Law meant, not neceſſarily conjunction of body. That Law then had good reaſon attending to its own definition, that divorce ſhould be granted for the breaking of that conjunction which it holds neceſſary, ſooner then for the want of that conjunction which it holds not neceſſary. And whereas Tuningus a famous Lawyer excuſes individual as the purpoſe of Marriage, not always the ſucceſs, it ſuffices not. Purpoſe is not able to conſtitute the eſſence of a thing. Nature her ſelf, the univerſal Mother, intends nothing but her own perfection and preſervation; yet is not the more indiſſoluble for that. The Pandects out of Modeſtinus, though not define, yet well deſcribe Marriage, the conjunction of male and female, the ſociety of all life, the communion of divine and human right: which Bucer alſo imitates on the fifth to the Epheſians. But it ſeems rather to comprehend the ſeveral ends of Marriage than to contain the more conſtituting cauſe that makes it what it is.

That I therefore among others (for who ſings not Hylas) may give as well as take matter to be judg'd on, it will be lookt I ſhould produce another definition than theſe which have not ſtood the trial. Thus then I ſuppoſe that Marriage by the natural and plain order of Gods inſtitution in the Text may be more demonſtratively and eſſentially defin'd. Marriage is a divine inſtitution, joyning man and woman in a love fitly diſpos'd to the helps and comforts of domeſtick life. A divine inſtitution. This contains the prime efficient cauſe of Marriage: as for conſent of Parents and Guardians, it ſeems rather a concurrence then a cauſe; for as many that marry are in their own power as not; and where they are not their own, yet are they not ſubjected beyond reaſon. Now though efficient cauſes are not requiſite in a definition, yet divine inſtitution hath ſuch influence upon the Form, and is ſo a conſerving cauſe of it, that without it the Form is not ſufficient to diſtinguiſh matrimony from other conjunctions of male and female, which are not to be counted Marriage. Joyning man and woman in a love, &c. This brings in the parties conſent; until which be, the Marriage hath no true being. When I ſay conſent, I mean not error, for error is not properly conſent: And why ſhould not conſent be here underſtood with equity and good to either part, as in all other friendly Covenants, and not be ſtrain'd and cruelly urg'd to the miſchief and deſtruction of both? Neither do I mean that ſingular act of conſent which made the contract, for that may remain, and yet the Marriage not true nor lawful; and that may ceaſe, and yet the Marriage both true and lawful, to their ſin that break it. So that either as no efficient at all, or but a tranſitory, it comes not into the definition. That conſent I mean which is a love fitly diſpos'd to mutual help and comfort of life: this is that happy Form of Marriage naturally ariſing from the very heart of divine inſtitution in the Text, in all the former definitions either obſcurely, and under miſtak'n terms expreſt, or not at all. This gives Marriage all her due, all her benefits, all her being, all her diſtinct and proper being. This makes a Marriage not a bondage, a bleſſing not a curſe, a gift of God not a ſnare. Unleſs there be a love, and that love born of fitnes, how can it laſt? unleſs it laſt, how can the beſt and ſweeteſt purpoſes of Marriage be attain'd, and they not attain'd, which are the chief ends, and with a lawful love conſtitute the formal cauſe it ſelf of Marriage? How can the eſſence thereof ſubſiſt? How can it be indeed what it goes for? Conclude therefore by all the power of Reaſon, that where this eſſence of Marriage is not, there can be no true Marriage; and the Parties, either one of them or both, are free, and without fault, rather by a Nullity then by a Divorce, may betake them to a ſecond choys, if their preſent condition be not tolerable to them. If any ſhall ask, why domeſtic in the definition? I anſwer, that becauſe both in the Scriptures, and in the graveſt Poets and Philoſophers, I find the properties and excellencies of a Wife ſet out only from domeſtic vertues; if they extend furder, it diffuſes them into the notion of ſom more common duty then matrimonial.

Thus far of the definition; the Conſectary which flows from thence, and altogether depends theron, is manifeſtly brought in by this connexive particle Therefore; and branches it ſelf into a double conſequence; Firſt individual Society, therefore ſhall a man leav father and mother: Secondly, conjugal benevolence, and they ſhall be one fleſh. Which, as was ſhewn, is not without cauſe here mention'd, to prevent and to aboliſh the ſuſpect of pollution in that natural and undefiled act. Theſe conſequences therefore cannot either in Religion, Law, or Reaſon be bound, and poſted upon Mankind to his ſorrow and miſery, but receiv what force they have from the meetnes of help and ſolace, which is the formal cauſe and end of that definition that ſuſtains them. And although it be not for the Majeſty of Scripture to humble her ſelf in artificial Theorems, and Definitions, and Corollaries, like a profeſſor in the Schools, but looks to be analys'd, and interpreted by the logical induſtry of her Diſciples and followers, and to be reduc't by them as oft as need is, into thoſe Sciential rules, which are the implements of inſtruction; yet Moſes, as if foreſeeing the miſerable work that mans ignorance and puſillanimity would make in this matrimonious buſines, and endeavouring his utmoſt to prevent it, condeſcends in this place to ſuch a methodical and School-like way of defining, and conſequencing, as in no place of the whole Law more.

Thus we have ſeen, and if we be not contentious, may know what was Marriage in the beginning, to which in the Goſpel we are referr'd; and what from hence to judg of Nullity, or Divorce. Here I eſteem the work don; in this field the controverſie decided; but becauſe other places of Scripture ſeem to look averſly upon this our deciſion, although indeed they keep all harmony with it, and becauſe it is a better work to reconcile the ſeeming diverſities of Scripture, then the real diſſentions of neareſt friends, I ſhall aſſay in three following Diſcourſes to perform that Office.

Deut. XXIV. 1, 2.

1 When a man hath taken a Wife, and married her, and it come to paſs that ſhe find no favour in his eyes, becauſe he hath found ſom uncleannes in her, then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and ſend her out of his houſe.

2 And when ſhe is departed out of his houſe, ſhe may go and be another mans wife.

THat which is the only diſcommodity of ſpeaking in a clear matter, the abundance of argument that preſſes to be utter'd, and the ſuſpence of judgment what to chooſe, and how in the multitude of reaſon to be not tedious, is the greateſt difficulty which I expect heer to meet with. Yet much hath bin ſaid formerly concerning this Law in the Doctrine of Divorce. Wherof I ſhall repeat no more then what is neceſſary. Two things are heer doubted: Firſt, and that but of late, whether this be a Law or no; next what this reaſon of uncleannes might mean for which the Law is granted. That it is a plain Law no man ever queſtion'd, till Vatablus within theſe hundred years profeſs'd Hebrew at Paris, a man of no Religion, as Beza deciphers him. Yet ſom there be who follow him, not only againſt the current of all Antiquity both Jewiſh and Chriſtian, but the evidence of Scripture alſo, Malach. 2. 16. Let him who hateth put away, ſaith the Lord God of Iſrael. Although this place alſo hath bin tamper'd with, as if it were to be thus render'd, The Lord God ſaith, that he hateth putting away. But this new interpretation reſts only in the autority of Junius; for neither Calvin, nor Vatablus himſelf, nor any other known Divine ſo interpreted before. And they of beſt note who have tranſlated the Scripture ſince, and Diodati for one, follow not his reading. And perhaps they might reject it, if for nothing els, for theſe two reaſons: Firſt, it introduces in a new manner the perſon of God ſpeaking leſs Majeſtic then he is ever wont; When God ſpeaks by his Profet, he ever ſpeaks in the firſt perſon, thereby ſignifying his Majeſty and Omnipreſence. He would have ſaid, I hate putting away, ſaith the Lord; and not ſent word by Malachi in a ſudden faln ſtile, The Lord God ſaith that he hateth putting away: that were a phraſe to ſhrink the glorious Omnipreſence of God ſpeaking, into a kind of circumſcriptive abſence. And were as if a Herald in the Atcheivment of a King, ſhould commit the indecorum to ſet his helmet ſideways and cloſe, not full fac't and open in the poſture of direction and command. We cannot think therefore that this laſt Profet would thus in a new faſhion abſent the perſon of God from his own words as if he came not along with them. For it would alſo be wide from the proper ſcope of this place: he that reads attentively will ſoon perceav, that God blames not heer the Jews for putting away their wives, but for keeping ſtrange Concubines, to the profaning of Juda's holines, and the vexation of their Hebrew wives, v. 11, and 14. Judah hath married the daughter of a ſtrange God: And exhorts them rather to put their wives away whom they hate, as the Law permitted, then to keep them under ſuch affronts. And it is receiv'd that this Profet liv'd in thoſe times of Ezra and Nehemiah (nay by ſom is thought to be Ezra himſelf) when the people were forc't by theſe two Worthies to put their ſtrange wives away. So that what the ſtory of thoſe times, and the plain context of the 11 verſe, from whence this rebuke begins, can give us to conjecture of the obſcure and curt Ebraiſms that follow, this Profet does not forbid putting away, but forbids keeping, and commands putting away according to God's Law, which is the plaineſt Interpreter both of what God will, and what he can beſt ſuffer. Thus much evinces that God there commanded Divorce by Malachi, and this confirms that he commands it alſo here by Moſes.

I may the leſs doubt to mention by the way an Author, tho counted Apocriphal, yet of no ſmall account for Piety and Wiſdom, the Author of Eccleſiaſticus. Which Book, begun by the Grand-father of that Jeſus who is call'd the Son of Sirach, might have bin writt'n in part, not much after the time when Malachi liv'd; if we compute by the Raign of Ptolemæus Euergetes. It profeſſes to explain the Law and the Profets; and yet exhorts us to Divorce for incurable cauſes, and to cut off from the fleſh thoſe whom it there deſcribes, Eccleſiaſtic. 25. 26. Which doubtleſs that wiſe and ancient Writer would never have adviſ'd, had either Malachi ſo lately forbidd'n it, or the Law by a full precept not left it lawful. But I urge not this for want of better proof; our Saviour himſelf allows Divorce to be a command, Mark 10. 3, 5. Neither do they weak'n this aſſertion, who ſay it was only a ſufferance, as ſhall be prov'd at large in that place of Mark. But ſuppoſe it were not a writt'n Law, they never can deny it was a cuſtom, and ſo effect nothing. For the ſame reaſons that induce them why it ſhould not be a Law, will ſtrait'n them as hard why it ſhould be allow'd a cuſtom. All cuſtom is either evil or not evil; if it be evil, this is the very end of Lawgiving, to aboliſh evil cuſtoms by wholſom Laws; unleſs we imagin Moſes weaker then every negligent and ſtartling Politician. If it be, as they make this of Divorce to be, a cuſtom againſt nature, againſt juſtice, againſt chaſtity, how, upon this moſt impure cuſtom tolerated, could the God of purenes erect a nice and preciſe Law, that the Wife married after Divorce could not return to her former Husband, as being defiled? What was all this following nicenes worth, built upon the lewd foundation of a wicked thing allow'd? In few words then, this cuſtom of Divorce either was allowable, or not allowable; if not allowable, how could it be allow'd? if it were allowable, all who underſtand Law will conſent, that a tolerated cuſtom hath the force of a Law, and is indeed no other but an unwritt'n Law, as Juſtinian calls it, and is as prevalent as any writt'n ſtatute. So that their ſhift of turning this Law into a cuſtom wheels about, and gives the onſet upon their own flanks; not diſproving, but concluding it to be the more firm Law,becauſe it was without controverſy a granted cuſtom; as clear in the reaſon of common life, as thoſe giv'n rules wheron Euclides builds his propoſitions.

Thus being every way a Law of God, who can without blaſphemy doubt it to be a juſt and pure Law? Moſes continually diſavows the giving them any ſtatute, or judgment, but what he learnt of God; of whom alſo in his Song he ſaith, Deut. 32. He is the rock, his work is perfet, all his ways are judgment, a God of truth and without iniquity, juſt and right is he. And David teſtifies, the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. Not partly right and partly wrong, much leſs wrong altogether, as Divines of now adays dare cenſure them. Moſes again, of that people to whom he gave this Law, ſaith, Deut. 14. Ye are the children of the Lord your God, the Lord hath choſen thee to be a peculiar people to himſelf above all the nations upon the earth, that thou ſhouldeſt keep all his Commandments, and be high in praiſe, in name, and in honour, holy to the Lord, Chap. 26. And in the fourth, Behold I have taught you ſtatutes and judgments, even as the Lord my God commanded me; keep therefore and do them. For this is your wiſdom and your underſtanding in the ſight of Nations that ſhall hear all theſe Statutes, and ſay, ſurely this great Nation is a wiſe and underſtanding people. For what Nation is there ſo great, who hath God ſo nigh to them? and what Nation that hath Statutes and Judgments ſo righteous as all this Law which I ſet before you this day? Thus whether we look at the purity and juſtice of God himſelf, the jealouſy of his honour among other Nations, the holines and moral prefection which he intended by his Law to teach this people, we cannot poſſibly think how he could indure to let them ſlug and grow inveteratly wicked, under baſe allowances, and whole adulterous lives by diſpenſation. They might not eat, they might not touch an unclean thing; to what hypocriſy then were they train'd up, if by preſcription of the ſame Law, they might be unjuſt, they might be adulterous for term of life? forbid to ſoil their garments with a coy imaginary pollution, but not forbid, but countenanced and animated by Law to ſoil their Souls with deepeſt defilements. What more unlike to God, what more like that God ſhould hate, then that his Law ſhould be ſo curious to waſh veſſels, and veſtures, and ſo careles to leav unwaſh't, unregarded, ſo foul a ſcab of Egypt in their Souls? what would we more? the Statutes of the Lord are all pure and juſt: and if all, then this of Divorce.

Becauſe he hath found ſom uncleannes in her.] That we may not eſteem this Law to be a meer authorizing of licence, as the Phariſees took it, Moſes adds the reaſon, for ſom uncleannes found. Som heertofore have bin ſo ignorant, as to have thought, that this uncleanneſs means Adultery. But Eraſmus, who for having writ an excellent Treatiſe of Divorce, was wrote againſt by ſom burly ſtandard Divine perhaps of Cullen, or of Lovain, who calls himſelf Phimoſtomus, ſhews learnedly out of the Fathers, with other Teſtimonies and Reaſons, that uncleannes is not heer ſo underſtood; defends his former work, though new to that age, and perhaps counted licentious, and fears not to ingage all his fame on the Argument. Afterward, when Expoſiters began to underſtand the Hebrew Text, which they had not done of many ages before, they tranſlated word for word not uncleannes, but the nakedneſs of any thing; and conſidering that nakedneſs is uſually referr'd in Scripture to the mind as well as to the body, they conſtantly expound it any defect, annoyance, or ill quality in nature, which to be joyn'd with, makes life tedious, and ſuch company wors then ſolitude. So that heer will be no cauſe to vary from the general conſent of expoſition, which gives us freely that God permitted divorce, for whatever was unalterably diſtaſtful, whether in body or mind. But with this admoniſhment, that if the Roman Law, eſpecially in contracts and dowries, left many things to equity with theſe cautions, ex fide bonâ, quod aquius melius erit, ut inter bonos bene agitur, we will not grudg to think that God intended not licence heer to every humor, but to ſuch remediles greevances as might move a good and honeſt and faithful man then to divorce, when it can no more be peace or comfort to either of them continuing thus joyn'd. And although it could not be avoided, but that Men of hard hearts would abuſe this liberty, yet doubtleſs it was intended, as all other privileges in Law are, to good men principally, to bad only by accident. So that the Sin was not in the permiſſion, nor ſimply in the action of Divorce (for then the permitting alſo had bin ſin) but only in the abuſe. But that this Law ſhould, as it were, be wrung from God and Moſes, only to ſerve the hardheartednes, and the luſt of injurious men, how remote it is from all ſenſe, and law, and honeſty, and therefore ſurely from the meaning of Chriſt, ſhall abundantly be manifeſt in due order.

Now although Moſes needed not to add other reaſon of this Law then that one there expreſt, yet to theſe ages wherin Canons, and Scotiſms, and Lumbard Laws, have dull'd, and almoſt obliterated the lively Sculpture of ancient reaſon, and humanity, it will be requiſit to heap reaſon upon reaſon, and all little enough to vindicate the whitenes and the innocence of this divine Law, from the calumny it finds at this day, of being a dore to licence and confuſion. When as indeed there is not a judicial point in all Moſes, conſiſting of more true equity, high wiſdom, and God-like pity then this Law; not derogating, but preſerving the honour and peace of Marriage, and exactly agreeing with the ſenſe and mind of that inſtitution in Geneſis.

For firſt, if Marriage be but an ordain'd relation, as it ſeems not more, it cannot take place above the prime dictats of nature; and if it be of natural right, yet it muſt yeeld to that which is more natural, and before it by elderſhip and precedence in nature. Now it is not natural that Hugh marries Beatrice, or Thomas Rebecca, being only a civil contract, and full of many chances, but that theſe men ſeek them meet helps, that only is natural; and that they eſpouſe them ſuch, that only is Marriage. But if they find them neither fit helps nor tolerable ſociety, what thing more natural, more original and firſt in nature then to depart from that which is irkſom, greevous, actively hateful, and injurious even to hoſtility, eſpecially in a conjugal reſpect, wherin antipathies are invincible, and wher the forc't abiding of the one can be no true good, no real comfort to the other? For if he find no contentment from the other, how can he return it from himſelf; or no acceptance, how can he mutually accept? What more equal, more pious then to untie a civil knot for a natural enmity held by violence from parting, to diſſolv an accidental conjunction of this or that Man and Woman, for the moſt natural and moſt neceſſary diſagreement of meet from unmeet, guilty from guiltles, contrary from contrary? It being certain that the myſtical and bleſſed unity of Marriage can be no way more unhallow'd and profan'd, then by the forcible uniting of ſuch diſunions and ſeparations. Which if we ſee oft times they cannot join or peece up to a common friendſhip, or to a willing converſation in the ſame houſe, how ſhould they poſſibly agree to the moſt familiar and united amity of Wedlock? Abraham and Lot, though dear friends, and brethren in a ſtrange Country, choſe rather to part aſunder, then to infect thir friendſhip with the ſtrife of their ſervants: Paul and Barnabas, join'd together by the Holy Ghoſt to a ſpiritual work, thought it better to ſeparate when once they grew at variance. If theſe great Saints, join'd by Nature, Friendſhip, Religion, high Providence, and Revelation, could not ſo govern a caſual difference, a ſudden paſſion, but muſt in wiſdom divide from the outward duties of a Friendſhip, or a Collegueſhip in the ſame family, or in the ſame journey, leſt it ſhould grow to a worſe diviſion; can any thing be more abſurd and barbarous, than that they whom only Error, Caſualty, Art, or Plot hath join'd, ſhould be compell'd, not againſt a ſudden paſſion, but againſt the permanent and radical diſcords of Nature, to the moſt intimate and incorporating duties of Love and Imbracement, therin only rational and human, as they are free and voluntary; being els an abject and ſervile yoke, ſcarce not brutiſh? And that there is in man ſuch a peculiar ſway of liking or diſliking in the affairs of Matrimony, is evidently ſeen before Marriage among thoſe who can be friendly, can reſpect each other, yet to marry each other would not for any perſwaſion. If then this unfitneſs and diſparity be not till after Marriage diſcover'd, through many Cauſes, and Colours, and Concealments, that may overſhadow; undoubtedly it will produce the ſame effects, and perhaps with more vehemence, that ſuch a miſtak'n pair would give the world to be unmarried again. And thir condition Solomon to the plain juſtification of Divorce expreſſes, Prov. 30. 21, 23. where he tells us of his own accord, that a hated, or a hateful Woman, when ſhe is married, is a thing for which the earth is diſquieted, and cannot bear it: thus giving divine teſtimony to this divine Law, which bids us nothing more then is the firſt and moſt innocent leſſon of Nature, to turn away peaceably from what afflicts, and hazards our deſtruction; eſpecially when our ſtaying can do no good, and is expos'd to all evil.

Secondly, It is unjuſt that any Ordinance, ordain'd to the good and comfort of Man, where that end is miſſing, without his fault, ſhould be forc'd upon him to an unſufferable miſery and diſcomfort, if not commonly ruin. All Ordinances are eſtabliſht in their end; the end of Law is the vertu, is the righteouſneſs of Law: and therefore him we count an ill Expounder who urges Law againſt the intention thereof. The general end of every Ordinance, of every ſevereſt, every divineſt, even of Sabbath, is the good of Man; yea his temporal good not excluded. But Marriage is one of the benigneſt ordinances of God to man, wherof both the general and particular end is the peace and contentment of mans mind, as the inſtitution declares. Contentment of body they grant, which if it be defrauded, the plea of frigidity ſhall divorce: But here lies the ſadomles abſurdity, that granting this for bodily defect, they will not grant it for any defect of the mind, any violation of religious or civil ſociety. When as, if the argument of Chriſt be firm againſt the ruler of the Synagogue, Luk. 13. Thou hypocrite, doth not each of you on the Sabbath day looſ'n his Oxe or his Aſſe from the ſtall, and lead him to watering, and ſhould not I unbind a daughter of Abraham from this bond of Satan? it ſtands as good here; ye have regard in Marriage to the grievance of body, ſhould you not regard more the grievances of the mind, ſeeing the Soul as much excels the body, as the outward man excels the Aſs, and more? for that animal is yet a living creature, perfect in it ſelf; but the body without the Soul is a meer ſenſeleſs trunk. No ordinance therefore giv'n particularly to the good both ſpiritual and temporal of man, can be urg'd upon him to his miſchief: and if they yield this to the unworthier part, the body, whereabout are they in their principles, that they yield it not to the more worthy, the mind of a good man?

Thirdly, As no Ordinance, ſo no Cov'nant, no not between God and Man, much leſs between Man and Man, being, as all are, intended to the good of both Parties, can hold to the deluding or making miſerable of them both. For Equity is underſtood in every Cov'nant, ev'n between enemies, though the terms be not expreſt. If Equity therefore made it, Extremity may diſſolve it. But Marriage, they uſe to ſay, is the Cov'nant of God. Undoubted: and ſo is any Cov'nant frequently call'd in Scripture, wherein God is call'd to witneſs: the Cov'nant of Friendſhip between David and Jonathan, is call'd the Cov'nant of the Lord, 1 Sam. 20. The Cov'nant of Zedekiah with the King of Babel, a Cov'nant to be doubted whether lawful or no, yet in reſpect of God invok'd thereto, is call'd the Oath, and the Cov'nant of God, Ezek. 17. Marriage alſo is call'd the Cov'nant of God, Prov. 2. 17. Why, but as before, becauſe God is the witneſs thereof, Malach. 2. 14. So that this denomination adds nothing to the Cov'nant of Marriage, above any other civil and ſolemn contract: nor is it more indiſſoluble for this reaſon than any other againſt the end of its own Ordination; nor is any Vow or Oath to God exacted with ſuch a rigor, where ſuperſtition reigns not. For look how much divine the Cov'nant is, ſo much the more equal; ſo much the more to be expected that every Article thereof ſhould be fairly made good; no falſe dealing, or unperforming ſhould be thruſt upon men without redreſs, if the Cov'nant be ſo divine. But Faith, they ſay, muſt be kept in Cov'nant, though to our damage. I anſwer, that only holds true, where the other ſide performs; which failing, he is no longer bound. Again, this is true, when the keeping of Faith can be of any uſe or benefit to the other. But in Marriage, a league of Love and Willingneſs, if Faith be not willingly kept, it ſcarce is worth the keeping; nor can be any delight to a generous mind, with whom it is forcibly kept: and the queſtion ſtill ſuppoſes the one brought to an impoſſibility of keeping it as he ought, by the others default; and to keep it formally, not only with a thouſand ſhifts and diſſimulations, but with open anguiſh, perpetual ſadneſs and diſturbance, no willingneſs, no cheerfulneſs, no contentment, cannot be any good to a mind not baſely poor and ſhallow, with whom the contract of Love is ſo kept. A Cov'nant therefore brought to that paſs, is on the unfaulty ſide without injury diſſolv'd.

Fourthly, The Law is not to neglect men under greateſt ſufferances, but to ſee Cov'nants of greateſt moment faithfulleſt perform'd. And what injury comparable to that ſuſtain'd in a fruſtrate and falſe-dealing Marriage, to loſe, for anothers fault againſt him, the beſt portion of his temporal comforts, and of his ſpiritual too, as it may fall out? It was the Law, that for man's good and quiet, reduc'd things to propriety, which were at firſt in common; how much more Law-like were it to aſſiſt Nature in diſappropriating that evil which by continuing proper becomes deſtructive? But he might have bewar'd. So he might in any other Cov'nant, wherein the Law does not conſtrain Error to ſo dear a forfeit. And yet in theſe matters wherein the wiſeſt are apt to err, all the warineſs that can be, oft-times nothing avails. But the Law can compel the offending party to be more duteous. Yes, if all theſe kind of offences were fit in publick to be complain'd on, or being compell'd were any ſatisfaction to a mate not ſottiſh, or malicious. And theſe injuries work ſo vehemently, that if the Law remedy them not, by ſeparating the cauſe when no way elſe will pacify, the perſon not reliev'd betakes him either to ſuch diſorderly courſes, or to ſuch a dull dejection, as renders him either infamous, or uſeleſs to the ſervice of God and his Country. Which the Law ought to prevent as a thing pernicious to the Commonwealth; and what better prevention than this which Moſes us'd?

Fifthly, The Law is to tender the liberty and the human dignity of them that live under the Law, whether it be the man's right above the woman, or the woman's juſt appeal againſt wrong and ſervitude. But the duties of Marriage contain in them a duty of Benevolence, which to do by compulſion againſt the Soul, where there can be neither peace, nor joy, nor love, but an enthralment to one who either cannot, or will not be mutual in the godlieſt and the civileſt ends of that ſociety, is the ignobleſt, and the loweſt ſlavery that a human ſhape can be put to. This Law therefore juſtly and piouſly provides againſt ſuch an unmanly task of bondage as this. The Civil Law, though it favour'd the ſetting free of a ſlave, yet if he prov'd ungrateful to his Patron, reduc'd him to a ſervile condition. If that Law did well to reduce from liberty to bondage for an ingratitude not the greateſt, much more became it the Law of God to enact the reſtorement of a free-born man from an unpurpos'd, and unworthy bondage, to a rightful liberty, for the moſt unnatural fraud and ingratitude that can be committed againſt him. And if that Civilian Emperour in his title of Donations, permit the giver to recall his gift from him who proves unthankful towards him; yea, though he had ſubſcrib'd and ſign'd in the deed of his gift, not to recall it, though for this very cauſe of ingratitude; with much more equity doth Moſes permit here the giver to recall no petty gift, but the gift of himſelf from one who moſt injuriouſly and deceitfully uſes him againſt the main ends and conditions of his giving himſelf, expreſt in God's inſtitution.

Sixthly, Although there be nothing in the plain words of this Law, that ſeems to regard the afflictions of a Wife, how great ſoever; yet Expoſitors determin, and doubtleſs determin rightly, that God was not uncompaſſionate of them alſo in the framing of this Law. For ſhould the reſcript of Antoninus in the Civil Law give releaſe to ſervants flying for refuge to the Emperour's ſtatue, by giving leave to change their cruel Maſters; and ſhould God, who in his Law alſo is good to injur'd ſervants, by granting them their freedom in divers caſes, not conſider the wrongs and miſeries of a wife which is no ſervant? Though herein the counter-ſenſe of our Divines, to me, I muſt confeſs ſeems admirable; who teach that God gave this as a merciful Law, not for Man whom he here names, and to whom by name he gives this power, but for the wife whom he names not, and to whom by name he gives no power at all. For certainly if Man be liable to injuries in Marriage, as well as Woman, and Man be the worthier perſon, it were a prepoſterous Law to reſpect only the leſs worthy; her whom God made for Marriage, and not him at all for whom Marriage was made.

Seventhly, The Law of Marriage gives place to the power of Parents: for we hold, that conſent of Parents not had, may break the Wedlock, though elſe accompliſht. It gives place to maſterly Power, for the Maſter might take away from an Hebrew ſervant the wife which he gave him, Exod. 21. If it be anſwer'd that the Marriage of Servants is no Matrimony: 'tis reply'd, That this in the ancient Roman Law is true, not in the Moſaic. If it be added, ſhe was a Stranger, not an Hebrew, therefore eaſily divorc'd: it will be anſwer'd, That Strangers not being Canaanites, and they alſo being Converts, might be lawfully marry'd, as Rahab was. And her converſion is here ſuppos'd; for an Hebrew maſter could not lawfully give an Heathen wife to an Hebrew ſervant. However, the divorcing of an Iſraelitiſh woman was as eaſy by the Law, as the divorcing of a ſtranger, and almoſt in the ſame words permitted, Deut. 24, and Deut. 21. Laſtly, it gives place to the right of War, for a captive Woman lawfully marry'd, and afterward not belov'd, might be diſmiſt, only without ranſom, Deut. 21. If Marriage may be diſſolv'd by ſo many exterior powers, not ſuperior, as we think, why may not the power of Marriage it ſelf, for its own peace and honour, diſſolve it ſelf? where the perſons wedded be free perſons, why may not a greater and more natural power complaining diſſolve Marriage? For the ends why Matrimony was ordain'd, are certainly and by all Logic above the Ordinance it ſelf; why may not that diſſolve Marriage, without which that inſtitution hath no force at all? for the prime ends of Marriage, are the whole ſtrength and validity thereof, without which Matrimony is like an Idol, nothing in the world. But thoſe former allowances were all for hardneſs of heart. Be that granted, until we come where to underſtand it better: if the Law ſuffer thus far the obſtinacy of a bad man, is it not more righteous here, to do willingly what is but equal, to remove in ſeaſon the extremities of a good man?

Eightly, If a man had deflowr'd a Virgin, or brought an ill name on his Wife that ſhe came not a Virgin to him, he was amerc'd in certain ſhekles of Silver, and bound never to divorce her all his days, Deut. 22. which ſhews that the Law gave no liberty to divorce, where the injury was palpable; and that the abſolute forbidding to divorce, was in part the puniſhment of a deflowrer, and a defamer. Yet not ſo but that the wife queſtionleſs might depart when ſhe pleas'd. Otherwiſe this courſe had not ſo much righted her, as delivered her up to more ſpight and cruel uſage. This Law therefore doth juſtly diſtinguiſh the privilege of an honeſt and blameleſs man in the matter of divorce from the puniſhment of a notorious offender.

Ninthly, Suppoſe it might be imputed to a man, that he was too raſh in his choice, and why took he not better heed, let him now ſmart, and bear his folly as he may; although the Law of God, that terrible Law, do not thus upbraid the infirmities and unwilling miſtakes of man in his integrity: But ſuppoſe theſe and the like proud aggravations of ſome ſtern hypocrite, more mercileſs in his mercies, than any literal Law in the vigour of ſeverity, muſt be patiently heard; yet all Law, and Gods Law eſpecially, grants every-where to error eaſy remitments, even where the utmoſt penalty exacted were no undoing. With great reaſon therefore and mercy doth it here not torment an error, if it be ſo, with the indurance of a whole life loſt to all houſhold comfort and ſociety, a puniſhment of too vaſt and huge dimenſion for an error, and the more unreaſonable for that the like objection may be oppos'd againſt the plea of divorcing for adultery; he might have lookt better before to her breeding under religious Parents: why did he not then more diligently inquire into her manners, into what company ſhe kept? every glance of her eye, every ſtep of her gate would have prophecy'd adultery, if the quick ſcent of theſe diſcerners had bin took along; they had the divination to have foretold you all this, as they have now the divinity to puniſh an error inhumanly. As good reaſon to be content, and forc'd to be content with your Adultreſs, if theſe objecters might be the judges of human frailty. But God, more mild and good to man, then man to his brother, in all this liberty given to divorcement, mentions not a word of our paſt errors and miſtakes, if any were, which theſe men objecting from their own inventions, proſecute with all violence and iniquity. For if the one be to look ſo narrowly what he takes, at the peril of ever keeping, why ſhould not the other be made as wary what is promis'd, by the peril of loſing? for without thoſe promiſes the treaty of Marriage had not proceeded. Why ſhould his own error bind him, rather then the others fraud acquit him? Let the buyer beware, ſaith the old Law-beaten termer. Belike then there is no more honeſty, nor ingenuity in the bargain of a Wedlock, then in the buying of a Colt: We muſt it ſeems drive it on as craftily with thoſe whoſe affinity we ſeek, as if they were a pack of ſale-men and complotters. But the deceiver deceives himſelf in the unproſperous Marriage, and therein is ſufficiently puniſht. I anſwer, that the moſt of thoſe who deceive, are ſuch as either underſtand not, or value not the true purpoſes of Marriage; they have the prey they ſeek, not the puniſhment: yet ſay it prove to them ſome croſs, it is not equal that error and fraud ſhould be linkt in the ſame degree of forfeiture, but rather that error ſhould be acquitted, and fraud bereav'd his morſel, if the miſtake were not on both ſides; for then on both ſides the acquitment will be reaſonable, if the bondage be intolerable; which this Law graciouſly determins, not unmindful of the wife, as was granted willingly to the common Expoſiters, though beyond the letter of this Law, yet not beyond the ſpirit of charity.

Tenthly, Marriage is a ſolemn thing, ſome ſay a holy, the reſemblance of Chriſt and his Church; and ſo indeed it is where the perſons are truly religious; and we know all Sacred things not perform'd ſincerely as they ought, are no way acceptable to God in their outward formality. And that wherein it differs from perſonal duties, if they be not truly done, the fault is in our ſelves; but Marriage to be a true and pious Marriage is not in the ſingly power of any perſon; the eſſence whereof, as of all other Covenants, is in relation to another, the making and maintaining cauſes thereof are all mutual, and muſt be a communion of ſpiritual and temporal comforts. If then either of them cannot, or obſtinately will not be anſwerable in theſe duties, ſo as that the other can have no peaceful living, or enduring the want of what he juſtly ſeeks, and ſees no hope, then ſtrait from that dwelling love, which is the ſoul of wedlock, takes his flight, leaving only ſome cold performances of civil and common reſpects; but the true bond of Marriage, if there were ever any there, is already burſt like a rott'n thred. Then follows diſſimulation, ſuſpicion, falſe colours, falſe pretences, and wors then theſe, diſturbance, annoyance, vexation, ſorrow, temptation ev'n in the faultles perſon, weary of himſelf, and of all action publick or domeſtick; then comes diſorder, neglect, hatred, and perpetual ſtrife, all theſe the enemies of Holineſs and Chriſtianity, and every one of theſe perſiſted in, a remediles violation to Matrimony. Therefore God who hates all faining and formality, where there ſhould be all faith and ſincereneſs, and abhors to ſee inevitable diſcord, where there ſhould be greateſt concord, when through anothers default, faith and concord cannot be, counts it neither juſt to puniſh the innocent with the tranſgreſſor, nor holy, nor honourable for the ſanctity of Marriage, that ſhould be the union of peace and love, to be made the commitment, and cloſe fight of enmity and hate. And therefore doth in this Law, what beſt agrees with his goodneſs, looſning a ſacred thing to peace and charity, rather then binding it to hatred and contention; looſning only the outward and formal tie of that which is already inwardly and really brok'n, or elſe was really never joyn'd.

Eleventhly, One of the chief matrimonial ends is ſaid to ſeek a holy ſeed; but where an unfit Marriage adminiſters continual cauſe of hatred and diſtemper, there, as was heard before, cannot chooſe but much unholineſs abide. Nothing more unhallows a man, more unprepares him to the ſervice of God in any duty, then a habit of wrath and perturbation, ariſing from the importunity of troublous cauſes never abſent. And where the houſhold ſtands in this plight, what love can there be to the unfortunate iſſue, what care of their breeding, which is of main conducement to their being holy? God therefore knowing how unhappy it would be for children to be born in ſuch a family, gives this Law either as a prevention, that being an unhappy pair, they ſhould not add to be unhappy parents, or elſe as a remedy that if there be children, while they are feweſt, they may follow either parent, as ſhall be agreed, or judg'd, from the houſe of hatred and diſcord, to a place of more holy and peaceable education.

Twelfthly, All Law is available to ſome good end, but the final prohibition of Divorce avails to no good end, cauſing only the endles aggravation of evil, and therefore this permiſſion of divorce was giv'n to the Jews by the wiſdom and fatherly providence of God; who knew that Law cannot command love, without which Matrimony hath no true being, no good, no ſolace, nothing of God's inſtituting, nothing but ſo ſordid and ſo low, as to be diſdain'd of any generous perſon. Law cannot inable natural inability either of body, or mind, which gives the grievance; it cannot make equal thoſe inequalities, it cannot make fit thoſe unfitneſſes; and where there is malice more then defect of nature, it cannot hinder ten thouſand injuries, and bitter actions of deſpight, too ſuttle and too unapparent for Law to deal with. And while it ſeeks to remedy more outward wrongs, it expoſes the injur'd perſon to other more inward and more cutting. All theſe evils unavoidably will redound upon the children, if any be, and the whole family. It degenerates and diſorders the beſt ſpirits, leaves them to unſettl'd imaginations, and degraded hopes, careleſs of themſelves, their houſhold and their friends, unactive to all publick ſervice, dead to the Commonwealth; wherein they are by one miſhap, and no willing treſpaſs of theirs, outlaw'd from all the benefits and comforts of married life and poſterity. It confers as little to the honour and inviolable keeping of Matrimony, but ſooner ſtirs up temptations, and occaſions to ſecret adulteries, and unchaſt roaving. But it maintains publick honeſty. Publick folly rather; who ſhall judg of publick honeſty? the Law of God and of ancienteſt Chriſtians, and all Civil Nations, or the illegitimate Law of Monks and Canoniſts, the moſt malevolent, moſt unexperienc't, and incompetent Judges of Matrimony?

Theſe reaſons, and many more that might be alleg'd, afford us plainly to perceave, both what good cauſe this Law had to do for good men in miſchances, and what neceſſity it had to ſuffer accidentally the hard-heartedneſs of bad men, which it could not certainly diſcover, or diſcovering, could not ſubdue, no nor indeavour to reſtrain without multiplying ſorrow to them, for whom all was indeavour'd. The guiltleſs therefore were not depriv'd their needful redreſſes, and the hard hearts of others unchaſtiſable in thoſe judicial Courts, were ſo remitted there, as bound over to the higher Seſſion of Conſcience.

Notwithſtanding all this, there is a loud exception againſt this Law of God, nor can the holy Author ſave his Law from this exception, that it opens a dore to all licence and confuſion. But this is the rudeſt, I was almoſt ſaying the moſt graceleſs objection, and with the leaſt reverence to God and Moſes, that could be deviſ'd: This is to cite God before mans Tribunal, to arrogate a wiſdom and holineſs above him. Did not God then foreſee what event of licence or confuſion could follow? did not he know how to ponder theſe abuſes with more prevailing reſpects, in the moſt even ballance of his juſtice and pureneſs, till theſe correctors came up to ſhew him better? The Law is, if it ſtir up ſin any way, to ſtir it up by forbidding, as one contrary excites another, Rom. 7. but if it once come to provoke ſin, by granting licence to ſin, according to Laws that have no other honeſt end, but only to permit the fulfilling of obſtinate luſt, how is God not made the contradicter of himſelf? No man denies that beſt things may be abus'd: but it is a Rule reſulting from many pregnant experiences, that what doth moſt harm in the abuſing, us'd rightly doth moſt good. And ſuch a good to take away from honeſt men, for being abus'd by ſuch as abuſe all things, is the greateſt abuſe of all. That the whole Law is no furder uſeful, then as a man uſes it lawfully, St. Paul teaches 1 Tim. 1. And that Chriſtian liberty may be us'd for an occaſion to the fleſh, the ſame Apoſtle confeſſes, Galat. 5. yet thinks not of removing it for that, but bids us rather Stand faſt in the liberty wherwith Chriſt hath feed us, and not be held again in the yoke of bondage. The very permiſſion which Chriſt gave to Divorce for Adultery, may be fouly abus'd, by any whoſe hardnes of heart can either fain adultery, or dares commit, that he may divorce. And for this cauſe the Pope, and hitherto the Church of England, forbid all Divorce from the bond of Marriage, though for openeſt adultery. If then it be righteous to hinder for the fear of abuſe, that which Gods Law, notwithſtanding that caution, hath warranted to be done, doth not our righteouſneſs come ſhort of Antichriſt? or do we not rather herein conform our ſelvs to his unrighteouſneſs in this undue and unwiſe fear? For God regards more to relieve by this Law the juſt complaints of good men, then to curb the licence of wicked men, to the cruſhing withal, and the overwhelming of his afflicted ſervants. He loves more that his Law ſhould look with pity upon the difficulties of his own, than with rigor upon the boundleſs riots of them who ſerve another Maſter, and hinder'd here by ſtrictnes, will break another way to wors enormities. If this Law therfore have many good reaſons for which God gave it, and no intention of giving ſcope to lewdnes, but as abuſe by accident comes in with every good Law, and every good thing, it cannot be wiſdom in us, while we can content us with Gods wiſdom, nor can be purity, if his purity will ſuffice us, to except againſt this Law, as if it foſter'd licence. But if they affirm this Law had no other end, but to permit obdurat luſt, becauſe it would be obdurat, making the Law of God intentionally to proclame and enact Sin lawful, as if the will of God were become ſinful, or Sin ſtronger then his direct and Law-giving will, the men would be admoniſht to look well to it, that while they are ſo eager to ſhut the door againſt licence. they do not open a wors door to blaſphemy. And yet they ſhall be here furder ſhewn their iniquity; what more foul and common ſin among us then drunkennes? and who can be ignorant, that if the importation of Wine, and the uſe of all ſtrong drink were forbid, it would both clean rid the poſſibility of commiting that odious vice, and men might afterwards live happily and healthfully, without the uſe of thoſe intoxicating liquors. Yet who is there the ſevereſt of them all, that ever propounded to loſe his Sack, his Ale, toward the certain aboliſhing of ſo great a ſin? who is there of them, the holieſt, that leſs loves his rich Canary at meals, though it be fetcht from places that hazard the Religion of them who fetch it, and though it make his neighbour drunk out of the ſame Tun? While they forbid not therefore the uſe of that liquid Marchandiſe, which forbidden would utterly remove a moſt loathſom ſin, and not impair either the health, or the refreſhment of mankind, ſuppli'd many other ways: why do they forbid a Law of God, the forbidding whereof brings into an exceſſive bondage oft-times the beſt of men, and betters not the wors? He to remove a National vice, will not pardon his cups, nor think it concerns him to forbear the quaffing of that outlandiſh Grape, in his unneceſſary fulnes, though other men abuſe it never ſo much; nor is he ſo abſtemious as to intercede with the Magiſtrate that all matter of drunkennes be baniſht the Common-wealth; and yet for the fear of a leſs inconvenience unpardnably requires of his brethren, in their extream neceſſity, to debar themſelves the uſe of Gods permiſſive Law, though it might be their ſaving, and no mans indangering the more. Thus this peremptory ſtrictnes we may diſcern of what ſort it is, how unequal and how unjuſt.

But it will breed confuſion. What confuſion it would breed, God himſelf took the care to prevent in the fourth verſe of this Chapter, that the divorc't being married to another, might not return to her former Husband. And Juſtinians Law counſels the ſame in his Title of Nuptials. And what confuſion els can ther be in ſeparation, to ſeparat, upon extrem urgency, the religious from the irreligious, the fit from the unfit, the willing from the wilful, the abus'd from the abuſer? ſuch a ſeparation is quite contrary to confuſion. But to bind and mix together holy with Atheiſt, heav'nly with helliſh, fitnes with unfitnes, light with darknes, antipathy with antipathy, the injur'd with the injurer, and force them into the moſt inward neernes of a deteſted union, this doubtles is the moſt horrid, the moſt unnatural mixture, the greateſt confuſion that can be confus'd.

Thus by this plain and Chriſtian Talmud, vindicating the Law of God from irreverent and unwary expoſitions, I truſt, wher it ſhall meet with intelligible peruſers, ſom ſtay at leaſt of mens thoughts will be obtain'd, to conſider theſe many prudent and righteous ends of this divorcing permiſſion: That it may have, for the great Authors ſake, heerafter ſome competent allowance to be counted a little purer then the prerogative of a legal and public ribaldry, granted to that holy ſeed. So that from hence we ſhall hope to find the way ſtill more open to the reconciling of thoſe places which treat this matter in the Goſpel. And thither now without interruption the cours of method brings us.

MATTH. V. 31, 32.

31 It hath been ſaid, whoſoever ſhall put away his Wife, let him give her a writing of Divorcement.

32 But I ſay unto you, that whoſoever ſhall put away his Wife, &c.

MATTH. XIX. 3, 4, &c.

3 And the Phariſees alſo came unto him, tempting him, &c.

I*T hath been ſaid.*] What hitherto hath been ſpoke upon the Law of God touching Matrimony or Divorce, he who will deny to have bin argu'd according to reaſon, and all equity of Scripture, I cannot edifie how, or by what rule of proportion that mans vertue calculates, what his elements are, nor what his analytics. Confidently to thoſe who have read good books, and to thoſe whoſe reaſon is not an illiterate book to themſelves, I appeal, whether they would not confeſs all this to be the commentary of truth and juſtice, were it not for theſe recited words of our Saviour. And if they take not back that which they thus grant, nothing ſooner might perſwade them that Chriſt heer teaches no new precept, and nothing ſooner might direct them to find his meaning, then to compare and meaſure it by the rules of nature and eternal righteouſnes, which no writt'n Law extinguiſhes, and the Goſpel leaſt of all. For what can be more oppoſite and diſparaging to the cov'nant of love, of freedom, and of our manhood in grace, then to be made the yoking pedagogue of new ſeverities, the ſcribe of ſyllables and rigid letters, not only grievous to the beſt of men, but different and ſtrange from the light of reaſon in them, ſave only as they are fain to ſtretch and diſtort their apprehenſions, for fear of diſpleaſing the verbal ſtraitneſs of a text, which our own ſervil fear gives us not the leiſure to underſtand aright? If the Law of Chriſt ſhall be writt'n in our hearts, as was promis'd to the Goſpel, Jer. 31. how can this in the vulgar and ſuperficial ſenſe be a Law of Chriſt, ſo far from being writt'n in our hearts, that it injures and diſallows not only the free dictates of Nature and moral Law, but of Charity alſo and Religion in our heart? Our Saviours doctrine is, that the end, and the fulfilling of every command is charity; no faith without it, no truth without it, no worſhip, no works pleaſing to God but as they partake of charity. He himſelf ſets us an example, breaking the ſolemneſt and the ſtricteſt ordinance of religious reſt, and juſtify'd the breaking, not to cure a dying man, but ſuch whoſe cure might without danger have been deferr'd. And wherefore needs muſt the ſick mans bed be carried home on that day by his appointment? and why were the Diſciples, who could not forbear on that day to pluck the corn, ſo induſtriouſly defended, but to ſhew us that if he preferr'd the ſlighteſt occaſions of Mans good before the obſerving of higheſt and ſevereſt ordinances, he gave us much more eaſie leave to break the intolerable yoak of a never well joyn'd Wedlock for the removing of our heavieſt afflictions? Therefore it is that the moſt evangelick precepts are given us in proverbial forms, to drive us from the letter, though we love ever to be ſticking there. For no other cauſe did Chriſt aſſure us that whatſoever things we bind, or ſlacken on earth, are ſo in heaven, but to ſignifie that the chriſtian arbitrement of charity is ſupreme decider of all controverſie, and ſupreme reſolver of all Scripture; not as the Pope determines for his own tyranny, but as the Church ought to determine for its own true liberty. Hence Euſebius, not far from beginning his Hiſtory, compares the ſtate of Chriſtians to that of Noah and the Patriarchs before the Law. And this indeed was the reaſon why Apoſtolick tradition in the antient Church was counted nigh equal to the writt'n word, though it carried them at length awry, for want of conſidering that tradition was not left to be impos'd as Law, but to be a pattern of that Chriſtian prudence, and liberty which holy men by right aſſum'd of old; which truth was ſo evident, that it found entrance even into the Council of Trent, when the point of Tradition came to be diſcuſt. And Marinaro, a learned Carmelite, for approaching too near the true cauſe that gave eſteem to Tradition, that is to ſay, the difference between the Old and New Teſtament, the one punctually preſcribing writt'n Law, the other guiding by the inward Spirit, was reprehended by Cardinal Pool as one that had ſpoken more worthy a German Colloquie, then a General Council. I omit many inſtances, many proofs and arguments of this kind, which alone would compile a juſt volume, and ſhall content me here to have ſhew'n breifly, that the great and almoſt only commandment of the Goſpel, is to command nothing againſt the good of man, and much more no civil command, againſt his civil good. If we underſtand not this, we are but crackt cimbals, we do but tinkle, we know nothing, we do nothing, all the ſweat of our toilſomeſt obedience will but mock us. And what we ſuffer ſuperſtitiouſly, returns us no thanks. Thus med'cining our eyes, we need not doubt to ſee more into the meaning of theſe our Saviours words, then many who have gone before us.

It hath been ſaid, whoſoever ſhall put away his wife.] Our Saviour was by the Doctors of his time ſuſpected of intending to diſſolve the Law. In this Chapter he wipes off this aſperſion upon his Accuſers, and ſhews how they were the Law-breakers. In every Common-wealth, when it decays, Corruption makes two main ſteps; firſt, when men ceaſe to do according to the inward and uncompell'd actions of Vertue, caring only to live by the outward conſtraint of Law, and turn the ſimplicity of real good into the craft of ſeeming ſo by Law. To this hypocritical honeſty was Rome declin'd in that Age wherein Horace liv'd, and diſcover'd it to Quintius.

Whom do we count a good man, whom but he
Who keeps the laws and ſtatutes of the Senate,
Who judges in great ſuits and controverſies,
Whoſe witneſs and opinion wins the cauſe?
But his own houſe, and the whole neighbourhood
Sees his foul inſide through his whited skin.

The next declining is, when Law becomes now too ſtrait for the ſecular Manners, and thoſe too looſe for the cincture of Law. This brings in falſe and crooked Interpretations to eke out Law, and invents the ſuttle encroachment of obſcure Traditions hard to be diſprov'd. To both theſe deſcents the Phariſees themſelves were fall'n. Our Saviour therefore ſhews them both where they broke the Law, in not marking the divine Intent thereof, but only the Letter; and where they deprav'd the Letter alſo with ſophiſtical Expoſitions. This Law of Divorce they had deprav'd both ways: firſt, by teaching that to give a bill of Divorce was all the duty which that Law requir'd, whatever the cauſe were; next by running to Divorce for any trivial, accidental cauſe; whenas the Law evidently ſtays in the grave cauſes of natural and immutable diſlike. It hath been ſaid, ſaith he. Chriſt doth not put any contempt or diſeſteem upon the Law of Moſes, by citing it ſo briefly; for in the ſame manner God himſelf cites a Law of greateſt caution, Jer. 3. They ſay if a man put away his wife, ſhall he return to her again? &c. Nor doth he more aboliſh it then the Law of ſwearing, cited next with the ſame brevity, and more appearance of contradicting: for Divorce hath an exception left it; but we are charg'd there, as abſolutely as words can charge us, not to ſwear at all: yet who denies the lawfulnes of an Oath, though here it be in no caſe permitted? And what ſhall become of his ſolemn Proteſtation not to aboliſh one Law, or one tittle of any Law, eſpecially of thoſe which he mentions in this Chapter? And that he meant more particularly the not aboliſhing of Moſaic Divorce, is beyond all cavil manifeſt in Luke 16. 17, 18. where this Clauſe againſt abrogating is inſerted immediately before the ſentence againſt Divorce, as if it were call'd thither on purpoſe to defend the equity of this particular Law againſt the foreſeen raſhneſs of common Textuaries, who aboliſh Laws, as the Rabble demoliſh Images, in the zeal of their hammers oft violating the Sepulchers of good men; like Pentheus in the Tragedies, they ſee that for Thebes which is not, and take that for Superſtition, as theſe men in the heat of their annulling perceive not how they aboliſh Right, and Equal, and Juſtice under the appearance of judicial. And yet are confeſſing all the while, that theſe ſayings of Chriſt ſtand not in contradiction to the Law of Moſes, but to the falſe Doctrine of the Phariſees rais'd from thence; that the Law of God is perfect, not liable to additions or diminutions: and Pareus accuſes the Jeſuit Maldonatus of greateſt falſity for limiting the perfection of that Law only to the rudenes of the Jews. He adds, That the Law promiſeth life to the performers thereof, therefore needs not perfitter precepts then ſuch as bring to life; that if the corrections of Chriſt ſtand oppoſite, not to the corruptions of the Phariſees, but to the Law it ſelf of God, the hereſie of Manes would follow, one God of the Old Teſtament, and another of the New. That Chriſt ſaith not here, Except your righteouſneſs exceed the righteouſneſs of Moſes Law, but of the Scribes and Phariſees. That all this may be true: whether is common ſenſe flown aſquint, if we can maintain that Chriſt forbid the Moſaic Divorce utterly, and yet aboliſht not the Law that permits it? For if the Conſcience only were checkt, and the Law not repeal'd, what means the Fanatic boldneſs of this Age that dares tutor Chriſt to be more ſtrict then he thought fit? Ye ſhall have the evaſion, it was a judicial Law. What could infancy and ſlumber have invented more childiſh? judicial or not judicial, it was one of thoſe laws expreſly which he forewarn'd us with proteſtation, that his mind was not to abrogate: and if we mark the ſteerage of his words, what courſe they hold, we may perceive that what he proteſted not to diſſolve (that he might faithfully and not deceitfully remove a ſuſpition from himſelf) was principally concerning the judicial Law; for of that ſort are all theſe here which he vindicates, except the laſt. Of the Ceremonial Law he told them true, that nothing of it ſhould paſs until all were fulfill'd. Of the moral Law he knew the Phariſees did not ſuſpect he meant to nullifie that: for ſo doing would ſoon have undone his authority, and advanced theirs. Of the judicial Law therefore chiefly this Apologie was meant: For how is that fulfill'd longer then the common equity thereof remains in force? And how is this our Saviours defence of himſelf not made fallacious, if the Phariſees chief fear be leſt he ſhould aboliſh the judicial Law, and he to ſatisfy them, proteſts his good intention to the Moral Law? It is the general grant of Divines, that what in the Judicial Law is not meerly judaical, but reaches to human equity in common, was never in the thought of being abrogated. If our Saviour took away ought of Law, it was the burthenſome of it, not the eaſe of burden; it was the bondage, not the liberty of any divine Law, that he remov'd: this he often profeſt to be the end of his coming. But what if the Law of Divorce be a moral Law, as moſt certainly it is fundamentally, and hath been ſo prov'd in the reaſons thereof? For though the giving of a Bill may be judicial, yet the act of Divorce is altogether converſant in good or evil, and ſo abſolutely moral. So far as it is good, it never can be aboliſht, being moral; and ſo far as it is ſimply evil, it never could be judicial, as hath been ſhewn at large in the Doctrine of Divorce, and will be reaſſum'd anon. Whence one of theſe two neceſſities follow, that either it was never eſtabliſht, or never aboliſht. Thus much may be enough to have ſaid on this place. The following Verſe will be better unfolded in the 19*th* Chapter, where it meets us again, after a large debatement on the Queſtion between our Saviour and his Adverſaries.

Mat. XIX. 3, 4, &c.

V. 3. And the Phariſees came unto him, tempting him, and ſaying unto him.

Tempting him. ] The manner of theſe men coming to our Saviour, not to learn, but to tempt him, may give us to expect that their Anſwer will be ſuch as is fitteſt for them; not ſo much a teaching, as an intangling. No man, though never ſo willing or ſo well enabl'd to inſtruct, but if he diſcern his willingneſs and candor made

made uſe of to intrap him, will ſuddenly draw in himſelf, and laying aſide the facil vein of perſpicuity, will know his time to utter Clouds and Riddles; if he be not leſs wiſe than that noted Fiſh, when as he ſhould be not unwiſer than the Serpent. Our Saviour at no time expreſt any great deſire to teach the obſtinate and unteachable Phariſees; but when they came to tempt him, then leaſt of all. As now about the liberty of Divorce, ſo another time about the puniſhment of Adultery they came to ſound him; and what ſatisfaction got they from his anſwer, either to themſelves or to us, that might direct a Law under the Goſpel new from that of Moſes, unleſs we draw his abſolution of Adultery into an Edict? So about the Tribute, who is there can pick out a full Solution, what and when we muſt give to Cæſar, by the Anſwer which he gave the Phariſees? If we muſt give to Cæſar that which is Cæſars, and all be Cæſars which hath his Image, we muſt either new ſtamp our Coin, or we may go new ſtamp our Foreheads with the ſuperſcription of Slaves inſtead of Freemen. Beſides, it is a general Precept, not only of Chriſt, but of all other Sages, not to inſtruct the unworthy and the conceited, who love Tradition more than Truth, but to perplex and ſtumble them purpoſely with contriv'd obſcurities. No wonder then if they who would determine of Divorce by this place, have ever found it difficult, and unſatiſfying through all the Ages of the Church, as Auſtin himſelf and other great Writers confeſs. Laſtly, It is manifeſt to be the principal ſcope of our Saviour, both here, and in the 5th of Matthew, to convince the Phariſees of what they being evil did licentiouſly, not to explain what others being good and blameleſs men might be permitted to do in caſe of extremity. Neither was it ſeaſonable to talk of honeſt and conſcientious liberty among them, who had abuſed legal and civil liberty to uncivil licence. We do not ſay to a Servant what we ſay to a Son; nor was it expedient to preach Freedom to thoſe who had tranſgreſt in Wantonneſs. When we rebuke a Prodigal, we admoniſh him of Thrift, not of Magnificence, or Bounty. And to ſchool a proud man we labour to make him humble, not magnanimous. So Chriſt to retort theſe arrogant Inquiſitors their own, took the courſe to lay their Haughtineſs under a ſeverity which they deſerv'd; not to acquaint them, or to make them Judges either of the juſt mans Right and Privilege, or of the afflicted mans Neceſſity. And if we may have leave to conjecture, there is a likelyhood offer'd us by Tertullian in his 4th againſt Marcion, whereby it may ſeem very probable that the Phariſees had a private drift of Malice againſt our Saviours life in propoſing this Queſtion; and our Saviour had a peculiar aim in the rigor of his Anſwer, both to let them know the freedom of his ſpirit, and the ſharpneſs of his diſcerning. This I muſt now ſhew, ſaith Tertullian, whence our Lord deduc'd this ſentence, and which way he directed it, whereby it will more fully appear that he intended not to diſſolve Moſes. And thereupon tells us, that the vehemence of this our Saviours ſpeech was chiefly darted againſt Herod and Herodias. The Story is out of Joſephus: Herod had been a long time married to the Daughter of Aretas King of Petra, till haphing on his jorney towards Rome to be entertain'd at his brother Philips houſe, he caſt his eye unlawfully and ungueſtlike upon Herodias there, the Wife of Philip, but Daughter to Ariſtobulus their common Brother, and durſt make words of marrying her his Neece from his Brothers bed. She aſſented upon agreement he ſhould expel his former Wife. All was accompliſht, and by the Baptiſt rebukt with the loſs of his head. Though doubtles that ſtaid not the various diſcourſes of men upon the fact, which while the Herodian flatterers, and not a few perhaps among the Phariſees, endeavour'd to defend by wreſting the Law, it might be a means to bring the Queſtion of Divorce into a hot agitation among the People, how far Moſes gave allowance. The Phariſees therefore, knowing our Saviour to be a friend of John the Baptiſt, and no doubt but having heard much of his Sermon in the Mount, wherein he ſpake rigidly againſt the licence of Divorce, they put him this Queſtion, both in hope to find him a Contradicter of Moſes, and a Condemner of Herod; ſo to inſnare him within compaſs of the ſame accuſation which had ended his friend; and our Saviour ſo orders his Anſwer, as that they might perceive Herod and his Adultreſs, only not nam'd: ſo lively it concern'd them both what he ſpake. No wonder then if the Sentence of our Saviour ſounded ſtricter then his cuſtom was; which his conſcious Attempters doubtleſs apprehended ſooner then his other Auditors. Thus much we gain from hence to inform us, that what Chriſt intends to ſpeak here of Divorce, will be rather the forbidding of what we may not do herein paſſionately and abuſively, as Herod and Herodias did, then the diſcuſſing of what herein we may do reaſonably and neceſſarily.

Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife?] It might be render'd more exactly from the Greek, to looſen or to ſet free; which though it ſeem to have a milder ſignification then the two Hebrew words commonly us'd for divorce, yet Interpreters have noted, that the Greek alſo is read in the Septuagint, for an act which is not without conſtraint. As when Achiſh drove from his preſence David counterfeting madneſs. Pſal. 34. the Greek word is the ſame with this here, to put away. And Eraſmus quotes Hilary rendering it by an expreſſion not ſo ſoft. Whence may be doubted, whether the Phariſes did not ſtate this queſtion in the ſtrict right of the man, not tarrying for the wives conſent. And if our Saviour anſwer directly according to what was askt in the term of putting away, it may be queſtionable, whether the rigor of his ſentence did not forbid only ſuch putting away as is without mutual conſent, in a violent and harſh manner, or without any reaſon, but will, as the Tetrarch did. Which might be the cauſe that thoſe Chriſtian Emperours fear'd not in their conſtitutions to diſſolve Marriage by mutual conſent; in that our Saviour ſeems here, as the caſe is moſt likely, not to condemn all divorce, but all injury and violence in divorce. But no injury can be done to them who ſeek it, as the Ethics of Ariſtotle ſufficiently prove. True it is, that an unjuſt thing may be done to one though willing, and ſo may juſtly be forbid'n: But divorce being in it ſelf no unjuſt or evil thing, but only as it is joyn'd with injury, or luſt; injury it cannot be at law, if conſent be, and Ariſtotle err not. And luſt it may as frequently not be, while charity hath the judging of ſo many private grievances in a misfortun'd Wedlock, which may pard'nably ſeek a redemption. But whether it be or not, the law cannot diſcern, or examin luſt, ſo long as it walks from one lawful term to another, from Divorce to Marriage, both in themſelves indifferent. For if the Law cannot take hold to puniſh many actions apparently covetous, ambitious, ingrateful, proud, how can it forbid and puniſh that for luſt, which is but only ſurmis'd ſo, and can no more be certainly prov'd in the divorcing now, then before in the marrying? Whence if Divorce be no unjuſt thing, but through luſt, a cauſe not diſcernable by law, as law is wont to diſcern in other caſes, and can be no injury where conſent is, there can be nothing in the equity of law, why divorce by conſent may not be lawful: leaving ſecrecies to conſcience, the thing which our Saviour here aims to rectifie, not to revoke the ſtatutes of Moſes. In the mean while the word To put away, being in the Greek to looſen or diſſolve, utterly takes away that vain papiſtical diſtinction of divorce from bed, and divorce from bond, evincing plainly that both Chriſt and the Phariſes mean here that divorce which finally diſſolves the bond, and frees both parties to a ſecond Marriage.

For every cauſe.] This the Phariſes held, that for every cauſe they might divorce, for every accidental cauſe, any quarrel or difference that might happ'n. So both Joſephus and Philo, men who liv'd in the ſame age, explain; and the Syriack tranſlater, whoſe antiquity is thought parallel to the Evangeliſts themſelves, reads it conformably upon any occaſion or pretence. Divines alſo generally agree that thus the Phariſes meant. Cameron a late Writer, much applauded, commenting this place not undiligently, affirms that the Greek prepoſition κατὰ tranſlated unuſually (For) hath a force in it implying the ſuddeneſs of thoſe Phariſaic divorces; and that their queſtion was to this effect, whether for any cauſe whatever it chanc'd to be, ſtraight as it roſe, the divorce might be lawful. This he freely gives what ever mov'd him, and I as freely take, nor can deny his obſervation to be acute and learned. If therefore we inſiſt upon the word of putting away, that it imports a conſtraint without conſent, as might be inſiſted, and may enjoy what Cameron beſtows on us, that for every cauſe is to be underſtood, according as any cauſe may happen, with a relation to the ſpeedineſs of thoſe divorces, and that Herodian act eſpecially, as is already brought us, the ſentence of our Saviour will appear nothing ſo ſtrict a prohibition as hath been long conceiv'd, forbidding only to divorce for caſual and temporary cauſes, that may be ſoon ended, or ſoon remedied; and likewiſe forbidding to divorce raſhly, and on the ſudden heat, except it be for adultery. If theſe qualifications may be admitted, as partly we offer them, partly are offer'd them by ſome of their own opinion, and that where nothing is repugnant why they ſhould not be admitted, nothing can wreſt them from us, the ſevere ſentence of our Saviour will ſtraight unbend the ſeeming frown into that gentleneſs and compaſſion which was ſo abundant in all his actions, his office and his doctrine, from all which otherwiſe it ſtands off at no mean diſtance.

Verſ. 4. And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, Have ye not read that he which made them at the beginning, made them Male and Female?

Verſ. 5. And ſaid, for this cauſe ſhall a man leave Father and Mother, and ſhall cleave to his Wiſe, and they twain ſhall be one fleſh.

Verſ. 6. Wherefore they are no more twain, but one fleſh: what therefore God hath joyned together, let no man put aſunder.

4. and 5. Made them Male and Female; And ſaid, for this cauſe, &c.] We ſee it here undeniably, that the Law which our Saviour cites to prove that Divorce was forbidd'n, is not an abſolute and tyrannical command without reaſon, as now-a-days we make it little better, but is grounded upon ſome rational cauſe not difficult to be apprehended, being in a matter which equally concerns the meaneſt and the plaineſt ſort of perſons in a houſhold life. Our next way then will be to inquire if there be not more reaſons then one; and if there be, whether this be the beſt and chiefeſt. That we ſhall find by turning to the firſt Inſtitution, to which Chriſt refers our own reading; He himſelf having to deal with treacherous aſſailants, uſeth brevity, and lighting on the firſt place in Geneſis that mentions any thing tending to Marriage in the firſt chapter, joyns it immediately to the 24th verſe of the 2d chapter, omitting all the prime words between, which create the inſtitution, and contain the nobleſt and pureſt ends of Matrimony; without which attain'd, that conjunction hath nothing in it above what is common to us with beaſts. So likewiſe beneath in this very chapter, to the young man who came not tempting him, but to learn of him, asking him which Commandments he ſhould keep; he neither repeats the firſt Table, nor all the ſecond, nor that in order which he repeats. If here then being tempted, he deſire to be the ſhorter, and the darker in his Conference, and omit to cite that from the ſecond of Geneſis, which all Divines confeſs is a Commentary to what he cites out of the firſt, the making them Male and Female: what are we to do, but to ſearch the inſtitution our ſelves? and we ſhall find there his own authority, giving other manner of reaſons why ſuch firm union is to be in Matrimony; without which reaſons, there being male and female can be no cauſe of joyning them unſeparably: for if it be, then no Adultery can ſever. Therefore the prohibition of Divorce depends not upon this reaſon here expreſt to the Phariſes, but upon the plainer and more eminent cauſes omitted here, and referr'd to the inſtitution; which cauſes not being found in a particular and caſual Matrimony, this ſenſitive and materious cauſe alone can no more hinder a divorce againſt thoſe higher and more human reaſons urging it, then it can alone without them to warrant a copulation, but leaves arbitrary to thoſe who in their chance of Marriage find not why Divorce is forbid them, but why it is permitted them; and find both here and in Geneſis, that the forbidding is not abſolute, but according to the reaſons there taught us, not here. And that our Saviour taught them no better, but uſes the moſt vulgar, moſt animal and corporal argument to convince them, is firſt to ſhew us, that as through their licentious Divorces they made no more of Marriage then, as if to marry were no more then to be male and female, ſo he goes no higher in his confutation; deeming them unworthy to be talkt with in a higher ſtrain, but to be ty'd in Marriage by the meer material cauſe thereof, ſince their own licence teſtify'd that nothing matrimonial was in their thought but to be male and female. Next it might be done to diſcover the brute ignorance of theſe carnal Doctors, who taking on them to diſpute of Marriage and Divorce, were put to ſilence with ſuch a ſlender oppoſition as this, and outed from their hold with ſcarce one quarter of an argument. That we may believe this, his entertainment of the young man ſoon after may perſwade us. Whom, though he came to preach eternal life by faith only, he diſmiſſes with a ſalvation taught him by works only. On which place Paræus notes, That this man was to be convinc'd by a falſe perſwaſion; and that Chriſt is wont otherwiſe to anſwer hypocrites, otherwiſe thoſe that are docible. Much rather then may we think that in handling theſe tempters, he forgot not ſo to frame his prudent ambiguities and concealments, as was to the troubling of thoſe peremptory diſputants moſt wholſome. When therefore we would know what right there may be, in ill accidents, to divorce, we muſt repair thither where God profeſſes to teach his ſervants by the prime inſtitution, and not where we ſee him intending to dazle Sophiſters: We muſt not read he made them Male and Female, and not underſtand he made them more intendedly a meet help to remove the evil of being alone. We muſt take both theſe together, and then we may infer compleatly as from the whole cauſe why a man ſhall cleave to his wife, and they twain ſhall be one fleſh: but if the full and chief cauſe why we may not divorce, be wanting here, this place may skirmiſh with the Rabbies while it will, but to the true Chriſtian it prohibits nothing beyond the full reaſon of its own prohibiting, which is beſt known by the inſtitution.

Verſ. 6. Wherefore they are no more twain, but one fleſh.] This is true in the general right of Marriage, but not in the chance-medley of every particular match. For if they who were once undoubtedly one fleſh, yet become twain by adultery, then ſure they who were never one fleſh rightly, never helps meet for each other according to the plain preſcript of God, may with leſs ado then a volume be concluded ſtill twain. And ſo long as we account a Magiſtrate no Magiſtrate, if there be but a flaw in his election, why ſhould we not much rather count a Matrimony no Matrimony, if it cannot be in any reaſonable manner according to the words of God's inſtitution?

What therefore God hath joyned, let no man put aſunder.] But here the Chriſtian prudence lies to conſider what God hath joyn'd; ſhall we ſay that God hath joyn'd error, fraud, unfitneſs, wrath, contention, perpetual lonelineſs, perpetual diſcord; what ever luſt, or wine, or witchery, threat, or inticement, avarice or ambition hath joyn'd together, faithful with unfaithful, Chriſtian with Antichriſtian, hate with hate, or hate with love, ſhall we ſay this is God's joyning?

Let not man put aſunder.] That is to ſay, what God hath joyn'd; for if it be, as how oft we ſee it may be, not of God's joyning, and his Law tells us he joyns not unmatchable things, but hates to joyn them, as an abominable confuſion, then the divine law of Moſes puts them aſunder, his own divine will in the inſtitution puts them aſunder, as oft as the reaſons be not extant, for which only God ordain'd their joyning. Man only puts aſunder when his inordinate deſires, his paſſion, his violence, his injury makes the breach: not when the utter want of that which lawfully was the end of his joyning, when wrongs and extremities, and unſupportable grievances compel him to disjoin: when ſuch as Herod and the Phariſes divorce beſide law, or againſt law, then only man ſeparates, and to ſuch only this prohibition belongs. In a word, if it be unlawful for man to put aſunder that which God hath joyn'd, let man take heed it be not deteſtable to joyn that by compulſion which God hath put aſunder.

Verſ. 7. They ſay unto him, Why did Moſes then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away?

Verſ. 8. He ſaith unto them, Moſes becauſe of the hardneſs of your hearts ſuffered you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not ſo.

Moſes becauſe of the hardneſs of your hearts ſuffered you.] Hence the Divinity now current argues that this judicial Moſes is aboliſht. But ſuppoſe it were ſo, though it hath bin prov'd otherwiſe, the firmneſs of ſuch right to divorce as here pleads is fetcht from the prime inſtitution, does not ſtand or fall with the judicial Jew, but is as moral as what is moraleſt. Yet as I have ſhewn poſitively that this law cannot be abrogated, both by the words of our Saviour pronouncing the contrary, and by that unaboliſhable equity which it conveies to us; ſo I ſhall now bring to view thoſe appearances of ſtrength which are levied from this text to maintain the moſt groſs and maſſy paradox that ever did violence to reaſon and religion, bred only under the ſhadow of theſe words, to all other piety or philoſophy ſtrange and inſolent, that God by act of law drew out a line of adultery almoſt two thouſand years long: although to detect the prodigy of this ſurmiſe, the former book ſet forth on this argument hath already been copious. I ſhall not repeat much though I might borrow of mine own, but ſhall endeavour to add ſomething either yet untoucht, or not largely anough explain'd. Firſt it ſhall be manifeſt that the common expoſition cannot poſſibly conſiſt with chriſtian doctrine: next a truer meaning of this our Saviours reply ſhall be left in the room. The receiv'd expoſition is, that God, though not approving, did enact a law to permit adultery by divorcement ſimply unlawful. And this conceit they feed with fond ſuppoſals that have not the leaſt footing in Scripture: As that the Jews learnt this cuſtom of divorce in Egypt, and therefore God would not unteach it them till Chriſt came, but let it ſtick as a notorious botch of deformity in the midſt of his moſt perfect and ſevere law. And yet he ſaith, Levit. the 18th, after the doings of Egypt ye ſhall not do. Another while they invent a ſlander (as what thing more bold then teaching Ignorance when he ſhifts to hide his nakednes?) that the Jews were naturally to their wives the crueleſt men in the world; would poiſon, brain, and do I know not what, if they might not divorce. Certain, if it were a fault heavily puniſht, to bring an evil report upon the land which God gave, what is it to raiſe a groundles calumny againſt the people which God made choiſe of? But that this bold interpretament, how commonly ſo ever ſided with, cannot ſtand a minute with any competent reverence to God or his law, or his people, nor with any other maxim of religion, or good manners, might be prov'd through all the heads and the Topics of argumentation: but I ſhall willingly be as conciſe as poſſible. Firſt the law, not only the moral, but the judicial given by Moſes, is juſt and pure; for ſuch is God who gave it. Harken O Iſrael, ſaith Moſes, Deut. 4. unto the ſtatutes and the judgments which I teach you, to do them, that ye may live, &c. Ye ſhall not add unto the word which I command you, neither ſhall ye diminiſh ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you. And onward in the chapter, Behold, I have taught you ſtatutes and judgments, even as the Lord my God commanded me. Keep therefore and do them, for this is your wiſdom and your underſtanding. For what nation hath God ſo nigh unto them, and what nation hath ſtatutes and judgments ſo righteous as all this law which I ſet before ye this day? Is it imaginable ther ſhould be among theſe a law which God allow'd not, a law giving permiſſions laxative to unmarry a wife and marry a luſt, a law to ſuffer a kind of tribunal adultery? Many other Scriptures might be brought to aſſert the purity of this judicial Law, and many I have alleg'd before; this law therefore is pure and juſt. But if it permit, if it teach, if it defend that which is both unjuſt and impure, as by the common doctrine it doth, what think we? The three general doctrines of Juſtinians law, are To live in honeſty, To hurt no man, To give every one his due. Shall the Roman civil law obſerve theſe three things, as the only end of law, and ſhall a ſtatute be found in the civil law of God, enacted ſimply and totally againſt all theſe three precepts of nature and morality?

Secondly, The gifts of God are all perfet, and certainly the Law is of all his other gifts one of the perfeteſt. But if it give that outwardly which it takes away really, and give that ſeemingly, which, if a man take it, wraps him into ſin and damns him; what gift of an enemy can be more dangerous and deſtroying then this?

Thirdly, Moſes every-where commends his Laws, prefers them before all of other Nations, and warrants them to be the way of life and ſafety to all that walk therein, Levit. 18. But if they contain Statutes which God approves not, and train men unweeting to commit injuſtice and adultery under the ſhelter of Law; if thoſe things be ſin, and death ſins wages, what is this Law but the ſnare of death?

Fourthly, The Statutes and Judgments of the Lord, which, without exception, are often told us to be ſuch, as doing we may live by them, are doubtles to be counted the rule of knowledg and of conſcience. For I had not known luſt, ſaith the Apoſtle, but by the law. But if the Law come down from the ſtate of her incorruptible Majeſty to grant luſt his boon, palpably it dark'ns and confounds both knowledg and conſcience; it goes againſt the common office of all goodneſs and friendlineſs, which is at leaſt to counſel and admoniſh; it ſubverts the rules of all ſober education, and is it ſelf a moſt negligent and debauching Tutor.

Fiftly, If the Law permit a thing unlawful, it permits that which elſe-where it hath forbid; ſo that hereby it contradicts it ſelf, and tranſgreſſes it ſelf. But if the Law become a tranſgreſſor, it ſtands guilty to it ſelf, and how then ſhall it ſave another? it makes a confederacy with ſin, how then can it juſtly condemn a ſinner? And thus reducing it ſelf to the ſtate of neither ſaving nor condemning, it will not fail to expire ſolemnly ridiculous.

Sixtly, The Prophets in Scripture declare ſeverely againſt the decreeing of that which is unjuſt, Pſal. 94. 20. Iſaiah the 10th. But it was done, they ſay, for hardneſs of heart: To which Objection the Apoſtle's rule, not to do evil that good may come thereby, gives an invincible repuls; and here eſpecially, where it cannot be ſhewn how any good came by doing this evil, how rather more evil did not hereon abound; for the giving way to hardneſs of heart hard'ns the more, and adds more to the number. God to an evil and adulterous generation would not grant a ſign; much leſs would he for their hardneſs of heart pollute his Law with an adulterous permiſſion. Yea, but to permit evil, is not to do evil. Yes, it is in a moſt eminent manner to do evil: where elſe are all our grave and faithful ſayings, that he whoſe office is to forbid and forbids not, bids, exhorts, encourages? Why hath God denounc'd his anger againſt Parents, Maſters, Friends, Magiſtrates neglectful of forbidding what they ought, if Law, the common Father, Maſter, Friend, and perpetual Magiſtrate ſhall not only not forbid, but enact, exhibit, and uphold with countenance and protection, a deed every way diſhoneſt, whatever the pretence be. If it were of thoſe inward vices, which the Law cannot by outward conſtraint remedy, but leaves to conſcience and perſwaſion, it had bin guiltleſs in being ſilent: but to write a Decree of that which can be no way lawful, and might with eaſe be hinder'd, makes Law by the doom of Law it ſelf acceſſory in the higheſt degree.

Seventhly, It makes God the direct author of Sin: For although he be not made the author of what he ſilently permits in his Providence, yet in his Law, the image of his Will, when in plain expreſſion he conſtitutes and ordains a fact utterly unlawful; what wants he to authorize it, and what wants that to be the author?

Eightly, To eſtabliſh by Law a thing wholly unlawful and diſhoneſt, is an affirmation was never heard of before in any Law, Reaſon, Philoſophy, or Religion, till it was rais'd by inconſiderat Gloſſiſts from the miſtake of this Text. And though the Civilians have bin contented to chew this opinion, after the Canon had ſubdu'd them, yet they never could bring example or authority either from divine Writ, or human Learning, or human Practice in any Nation, or well-form'd Republick, but only from the cuſtomary abuſe of this text. Uſually they allege the Epiſtle of Cicero to Atticus; wherein Cato is blam'd for giving ſentence to the ſcum of Romulus, as if he were in Plato's Commonwealth. Cato would have call'd ſome great one into judgment for Bribery; Cicero, as the time ſtood, adviſ'd againſt it. Cato, not to endamage the public Treaſury, would not grant to the Roman Knights, that the Aſian Taxes might be farm'd them at a leſs rate. Cicero wiſht it granted. Nothing in all this will be like the eſtabliſhing of a Law to ſin: Here are no Laws made, here only the execution of Law is crav'd might be ſuſpended: between which and our queſtion is a broad difference. And what if human Law-givers have confeſt they could not frame their Laws to that perfection which they deſir'd? we hear of no ſuch confeſſion from Moſes concerning the Laws of God, but rather all praiſe and high teſtimony of perfection given them. And although man's nature cannot bear exacteſt Laws, yet ſtill within the confines of good it may and muſt, ſo long as leſs good is far enough from altogether evil. As for what they inſtance of Uſury, let them firſt prove Uſury to be wholly unlawful, as the Law allows it; which learned Men as numerous on the other ſide will deny them. Or if it be altogether unlawful, why is it tolerated more then Divorce? he who ſaid, Divorce not, ſaid alſo, Lend, hoping for nothing again, Luk. 6. 35. But then they put in, that Trade could not ſtand. And ſo to ſerve the commodity of inſatiable trading, Uſury ſhall be permitted, but Divorce, the only means oft-times to right the innocent, and outragiouſly wrong'd, ſhall be utterly forbid. This is egregious doctrine, and for which one day Charity will much thank them. Beza not finding how to ſalve this perplexity, and Cameron ſince him, would ſecure us; although the latter confeſſes that to permit a wicked thing by law, is a wickedneſs which God abhors; yet to limit ſin, and preſcribe it a certain meaſure, is good. Firſt this evaſion will not help here; for this Law bounded no man; he might put away whatever found not favour in his eyes. And how could it forbid to divorce, whom it could not forbid to diſlike, or command to love? If theſe be the limits of Law to reſtrain ſin, who ſo lame a ſinner but may hop over them more eaſily then over thoſe Romulean circumſcriptions, not as Remus did with hard ſucces, but with all indemnity? Such a limiting as this were not worth the miſchief that accompanies it. This Law therefore not bounding the ſuppoſed ſin, by permitting enlarges it, gives it enfranchiſement. And never greater confuſion, then when Law and Sin move their Land-marks, mix their Territories, and correſpond, have intercourſe and traffick together. When Law contracts a kindred and hoſpitality with Tranſgreſſion, becomes the Godfather of ſin, and names it lawful; when ſin revels and goſſips within the Arcenal of Law, plays and dandles the Artillery of Juſtice that ſhould be bent againſt her, this is a fair limitation indeed. Beſides, it is an abſurdity to ſay that Law can meaſure ſin, or moderate ſin; ſin is not in a predicament to be meaſur'd and modify'd, but is always an exceſs. The leaſt ſin that is, exceeds the meaſure of the largeſt Law that can be good; and is as boundleſs as that vacuity beyond the world. If once it ſquare to the meaſure of Law, it ceaſes to be an exceſs, and conſequently ceaſes to be a ſin; or elſe Law conforming it ſelf to the obliquity of ſin, betrays it ſelf to be not ſtreight, but crooked, and ſo immediately no Law. And the improper conceit of moderating ſin by Law, will appear, if we can imagin any Law-giver ſo ſenſleſs as to decree that ſo far a man may ſteal, and thus far be drunk, that moderately he may cozen, and moderately commit adultery. To the ſame extent it would be as pithily abſurd to publiſh that a man may moderately divorce, if to do that be intirely naught. But to end this moot, the Law of Moſes is manifeſt to fix no limit therein at all, or ſuch at leaſt as impeaches the fraudulent abuſer no more then if it were not ſet; only requires the diſmiſſive writing without other caution, leaves that to the inner man, and the bar of conſcience. But it ſtopt other ſins. This is as vain as the reſt, and dangerouſly uncertain: the contrary to be fear'd rather, that one ſin admitted courteouſly by Law, open'd the gate to another. However, evil muſt not be done for good. And it were a fall to be lamented, an indignity unſpeakable, if Law ſhould become tributary to ſin her ſlave, and forc'd to yield up into his hands her awful miniſter Puniſhment, ſhould buy out her peace with ſin for ſin, paying as it were her ſo many Philiſtian foreskins to the proud demand of Tranſgreſſion. But ſuppoſe it any way poſſible to limit ſin, to put a girdle about that Chaos, ſuppoſe it alſo good; yet if to permit ſin by Law be an abomination in the eyes of God, as Cameron acknowledges, the evil of permitting will eat out the good of limiting. For though ſin be not limited, there can but evil come out of evil; but if it be permitted and decreed lawful by divine Law, of force then ſin muſt proceed from the infinite Good, which is a dreadful thought. But if the reſtraining of ſin by this permiſſion being good, as this author teſtifies, be more good then the permiſſion of more ſin by the reſtraint of divorce, and that God weighing both theſe, like two ingots in the perfet ſcales of his Juſtice and Providence found them ſo, and others coming without authority from God, ſhall change this counterpoiſe, and judg it better to let ſin multiply by ſetting a judicial reſtraint upon divorce, which Chriſt never ſet; then to limit ſin by this permiſſion, as God himſelf thought beſt to permit it, it will behove them to conſult betimes whether theſe their ballances be not fals and abominable; and this their limiting that which God looſen'd, and their looſning the ſins that he limited, which they confeſs was good to do: and were it poſſible to do by Law, doubtleſs it would be moſt morally good; and they ſo believing, as we hear they do, and yet aboliſhing a Law ſo good and moral, the limiter of ſin, what are they elſe but contrary to themſelves? for they can never bring us to that time wherein it will not be good to limit ſin, and they can never limit it better then ſo as God preſcrib'd in his Law.

Others conceive it a more defenſible retirement to ſay this permiſſion to divorce ſinfully for hardneſs of heart was a diſpenſation. But ſurely they either know not, or attend not what a diſpenſation means. A diſpenſation is for no long time, is particular to ſome perſons rather then general to a whole people; always hath Charity the end, is granted to neceſſities and infirmities, not to obſtinate luſt. This permiſſion is another creature, hath all thoſe evils and abſurdities following the name of a diſpenſation, as when it was nam'd a Law; and is the very antarctic pole againſt Charity, nothing more advers, enſnaring and ruining thoſe that truſt in it, or uſe it; ſo leud and criminous as never durſt enter into the head of any Politician, Jew, or Proſelyte, till they became the apt Scholars of this Canoniſtic Expoſition. Ought in it, that can allude in the leaſt manner to Charity, or Goodneſs, belongs with more full right to the Chriſtian under Grace and Liberty, then to the Jew under Law and Bondage. To Jewiſh ignorance it could not be diſpenc'd, without a horrid imputation laid upon the Law, to diſpence foully, inſtead of teaching fairly; like that diſpenſation that firſt polluted Chriſtendom with Idolatry, permitting to laymen Images inſtead of Books and Preaching. Sloth or malice in the Law would they have this call'd? But what ignorance can be pretended for the Jews, who had all the ſame Precepts about Marriage, that we now? for Chriſt refers all to the inſtitution. It was as reaſonable for them to know then as for us now, and concern'd them alike: for wherein hath the Goſpel alter'd the nature of Matrimony? All theſe conſiderations, or many of them, have bin furder amplify'd in the doctrine of Divorce. And what Rivetus and Pareus hath objected, or giv'n over as paſt cure, hath bin there diſcuſs'd. Whereby it may be plain enough to men of eyes, that the vulgar expoſition of a permittance by Law to an entire ſin, whatever the colour may be, is an opinion both ungodly, unpolitic, unvertuous, and void of all honeſty and civil ſenſe. It appertains therefore to every zealous Chriſtian both for the honour of God's Law, and the vindication of our Saviour's Words, that ſuch an irreligious depravement no longer may be ſooth'd and flatter'd through cuſtom, but with all diligence and ſpeed ſolidly refuted, and in the room a better explanation giv'n; which is now our next endeavour.

Moſes ſuffer'd you to put away, &c.] Not commanded you, ſays the common obſerver, and therefore car'd not how ſoon it were aboliſht, being but ſuffer'd; here in declaring his annotation to be ſlight, and nothing law prudent. For in this place commanded and ſuffer'd are interchangeably us'd in the ſame ſenſe both by our Saviour and the Phariſes. Our Saviour who here ſaith, Moſes ſuffer'd you, in the 10th of Mark ſaith, Moſes wrote you this Command. And the Phariſes who here ſay, Moſes commanded, and would mainly have it a Command, in that place of Mark ſay Moſes ſuffered, which had made againſt them in their own mouths, if the word of ſuffering had weaken'd the command. So that ſuffer'd and commanded is here taken for the ſame thing on both ſides of the controverſy: as Cameron alſo and others on this place acknowledg. And Lawyers know that all the precepts of Law are divided into obligatory and permiſſive, containing either what we muſt do, or what we may do; and of this latter ſort are as many precepts, as of the former, and all as lawful. Tutelage, an ordainment then which nothing more juſt, being for the defence of Orphans, the Inſtitutes of Juſtinian, ſay is given and permitted by the Civil Law: and to Parents it is permitted to chooſe and appoint by will the Guardians of their Children. What more equal, and yet the Civil Law calls this permiſſion. So likewiſe to manumiſe, to adopt, to make a Will, and to be made an Heir is call'd permiſſion by Law. Marriage it ſelf, and this which is already granted, to divorce for Adultery, obliges no man, is but a permiſſion by Law, is but ſuffer'd. By this we may ſee how weakly it hath bin thought that all Divorce is utterly unlawful, becauſe the Law is ſaid to ſuffer it: whenas to ſuffer is but the legal phraſe denoting what by law a man may do or not do.

Becauſe of the hardneſs of your hearts.] Hence they argue that therefore he allow'd it not; and therefore it muſt be aboliſht. But the contrary to this will ſooner follow, that becauſe he ſuffer'd it for a cauſe, therefore in relation to that cauſe he allow'd it. Next, if he in his wiſdom, and in the midſt of his ſeverity allow'd it for hardneſs of heart, it can be nothing better then arrogance and preſumption to take ſtricter courſes againſt hardneſs of heart then God ever ſet an example, and that under the Goſpel which warrants them to no judicial act of compulſion in this matter, much leſs to be more ſevere againſt hardneſs of extremity, then God thought good to be againſt hardneſs of heart. He ſuffer'd it, rather then worſe inconveniences; theſe men wiſer as they make themſelves, will ſuffer the worſt and hainouſeſt inconveniences to follow, rather then they will ſuffer what God ſuffer'd. Although they can know when they pleaſe, that Chriſt ſpake only to the conſcience, did not judg on the civil bench, but always diſavow'd it. What can be more contrary to the ways of God then theſe their doings? If they be ſuch enemies to hardnes of heart, although this groundleſs rigor proclaims it to be in themſelves, they may yet learn, or conſider that hardneſs of heart hath a twofold acception in the Goſpel. One, when it is in a good man taken for infirmity, and imperfection, which was in all the Apoſtles, whoſe weakneſs only, not utter want of belief is call'd hardnes of heart, Mark 16. Partly for this hardneſs of heart, the imperfection and decay of man from original righteouſneſs, it was that God ſuffer'd not Divorce only, but all that which by Civilians is term'd the ſecondary Law of Nature and of Nations. He ſuffer'd his own people to waſt and ſpoil and ſlay by War, to lead captives, to be ſome maſters, ſome ſervants, ſome to be Princes, others to be Subjects; he ſuffer'd propriety to divide all things by ſeveral poſſeſſion, trade and commerce, not without uſury; in his Commonwealth ſome to be undeſervedly rich, others to be undeſervingly poor. All which till hardneſs of heart came in, was moſt unjuſt; whenas prime Nature made us all equal, made us equal coheirs by common right and dominion over all creatures. In the ſame manner, and for the ſame cauſe he ſuffer'd Divorce as well as Marriage, our imperfect and degenerate condition of neceſſity requiring this Law among the reſt, as a remedy againſt intolerable wrong and ſervitude above the patience of man to bear. Nor was it giv'n only becauſe our infirmity, or if it muſt be ſo call'd, hardneſs of heart could not endure all things, but becauſe the hardneſs of anothers heart might not inflict all things upon an innocent perſon, whom far other ends brought into a league of love and not of bondage and indignity. If therefore we aboliſh Divorce as only ſuffer'd for hardnes of heart, we may as well aboliſh the whole Law of Nations, as only ſuffer'd for the ſame cauſe; it being ſhewn us by Saint Paul 1 Cor. 6. that the very ſeeking of a mans right by Law, and at the hands of a worldly Magiſtrate, is not without the hardneſs of our hearts. For why do ye not rather take wrong, ſaith he, why ſuffer ye not rather your ſelves to be defrauded? If nothing now muſt be ſuffer'd for hardnes of heart, I ſay the very proſecution of our right by way of civil Juſtice can no more be ſuffer'd among Chriſtians, for the hardnes of heart wherewith moſt men perſue it. And that would next remove all our judicial Laws, and this reſtraint of Divorce alſo in the number; which would more then half end the controverſy. But if it be plain that the whole juridical Law and Civil Power is only ſuffer'd under the Goſpel, for the hardnes of our hearts, then wherefore ſhould not that which Moſes ſuffer'd, be ſuffer'd ſtill by the ſame reaſon?

In a ſecond ſignification hardnes of heart is tak'n for a ſtubborn reſolution to do evil. And that God ever makes any Law purpoſely to ſuch, I deny; for he voutſafes not to enter Cov'nant with them, but as they fortune to be mixt with good men, and paſs undiſcover'd; much leſs that he ſhould decree an unlawful thing only to ſerve their licentiouſneſs. But that God ſuffers this reprobate hardnes of heart I affirm, not only in this law of Divorce, but throughout all his beſt and pureſt Commandments. He commands all to worſhip in ſinglenes of heart according to all his Ordinances; and yet ſuffers the wicked man to perform all the rites of Religion hypocritically and in the hardnes of his heart. He gives us general ſtatutes and privileges in all civil matters, juſt and good of themſelves, yet ſuffers unworthieſt men, to uſe them, and by them to proſecute their own right, or any colour of right, tho for the moſt part maliciouſly, covetouſly, rigorouſly, revengefully. He allow'd by law the diſcreet father and husband to forbid, if he thought fit, the religious vows of his wife or daughter, Num. 30. and in the ſame law ſuffer'd the hard-heartednes of impious and covetous fathers or husbands abuſing this law to forbid their wives or daughters in their offrings and devotions of greateſt zeal. If then God ſuffer hardnes of heart equally in the beſt Laws as in this of Divorce, there can be no reaſon that for this cauſe this Law ſhould be aboliſht. But other Laws, they object, may be well us'd, this never. How often ſhall I anſwer both from the inſtitution of Marriage, and from other general rules in Scripture, that this Law of Divorce hath many wiſe and charitable ends beſides the being ſuffer'd for hardnes of heart; which is indeed no end, but an accident hapning through the whole Law; which gives to good men right, and to bad men, who abuſe right under falſe pretences, gives only ſufferance. Now although Chriſt expreſs no other reaſons here, but only what was ſuffer'd, it nothing followes that this Law had no other reaſon to be permitted but for hardnes of heart. The Scripture ſeldom, or never in one place ſets down all the reaſons of what it grants or commands, eſpecially when it talks to enemies and tempters. St. Paul permitting Marriage, 1 Cor. 7. ſeems to permit even that alſo for hardnes of heart only, leſt we ſhould run into fornication; yet no intelligent man thence concludes Marriage allow'd in the Goſpel only to avoid an evil, becauſe no other end is there expreſt. Thus Moſes of neceſſity ſuffer'd many to put away their wives for hardneſs of heart; but enacted the law of Divorce doubtles for other good cauſes, nor for this only ſufferance. He permitted not Divorce by law as an evil, for that was impoſſible to divine Law, but permitted by accident the evil of them who divorc't againſt the Laws intention undiſcoverably. This alſo may be thought not improbably, that Chriſt, ſtirr'd up in his ſpirit againſt theſe tempting Phariſes, anſwer'd them in a certain form of indignation uſual among good authors; whereby the queſtion, or the truth is not directly anſwer'd, but ſome thing which is fitter for them, who ask, to hear. So in the Eccleſiaſtical ſtories, one demanding how God imploy'd himſelf before the world was made? had anſwer; that he was making hell for curious queſtioners. Another (and Libanius the Sophiſt as I remember) asking in deriſion ſome Chriſtian, What the Carpenter, meaning our Saviour, was doing, now that Julian ſo prevail'd? had it return'd him, that the Carpenter was making a coffin for the Apoſtat. So Chriſt being demanded maliciouſly why Moſes made the law of Divorce, anſwers them in a vehement ſcheme, not telling them the cauſe why he made it, but what was fitteſt to be told them, that for the hardneſs of their hearts he ſuffer'd them to abuſe it. And albeit Mark ſay not he ſuffer'd you, but to you he wrote this precept; Mark may be warrantably expounded by Matthew the larger. And whether he ſuffer'd, or gave precept, being all one as was heard, it changes not the trope of indignation, fitteſt account for ſuch askers. Next for the hardnes of your hearts to you he wrote this precept, infers not therefore for this cauſe only he wrote it, as was parallell'd by other Scriptures. Laſtly, It may be worth the obſerving, that Chriſt ſpeaking to the Phariſes, does not ſay in general that for hardnes of heart he gave this precept, but you he ſuffer'd, and to you he gave this precept for your hardnes of heart. It cannot be eaſily thought that Chriſt here included all the children of Iſrael under the perſon of theſe tempting Phariſes, but that he conceals; wherefore he gave the better ſort of them this Law, and expreſſes by ſaying emphatically To you how he gave it to the worſer, ſuch as the Phariſees beſt repreſented, that is to ſay, for the hardnes of your hearts: as indeed to wicked men and hardn'd hearts he gives the whole Law and the Goſpel alſo, to hard'n them the more. Thus many ways it may orthodoxally be underſtood how God or Moſes ſuffer'd ſuch as the demanders were, to divorce for hardnes of heart. Whereas the vulgar Expoſitor, beſet with contradictions and abſurdities round, and reſolving at any peril to make an expoſition of it, as there is nothing more violent and boiſtrous than a reverend ignorance in fear to be convicted, ruſhes brutely and impetuouſly againſt all the principles both of Nature, Piety, and moral Goodnes; and in the fury of his literal expounding overturns them all.

But from the beginning it was not ſo.] Not how from the beginning? do they ſuppoſe that men might not divorce at all, not neceſſarily, not deliberatly, except for Adultery, but that ſom law, like canon law, preſently attacht them both before and after the flood, till ſtricter Moſes came, and with law brought licence into the world? that were a fancy indeed to ſmile at. Undoubtedly as to point of judicial Law Divorce was more permiſſive from the beginning before Moſes then under Moſes. But from the beginning, that is to ſay, by the inſtitution in Paradiſe, it was not intended that Matrimony ſhould diſſolve for every trivial cauſe, as you Phariſees accuſtom. But that it was not thus ſuffer'd from the beginning ever ſince the race of men corrupted, and Laws were made, he who will affirm, muſt have found out other antiquities then are yet known. Beſides we muſt conſider now, what can be ſo as from the beginning, not only what ſhould be ſo. In the beginning, had men continu'd perfet, it had bin juſt that all things ſhould have remain'd, as they began to Adam and Eve. But after that the Sons of Men grew violent and injurious, it alter'd the lore of juſtice, and put the government of things into a new frame. While man and woman were both perfet each to other, there needed no Divorce; but when they both degenerated to imperfection, and oft times grew to be an intolerable evil each to other, then Law more juſtly did permit the alienating of that evil which miſtake made proper, then it did the appropriating of that good which Nature at firſt made common. For if the abſence of outward good be not ſo bad as the preſence of a cloſe evil, and that propriety, whether by cov'nant or poſſeſſion, be but the attainment of ſome outward good, it is more natural and righteous that the Law ſhould ſever us from an intimat evil, then appropriate any outward good to us from the Community of nature. The Goſpel indeed tending ever to that which is perfeteſt, aim'd at the reſtorement of all things as they were in the beginning, and therefore all things were in common to thoſe primitive Chriſtians in the Acts, which Ananias and Sapphira dearly felt. That cuſtom alſo continu'd more or leſs till the time of Juſtin Martyr, as may be read in his ſecond Apology, which might be writ after that act of communion perhaps ſome forty years above a hundr'd. But who will be the man ſhall introduce this kind of Commonwealth, as Chriſtianity now goes? If then Marriage muſt be as in the beginning, the perſons that marry muſt be ſuch as then were; the inſtitution muſt make good, in ſom tolerable ſort, what it promiſes to either party. If not, it is but madnes to drag this one Ordinance back to the beginning, and draw down all other to the preſent neceſſity and condition, far from the beginning, even to the tolerating of extortions and opreſſions. Chriſt only told us that from the beginning it was not ſo; that is to ſay, not ſo as the Phariſees manur'd the buſines; did not command us that it ſhould be forcibly ſo again in all points, as at the beginning; or ſo at leaſt in our intentions and deſires, but ſo in execution, as reaſon and preſent nature can bear. Although we are not to ſeek, that the inſtitution it ſelf from the firſt beginning was never but conditional, as all cov'nants are: becauſe thus and thus, therefore ſo and ſo; if not thus, then not ſo. Then moreover was perfeteſt to fulfil each Law in itſelf; now is perfeteſt in this eſtate of things, to ask of charity how much law may be fulfill'd: els the fulfilling oft times is the greateſt breaking. If any therefore demand, which is now moſt perfection, to eaſe an extremity by Divorce, or to enrage and feſter it by the grievous obſervance of a miſerable Wedloc, I am not deſtitute to ſay which is moſt perfection (although ſom who believ they think favourably of Divorce, eſteem it only venial to infirmity.) Him I hold more in the way to perfection who forgoes an unfit, ungodly, and diſcordant Wedloc, to live according to peace and love, and Gods inſtitution in a fitter chois, then he who debars himſelf the happy experience of all godly, which is peaceful converſation in his family, to live a contentious, and unchriſtian life not to be avoided, in temptations not to be liv'd in, only for the fals keeping of a moſt unreal nullity, a Marriage that hath no affinity with God's intention, a daring phantaſm, a meer toy of terror awing weak ſenſes, to the lamentable ſuperſtition of ruining themſelvs; the remedy whereof God in his Law vouchſafes us. Which not to dare uſe, he warranting, is not our perfection, is our infirmity, our little faith, our timorous and low conceit of Charity: and in them who force us, it is their masking pride and vanity, to ſeem holier and more circumſpect then God. So far is it that we need impute to him infirmity, who thus divorces: ſince the rule of perfection is not ſo much that which was don in the beginning, as that which now is neareſt to the rule of charity. This is the greateſt, the perfeteſt, the higheſt commandment.

V. 9. And I ſay unto you, Whoſo ſhall put away his wife, except it be for Fornication, and ſhall marry another, committeth adultery; and whoſo marrieth her which is put away, doth commit adultery.

And I ſay unto you.] That this reſtrictive denouncement of Chriſt contradicts and refutes that permiſſive precept of Moſes, common Expoſitors themſelves diſclaim: and that it does not traverſe from the Cloſet of Conſcience to the Courts of Civil or Canon Law, with any Chriſtian rightly commenc't, requires not long evincing. If Chriſt then did not heer check permiſſive Moſes, nor did reduce Matrimony to the beginning more then all other things, as the reaſon of mans condition could bear, we would know preciſely what it was which he did, and what the end was of his declaring thus auſterely againſt Divorce. For this is a confeſt Oracle in Law, that he who looks not at the intention of a Precept, the more ſuperſtitious he is of the letter, the more he miſinterprets. Was it to ſhame Moſes? that had been monſtrous: or all thoſe pureſt Ages of Iſrael, to whom the Permiſſion was granted? that were as incredible. Or was it that he who came to abrogate the burden of Law, not the equity, ſhould put this yoke upon a blameleſs perſon, to league himſelf in chains with a begirting miſchief, not to ſeparate till death? He who taught us that no man puts a piece of new cloth upon an old garment, nor new wine into old bottels, that he ſhould ſew this patch of ſtrictnes upon the old apparel of our frailty, to make a rent more incurable, whenas in all other amendments his doctrine ſtill charges, that regard be had to the garment, and to the veſſel, what it can endure; this were an irregular and ſingle peece of rigor, not only ſounding diſproportion to the whole Goſpel, but outſtretching the moſt rigorous nervs of Law and Rigor it ſelf. No other end therefore can be left imaginable of this exceſſive reſtraint, but to bridle thoſe erroneous and licentious poſtillers the Phariſees; not by telling them what may be done in neceſſity, but what cenſure they deſerve who divorce abuſively, which their Tetrarch had done. And as the offence was in one extreme, ſo the rebuke, to bring more efficaciouſly to a rectitude and mediocrity, ſtands not in the middle way of duty, but in the other extreme. Which art of powerful reclaiming, wiſeſt men have alſo taught in their ethical Precepts and Gnomologies, reſembling it, as when we bend a crooked wand the contrary way; not that it ſhould ſtand ſo bent, but that the overbending might reduce it to a ſtraitneſs by its own reluctance. And as the Phyſician cures him who hath tak'n down poyſon, not by the middling temper of nouriſhment, but by the other extreme of Antidote, ſo Chriſt adminiſters heer a ſharp and corroſive ſentence againſt a foul and putrid licence; not to eat into the fleſh, but into the ſore. And knowing that our Divines through all their Comments make no ſcruple, where they pleaſe, to ſoften the high and vehement ſpeeches of our Saviour, which they call Hyperbolies; why in this one Text ſhould they be ſuch crabbed Maſorites of the letter, as not to mollifie a tranſcendence of literal rigidity, which they confeſs to find often elſewhere in his manner of delivery, but muſt make their expoſition heer ſuch an obdurate Cyclops, to have but one eye for this Text, and that only open to cruelty and enthralment, ſuch as no divine or human Law before ever heard of? No, let the foppiſh Canoniſt, with his fardel of matrimonial caſes, go and be vendible where men be ſo unhappy as to cheap'n him: the words of Chriſt ſhall be aſſerted from ſuch elemental Notaries, and reſolv'd by the now-only lawgiving mouth of charity; which may be done undoubtedly by underſtanding them as follows.

Whoſoever ſhall put away his wife.] That is to ſay, ſhall ſo put away as the Propounders of this queſtion, the Phariſees, were wont to do, and covertly defended Herod for ſo doing; whom to rebuke, our Saviour heer mainly intends, and not to determine all the caſes of Divorce, as appears by St. Paul. Whoſoever ſhall put away, either violently without mutual conſent for urgent reaſons, or conſpiringly by plot of luſt, or cunning malice, ſhall put away for any ſudden mood, or contingency of diſagreement, agreement, which is not daily practice, but may blow ſoon over, and be reconcil'd, except it be Fornication; whoſoever ſhall put away raſhly, as his choler prompts him, without due time of deliberating, and think his Conſcience diſcharg'd only by the bill of Divorce giv'n, and the outward Law ſatiſfi'd; whoſoever, laſtly, ſhall put away his Wife, that is a Wife indeed, and not in name only, ſuch a one who both can and is willing to be a meet help toward the chief ends of Marriage both civil and ſanctify'd, except Fornication be the cauſe, that Man, or that Pair, commit Adultery. Not he who puts away by mutual conſent, with all the conſiderations and reſpects of humanity and gentleneſs without malicious or luſtful drift. Not he who after ſober and cool experience, and long debate within himſelf, puts away, whom though he cannot love or ſuffer as a Wife, with that ſincere affection that Marriage requires, yet loves at leaſt with that civility and goodneſs, as not to keep her under a neglected and unwelcom reſidence, where nothing can be hearty, and not being, it muſt needs be both unjoyous, and injurious to any perceiving perſon ſo detain'd, and more injurious then to be freely, and upon good terms diſmiſt. Nor doth he put away adulterouſly who complains of cauſes rooted in immutable nature, utter unfitneſs, utter diſconformity, not concileable, becauſe not to be amended without a miracle. Nor he who puts away an unquenchable vexation from his boſom, and flies an evil, then which a greater cannot befall human ſociety. Nor he who puts away with the full ſuffrage and applauſe of his conſcience, not relying on the writt'n bill of Law, but claiming by faith and fulnes of perſwaſion the rights and promiſes of Gods inſtitution, of which he finds himſelf in a miſtak'n wedlock defrauded. Doubtleſs this man hath bail enough to be no Adulterer, giving Divorce for theſe cauſes.

His wife.] This word is not to be idle here, a meer word without a ſenſe, much leſs a fallacious word ſignifying contrary to what it pretends; but faithfully ſignifies a Wife, that is, a comfortable help and ſociety, as God inſtituted; does not ſignify deceitfully under this name, an intolerable adverſary, not a helpleſs, unaffectionate and ſullen maſs, whoſe very company repreſents the viſible and exacteſt figure of lonelineſs it ſelf. Such an aſſociate he who puts away, divorces not a wife, but disjoyns a nullity which God never joyn'd, if ſhe be neither willing, nor to her proper and requiſite duties ſufficient, as the words of God inſtitute her. And this alſo is Bucers explication of this place.

Except it be for fornication, or ſaving for the cauſe of fornication, as Matt. 5.] This declares what kind of cauſes our Saviour meant; fornication being no natural and perpetual cauſe, but only accidental and temporary; therefore ſhews that head of cauſes from whence it is excepted, to be meant of the ſame ſort. For exceptions are not logically deduc't from a divers kind, as to ſay whoſo puts away for any natural cauſe except Fornication, the exception would want ſalt. And if they underſtand it, who ſo for any cauſe whatever, they caſt themſelves; granting Divorce for frigidity a natural cauſe of their own allowing, though not heer expreſt, and for deſertion without infidelity, when as he who marries, as they allow him for a deſertion, deſerts as well as is deſerted, and finally puts away for another cauſe beſides Adultery. It will with all due reaſon therefore be thus better underſtood, who ſo puts away for any accidental and temporary cauſes, except one of them, which is fornication. Thus this exception finds out the cauſes from whence it is excepted, to be of the ſame kind, that is caſual, not continual.

Saving for the cauſe of fornication.] The New Teſtament, though it be ſaid originally writ in Greek, yet hath nothing neer ſo many Atticiſms as Hebraiſms, and Syriaciſms, which was the Majeſty of God, not fitting the tongue of Scripture to a Gentiliſh Idiom, but in a princely manner offring to them as to Gentiles and Foreiners grace and mercy, though not in forein words, yet in a forein ſtile that might induce them to the fountains; and though their calling were high and happy, yet ſtill to acknowledg Gods ancient people their betters, and that language the Metropolitan language. He therefore who thinks to Scholiaze upon the Goſpel, though Greek according to his Greek Analogies, and hath not bin Auditor to the Oriental dialects, ſhall want in the heat of his Analyſis no accommodation to ſtumble. In this place, as the 5th of Matth. reads it, Saving for the cauſe of fornication, the Greek, ſuch as it is, ſounds it, except for the word, report, ſpeech, or proportion of fornication. In which regard, with other inducements, many ancient and learned Writers have underſtood this exception, as comprehending any fault equivalent and proportional to fornication. But truth is, the Evangeliſt heer Hebraizes, taking word or ſpeech for cauſe or matter in the common Eaſtern phraſe, meaning perhaps no more then if he had ſaid for fornication, as in this 19*th* chapter. And yet the word is found in the 5th of Exodus alſo ſignifying Proportion ; where the Iſraelites are commanded to do their tasks, The matter of each day in his day. A task we know is a proportion of work not doing the ſame thing abſolutely every day, but ſo much. Whereby it may be doubtful yet, whether here be not excepted not only fornication it ſelf, but other cauſes equipollent, and proportional to fornication. Which very word alſo to underſtand rightly, we muſt of neceſſity have recours again to the Ebrew. For in the Greek and Latin, ſenſe by fornication is meant the common proſtitution of body for ſale. So that they who are ſo exact for the letter, ſhall be dealt with by the Lexicon, and the Etymologicon too if they pleaſe, and muſt be bound to forbid Divorce for adultery alſo, until it come to open whoredom and trade, like that for which Claudius divorc't Meſſalina. Since therfore they take not here the word fornication in the common ſignificance, for an open exerciſe in the ſtews, but grant Divorce for one ſingle act of privateſt Adultery, notwithſtanding that the word ſpeaks a public and notorious frequency of fact, not without price ; we may reaſon with as good leav, and as little ſtraining to the text, that our Saviour on ſet purpoſe choſe this word Fornication, improperly appli'd to the lapſe of Adultery, that we might not think our ſelves bound from all Divorce, except when that fault hath bin actually committed. For the language of Scripture ſignifies by fornication ( and others beſides St. Auſtin ſo expounded it ) not only the treſpas of Body, nor perhaps that between married perſons, unleſs in a degree or quality as ſhameles as the Bordello, but ſignifies alſo any notable diſobedience, or intractable carriage of the Wife to the Husband, as Judg. 19. 2. Whereof at large in the Doctrine of Divorce, l. 2. c. 18. Secondly, ſignifies the apparent alienation of mind not to Idolatry, (which may ſeem to anſwer the act of Adultery) but far on this ſide, to any point of will-worſhip, though to the true God ; ſometimes it notes the love of earthly things, or worldly pleaſures, though in a right Believer, ſometimes the leaſt ſuſpicion of unwitting Idolatry. As Num. 15. 39. wilful diſobedience to any the leaſt of Gods Commandment is call'd fornication. Pſal. 73. 26, 27. A diſtruſt only in God, and withdrawing from that neernes of zeal and confidence which ought to be, is call'd fornication. We may be ſure it could not import thus much leſs than Idolatry in the borrow'd metaphor between God and Man, unleſs it ſignify'd as much leſs than Adultery in the ordinary acception between Man and Wife. Add alſo, that there was no need our Saviour ſhould grant divorce for Adultery, it being death by Law, and Law then in force. Which was the cauſe why Joſeph ſought to put away his betrothed Wife privately, leſt he ſhould make her an example of capital puniſhment, as learnedeſt Expounders affirm, Herod being a great zelot of the Moſaic Law, and the Phariſees great maſters of the Text, as the woman tak'n in Adultery doubtles had cauſe to fear. Or if they can prove it was neglected, which they cannot do, why did our Saviour ſhape his Anſwer to the corruption of that age, and not rather tell them of their neglect? If they ſay he came not to meddle with their Judicatures, much leſs then was it in his thought to make them new ones, or that Divorce ſhould be judicially reſtrain'd in a ſtricter manner by theſe his words, more than Adultery judicially acquitted by thoſe his words to the Adultreſs. His ſentence doth no more by Law forbid Divorce here, then by Law it doth abſolve Adultery there. To them therfore who have drawn this yoke upon Chriſtians from his words thus wreſted, nothing remains but the guilt of a preſumption and perverſneſs, which will be hard for them to anſwer. Thus much that the word Fornication is to be underſtood as the Language of Chriſt underſtands it, for a conſtant alienation and diſaffection of mind, or for the continual practice of diſobedience and croſſnes from the duties of love and peace ; that is in ſum, when to be a tolerable Wife is either naturally not in their power, or obſtinately not in their will : and this Opinion alſo is St. Auſtin's, leſt it ſhould hap to be ſuſpected of novelty. Yet grant the thing heer meant were only Adultery, the reaſon of things will afford more to our aſſertion, then did the reaſon of words. For why is Divorce unlawful but only for Adultery ? becauſe, ſay they, that crime only breaks the Matrimony. But this, I reply, the Inſtitution it ſelf gainſays : for that which is moſt contrary to the words and meaning of the Inſtitution, that moſt breaks the Matrimony ; but a perpetual unmeetnes and unwillingnes to all the duties of Help, of Love, and Tranquillity, is moſt contrary to the words and meaning of the Inſtitution ; that therefore much more breaks Matrimony then the act of Adultery though repeated. For this, as it is not felt, nor troubles him who perceives it not, ſo being perceiv'd, may be ſoon repented, ſoon amended, ſoon, if it can be pardon'd, may be redeem'd with the more ardent love and duty in her who hath the pardon. But this natural unmeetnes both cannot be unknown long, and ever after cannot be amended, if it be natural, and will not, if it be far gon obſtinat. So that wanting ought in the inſtant to be as great a breach as Adultery, it gains it in the perpetuity to be greater. Next, Adultery does not exclude her other fitnes, her other pleaſingnes; ſhe may be otherwiſe both loving and prevalent, as many Adultreſſes be; but in this general unfitnes or alienation ſhe can be nothing to him that can pleaſe. In Adultery nothing is given from the husband, which he miſſes, or enjoys the leſs, as it may be ſuttly giv'n: but this unfitnes defrauds him of the whole contentment which is ſought in Wedlock. And what benefit to him, though nothing be giv'n by the ſtealth of Adultery to another, if that which there is to give, whether it be ſolace, or ſociety, be not ſuch as may juſtly content him? and ſo not only deprives him of what it ſhould give him, but gives him ſorrow and affliction, which it did not owe him. Beſides, is Adultery the greateſt breach of Matrimony in reſpect of the offence to God, or of the injury to Man? if in the former, then other ſins may offend God more, and ſooner cauſe him to diſunite his ſervant from being one fleſh with ſuch an offender. If in reſpect of the latter, other injuries are demonſtrated therein more heavy to mans nature than the iterated act of Adultery. God therefore, in his wiſdom, would not ſo diſpoſe his remedies, as to provide them for the leſs injuries, and not allow them for the greater. Thus is won both from the word Fornication, and the reaſon of Adultery, that the exception of Divorce is not limited to that act, but enlarg'd to the cauſes above ſpecify'd.

And whoſo marrieth her which is put away, doth commit adultery.] By this Clauſe alone, if by nothing elſe, we may aſſure us, that Chriſt intended not to deliver heer the whole doctrine of Divorce, but only to condemn abuſes. Otherwiſe to marry after Deſertion, which the Apoſtle, and the reformed Churches at this day permit, is heer forbid, as Adultery. Be ſhe never ſo wrongfully deſerted, or put away, as the Law then ſuffer'd, if thus forſak'n and expulſt, ſhe accept the refuge and protection of any honeſter man who would love her better, and give her ſelf in Marriage to him, by what the letter guides us, it ſhall be preſent Adultery to them both. This is either harſh and cruel, or all the Churches teaching as they do the contrary, are loos and remiſs; beſides that the Apoſtle himſelf ſtands deeply ſin'd in a contradiction againſt our Saviour. What ſhall we make of this? what rather the common interpreter can make of it, for they be his own markets,let him now try; let him try which way he can wind in his Vertumnian diſtinctions and evaſions, if his canonical Gabardine of text and letter do not now ſit too cloſe about him, and pinch his activity; which if I err not, hath heer hamper'd it ſelf in a ſpring fit for thoſe who put their confidence in Alphabets. Spanheim a writer of Evangelic doubts, comes now and confeſſes that our Saviour's words are to be limited beyond the limitation there expreſt, and excepted beyond their own exception, as not ſpeaking of what happen'd rarely, but what moſt commonly. Is it ſo rare, Spanheim, to be deſerted? or was it then ſo rare to put away injuriouſly, that a perſon ſo hatefully expell'd, ſhould to the heaping of more injury be turn'd like an infectious thing out of all Marriage-fruition upon pain of Adultery, as not conſiderable to the brevity of this half ſentence? Of what then ſpeaks our Saviour? of that colluſion, ſaith he which was then moſt frequent among the Jews of changing wives and husbands, through inconſtancy and unchaſt deſires. Colluders your ſelves, as violent to this Law of God by your unmerciful binding, as the Phariſes by their unbounded looſning! Have thouſands of Chriſtian ſouls periſht as to this life, and God knows what hath betided their Conſciences, for want of this healing explanation; and is it now at laſt obſcurely drawn forth, only to cure a ſcratch, and leave the main wound ſpouting? Whoſoever putteth away his wife, except for fornication, committeth adultery. That ſhall be ſpoke of all ages, and all men, though never ſo juſtly otherwiſe mov'd to Divorce: In the very next breath, And whoſo marrieth her which is put away, committeth adultery: the men are new and miraculous, they tell you now you are to limit it to that age, when it was in faſhion to chop matrimonies; and muſt be meant of him who puts away with his wifes conſent through the lightnes and leudnes of them both. But what rule of Logic, or indeed of Reaſon is our commiſſion to underſtand the Antecedent one way and the Conſequent another? for in that habitude this whole vers may be conſidered: or at leaſt to take the parts of a copulat axiom, both abſolutely affirmative, and to ſay the firſt is abſolutely true, the other not, but muſt be limited to a certain time and cuſtom; which is no leſs then to ſay they are both falſe? For in this compound axiom, be the parts never ſo many, if one of them do but falter, and be not equally abſolute and general, the reſt are all fals. If therefore that he who marries her which is put away commits adultery, be not generally true, neither is it generally true that he commits adultery who puts away for other cauſe then fornication. And if the marrying her which is put away, muſt be underſtood limited, which they cannot but yield it muſt with the ſame limitation muſt be underſtoodthe putting away. Thus doth the common expoſition confound it ſelf, and juſtify this which is heer brought; that our Saviour as well in the firſt part of this ſentence as in the ſecond, prohibited onely ſuch Divorces as the Jews then made through malice or through plotted licence, not thoſe which are for neceſſary and juſt cauſes; where charity and wiſdom disjoyns, that which not God, but Error and Diſaſter joyn'd.

And there is yet to this our expoſition, a ſtronger ſiding friend, then any can be an adverſary, unleſs St. Paul be doubted, who repeating a command concerning Divorce, 1 Cor. 7. which is agreed by Writers to be the ſame with this of our Saviour, and appointing that the wife remain unmarried, or be reconcil'd to her husband, leavs it infallible that our Saviour ſpake chiefly againſt putting away for caſual and choleric diſagreements, or any other cauſe which may with human patience and wiſdom be reconcil'd, not hereby meaning to hale and daſh together the irreconcilable averſations of nature, nor to tie up a faultleſs perſon like a Parricide, as it were into one ſack with an enemy, to be his cauſleſs tormenter and executioner the length of a long life. Laſtly, let this ſentence of Chriſt be underſtood how it will, yet that it was never intended for a judicial Law, to be enforc'd by the Magiſtrat, beſides that the office of our Saviour had no ſuch purpoſe in the Goſpel, this latter part of the ſentence may aſſure us, And whoſo marrieth her who is put away, commits adultery. Shall the exception for Adultery belong to this clauſe or not? if not, it would be ſtrange, that he who marries a Woman really divorc'd for Adultery, as Chriſt permitted, ſhould become an Adulterer by marrying one who is now no other mans Wife, himſelf being alſo free, who might by this means reclaim her from common Whoredom. And if the exception muſt belong hither, then it follows that he who marries an Adultreſs divorc'd commits no Adultry; which would ſoon diſcover to us what an abſurd and ſenſles peece of injuſtice this would be to make a civil Statute of in penal Courts: whereby the Adultreſs put away may marry another ſafely, and without a crime to him that marries her; but the innocent and wrongfully divorc'd ſhall not marry again without the guilt of Adultery both to her ſelf and to her ſecond husband. This ſaying of Chriſt therefore cannot be made a temporal Law, were it but for this reaſon. Nor is it eaſie to ſay what coherence there is at all in it from the letter, to any perfet ſenſe not obnoxious to ſom abſurdity, and ſeems much leſs agreeable to what ever elſe of the Goſpel is left us written; doubtleſs by our Saviour ſpok'n in that fiercenes and abſtruſe intricacy, firſt to amuſe his tempters, and admoniſh in general the abuſers of that Moſaic Law; next to let Herod know a ſecond knower of his unlawful act, though the Baptiſt were beheaded; laſt, that his Diſciples and all good men might learn to expound him in this place, as in all other his precepts, not by the written letter, but by that unerring paraphraſe of Chriſtian Love and Charity, which is the ſum of all commands, and the perfection.

V. 10. His Diſciples ſay unto him, If the caſe of the man be ſo with his Wife, it is not good to marry.

This verſe I add, to leave no objection behind unanſwer'd: for ſome may think, if this our Saviour's ſentence be ſo fair, as not commanding ought that patience or nature cannot brook, why then did the diſciples murmer and ſay, it is not good to marry? I anſwer, that the Diſciples had bin longer bred up under the Phariſæan Doctrine, then under that of Chriſt, and ſo no marvel though they yet retain'd the infection of loving old licentious cuſtoms; no marvel though they thought it hard they might not for any offence that throughly anger'd them, divorce a Wife, as well as put away a Servant, ſince it was but giving her a Bill, as they were taught. Secondly, it was no unwonted thing with them not to underſtand our Saviour in matters far eaſier. So that be it granted their conceit of this text was the ſame which is now commonly conceiv'd, according to the uſual rate of their capacity then, it will not hurt a better interpretation. But why did not Chriſt, ſeeing their error, inform them? for good cauſe; it was his profeſt method not to teach them all things at all times, but each thing in due place and ſeaſon. Chriſt ſaid, Luke 22. that he who had no ſword ſhould ſell his garment and buy one: the Diſciples took it in a manifeſt wrong ſenſe, yet our Saviour did not there inform them better. He told them it was eaſier for a Camel to go through a needles eye, then a rich man in at heav'n gate. They were amaz'd exceedingly: he explain'd himſelf to mean of thoſe who truſt in riches, Mark 10. They were ama- zed then out of meaſure, for ſo Mark relates it; as if his explaining had increas'd their amazement in ſuch a plain caſe, and which concern'd ſo neerly their calling to be inform'd in. Good reaſon therefore, if Chriſt at that time did not ſtand amplifying, to the thick prejudice and tradition wherein they were, this queſtion of more difficulty, and leſs concernment to any perhaps of them in particular. Yet did he not omit to ſow within them the ſeeds of a ſufficient determining, agen the time that his promis'd Spirit ſhould bring all things to their memory. He had declar'd in their hearing not long before, how diſtant he was from aboliſhing the Law it ſelf of Divorce; he had refer'd them to the inſtitution; and after all this, gives them a ſet anſwer, from which they might collect what was cleer enough, that all men cannot receive all ſayings, verſe 11. If ſuch regard be had to each mans receiving of Marriage or ſingle life, what can ariſe that the ſame chriſtian regard ſhould not be had in moſt neceſſary Divorce? All which inſtructed both them and us, that it beſeem'd his Diſciples to learn the deciding of this queſtion, which hath nothing new in it, firſt by the inſtitution, then by the general grounds of Religion, not by a particular ſaying here or there, temper'd and level'd only to an incident occaſion, the riddance of a tempting aſſault. For what can this be but weak and ſhallow apprehenſion, to forſake the ſtandard principles of inſtitution, faith, and charity; then to be blank and various at every occurrence in Scripture, and in a cold Spaſm of ſcruple, to rear peculiar doctrines upon the place, that ſhall bid the gray autority of moſt unchangeable and ſovran Rules to ſtand by and be contradicted? Thus to this Evangelic precept of famous difficulty, which for theſe many ages weakly underſtood, and violently put in practice, hath made a ſhambles rather then an ordinance of Matrimony, I am firm a truer expoſition cannot be given. If this or that argument heer us'd, pleaſe not every one, there is no ſcarſity of arguments, any half of them will ſuffice. Or ſhould they all fail, as Truth it ſelf can fail as ſoon, I ſhould content me with the inſtitution alone to wage this controverſie, and not diſtruſt to evince. If any need it not, the happier; yet Chriſtians ought to ſtudy earneſtly what may be anothers need. But if, as mortal miſchances are, ſome hap to need it, let them be ſure they abuſe not, and give God his thanks, who hath reviv'd this remedy, not too late for them, and ſcowr'd off an inveterate miſexpoſition from the Goſpel: a work not to periſh by the vain breath or doom of this age. Our next induſtry ſhall be, under the ſame guidance, to try with what fidelity that remaining paſſage in the Epiſtles touching this matter, hath bin commented.

1 Cor. VII. 10, &c.

10. And unto the married I command, &c.
11. And let not the husband put away his wife.

THis intimates but what our Saviour taught before, that Divorce is not raſhly to be made, but reconcilement to be perſuaded and endevor'd, as oft as the cauſe can have to do with reconcilement, and is not under the dominion of blameles nature; which may have reaſon to depart, though ſeldomeſt and laſt from charitable love, yet ſometimes from friendly, and familiar, and ſomething oftner from conjugal love, which requires not only moral, but natural cauſes to the making and maintaining; and may be warrantably excus'd to retire from the deception of what it juſtly ſeeks, and the ill requitals which unjuſtly it finds. For Nature hath her Zodiack alſo, keeps her great annual circuit over human things, as truly as the Sun and Planets in the firmament; hath her anomalies, hath her obliquities in aſcenſions and declinations, acceſſes and receſſes, as blameleſly as they in Heaven. And ſitting in her planetary Orb with two reins in each hand, one ſtrait, the other loos, tempers the cours of minds as well as bodies to ſeveral conjunctions and oppoſitions, friendly or unfriendly aſpects, conſenting ofteſt with reaſon, but never contrary. This in the effect no man of meaneſt reach but daily ſees; and though to every one it appear not in the cauſe, yet to a clear capacity, well nurtur'd with good reading and obſervation, it cannot but be plain and viſible. Other expoſition therefore then hath bin given to former places that give light to theſe two ſummary verſes, will not be needful: ſave only that theſe precepts are meant to thoſe married who differ not in Religion.

But to the reſt ſpeak I, not the Lord; if any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and ſhe be pleaſed to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

Now follows what is to be done, if the perſons wedded be of a different faith. The common belief is, that a Chriſtian is here commanded not to divorce, if the Infidel pleaſe to ſtay, though it be but to vex, or to deride, or to ſeduce the Chriſtian. This doctrin will be the eaſie work of a refutation. The other opinion is, that a Chriſtian is here conditionally permitted to hold Wedlock with a miſbeliever only, upon hopes limited by Chriſtian prudence, which without much difficulty ſhall be defended. That this here ſpoken by Paul, not by the Lord, cannot be a Command, theſe reaſons avouch. Firſt, the Law of Moſes, Exod. 34. 16. Deut. 7. 3, 6. interpreted by Ezra and Nehemiah, two infallible authors, commands to divorce an Infidel not for the fear only of a ceremonious defilement, but of an irreligious ſeducement, fear'd both in reſpect of the Believer himſelf, and of his Children in danger to be perverted by the miſbelieving parent, Nehem. 13. 24, 26. And Peter Martyr thought this a convincing reaſon. If therefore the legal pollution vaniſhing, have abrogated the ceremony of this Law, ſo that a Chriſtian may be permitted to retain an Infidel without uncleannes, yet the moral reaſon of divorcing ſtands to eternity, which neither Apoſtle nor Angel from heaven can countermand. All that they reply to this, is their human warrant, that God will preſerve us in our obedience to this command againſt the danger of ſeducement. And ſo undoubtedly he will, if we underſtand his commands aright; if we turn not this evangelick permiſſion into a legal, and yet illegal command; if we turn not hope into bondage, the charitable and free hope of gaining another, into the forc't and ſervil temptation of loſing our ſelves: but more of this beneath. Thus theſe words of Paul, by common doctrin made a command, are made a contradiction to the moral Law.

Secondly, not the Law only, but the Goſpel from the Law, and from it ſelf, requires even in the ſame chapter, where Divorce between them of one Religion is ſo narrowly forbid, rather then our Chriſtian love ſhould come into danger of backſliding, to forſake all relations how near ſo ever, and the Wife expreſly, with promiſe of a high reward, Mat. 19. And he who hates not Father or Mother, Wife or Children, hindring his chriſtian cours, much more if they deſpiſe or aſſault it, cannot be a Diſciple, Luke 14. How can the Apoſtle then command us to love and continue in that matrimony, which our Saviour bids us hate, and forſake? They can as ſoon teach our faculty of reſpiration to contract and to dilate it ſelf at once, to breath and to fetch breath in the ſame inſtant, as teach our minds how to do ſuch contrary acts as theſe towards the ſame object, and as they muſt be done in the ſame moment. For either the hatred of her Religion, and her hatred to our Religion will work powerfully againſt the love of her ſociety, or the love of that will by degrees flatter out all our zealous hatred and forſaking, and ſoon enſnare us to unchriſtianly compliances.

Thirdly, In Marriage there ought not only to be a civil love, but ſuch a love as Chriſt loves his Church; but where the Religion is contrary without hope of converſion, there can be no love, no faith, no peaceful ſociety, ( they of the other opinion confeſs it ) nay there ought not to be, furder then in expectation of gaining a ſoul; when that ceaſes, we know God hath put an enmity between the ſeed of the Woman, and the ſeed of the Serpent. Neither ſhould we love them that hate the Lord, as the Prophet told Jehoſaphat, 2 Chron. 19. And this Apoſtle himſelf in another place warns us that we be not unequally yokt with Infidels, 2 Cor. 6. for that there can be no fellowſhip, no communion, no concord between ſuch. Outward commerce and Civil intercours cannot perhaps be avoided; but true friendſhip and familiarity there can be none. How vainly therefore, not to ſay how impiouſly would the moſt inward and dear alliance of Marriage or continuance in Marriage be commanded, where true friendſhip is confeſt impoſſible? For ſay they, we are forbid here to marry with an Infidel, not bid to divorce. But to rob the words thus of their full ſenſe, will not be allow'd them: it is not ſaid, enter not into yoke, but be not unequally yokt; which plainly forbids the thing in preſent act, as well as in purpoſe: and his manifeſt concluſion is, not only that we ſhould not touch, but that having toucht, we ſhould come out from among them, and be ſeparate; with the promiſe of a bleſſing thereupon, that God will receive us, will be our father, and we his ſons and daughters, v. 17, 18. Why we ſhould ſtay with an Infidel after the expence of all our hopes, can be but for a civil relati[illegible]; but why we ſhould depart from a ſeducer, ſetting aſide the miſconſtruction of this place, is from a religious neceſſity of departing. The wors cauſe therefore of ſtaying ( if it be any cauſe at all, for civil government forces it not ) muſt not overtop the religious cauſe of ſeparating, executed with ſuch an urgent zeal, and ſuch a proſtrate humiliation by Ezra and Nehemiah. What God hates to joyn, certainly he cannot love ſhould continue joyn'd: it being all one in matter of ill conſequence, to marry, or to continue married with an Infidel, ſave only ſo long as we wait willingly, and with a ſafe hope. St. Paul therefore citing heer a command of the Lord Almighty, for ſo he terms it, that we ſhould ſeparate cannot have bound us with that which he calls his own whether command or counſel that we ſhould not ſeparate.

Which is the fourth Reaſon, for he himſelf takes care leſt we ſhould miſtake him, [But to the reſt ſpeak I, not the Lord.] If the Lord ſpake not, then Man ſpake it, and Man hath no Lordſhip to command the conſcience: yet modern Interpreters will have it a command, maugre St. Paul himſelf, they will make him a Prophet like Caiphas, to ſpeak the word of the Lord not thinking, nay denying to think; though he diſavow to have receiv'd it from the Lord, his word ſhall not be tak'n, though an Apoſtle, he ſhall be born down in his own Epiſtle, by a race of Expoſiters who preſume to know from whom he ſpake, better then he himſelf. Paul depoſes that the Lord ſpeaks not this, they, that the Lord ſpeaks it: Can this be leſs then to brave him with a full-fac'd contradiction? Certainly to ſuch a violence as this, for I cannot call it an expounding, what a man ſhould anſwer I know not, unleſs that if it be their pleaſure next to put a gag into the Apoſtle's mouth, they are already furniſht with a commodious audacity toward the attempt. Beza would ſeem to ſhun the contradictory, by telling us that the Lord ſpake it not in perſon, as he did the former precept. But how many other Doctrines doth St. Paul deliver, which the Lord ſpake not in perſon, and yet never uſes this preamble but in things indifferent? So long as we receive him for a meſſenger of God, for him to ſtand ſorting Sentences what the Lord ſpake in perſon, and what he, not the Lord in perſon, would be but a chill trifling, and his Readers might catch an Ague the while. But if we ſhall ſupply the Grammatical Ellipſis regularly, and as we muſt in the ſame tenſe, all will be then clear, for we cannot ſupply it thus, to the reſt I ſpeak; the Lord ſpake not, but I ſpeak, the Lord ſpeaks not. If then the Lord neither ſpake in perſon, nor ſpeaks it now, the Apoſtle teſtifying both, it follows duely, that this can be no command. Forſooth the fear is, leſt this not being a command, would prove an evangelick counſel, and ſo make way for ſupererogations. As if the Apoſtle could not ſpeak his mind in things indifferent, as he doth in four or five ſeveral places of this chapter with the like preface of not commanding, but that the doubted inconvenience of ſupererogating muſt needs ruſh in. And how adds it to the Word of the Lord, (for this alſo they object) when as the Apoſtle by his chriſtian prudence guids us in the liberty which God hath left us to, without command? could not the Spirit of God inſtruct us by him what was free, as well as what was not? But what need I more, when Cameron an ingenuous writer, and in high eſteem, ſolidly confutes the ſurmiſe of a command heer, and among other words hath theſe; That when Paul ſpeaks as an Apoſtle, he uſes this form, The Lord ſaith. not I, v. 10. but as a private man he ſaith, I ſpeak, not the Lord. And thus alſo all the prime fathers, Auſtin, Jerom, and the reſt underſtood this place.

Fiftly, The very ſtating of the Queſtion declares this to be no Command; If any Brother hath an unbelieving Wife, and ſhe be pleaſed to dwell with him, let him not put her away. For the Greek word συνευδοκεῖ does not imply only her being pleas'd to ſtay, but his being pleas'd to let her ſtay; it muſt be a conſent of them both. Nor can the force of this word be render'd leſs, without either much negligence or iniquity of him that otherwiſe tranſlates it. And thus the Greek Church alſo and their Synods underſtood it, who beſt knew what their own language meant, as appears by Matthaus Monachus, an Author ſet forth by Leunclavius, and of antiquity perhaps not inferior to Balſamon, who writes upon the Canons of the Apoſtles: this Author in his chap. That Marriage is not to be made with Hereticks, thus recites the ſecond Canon of the 6th Synod; As to the Corinthians, Paul determins; If the believing Wife chooſe to live with the unbelieving Husband, or the believing Husband with the unbelieving Wife. Mark, ſaith he, how the Apoſtle here condeſcends, if the believer pleaſe to dwell with the unbeliever, ſo that if he pleaſe not, out of doubt the Marriage is diſſolv'd. And I am perſwaded it was ſo in the beginning, and thus preacht. And thereupon gives an example of one, who though not deſerted, yet by the Decree of Theodotus the Patriarch divorc'd an unbelieving Wife. What therefore depends in the plain ſtate of this queſtion on the conſent and well liking of them both, muſt not be a Command. Lay next the latter end of the 11th verſe to the 12th (for wherefore elſe is Logic taught us) in a diſcreet axiom, as it can be no other by the phraſe; The Lord ſaith, Let not the Husband put away his Wife: but I ſay, Let him not put away a misbelieving Wife. This ſounds as if by the judgment of Paul, a man might put away any Wife but the misbelieving; or elſe the parts are not diſcreet, or diſſentany, for both conclude not putting away, and conſequently in ſuch a form the propoſition is ridiculous. Of neceſſity therefore the former part of this ſentence muſt be conceiv'd, as underſtood, and ſilently granted, that although the Lord command to divorce an infidel, yet I, not the Lord command you? No, but give my judgment, that for ſome evangelick reaſons a Chriſtian may be permitted not to divorce her. Thus while we reduce the brevity of St. Paul to a plainer ſenſe, by the needful ſupply of that which was granted between him and the Corinthians, the very logic of his ſpeech extracts him confeſſing that the Lords command lay in a ſeeming contrariety to this his counſel: and that he meant not to thruſt out a command of the Lord by a new one of his own, as one nail drives another, but to releaſe us from the rigor of it, by the right of the Goſpel, ſo farr forth as a charitable cauſe leads us on in the hope of winning another ſoul without the peril of loſing our own. For this is the glory of the Goſpel, to teach us that the end of the commandment is charity, 1 Tim. 1. not the drudging out a poor and worthleſs duty forc'd from us by the tax and tail of ſo many letters. This doctrine therefore can be no command, but it muſt contradict the moral Law, the Goſpel; and the Apoſtle himſelf both elſewhere, and here alſo even in the act of ſpeaking.

If then it be no command, it muſt remain to be a permiſſion, and that not abſolute, for ſo it would be ſtill contrary to the law, but with ſuch a caution as breaks not the Law, but as the manner of the Goſpel is, fulfils it through Charity. The Law had two reaſons, the one was ceremonial, the pollution that all Gentiles were to the Jews; this the viſion of Peter had aboliſht, Acts 10. and clens'd all creatures to the uſe of a Chriſtian. The Corinthians underſtood not this, but fear'd leſt dwelling in matrimony with an unbeliever, they were defil'd. The Apoſtle diſcuſſes that ſcruple with an Evangelic reaſon, ſhewing them that although God heretofore under the Law, not intending the converſion of the Gentiles, except ſome ſpecial ones, held them as polluted things to the Jew, yet now purpoſing to call them in, he hath purify'd them from that legal uncleanneſs wherein they ſtood, to uſe and to be us'd in a pure manner.

For ſaith he, The unbelieving husband is ſanctify'd by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is ſanctifi'd by the husband, elſe were your children unclean; but now they are holy. That is, they are ſanctify'd to you, from that legal impurity which you ſo fear; and are brought into a neer capacity to be holy, if they believe, and to have free acceſs to holy things. In the mean time, as being God's creatures, a Chriſtian hath power to uſe them according to their proper uſe; in as much as now, all things to the pure are become pure. In this legal reſpect therefore ye need not doubt to continue in Marriage with an unbeliever. Thus others alſo expound this place, and Cameron eſpecially. This reaſon warrants us only what we may do without fear of pollution, does not bind us that we muſt. But the other reaſon of the Law to divorce an infidel was moral, the avoiding of enticement from the true Faith. This cannot ſhrink; but remains in as full force as ever, to ſave the actual Chriſtian from the ſnare of a misbeliever. Yet if a Chriſtian full of grace and ſpiritual gifts, finding the misbeliever not frowardly affected, fears not a ſeducing, but hopes rather a gaining, who ſees not that this moral Reaſon is not violated by not divorcing, which the Law commanded to do, but better fulfill'd by the excellence of the Goſpel working through Charity. For neither the faithful is ſeduc'd, and the unfaithful is either ſav'd, or with all diſcharge of love, and evangelic duty ſought to be ſav'd. But contrary-wiſe if the infirm Chriſtian ſhall be commanded here againſt his mind, againſt his hope, and againſt his ſtrength, to dwell with all the ſcandals, the houſhold perſecutions, or alluring temptations of an Infidel, how is not the Goſpel by this made harſher then the Law, and more yoaking? Therefore the Apoſtle ere he delivers this other reaſon why we need not in all haſt put away an Infidel, his mind miſgiving him, leſt he ſhould ſeem to be the impoſer of a new command, ſtays not for method, but with an abrupt ſpeed inſerts the declaration of their liberty in this matter.

But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart; a brother or a ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes: but God hath called us to peace.

But if the unbelieving depart.] This cannot be reſtrain'd to local departure only; for who knows not that an offenſive ſociety is worſe then a forſaking. If his purpoſe of cohabitation be to endanger the life, or the conſcience, Beza himſelf is half perſwaded, that this may purchaſe to the faithful perſon the ſame freedom that a deſertion may; and ſo Gerard and others whom he cites. If therefore he depart in affection; if he depart from giving hope of his converſion; if he diſturb, or ſcoff at Religion, ſeduce, or tempt; if he rage, doubtleſs not the weak only, but the ſtrong may leave him; if not for fear, yet for the dignities ſake of Religion, which cannot be liable to all baſe affronts, meerly for the worſhipping of a civil Marriage. I take therefore departing to be as large as the negative of being well pleas'd: that is, if he be not pleas'd for the preſent to live lovingly, quietly, inoffenſively, ſo as may give good hope; which appears well by that which follows.

A brother or a ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes.] If St. Paul provide ſeriouſly againſt the bondage of a Chriſtian, it is not the only bondage to live unmarried for a deſerting Infidel, but to endure his preſence intolerably, to bear indignities againſt his Religion in words or deeds, to be wearied with ſeducements, to have idolatries and ſuperſtitions ever before his eyes, to be tormented with impure and prophane converſation, this muſt needs be bondage to a Chriſtian: is this left all unprovided for, without remedy, or freedom granted? undoubtedly no, for, the Apoſtle leaves it furder to be conſider'd with prudence, what bondage a brother or ſiſter is not under, not only in this caſe, but as he ſpeaks himſelf plurally, in ſuch caſes.

But God hath called us to peace.] To peace, not to bondage, not to brabbles and contentions with him who is not pleas'd to live peaceably, as Marriage and Chriſtianity requires. And where ſtriſe ariſes from a cauſe hopeleſs to be allay'd, what better way to peace then by ſeparating that which is ill joyn'd? It is not Divorce that firſt breaks the peace of a family, as ſome fondly comment on this place, but it is peace already brok'n, which, when other cures fail, can only be reſtor'd to the faultles perſon by a neceſſary Divorce. And St. Paul here warrants us to ſeek peace, rather then to remain in bondage. If God hath call'd us to peace, why ſhould we not follow him? why ſhould we miſerably ſtay in perpetual diſcord under a ſervitude not requir'd?

For what knoweſt thou, O Wife, whether thou ſhalt ſave thy Husband, &c.] St. Paul having thus clear'd himſelf, not to go about the mining of our Chriſtian liberty, not to caſt a ſnare upon us, which to do he ſo much hated, returns now to the ſecond reaſon of that Law, to put away an Infidel for fear of ſeducement, which he does not here contradict with a Command now to venture that; but if neither the infirmity of the Chriſtian, nor the ſtrength of the Unbeliever be fear'd, but hopes appearing that he may be won, he judges it no breaking of that Law, though the Believer be permitted to forbear Divorce, and can abide, without the peril of ſeducement, to offer the charity of a ſalvation to Wife or Husband, which is the fulfilling, not the tranſgreſſing of that Law; and well worth the undertaking with much hazard and patience. For what knoweſt thou whether thou ſhalt ſave thy Wife, that is, till all means convenient and poſſible with diſcretion and probability, as human things are, have bin us'd. For Chriſt himſelf ſends not our hope on pilgrimage to the World's end; but ſets it bounds, beyond which we need not wait on a Brother, much leſs on an Infidel. If after ſuch a time we may count a profeſſing Chriſtian no better then a Heathen, after leſs time perhaps we may ceaſe to hope of a Heathen, that he will turn Chriſtian. Otherwiſe, to bind us harder then the Law, and tell us we are not under Bondage, is meer mockery. If till the unbeliever pleaſe to part, we may not ſtir from the houſe of our bondage, then certain this our liberty is not grounded in the purchas of Chriſt, but in the pleaſure of a Miſcreant. What knows the loyal Husband, whether he may not ſave the Adultereſs? he is not therefore bound to receive her. What knows the Wiſe but ſhe may reclaim her Husband who hath deſerted her? yet the reformed Churches do not enjoyn her to wait longer then after the contempt of an Eccleſiaſtical Summons. Beza himſelf here befriends us with a remarkable Speech, What could be firmly conſtituted in human matters, if under pretence of expecting grace from above, it ſhould be never lawful for us to ſeek our right. And yet in other caſes not leſs reaſonable to obtain a moſt juſt and needful remedy by Divorce, he turns the innocent party to a task of prayers beyond the multitude of Beads and Roſaries, to beg the gift of Chaſtity in recompence of an injurious Marriage. But the Apoſtle is evident enough, we are not under bondage, truſting that he writes to thoſe who are not ignorant what Bondage is, to let ſupercilious determiners cheat them of their freedom. God hath call'd us to peace, and ſo doubtleſs hath left in our hands how to obtain it ſeaſonably; if it be not our own choice to ſit ever like novices wretchedly ſervile.

Thus much the Apoſtle in this queſtion between Chriſtian and Pagan, to us now of little uſe; yet ſuppoſing it written for our inſtruction, as it may be rightly apply'd, I doubt not but that the difference between a true believer and a heretic, or any one truely religious either deſerted or ſeeking Divorce from any one groſſly erroneous or profane may be referr'd hither. For St. Paul leaves us heer the ſolution not of this caſe only, which little concernes us, but of ſuch like caſes, which may ocurr to us.

For where the reaſons directly ſquare, who can forbid why the verdit ſhould not be the ſame? But this the common Writers allow us not. And yet from this Text, which in plain words gives liberty to none, unleſs deſerted by an Infidel, they collect the ſame freedom, though the deſertion be not for Religion, which, as I conceive, they need not do; but may, without ſtraining, reduce it to the cauſe of Fornication. For firſt, they confeſs that deſertion is ſeldom without a juſt ſuſpition of Adultery: next it is a breach of Marriage in the ſame kind, and in ſome ſort worſe: for Adultery, though it give to another, yet it bereaves not all; but the deſerter wholly denies all right, and makes one fleſh twain, which is counted the abſoluteſt breach of Matrimony, and cauſes the other, as much as in him lies, to commit ſin, by being ſo left. Nevertheleſs, thoſe reaſons which they bring of eſtabliſhing by this place the like liberty from any deſertion, are fair and ſolid: and if the thing be lawful, and can be prov'd ſo, more ways then one, ſo much the ſafer. Their arguments I ſhall here recite, and that they may not come idle, ſhall uſe them to make good the like freedom to Divorce for other cauſes; and that we are no more under Bondage to any hainous default againſt the main ends of Matrimony, then to a Deſertion: Firſt they allege that to 1 Tim. 5.8. If any provide not for thoſe of his own houſe, he hath deny'd the faith, and is worſe then an Infidel. But a deſerter, ſay they, can have no care of them who are moſt his own, therefore the deſerted party is not leſs to be righted againſt ſuch a one then againſt an Infidel. With the ſame evidence I argue, that Man or Wife who hates in Wedlock, is perpetually unſociable, unpeaceful, or unduteous, either not being able, or not willing to perform what the main ends of Marriage demand in help and ſolace, cannot be ſaid to care for who ſhould be deareſt in the houſe; therefore is worſe then an infidel in both regards, either in undertaking a duty which he cannot perform, to the undeſerved and unſpeakable injury of the other party ſo defrauded and betrai'd, or not performing what he hath undertaken, whenas he may or might have, to the perjury of himſelf more irreligious then heatheniſm. The blameleſs perſon therefore hath as good a plea to ſue out his delivery from this bondage, as from the deſertion of an infidel. Since moſt Writers cannot but grant that deſertion is not only a local abſence, but an intolerable ſociety; or if they grant it not, the reaſons of Saint Paul grant it, withall as much leave as they grant to enlarge a particular freedom from paganiſm, into a general freedom from any deſertion. Secondly, they reaſon from the likenes of either fact, the ſame loſs redounds to the deſerted by a Chriſtian, as by an Infidel, the ſame peril of temptation. And I in like manner affirm, that if honeſt and free perſons may be allow'd to know what is moſt to their own loſs, the ſame loſs and diſcontent, but worſe diſquiet, with continual miſery and temptation, reſides in the company, or better call'd the perſecution of an unfit, or an unpeaceable Conſort, then by his deſertion. For then the deſerted may enjoy himſelf at leaſt. And he who deſerts is more favourable to the party whom his preſence afflicts, then that importunate thing which is and will be ever converſant before the eyes, a loyal and individual vexation. As for thoſe who ſtill rudely urge it no loſs to Marriage, no Deſertion, ſo long as the Fleſh is preſent, and offers a Benevolence that hates, or is juſtly hated; I am not of that vulgar and low perſwaſion, to think ſuch forc'd embracements as theſe worth the honour, or the humanity of Marriage, but far beneath the ſoul of a rational and free-born Man. Thirdly, they ſay, It is not the Infidelity of the deſerter, but the deſertion of the Infidel from which the Apoſtle gives this freedom; and I joyn, that the Apoſtle could as little require our ſubjection to an unfit and injurious Bondage preſent, as to an Infidel abſent. To free us from that which is an evil by being diſtant, and not from that which is an inmate, and in the boſom evil, argues an improvident and careles Deliverer. And thus all occaſions, which way ſoever they turn, are not unofficious to adminiſter ſomething which may conduce to explain, or to defend the aſſertion of this book touching Divorce. I complain of nothing, but that it is indeed too copious to be the matter of a diſpute, or a defence, rather to be yielded, as in the beſt Ages, a thing of common Reaſon, not of Controverſie. What have I left to ſay? I fear to be more elaborat in ſuch a perſpicuity as this; leſt I ſhould ſeem not to teach, but to upbraid the dulnes of an Age; not to commune with reaſon in men, but to deplore the loſs of reaſon from among men: this only, and not the want of more to ſay, is the limit of my diſcourſe.

Who among the Fathers have interpreted the words of Chriſt concerning Divorce, as is here interpreted; and what the Civil Law of Chriſtian Emperors in the primitive Church determin'd

Although teſtimony be in Logic an argument rightly call'd inartificial, and doth not ſolidly fetch the truth by multiplicity of Authors, nor argue a thing falſe by the few that hold ſo; yet ſeeing moſt men from their youth ſo accuſtom, as not to ſcan reaſon, nor clearly to apprehend it, but to truſt for that the names and numbers of ſuch, as have got, and many times undeſervedly, the reputation among them to know much, and becauſe there is a vulgar alſo of teachers, who are as blindly by whom they fancy led, as they lead the people, it will not be amiſs for them who had rather liſt themſelves under this weaker ſort, and follow authorities, to take notice that this opinion which I bring, hath bin favour'd, and by ſome of thoſe affirm'd, who in their time were able to carry what they taught, had they urg'd it, through all Chriſtendom; or to have left it ſuch a credit with all good men, as they who could not boldly uſe the opinion, would have fear'd to cenſure it. But ſince by his appointment on whom the times and ſeaſons wait, every point of doctrine is not fatal to be throughly ſifted out in every age, it will be anough for me to find, that the thoughts of wiſeſt heads heertofore, and hearts no leſs reverenc'd for devotion have tended this way, and contributed their lot in ſome good meaſure towards this which hath bin here attain'd. Others of them, and modern eſpecially, have bin as full in the aſſertion, though not ſo full in the reaſon; ſo that either in this regard, or in the former, I ſhall be maniſeſt in a middle fortune to meet the praiſe or diſpraiſe of being ſomething firſt.

But I defer not what I undertook to ſhew, that in the Church both primitive and reformed, the words of Chriſt have bin underſtood to grant Divorce for other cauſes then Adultery; and that the word fornication in Marriage hath a larger ſenſe then that commonly ſuppos'd.

Juſtin Martyr in his firſt Apology writt'n within 50 years after St. John dy'd, relates a ſtory which Euſebius tranſcribes, that a certain Matron of Rome, the Wife of a vitious Husband, her ſelf alſo formerly vitious, but converted to the Faith, and perſuading the ſame to her Husband, at leaſt the amendment of his wicked life, upon his not yeilding to her daily entreaties and perſuaſions in this behalf, procur'd by Law to be divorc'd from him. This was neither for Adultery, nor Deſertion, but as the relation ſays, eſteeming it an ungodly thing to be the conſort of bed with him, who againſt the Law of Nature and of right ſought out voluptuous ways. Suppoſe he endeavour'd ſome unnatural abuſe, as the Greek admits that meaning, it cannot yet be call'd Adultery; it therefore could be thought worthy of Divorce no otherwiſe then as equivalent, or wors; and other vices will appear in other reſpects as much divorſive. Next 'tis ſaid her friends adviſ'd her to ſtay a while; and what reaſon gave they? not becauſe they held unlawful what ſhe purpos'd, but becauſe they thought ſhe might longer yet hope his repentance. She obey'd, till the man going to Alexandria, and from thence reported to grow ſtill more impenitent, not for any Adultery or Deſertion, wherof neither can be gather'd, but, ſaith the Martyr, and ſpeaks it like one approving, leſt ſhe ſhould be partaker of his unrighteous and ungodly deeds, remaining in Wedlock, the communion of bed and board with ſuch a perſon, ſhe left him by a lawful Divorce. This cannot but give us the judgment of the Church in thoſe pure and next to Apoſtolic times. For how els could the Woman have bin permitted, or here not reprehended? and if a Wife might then do this without reproof, a Husband certainly might no leſs, if not more.

Tertullian in the ſame Age, writing his 4th Book againſt Marcion, witneſſes that Chriſt by his anſwer to the Phariſes, protected the conſtitution of Moſes as his own, and directed the inſtitution of the Creator, for I alter not his Carthaginian phraſe; he excus'd rather then deſtroy'd the conſtitution of Moſes; I ſay, he forbid conditionally, if any one therefore put away, that he may marry another: ſo that if he prohibited conditionally, then not wholly; and what he forbad not wholly, he permitted otherwiſe, where the cauſe ceaſes for which he prohibited: that is, when a man makes it not the cauſe of his putting away, meerly that he may marry again. Chriſt teaches not contrary to Moſes, the juſtice of Divorce hath Chriſt the aſſerter: he would not have Marriage ſeparate, nor kept with ignominy, permitting then a Divorce; and gueſſes that this vehemence of our Saviour's ſentence was chiefly bent againſt Herod, as was cited before. Which leaves it evident how Tertullian interpreted this prohibition of our Saviour: for whereas the Text is, Whoſoever putteth away, and marrieth another; wherefore ſhould Tertullian explain it, Whoſoever putteth away that he may marry another, but to ſignifie his opinion, that our Saviour did not forbid Divorce from an unworthy Yoke, but forbid the Malice or the Luſt of a needles Change, and chiefly thoſe plotted Divorces then in uſe?

Origen in the next century teſtifies to have known certain who had the government of Churches in his time, who permitted ſom to marry, while yet their former huſbands liv'd, and excuſes the deed, as don not without cauſe, though without Scripture, which confirms that cauſe not to be Adultery; for how then was it againſt Scripture that they married again? And a little beneath, for I cite his 7. homily on Matthew, ſaith he, To endure faults wors then adultery and fornication, ſeems a thing unreaſonable; and diſputes therefore that Chriſt did not ſpeak by way of precept, but as it were expounding. By which, and the like ſpeeches, Origen declares his mind, far from thinking that our Saviour confin'd all the cauſes of Divorce to actual adultery.

Lactantius of the age that ſucceeded, ſpeaking of this matter in the 6th of his Inſtitutions, hath theſe words: But leſt any think he may circumſcribe divine precepts, let this be added, that all miſinterpreting, and occaſion of fraud or death may be remov'd, he commits adultery who marries the divorc't wife, and, beſides the crime of adultery, divorces a wife that he may marry another. To divorce and marry another, and to divorce that he may marry another, are two different things; and imply that Lactantius thought not this place the forbidding of all neceſſary Divorce, but ſuch only as proceeded from the wanton deſire of a future chois, not from the burden of a preſent affliction.

About this time the Council of Eliberis in Spain decreed the huſband excommunicat, If he kept his wife being an adultreſs; but if he left her, he might after ten years be receiv'd into communion, if he retain'd her any while in his houſe after the adultery known. The Council of Neocaſarea in the year 314. decreed, That if the wife of any Laic were convicted of adultery, that man could not be admitted into the Miniſtry: if after ordination it were committed, he was to divorce her; if not, he could not hold his Miniſtry. The Council of Nantes condemn'd in ſeven years penance the huſband that would reconcile with an adultreſs. But how proves this that other cauſes may divorce? It proves thus: There can be but two cauſes why theſe Councils enjoin'd ſo ſtrictly the divorſing of an adultreſs, either as an offender againſt God, or againſt the huſband; in the latter reſpect they could not impoſe on him to divorce; for every man is the maſter of his own forgivnes; who ſhall hinder him to pardon the injuries don againſt himſelf? It follows therefore that the divorce of an adultreſs was commanded by theſe three Councils, as it was a ſin againſt God; and by all conſequence they could not but believe that other ſins as hainous might with equal juſtice be the ground of a divorce.

Baſil in his 73d Rule, as Chamier numbers it, thus determins, That divorce ought not to be, unleſs for adultery, or the hinderance to a godly life. What doth this but proclaim aloud more cauſes of divorce then adultery, if by other ſins beſides this, in wife or huſband, the godlines of the better perſon may be certainly hinder'd and endanger'd?

Epiphanius no leſs ancient, writing againſt Hereticks, and therefore ſhould himſelf be orthodoxal above others, acquaints us in his ſecond book, Tom. 1. not that his private perſuaſion was, but that the whole Church in his time generally thought other cauſes of divorce lawful beſides adultery, as comprehended under that name: If, ſaith he, a divorce happ'n for any cauſe, either fornication, or adultery, or any hainous fault, the word of God blames not either the man or wife marrying again, nor cuts them off from the congregation, or from life, but bears with the infirmity; not that he may keep both wives, but that leaving the former he may be lawfully joyn'd to the latter: the holy Word, and the holy Church of God commiſerates this man, eſpecially if he be otherwiſe of good converſation, and live according to Gods law. This place is cleerer then expoſition, and needs no comment.

Ambroſe on the 16th of Luke, teaches that all wedloc is not Gods joyning: and to the 19th of Prov. That a wife is prepar'd of the Lord, as the old Latin tranſlates it, he anſwers that the Septuagint renders it, a wife is fitted by the Lord, and temper'd to a kind of harmony; and where that harmony is, there God joyns; where it is not, there diſſention reigns, which is not from God, for God is love. . This he brings to prove the marrying of Chriſtian with Gentile to be no marriage, and conſequently divorc't without ſin: but he who ſees not this Argument how plainly it ſerves to divorce any untunable, or unatonable matrimony, ſees little. On the 1ſt to the Cor. 7. he grants a woman may leave her huſband not for only fornication, but for Apoſtacy, and inverting nature, though not marry again; but the man may: here are cauſes of divorce aſſign'd other then adultery. And going on, he affirms, that the cauſe of God is greater than the cauſe of matrimony; that the reverence of wedloc is not due to him who hates the author thereof; that no matrimony is firm without devotion to God; that diſhonour don to God acquits the other being deſerted from the bond of matrimony; that the faith of marriage is not to be kept with ſuch. If theſe contorted ſentences be ought worth, it is not the deſertion that breaks what is broken, but the impiety; and who then may not for that cauſe better divorce, than tarry to be deſerted? or theſe grave ſayings of St. Ambroſe are but knacks.

Jerom on the 19th of Matthew explains, that for the cauſe of fornication, or the ſuſpicion thereof, a man may freely divorce. What can breed that ſuſpicion, but ſundry faults leading that way? by Jeroms conſent therfore Divorce is free not only for actual adultery, but for any cauſe that may incline a wiſe man to the juſt ſuſpicion therof.

Auſtin alſo muſt be remember'd among thoſe who hold that this inſtance of fornication gives equal inference to other faults equally hateful, for which to divorce: and therfore in his books to Pollentius he diſputes that Infidelity, as being a greater ſin then Adultery, ought ſo much the rather cauſe a divorce. And on the Sermon in the Mount, under the name of fornication will have idolatry, or any harmful ſuperſtition contain'd, which are not thought to diſturb Matrimony ſo directly as ſom other obſtinacies and diſaffections, more againſt the daily duties of that cov'nant, and in the Eaſtern tongues not unfrequently call'd fornication, as hath bin ſhewn. Hence is underſtood, ſaith he, that not only for bodily fornication, but for that which draws the mind from Gods law, and foully corrupts it, a man may without fault put away his wife, and a wife her husband, becauſe the Lord excepts the cauſe of fornication, which fornication we are conſtrain'd to interpret in a general ſenſe. And in the firſt book of his Retractations, chap. 16. he retracts not this his opinion, but commends it to ſerious conſideration; and explains that he counted not there all ſin to be fornication, but the more deteſtable ſort of ſins. The cauſe of Fornication therefore is not in this diſcours newly interpreted to ſignify other faults infringing the duties of Wedlock, beſides Adultery.

Laſtly, the Council of Agatha in the year 506. Can. 25. decreed, that if Lay-men who divorc't without ſome great fault, or giving no probable cauſe, therefore divorc't, that they might marry ſom unlawful perſon, or ſom other mans, if before the provincial Biſhops were made acquainted, or judgment paſt, they preſum'd this, Excommunication was the penalty. Whence it follows, that if the cauſe of Divorce were ſom great offence, or that they gave probable cauſes for what they did, and did not therefore divorce that they might preſume with ſom unlawful perſon, or what was another mans, the cenſure of Church in thoſe days did not touch them.

Thus having alleg'd enough to ſhew, after what manner the primitive Church for above 500 years underſtood our Saviours words touching Divorce, I ſhall now, with a labour leſs diſperſt, and ſooner diſpatcht, bring under view what the civil Law of thoſe times conſtituted about this matter: I ſay the civil Law, which is the honour of every true Civilian to ſtand for, rather then to count that for Law, which the Pontificial Canon had enthrall'd them to, and inſtead of interpreting a generous and elegant Law, made them the drudges of a blockiſh Rubric.

Theodoſius and Valentinian, pious Emperors both, ordain'd that as by conſent lawful marriages were made, ſo by conſent, but not without the bill of Divorce, they might be diſſolv'd; and to diſſolve was the more difficult, only in favour of the children. We ſee the Wiſdom and Piety of that age, one of the pureſt and learnedeſt ſince Chriſt, conceiv'd no hindrance in the words of our Saviour, but that a Divorce mutually conſented, might be ſuffer'd by the Law, eſpecially if there were no children, or if there were, careful proviſion was made. And further ſaith that Law (ſuppoſing there wanted the conſent of either) We deſign the cauſes of Divorce by this moſt wholſom Law; for as we forbid the diſſolving of Marriage without juſt cauſe, ſo we deſire that a husband or a wife diſtreſt by ſom advers neceſſity, ſhould be freed, though by an unhappy, yet a neceſſary releef. What dram of Wiſdom or Religion (for Charity is trueſt Religion) could there be in that knowing age, which is not virtually ſum'd up in this moſt juſt Law? As for thoſe other Chriſtian Emperors, from Conſtantine the firſt of them, finding the Roman Law in this point ſo anſwerable to the Moſaic, it might be the likelieſt cauſe why they alter'd nothing to reſtraint, but if ought, rather to liberty, for the help, and conſideration of the weaker ſex, according as the Goſpel ſeems to make the wife more equal to her husband in theſe conjugal reſpects then the law of Moſes doth. Therefore if a man were abſent from his wife four years, and in that ſpace not heard of, though gon to war in the ſervice of the Empire, ſhe might divorce, and marry another by the edict of Conſtantine to Dalmatius, Co. l. 5. tit. 17. And this was an Age of the Church both antient, and cry'd up ſtill for the moſt flouriſhing in knowledg and pious government ſince the Apoſtles. But to return to this Law of Theodoſius, with this obſervation by the way, that ſtill as the Church corrupted, as the Clergy grew more ignorant, and yet more uſurping on the Magiſtrate, who alſo now declin'd, ſo ſtill Divorce grew more reſtrain'd; though certainly if better times permitted the thing that worſe times reſtrain'd, it would not weakly argue that the permiſſion was better, and the reſtraint worſe. This Law therefore of Theodoſius, wiſer in this then the moſt of his ſucceſſors, though not wiſer then God and Moſes, reduc't the cauſes of Divorce to a certain number, which by the judicial Law of God, and all recorded humanity were left before to the breſt of each husband, provided that the diſmiſs was not without reaſonable conditions to the Wife. But this was a reſtraint not yet come to extremes. For beſides Adultery, and that not only actual, but ſuſpected by many ſigns there ſet down, any fault equally puniſhable with Adultery, or equally infamous, might be the cauſe of a Divorce. Which informs us how the wiſeſt of thoſe ages underſtood that place in the Goſpel, whereby, not the pilfering of a Benevolence was conſider'd as the main and only breach of Wedloc, as is now thought, but the breach of love and peace, a more holy union then that of the fleſh; and the dignity of an honeſt perſon was regarded, not to be held in bondage with one whoſe ignominy was infectious. To this purpoſe was conſtituted Cod. l. 5. tit. 17. and Authent. collat. 4. tit. 1. Novell. 22. where Juſtinian added three cauſes more. In the 117. Novell. moſt of the ſame cauſes are allow'd, but the liberty of divorcing by conſent is repeal'd: but by whom? by Juſtinian, not a wiſer, not a more religious Emperor then either of the former, but noted by judicious writers for his fickle head in making and unmaking Laws; and how Procopius, a good Hiſtorian, and a Counſellor of State then living, deciphers him in his other actions, I willingly omit. Nor was the Church then in better caſe, but had the corruption of a 100 declining years ſwept on it, when the ſtatute of Conſent was call'd in; which, as I ſaid, gives us every way more reaſon to ſuſpect this reſtraint, more than that liberty: which therefore in the reign of Juſtin, the ſucceeding Emperor, was recall'd, Novell. 140. and eſtabliſht with a preface more wiſe and chriſtianly then for thoſe times, declaring the neceſſity to reſtore that Theodoſian Law, if no other means of reconcilement could be found. And by whom this Law was abrogated, or how long after, I do not find; but that thoſe other cauſes remain'd in force as long as the Greek Empire ſubſiſted, and were aſſented by that Church, is to be read in the Canons and Edicts compar'd by Photius the Patriarch, with the avertiments of Balſamon and Matthæus Monachus thereon.

But long before thoſe days Leo, the ſon of Baſilius Macedo, reigning about the year 886. and for his excellent wiſdom ſurnam'd the Philoſopher, conſtituted that in caſe of madneſs the husband might divorce after three years, the wife after five. Conſtitut. Leon. 111, 112. This declares how he expounded our Saviour, and deriv'd his reaſons from the Inſtitution, which in his Preface with great eloquence are ſet down; whereof a paſſage or two may give ſom proof, though better not divided from the reſt. There is not, ſaith he, a thing more neceſſary to preſerve mankind, then the help giv'n him from his own rib; both God and Nature ſo teaching us: which being ſo, it was requiſite that the providence of Law, or if any other care be to the good of man, ſhould teach and ordain thoſe things which are to the help and comfort of married perſons, and confirm the end of marriage purpos'd in the beginning, not thoſe things which afflict and bring perpetual miſery to them. Then anſwers the Objection that they are one fleſh; if matrimony had held ſo as God ordain'd it, he were wicked that would diſſolve it. But if we reſpect this in matrimony, that it be contracted to the good of both, how ſhall he, who for ſome great evil fear'd, perſwades not to marry though contracted, not perſwade to unmarry, if after marriage a calamity befall? Should we bid beware leſt any fall into an evil, and leave him helpleſs who by human error is fall'n therein? This were as if we ſhould uſe remedies to prevent a diſeaſe, but let the ſick die without remedy. The reſt will be worth reading in the Author.

And thus we have the judgment firſt of primitive fathers; next of the imperial Law not diſallow'd by the univerſal Church in ages of her beſt authority; and laſtly of the whole Greek Church and civil State, incorporating their Canons and Edicts together, that Divorce was lawful for other cauſes equivalent to Adultery, contain'd under the word Fornication. So that the expoſition of our Saviour's ſentence here alleg'd hath all theſe ancient and great aſſerters, is therefore neither new nor licentious, as ſome would perſwade the commonalty; although it be nearer truth that nothing is more new then thoſe teachers themſelves, and nothing more licentious then ſome known to be, whoſe hypocriſie yet ſhames not to take offence at this doctrine for licence; when as indeed they fear it would remove licence, and leave them but few companions.

That the Popes Canon Law incroaching upon civil Magiſtracy, aboliſh't all Divorce even for Adultery. What the reformed Divines have recover'd; and that the famouſeſt of them have taught according to the aſſertion of this Book.

But in theſe weſtern parts of the Empire it will appear almoſt unqueſtionable that the cited Law of Theodoſius and Valentinian ſtood in force until the blindeſt and corrupteſt times of Popedom diſplac't it. For, that the Volumes of Juſtinian never came into Italy, or beyond Illyricum, is the Opinion of good Antiquaries. And that only Manuſcript thereof found in Apulia by Lotharius the Saxon, and giv'n to the States of Piſa for their aid at ſea againſt the Normans of Sicily, was receiv'd as a rarity, not to be matcht. And altho the Goths, and after them the Lombards and Franks, who over-run the moſt of Europe except this Iland (unleſs we make our Saxons and Normans a limb of them) brought in their own cuſtoms, yet that they follow'd the Roman Laws in their Contracts and Marriages, Agathias the Hiſtorian is alleg'd. And other teſtimonies relate that Alaricus and Theodoric their Kings writ their ſtatutes out of this Theodoſian Code, which hath the recited Law of Divorce. Nevertheleſs while the Monarchs of Chriſtendom were yet barbarous, and but half Chriſtian, the Popes took this advantage of their weak Superſtition, to raiſe a corpulent Law out of the Canons and Decretals of audacious Prieſts; and preſum'd alſo to ſet this in the front; That the conſtitutions of Princes are not above the conſtitutions of Clergy, but beneath them. Uſing this very inſtance of Divorce as the firſt prop of their tyranny; by a falſe conſequence drawn from a paſſage of Ambroſe upon Luke, where he ſaith, though Mans law grant it, yet Gods law prohibits it: Whence Gregory the Pope writing to Theoctiſta infers that Eccleſiaſtical Courts cannot be diſſolv'd by the Magiſtrate. A fair concluſion from a double error. Firſt in ſaying that the Divine Law prohibited Divorce, for what will he make of Moſes? next ſuppoſing that it did, how will it follow, that whatever Chriſts forbids in his Evangelic precepts, ſhould be hal'd into a judicial conſtraint againſt the pattern of a divine Law? Certainly the Goſpel came not to enact ſuch compulſions. In the mean while we may note here that the reſtraint of Divorce was one of the firſt fair ſeeming pleas which the Pope had, to ſtep into ſecular authority, and with his Antichriſtian rigor to aboliſh the permiſſive Law of Chriſtian Princes conforming to a ſacred Lawgiver. Which if we conſider, this papal and unjuſt reſtriction of Divorce need not be ſo deer to us, ſince the plauſible reſtraining of that was in a manner the firſt looſning of Antichriſt, and as it were the ſubſtance of his eldeſt Horn. Nor do we leſs remarkably ow the firſt means of his fall here in England to the contemning of that reſtraint by Henry 8, whoſe Divorce he oppoſed. Yet was not that rigour executed anciently in ſpiritual Courts until Alexander the third, who trod upon the neck of Frederic Barbaroſſa the Emperor, and ſummond our Henry 2. into Normandy about the death of Becket. He it was, that the worthy author may be known, who firſt actually repeal'd the imperial Law of Divorce, and decreed this tyrannous Decree, that Matrimony for no cauſe ſhould be diſſolv'd, though for many cauſes it might ſeparate; as may be ſeen Decret Gregor. l. 4. tit. 19. and in other places of the Canonical Tomes. The main good of which invention, wherein it conſiſts who can tell? but that it hath one vertue incomparable, to fill all Chriſtendom with Whoredoms and Adulteries beyond the art of Balaams, or of Devils. Yet neither can theſe, though ſo perverſe, but acknowledg that the words of Chriſt under the name of fornication allow putting away for other cauſes then Adultery both from bed and bord, but not from the bond; their only reaſon is, becauſe Marriage they believe to be a Sacrament. But our Divines who would ſeem long ſince to have renounc't that reaſon, have ſo forgot themſelves, as yet to hold the abſurdity, which but for that reaſon, unleſs their be ſome myſtery of Satan in it, perhaps the Papiſt would not hold. 'Tis true, we grant Divorce for actual and prov'd Adultery, and not for leſs then many tedious and unreparable years of deſertion, wherein a man ſhall loſe all his hope of poſterity, which great and holy men have bewail'd, ere he can be righted; and then perhaps on the confines of his old age, when all is not worth the while. But grant this were ſeaſonably don; what are theſe two caſes to many other, which afflict the ſtate of Marriage as bad, and yet find no redreſs? What hath the ſoul of man deſerv'd, if it be in the way of ſalvation, that it ſhould be morgag'd thus, and may not redeem it ſelf according to conſcience out of the hands of ſuch ignorant and ſlothful teachers as theſe, who are neither able nor mindful to give due tendance to that pretious cure which they raſhly undertake; nor have in them the noble goodneſs to conſider theſe diſtreſſes and accidents of mans life, but are bent rather to fill their mouths with Tithe and Oblation? Yet if they can learn to follow, as well as they can ſeek to be follow'd, I ſhall direct them to a fair number of renowned men, worthy to be their leaders, who will commend to them a doctrin in this point wiſer then their own; and if they be not impatient, it will be the ſame doctrine which this Treatis hath defended.

Wicklef that Engliſhman honor'd of God to be the firſt Preacher of a general Reformation to all Europe, was not in this thing better taught of God, then to teach among his chiefeſt recoveries of truth, that Divorce is lawful to the Chriſtian for many other cauſes equal to Adultery. This book indeed, through the poverty of our Libraries, I am forc't to cite from Arniſæus of Halberſtad on the right of Marriage, who cites it from Coraſius of Toulouſe, c. 4. Cent. Sct. and he from Wicklef, l. 4. *Dial. c.*21. So much the ſorrier, for that I never lookt into an Author cited by his Adverſary upon this occaſion, but found him more conducible to the queſtion than his quotation render'd him.

Next Luther, how great a ſervant of God, in his book of conjugal life quoted by Gerard out of the Dutch, allows Divorce for the obſtinate denial of conjugal duty; and that a man may ſend away a proud Vaſthi, and marry an Eſther in her ſtead. It ſeems, if this example ſhall not be impertinent, that Luther meant not only the refuſal of benevolence, but a ſtubborn denial of any main conjugal duty; or if he did not, it will be evinc't from what he allows. For out of queſtion, with men that are not barbarous, love and peace, and fitneſs, will be yielded as eſſential to marriage, as corporal benevolence. Though I give my body to be burnt, ſaith St. Paul, and have not charity, it profits me nothing. So though the body proſtitute it ſelf to whom the mind affords no other love or peace, but conſtant malice and vexation, can this bodily benevolence deſerve to be call'd a marriage between Chriſtians and rational Creatures?

Melancton, the third great luminary of Reformation, in his book concerning Marriage, grants Divorce for cruel uſage, and danger of life, urging the authority of that Theodoſian Law, which he eſteems written with the grave deliberation of godly men; and that they who reject this law, and think it diſagreeing from the Goſpel, underſtand not the difference of Law and Goſpel; that the Magiſtrat ought not only to defend life, but to ſuccour the weak conſcience, leſt broke with grief and indignation, it relinquiſh Prayer, and turn to ſome unlawful thing. What if this heavy plight of deſpair ariſe from other diſcontents in Wedloc, which may go to the ſoul of a good man more than the danger of his life, or cruel uſing? which a man cannot be liable to, ſuppoſe it be ingrateful uſage, ſuppoſe it be perpetual ſpight, and diſobedience, ſuppoſe a hatred; ſhall not the Magiſtrat free him from this diſquiet which interrupts his prayers, and diſturbs the cours of his ſervice to God and his Country all as much, and brings him ſuch a miſery, as that he more deſires to leave his life, then fears to loſe it? ſhall not this equally concern the office of civil protection, and much more the charity of a true Church to remedy?

Eraſmus, who for Learning was the wonder of his age, both in his Notes on Matthew, and on the firſt to the Corinthians, in a large and eloquent Diſcourſe, and in his anſwer to Phimoſtomus a Papiſt, maintains (and no Proteſtant then living contradicted him) that the words of Chriſt comprehend many other cauſes of Divorce under the name of fornication.

Bucer (whom our famous Dr. Rainolds was wont to prefer before Calvin) in his Comment on Matthew, and in his ſecond book of the Kingdom of Chriſt, treats of Divorce at large to the ſame effect as is written in the doctrine and diſcipline of Divorce lately publiſht, and the Tranſlation is extant: whom leſt I ſhould be thought to have wreſted to mine own purpoſe, take ſomthing more out of his 49th Chapter, which I then for brevity omitted. It will be the duty of pious Princes, and all who govern Church or Commonwealth, if any, whether husband or wife, ſhall affirm their want of ſuch who either will, or can tolerably perform the neceſſary duties of married life, to grant that they may ſeek them ſuch, and marry them; if they make it appear that ſuch they have not. This Book he wrote here in England, where he liv'd the greateſt admir'd man; and this he dedicated to Edward the ſixt.

Fagius, rankt among the famous Divines of Germany, whom Frederic, at that time the Palatine, ſent for to be the Reformer of his Dominion, and whom afterwards England ſought to, and obtain'd of him to come and teach her, differs not in this opinion from Bucer, as his Notes on the Chaldee Paraphraſt well teſtify.

The whole Church of Strasburgh in her moſt flouriſhing time, when Zellius, Hedio, Capito, and other great Divines taught there, and thoſe two renouned Magiſtrates Farrerus and Sturmius govern'd that Commonwealth and Academy to the admiration of all Germany, hath thus in the 21ſt Article: We teach, that if according to the word of God, yea or againſt it, Divorces happen, to do according to Gods word, Deut. 24. 1. Mat. 19. 1 Cor. 7. and the obſervation of the primitive Church, and the Chriſtian conſtitution of pious Cæſars.

Peter Martyr ſeems in word our eaſy adverſary, but is in deed for us: toward which though it be ſomthing when he ſaith of this opinion, that it is not wicked, and can hardly be refuted, this which follows is much more; I ſpeak not here, ſaith he, of natural impediments which may ſo happ'n that the matrimony can no longer hold: but adding, that he often wonder'd, how the antient and moſt chriſtian Emperors eſtabliſht thoſe laws of Divorce, and neither Ambroſe, who had ſuch influence upon the laws of Theodoſius, nor any of thoſe holy Fathers found fault, nor any of the Churches, why the Magiſtrats of this day ſhould be ſo loth to conſtitute the ſame. Perhaps they fear an inundation of Divorces, which is not likely, whenas we read not either among the Ebrews, Greeks, or Romans, that they were much frequent where they were moſt permitted. If they judg chriſtian men worſe than Jews or Pagans, they both injure that name, and by this reaſon will be conſtrain'd to grant Divorces the rather; becauſe it was permitted as a remedy of evil, for who would remove the medcin, while the diſeaſe is yet ſo rife? This being read both in his common places, and on the firſt to the Corinthians, with what we ſhall relate more of him yet ere the end, ſets him abſolutely on this ſide. Not to inſiſt that in both theſe, and other places of his commentaries he grants Divorce not only for deſertion, but for the ſeducement and ſcandalous demeanour of a heretical conſort.

Muſculus, a Divine of no obſcure fame, diſtinguiſhes between the religious and the civil determination of Divorce; and leaving the civil wholly to the Lawyers, pronounces a conſcionable Divorce for impotence not only natural, but accidental, if it be durable. His equity, it ſeems, can enlarge the words of Chriſt to one cauſe more then Adultery; why may not the reaſon of another man as wiſe, enlarge them to another cauſe?

Gualter of Zuric, a well known judicious commentator, in his Homilies on Matthew allows Divorce for Leproſie, or any other cauſe which renders unfit for wedloc, and calls this rather a nullity of marriage then a divorce. And who, that is not himſelf a meer body, can reſtrain all the unfitnes of Marriage only to a corporeal defect?

Hemingius an Author highly eſteem'd, and his works printed at Geneva, writing of Divorce, confeſſes that learned men vary in this queſtion, ſome granting three cauſes thereof, ſome five, others many more; he himſelf gives us ſix, Adultery, Deſertion, Inability, Error, Evil-uſage, and Impiety, uſing argument that Chriſt under one ſpecial contains the whole kind, and under the name and example of fornication he includes other cauſes equipollent. This diſcours he wrote at the requeſt of many who had the judging of theſe cauſes in Denmark and Norway, who by all likelyhood follow'd his advice.

Hunnius a Doctor of Wittenberg, well known both in Divinity and other Arts, on the 19th of Matth. affirms, That the exception of fornication expreſt by our Saviour excludes not other cauſes equalling adultery, or deſtructive to the ſubſtantials of matrimony; but was oppos'd to the cuſtom of the Jews who made divorce for every light cauſe.

Felix Bidenbachius, an eminent Divine in the Dutchy of Wirtemberg, affirms, That the obſtinate refuſal of conjugal due, is a lawful cauſe of Divorce, and gives an inſtance that the conſiſtory of that ſtate ſo judg'd.

Gerard cites Harbardus an Author not unknown, and Arniſæus cites Wigandus, both yeelding divorce in caſe of cruel uſage; and another author who teſtifies to have ſeen in a dukedom of Germany marriages diſjoyn'd for ſome implacable enmities ariſing.

Beza, one of the ſtricteſt againſt Divorce, denies it not for danger of life from a Heretic, or importunat ſolicitation to do ought againſt Religion: and counts it all one whether the Heretic deſert, or would ſtay upon intolerable conditions. But this deciſion well examin'd will be found of no ſolidity. For Beza would be ask'd why, if God ſo ſtrictly exact our ſtay in any kind of Wedloc, we had not better ſtay and hazard a murdering for Religion at the hand of a wife or husband, as he and others enjoyn us to ſtay and venture it for all other cauſes but that? and why a mans life is not as well and warrantably ſav'd by divorcing from an orthodox murderer, as a heretical? Again, if deſertion be confeſt by him to conſiſt not only in the forſaking, but in the unſufferable conditions of ſtaying, a man may as well deduce the lawfulneſs of divorcing from any intolerable conditions (if his grant be good that we may divorce thereupon from a Heretic) as he can deduce it lawful to divorce from any deſerter, by finding it lawful to divorce from a deſerting Infidel. For this is plain, if St. Pauls permiſſion to divorce an infidel deſerter, infer it lawful for any malicious deſertion, then doth Beza's definition of a deſerter transfer it ſelf with like facility from the cauſe of Religion to the cauſe of Malice, and proves it as good to divorce from him who intolerably ſtays, as from him who purpoſely departs; and leaves it as lawful to depart from him who urgently requires a wicked thing, though profeſſing the ſame Religion, as from him who urges a heatheniſh or ſuperſtitious compliance in a different faith. For if there be ſuch neceſſity of our abiding, we ought rather to abide the utmoſt for Religion than for any other cauſe; ſeeing both the cauſe of our ſtay is pretended our Religion to Marriage, and the cauſe of our ſuffering is ſuppos'd our conſtant Marriage to Religion. Beza therefore, by his own definition of a deſerter, juſtifies a divorce from any wicked or intolerable conditions rather in the ſame Religion than in a different.

Aretius, a famous Divine of Bern, approves many cauſes of Divorce in his Problems, and adds, That the laws and conſiſtories of Swizzerland approve them alſo. As firſt, Adultery, and that not actual only, but intentional, alleging Matthew 5. Whoſoever looketh to luſt, hath committed adultery already in his heart. Whereby, ſaith he, our Saviour ſhews that the breach of matrimony may be not only by outward act, but by the heart and deſire; when that hath once poſſeſt, it renders the converſation intolerable, and commonly the fact follows. Other cauſes to the number of 9. or 10. conſenting in moſt with the imperial Laws, may be read in the Author himſelf, who avers them to be grave and weighty. All theſe are men of name in Divinity; and to theſe, if need were, might be added more. Nor have the Civilians bin all ſo blinded by the Canon, as not to avouch the juſtice of thoſe old permiſſions touching Divorce.

Alciat of Millain, a man of extraordinary wiſdom and learning, in the ſixt book of his Parerga, defends thoſe imperial Laws, not repugnant to the Goſpel, as the Church then interpreted. For, ſaith he, the antients underſtood him ſeparat by man, whom paſſions and corrupt affections divorc't, not if the provincial Biſhops firſt heard the matter, and judg'd, as the Council of Agatha declares: and on ſome part of the Code he names Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis, the firſt computer of Canons, to be in the ſame mind. And in the former place gives his opinion that Divorce might be more lawfully permitted than Uſury.

Coraſius, recorded by Helvicus among the famous Lawyers, hath been already cited of the ſame judgment.

Weſembechius, a much nam'd Civilian, in his Comment on this Law defends it, and affirms, That our Saviour excluded not other faults equal to adultery; and that the word fornication ſignifies larger among the Hebrews than with us, comprehending every fault which alienates from him to whom obedience is due, and that the primitive Church interpreted ſo.

Grotius, yet living, and of prime note among learned men, retires plainly from the Canon to the antient Civility, yea to the Moſaic Law, as being moſt juſt and undecevable. On the 5*th* of Matth. he ſaith, That Chriſt made no civil Laws, but taught us how to uſe Law: that the Law ſent not a husband to the Judg about this matter of Divorce, but left him to his own conſcience; that Chriſt therfore cannot be thought to ſend him; that Adultery may be judg'd by a vehement ſuſpition; that the exception of Adultery ſeems an example of other like offences; proves it from the manner of ſpeech, the maxims of Law, the reaſon of Charity, and common Equity.

Theſe Authorities, without long ſearch, I had to produce, all excellent Men, ſom of them ſuch as many ages had brought forth none greater: almoſt the meaneſt of them might deſerve to obtain credit in a ſingularity; what might not then all of them joyn'd in an opinion ſo conſonant to reaſon? For although ſom ſpeak of this cauſe, others of that, why Divorce may be, yet all agreeing in the neceſſary enlargement of that textual ſtraitnes, leave the matter to equity, nor to literal bondage, and ſo the Opinion cloſes. Nor could I have wanted more teſtimonies, had the cauſe needed a more ſollicitous enquiry. But herein the ſatiſfaction of others hath bin ſtudied, not the gaining of more aſſurance to mine own perſwaſion: although authorities contributing reaſon withall, be a good confirmation and a welcom. But God, I ſolemnly atteſt him, withheld from my knowledge the conſenting judgment of theſe men ſo late, until they could not be my inſtructers, but only my unexpected witneſſes to partial men, that in this work I had not given the worſt experiment of an induſtry joyn'd with integrity, and the free utterance tho of an unpopular truth. Which yet to the people of England may, if God ſo pleaſe, prove a memorable informing; certainly a benefit which was intended them long ſince by men of higheſt repute for Wiſdom and Piety, Bucer and Eraſmus. Only this one autority more, whether in place or out of place, I am not to omit; which if any can think a ſmall one, I muſt be patient, it is no ſmaller then the whole aſſembl'd Autority of England both Church and State; and in thoſe times which are on record for the pureſt and ſincereſt that ever ſhon yet on the reformation of this Iland, the time of Edward the 6th. That worthy Prince having utterly aboliſht the Canon Law out of his Dominions, as his Father did before him, appointed by full vote of Parlament, a Committie of two and thirty choſen men, Divines and Lawyers, of whom Cranmer the Archbiſhop, Peter Martyr, and Walter Haddon (not without the aſſiſtance of Sir John Cheeke the Kings Tutor, a man at that time counted the learnedeſt of Engliſh-men, and for piety not inferior) were the chief, to frame anew ſom Eccleſiaſtical Laws that might be inſtead of what was abrogated. The work with great diligence was finiſht, and with as great approbation of that reforming age was receav'd; and had bin doubtleſs, as the learned Preface thereof teſtifies, eſtabliſht by Act of Parlament, had not the good Kings death ſo ſoon enſuing, arreſted the furder growth of Religion alſo, from that ſeaſon to this. Thoſe Laws, thus founded on the memorable Wiſdom and Piety of that religious Parlament and Synod, allow Divorce and ſecond Marriage not only for adultery or deſertion, but for any capital enmity or plot laid againſt the others life, and likewiſe for evil and fierce uſage: nay the 12 Chap. of that title by plain conſequence declares, that leſſer contentions, if they be perpetual, may obtain divorce: which is all one really with the poſition by me held in the former Treatiſe publiſht on this argument, herein only differing, that there the cauſe of perpetual ſtrife was put for example in the unchangeable diſcord of ſom natures; but in theſe Laws intended us by the beſt of our anceſtors, the effect of continual ſtrife is determined no unjuſt plea of Divorce, whether the cauſe be natural or wilful. Wherby the warineſs and deliberation from which that diſcourſe proceeded, will appear, and that God hath aided us to make no bad concluſion of this point; ſeeing the Opinion which of late hath undergon ill cenſures among the vulgar, hath now prov'd to have don no violence to Scripture, unleſs all theſe famous Authors alleg'd have done the like; nor hath affirm'd ought more then what indeed the moſt nominated Fathers of the Church both ancient and modern are unexpectedly affirming, the Laws of Gods peculiar people, and of primitive Chriſtendom found to have practis'd, reformed Churches and States to have imitated, and eſpecially the moſt pious Church-times of this Kingdom to have fram'd and publiſht, and, but for ſad hindrances in the ſudden change of Religion, had enacted by the Parlament. Henceforth let them who condemn the aſſertion of this book for new and licentious, be ſorry; leſt, while they think to be of the graver ſort, and take on them to be teachers, they expoſe themſelves rather to be pledg'd up and down by men who intimately know them, to the diſcovery and contempt of their ignorance and preſumption.

Teſtimonies of the high Approbation which Learned Men have given of MARTIN BUCER.

Simon Grynæus, 1533.

AMong all the Germans, I give the Palm to Bucer for Excellence in the Scriptures. Melanchton in human Learning is wondrous fluent; but greater Knowledg in the Scripture I attribute to Bucer, and ſpeak it unfainedly.

John Calvin, 1539.

Martin Bucer, a moſt faithful Doctor of the Church of Chriſt, beſides his rare Learning, and copious Knowledg of many things, beſides his clearnes of Wit, much Reading, and other many and various Vertues, wherein he is almoſt by none now living excell'd, hath few Equals, and excels moſt; hath this praiſe peculiar to himſelf, that none in this Age hath us'd exacter diligence in the Expoſition of Scripture.

And a little beneath.

Bucer is more large then to be read by over-buſied Men, and too high to be eaſily underſtood by unattentive Men, and of a low capacity.

Sir John Cheek, Tutor to K. Edward VI. 1551.

We have loſt our Maſter, then whom the World ſcarce held a greater, whether we conſider his knowledg of true Religion, or his integrity and innocence of life, or his inceſſant ſtudy of holy things, or his matchleſs labour of promoting piety, or his authority and amplitude of teaching, or whatever els was praiſe-worthy and glorious in him. Script. Anglicana, pag. 864.

John Sturmius of Strasburgh.

No man can be ignorant what a great and conſtant opinion and eſtimation of Bucer there is in Italy, France, and England. Whence the Saying of Quintilian hath oft come to my mind, that he hath well profited in Eloquence whom Cicero pleaſes. The ſame ſay I of Bucer, that he hath made no ſmall progreſs in Divinity, whom Bucer pleaſes; for in his Volumes, which he wrote very many, there is the plain impreſſion to be diſcern'd of many great Vertues, of Diligence, of Charity, of Truth, of Acuteneſs of Judgment, of Learning. Wherein he hath a certain proper kind of Writing, whereby he doth not only teach the Reader, but affects him with the ſweetneſs of his Sentences, and with the manner of his Arguing, which is ſo teaching, and ſo logical, that it may be perceiv'd how learnedly he ſeparates probable Reaſons from neceſſary, how forcibly he confirms what he has to prove, how ſuttly he refutes, not with ſharpnes, but with truth.

Theodore Beza on the Portraiture of M. Bucer.

This is that count'nance of Bucer, the mirror of mildnes, temper'd with gravity; to whom the City of Strasburgh owes the Reformation of her Church. Whoſe ſingular Learning, and eminent Zeal, joyn'd with excellent Wiſdom, both his learned Books, and public Diſputations in the general Diets of the Empire, ſhall witneſs to all Ages. Him the German Perſecution drove into England; where honourably entertain'd by Edward the Sixt, he was for two years chief Profeſſor of Divinity in Cambridge, with greateſt frequency and applauſe of all learned and pious Men until his death, 1551. Bezæ Icones.

Mr. Fox Book of Martyrs, Vol. 3. p. 763.

Bucer, what by writing, but chiefly by reading and preaching openly, wherein being painful in the Word of God, he never ſpar'd himſelf, nor regarded his Health, brought all Men into ſuch an admiration of him, that neither his Friends could ſufficiently praiſe him, nor his Enemies in any point find fault with his ſingular Life, and ſincere Doctrine. A moſt certain tok'n whereof may be his ſumptuous Burial at Cambridge, ſolemniz'd with ſo great an aſſiſtance of all the Univerſity, that it was not poſſible to deviſe more to the ſetting out and amplifying of the ſame.

Dr. Pern the Popiſh Vice-Chancellor of Cambridg, his Adverſary.

Cardinal Pool about the ſourth year of Queen Mary, intending to reduce the Univerſity of Cambridg to Popery again, thought no way ſo effectual, as to cauſe the Bones of Martin Bucer and Paulus Fagius, which had been four years in the Grave, to be tak'n up and burnt openly with their Books, as knowing that thoſe two worthy Men had bin of greateſt moment to the Reformation of that place from Popery, and had left ſuch powerful Seeds of their Doctrine behind them, as would never die, unleſs the Men themſelves were digg'd up, and openly condemn'd for Heretics by the Univerſity it ſelf. This was put in execution, and Doctor Pern, Vice-Chancellor, appointed to preach againſt Bucer. Who, among other things, laid to his charge the Opinions which he held of the Marriage of Prieſts, ot Divorcement, and of Uſury. But immediately after his Sermon, or ſomewhat before, as the Book of Martyrs for a truth relates, Vol. 3. p. 770. the ſaid Doctor Pern ſmiting himſelf on the Breaſt, and in manner weeping, wiſht with all his heart, that God would grant his Soul might then preſently depart, and remain with Bucer's; for he knew his Life was ſuch, that if any man's Soul were worthy of Heaven, he thought Bucers in ſpecial to be moſt worthy. Hiſtor. de Combuſt. Buceri, & Fagii.

Acworth the Univerſity-Orator.

Soon after that Queen Elizabeth came to the Crown, this Condemnation of Bucer and Fagius by the Cardinal and his Doctors, was ſolemnly repeal'd by the Univerſity; and the Memory of thoſe two famous Men celebrated in an Oration by Acworth the Univerſity-Orator, which is yet extant in the Book of Martyrs, Vol. 3. p. 773. and in Latin, Scripta Anglic. p. 936.

Nicolas Carre, a learned Man; Walter Haddon, Maſter of the Requeſts to Queen Elizabeth; Matthew Parker, afterwards Primate of England, with other eminent Men, in their funeral Orations and Sermons, expreſs abundantly how great a Man Martin Bucer was; what an incredible loſs England ſuſtain'd in his Death; and that with him dy'd the hope of a perfet Reformation for that Age. Ibid.

Jacobus Verheiden of Grave, in his Elogies of famous Divines.

Though the Name of Martin Luther be famous, yet thou Martin Bucer, for Piety, Learning, Labour, Care, Vigilance, and Writing, art not to be held inferior to Luther. Bucer was a ſingular inſtrument of God, ſo was Luther. By the Death of this moſt learned and moſt faithful Man, the Church of Chriſt ſuſtain'd a heavy loſs, as Calvin witneſſeth; and they who are ſtudious of Calvin, are not ignorant how much he aſcribes to Bucer; for thus he writes in a Letter to Viretus: What a manifold loſs befel the Church of God in the Death of Bucer, as oft as I call to mind, I feel my heart almoſt rent aſunder.

Peter Martyr Epiſt. to Conradus Hubertus.

He is dead, who hath overcome in many Battels of the Lord. God lent us for a time this our Father, and our Teacher, never enough prais'd. Death hath divided me from a moſt unanimous Friend, one truly according to mine own heart. My Mind is over-preſt with Grief, inſomuch that I have not power to write more. I bid thee in Chriſt farewel, and wiſh thou maiſt be able to bear the loſs of Bucer, better then I can bear it.

Teſtimonies giv'n by Learned Men to Paulus Fagius, who held the ſame Opinion with Martin Bucer concerning Divorce.

Bezæ Icones. Paulus Fagius, born in the Palatinate, became moſt ſkilful in the Hebrew Tongue. Being call'd to the Miniſtery at Iſna, he publiſht many ancient and profitable Hebrew Books, being aided in the expences by a Senator of that City, as Origen ſometime was by a certain rich man call'd Ambroſius. At length invited to Strasburgh, he there famouſly diſcharg'd the Office of a Teacher; until the ſame Perſecution drove him and Bucer into England, where he was preferr'd to a Profeſſors place in Cambridge, and ſoon after died.

Melchior Adamus writes his Life among the famous German Divines.

Sleidan and Thuanus mention him with honour in their Hiſtory. And Verheiden in his Elogies.

To the PARLAMENT.

THE Book, which among other great and high Points of Reformation, contains as a principal part thereof, this Treatiſe here preſented, Supreme Court of Parlament, was by the famous Author Martin Bucer, dedicated to Edward the ſixt: whoſe incomparable Youth doubtleſs had brought forth to the Church of England ſuch a glorious Manhood, had his life reacht it, as would have left in the affairs of Religion, nothing without an excellent pattern for us now to follow. But ſince the ſecret purpoſe of divine Appointment hath reſerv'd no leſs perhaps then the juſt half of ſuch a ſacred Work to be accompliſht in this Age, and principally, as we truſt, by your ſucceſful Wiſdom and Authority, religious Lords and Commons, what wonder if I ſeek no other, to whoſe exacteſt judgment and review I may commend theſe laſt and worthieſt Labours of this renowned Teacher? whom living, all the pious Nobility of thoſe reforming Times, your trueſt and beſt imitated Anceſtors, reverenc'd and admir'd. Nor was he wanting to a recompence as great as was himſelf; when both at many times before, and eſpecially among his laſt Sighs and Prayers teſtifying his dear and fatherly affection to the Church and Realm of England, he ſincerely wiſht in the hearing of many devout Men, that what he had in this his laſt Book Nicol. de obit Buceri. written to King Edward concerning Diſcipline, might have place in this Kingdom. His hope was then, that no calamity, no confuſion, or deformity would happen to the Common-wealth; but otherwiſe he fear'd, leſt in the midſt of all this ardency to know God, yet by the neglect of Diſcipline, or good Endeavours would not ſucceed. Theſe remarkable words of ſo godly and ſo eminent a Man at his death, as they are related by a ſufficient and well-known witnes, who heard them, and inſerted by Thuanus into his grave and ſerious Hiſtory; ſo ought they to be chiefly conſider'd by that Nation for whoſe ſake they were utter'd, and more eſpecially by that general Council which repreſents the Body of that Nation. If therfore the Book or this part therof, for neceſſary cauſes, be now reviv'd and recommended to the uſe of this undiſciplin'd Age; it

hence appears, that theſe Reaſons have not err'd in the choice of a fit Patronage for a diſcourſe of ſuch importance. But why the whole Tractat is not here brought entire, but this matter of Divorcement ſelected in particular, to prevent the full ſpeed of ſome miſ-interpreter, I haſten to diſcloſe. Firſt, it will be ſoon manifeſt to them who know what wiſe men ſhould know, that the conſtitution and reformation of a Common-wealth, if Ezra and Nehemiah did not miſ-reform, is, like a building, to begin orderly from the foundation therof, which is Marriage and the Family, to ſet right firſt what ever is amiſs therein. How can there els grow up a Race of warrantable Men, while the houſe and home that breeds them, is troubl'd and diſquieted under a bondage not of God's conſtraining with a natureles conſtraint (if his moſt righteous judgments may be our rule) but laid upon us imperiouſly in the worſt and weakeſt Ages of Knowledg, by a canonical tyranny of ſtupid and malicious Monks: who having raſhly vow'd themſelves to a ſingle life, which they could not undergo, invented new fetters to throw on Matrimony, that the World thereby waxing more diſſolute, they alſo in a general looſnes might ſin with more favour. Next, there being yet among many, ſuch a ſtrange iniquity and perverſnes againſt all neceſſary Divorce, while they will needs expound the words of our Saviour not duly by comparing other places, as they muſt do in the reſolving of a hunder'd other Scriptures, but by perſiſting deafly in the abrupt and Papiſtical way of a literal apprehenſion againſt the direct Analogy of Senſe, Reaſon, Law and Goſpel; it therfore may well ſeem more then time to apply the ſound and holy Perſuaſions of this Apoſtolic Man, to that part in us, which is not yet fully diſpoſſeſt of an error as abſurd, as moſt that we deplore in our blindeſt Adverſaries; and to let his Autority and unanſwerable Reaſons be vulgarly known, that either his Name, or the force of his Doctrine may work a wholſome effect. Laſtly, I find it clear to be the Author's intention, that this point of Divorcement ſhould be held and receiv'd as a moſt neceſſary and prime part of diſcipline in every Chriſtian Government. And therfore having reduc'd his model of Reformation to 14 Heads, he beſtows almoſt as much time about this one point of Divorce, as about all the reſt; which alſo was the judgment of his Heirs and learned Friends in Germany, beſt acquainted with his meaning; who firſt publiſhing this his Book by Oporinus at Baſil (a City for Learning and Conſtancy in the true Faith, honorable among the firſt) added a ſpecial note in the title, that there the Reader ſhould find the Doctrine of Divorce handl'd ſo ſolidly, and ſo fully, as ſcars the like in a Writer of that Age: and with this particular commendation they doubted not to dedicate the Book, as a moſt profitable and exquiſit Diſcours, to Chriſtian the 3d, a worthy and pious King of Denmark, as the Author himſelf had done before to our Edward the ſixt. Yet did not Bucer in that Volume only declare what his conſtant opinion was herein, but alſo in his Comment upon Matthew, written at Straſburgh divers years before, he treats diſtinctly and copiouſly the ſame Argument in three ſeveral places; touches it alſo upon the 7th to the Romans, and promiſes the ſame Solution more largely upon the 1ſt to the Corinthians, omitting no occaſion to weed out this laſt and deepeſt miſchief of the Canon-law, ſown into the Opinions of modern Men, againſt the Laws and Practice both of God's choſen People, and the beſt primitive Times. Wherin his faithfulnes and powerful evidence prevail'd ſo far with all the Church of Straſburg, that they publiſht this doctrine of Divorce, as an Article of their Confeſſion, after they had taught ſo eight and twenty years, through all thoſe times, when that City flouriſht, and excell'd moſt, both in Religion, Learning, and good Government, under thoſe firſt reſtorers of the Goſpel there, Zelius, Hedio, Capito, Fagius, and thoſe who incomparably then govern'd the Common-wealth, Farrerus and Sturmius. If therfore God in the former Age found out a Servant, and by whom he had converted and reform'd many a City, by him thought good to reſtore the moſt needful Doctrine of Divorce from rigorous and harmful miſtakes on the right hand, it can be no ſtrange thing if in this age he ſtir up by whatſoever means whom it pleaſes him, to take in hand and maintain the ſame aſſertion. Certainly if it be in man's diſcerning to ſever Providence from Chance, I could allege many inſtances, wherin there would appear cauſe to eſteem of me no other then a paſſive inſtrument under ſome power and counſel higher and better then can be human, working to a general good in the whole cours of this matter. For that I owe no light, or leading receiv'd from any man in the diſcovery of this truth, what time I firſt undertook it in the doctrine and diſcipline of Divorce, and had only the infallible grounds of Scripture to be my guide; he who tries the inmoſt heart, and ſaw with what ſevere induſtry and examination of my ſelf, I ſet down every period, will be my witnes. When I had almoſt finiſht the firſt Edition, tion, I chanc'd to read in the Notes of Hugo Grotius upon the 5th of Matth. whom I ſtrait underſtood inclining to reaſonable terms in this Controverſie: and ſomething he whiſper'd rather then diſputed about the Law of Charity, and the true end of Wedloc. Glad therfore of ſuch an able Aſſiſtant, however at much diſtance, I reſolv'd at length to put off into this wild and calumnious World. For God, it ſeems, intended to prove me, whether I durſt alone take up a rightful Cauſe againſt a World of diſeſteem, and found I durſt. My Name I did not publiſh, as not willing it ſhould ſway the Reader either for me or againſt me. But when I was told, that the ſtile, which what it ails to be ſo ſoon diſtinguiſhable, I cannot tell, was known by moſt Men, and that ſome of the Clergy began to inveigh and exclaim on what I was credibly inform'd they had not read; I took it then for my proper ſeaſon both to ſhew them a Name that could eaſily contemn ſuch an indiſcreet kind of Cenſure, and to reinforce the Queſtion with a more accurat diligence: that if any of them would be ſo good as to leave railing, and to let us hear ſo much of his Learning and Chriſtian Wiſdom, as will be ſtrictly demanded of him in his anſwering to this Problem, care was had he ſhould not ſpend his Preparations againſt a nameleſs Pamphlet. By this time I had learnt that Paulus Fagius, one of the chief Divines in Germany, ſent for by Frederic the Palatine, to reform his Dominion, and after that invited hither in King Edward's days to be Profeſſor of Divinity in Cambridge, was of the ſame Opinion touching Divorce, which theſe Men ſo laviſhly traduc'd in me. What I found, I inſerted where fitteſt place was, thinking ſure they would reſpect ſo grave an Author, at laſt to the moderating of their odious Inferences. And having now perfected a ſecond Edition, I referr'd the judging therof to your high and impartial Sentence, honour'd Lords and Commons. For I was confident, if any thing generous, any thing noble, and above the Multitude, were left yet in the Spirit of England; it could be no where ſooner found, and no where ſooner underſtood, then in that Houſe of Juſtice and true Liberty where ye ſit in Council. Nor doth the Event hitherto, for ſome reaſons which I ſhall not here deliver, fail me of what I conceiv'd ſo highly. Nevertheleſs, being far otherwiſe dealt with by ſome, of whoſe Profeſſion and ſuppoſed Knowledg I had better hope, and eſteem'd the deviſer of a new and pernicious Paradox, I felt no difference within me from that peace and firmnes of Mind, which is of neareſt kin to Patience and Contentment: both for that I knew I had divulg'd a truth linkt inſeparably with the moſt fundamental Rules of Chriſtianity, to ſtand or fall together, and was not un-inform'd that divers learned and judicious Men teſtify'd their daily Approbation of the Book. Yet at length it hath pleas'd God, who had already giv'n me ſatisfaction in my ſelf, to afford me now a means wherby I may be fully juſtify'd alſo in the eyes of Men. When the Book had bin now the ſecond time ſet forth welnigh three Months, as I beſt remember, I then firſt came to hear that Martin Bucer had writt'n much concerning Divorce: whom earneſtly turning over, I ſoon perceiv'd, but not without amazement, in the ſame Opinion, confirm'd with the ſame Reaſons which in that publiſht Book, without the help or imitation of any precedent Writer, I had labour'd out, and laid together. Not but that there is ſome difference in the Handling, in the Order, and the Number of Arguments, but ſtill agreeing in the ſame Concluſion. So as I may juſtly gratulat mine own mind with due acknowledgment of aſſiſtance from above, which led me, not as a Learner, but as a collateral Teacher, to a ſympathy of judgment with no leſs a man then Martin Bucer. And he, if our things here below arrive him where he is, does not repent him to ſee that point of Knowledg which he firſt, and with an uncheckt freedom preacht to thoſe more knowing times of England, now found ſo neceſſary, though what he admoniſht were loſt out of our memory; yet that God doth now again create the ſame doctrince in another unwritt'n Table, and raiſes it up immediately out of his pure Oracle to the convincement of a pervers Age, eager in the reformation of Names and Ceremonies, but in realities as traditional and as ignorant as their forefathers. I would aſk now the formoſt of my profound Accuſers, Whether they dare affirm that to be licentious, new and dangerous, which Martin Bucer ſo often, and ſo urgently avoucht to be moſt lawful, moſt neceſſary, and moſt Chriſtian, without the leaſt blemiſh to his good Name, among all the worthy Men of that Age, and ſince, who teſtifie ſo highly of him? If they dare, they muſt then ſet up an Arrogance of their own againſt all thoſe Churches and Saints who honour'd him without this exception: If they dare not, how can they now make that licentious Doctrine in another, which was never blam'd, or confuted in Bucer, or in Fagius? The truth is, there will be due to them for this their unadviſed raſhnes, the beſt Donative that can be giv'n them, I mean a round

Reproof; now that where they thought to be moſt Magiſterial, they have diſplay'd their own want, both of reading, and of judgment. Firſt, to be ſo unacquainted in the Writings of Bucer, which are ſo obvious and ſo uſeful in their own faculty; next to be ſo caught in a prejudicating weaknes, as to condemn that for lewd, which (whether they knew or not) theſe elect Servants of Chriſt commended for lawful; and for new, that which was taught by theſe almoſt the firſt and greateſt Authors of Reformation, who were never taxt for ſo teaching; and dedicated without ſcruple to a royal Pair of the firſt reforming Kings in Chriſtendom, and confeſt in the public Confeſſion of a moſt Orthodoxal Church and State in Germany. This is alſo another fault which I muſt tell them; that they have ſtood now almoſt this whole year clamouring a far off, while the Book hath bin twice printed, twice bought up, and never once vouchſaft a friendly Conference with the Author, who would be glad and thankful to be ſhewn an Error, either by privat Diſpute, or public Anſwer, and could retract, as well as wiſe men before him; might alſo be worth the gaining, as one who heretofore, hath done good ſervice to the Church by their own confeſſion. Or if he be obſtinat, their Confutation would have render'd him without excuſe, and reclam'd others of no mean parts who incline to his Opinion. But now their work is more then doubl'd; and how they will hold up their heads againſt the ſudden aſpect of theſe two great and reverend Saints whom they have defam'd, how they will make good the cenſuring of that for a novelty of licence, which Bucer conſtantly taught to be a pure and holy Law of Chriſt's Kingdom, let them adviſe. For againſt theſe my Adverſaries, who before the examining of a propounded truth in a fit time of Reformation, have had the conſcience to oppoſe naught els but their blind reproaches and ſurmiſes, that a ſingle innocence might not be oppreſt and overborn by a crew of mouths for the reſtoring of a Law and Doctrin falſely and unlearnedly reputed new and ſcandalous, God, that I may ever magnifie and record this his Goodnes, hath unexpectedly rais'd up as it were from the dead, more then one famous Light of the firſt Reformation to bear witnes with me, and to do me honour in that very thing, wherein theſe men thought to have blotted me: And hath giv'n them the proof of a capacity which they deſpis'd, running equal, and authentic with ſome of their chiefeſt Maſters unthought of, and in a point of ſageſt moment. However, if we know at all when to aſcribe the Occurences of this life to the work of a ſpecial Providence, as nothing is more uſual in the talk of good men, what can be more like to a ſpecial Providence of God, then in the firſt Reformation of England, that this queſtion of Divorce, as a main thing to be reſtor'd to juſt freedom, was writt'n, and ſeriouſly commended to Edward the ſixt, by a man call'd from another Country to be the inſtructer of our Nation; and now in this preſent renewing of the Church and Commonwealth, which we pray may be more laſting, that the ſame Queſtion ſhould be again treated and preſented to this Parlament, by one enabl'd to uſe the ſame reaſons without the leaſt ſight or knowledg of what was done before. It were no treſpas, Lords and Commons, though ſomething of leſs note were attributed to the ordering of a heavenly Power; this queſtion therfore of ſuch prime concernment both to Chriſtian and Civil welfare, in ſuch an extraordinary manner, not recover'd, but plainly twice born to theſe latter Ages, as from a divine hand I tender to your Acceptance, and moſt conſiderate Thoughts. Think not that God rais'd up in vain a man of greateſt autority in the Church to tell a trivial and licentious Tale in the ears of that good Prince, and to bequeath it as his laſt Will and Teſtament, nay rather as the Teſtament and Royal Law of Chriſt to this Nation; or that it ſhould of it ſelf after ſo many years, as it were in a new Feild where it was never ſow'n, grow up again as a vitious plant in the mind of another, who had ſpoke honeſteſt things to the Nation; though he knew not that what his Youth then reaſon'd without a pattern, had bin heard already, and well allow'd from the Gravity and Worth of Martin Bucer: till meeting with the envy of men ignorant in their own undertak'n Calling, God directed him to the forgott'n Writings of this faithful Evangeliſt, to be his defence and warrant againſt the groſs imputation of broaching Licence. Ye are now in the glorious way to high Vertue, and matchleſs Deeds, truſted with a moſt ineſtimable Truſt, the aſſerting of our juſt Liberties. Ye have a Nation that expects now, and from mighty ſuffrings aſpires to be the example of all Chriſtendom to a perfeteſt reforming. Dare to be as great, as ample, and as eminent in the fair progreſs of your noble deſigns, as the full and goodly ſtature of Truth and Excellence it ſelf; as unlimited by petty Precedents and Copies, as your unqueſtionable Calling from Heaven gives ye power to be. What are all our public Immunities and Privileges worth? and how ſhall it be judg'd that we fight for them with Minds worthy to enjoy them, if we ſuffer our ſelves in the mean while not to underſtand the moſt important freedom that God and Nature hath giv'n us in the family; which no wiſe Nation ever wanted, till the Popery and Superſtition of ſome former Ages attempted to remove and alter divine and moſt prudent Laws for human and moſt imprudent Canons: whereby good men in the beſt portion of their lives, and in that Ordinance of God which entitles them from the beginning to moſt juſt and requiſite contentments, are compell'd to civil Indignities, which by the Law of Moſes bad men were not compell'd to? Be not bound about, and ſtraitn'd in the ſpatious Wiſdom of your free Spirits, by the ſcanty and unadequat and inconſiſtent Principles of ſuch as condemn others for adhering to Traditions, and are themſelves the proſtrat Worſhippers of Cuſtom; and of ſuch a tradition as they can deduce from no antiquity, but from the rudeſt, and thickeſt Barbariſm of Antichriſtian times. But why do I anticipate the more acceptable, and prevailing voice of learned Bucer himſelf, the Paſtor of Nations? And O that I could ſet him living before ye in that Doctoral Chair, where once the learnedeſt of England thought it no diſparagement to ſit at his feet! He would be ſuch a Pilot, and ſuch a Father to ye, as ye would ſoon find the difference of his hand and ſkill upon the helm of Reformation. Nor do I forget that faithful Aſſociate of his Labours, Paulus Fagius; for theſe their great Names and Merits, how pretious ſo ever, God hath now joyn'd with me neceſſarily, in the good or evil report of this doctrine which I leave with you. It was writt'n to a religious King of this Land; writt'n earneſtly, as a main matter wherin this Kingdom needed a reform, if it purpos'd to be the Kingdom of Chriſt: Writt'n by him, who if any ſince the days of Luther, merits to be counted the Apoſtle of our Church; whoſe unwearied pains and watching for our ſakes, as they ſpent him quickly here among us, ſo did they, during the ſhortnes of his Life, incredibly promote the Goſpel throughout this Realm. The Autority, the Learning, the Godlines of this Man conſulted with, is able to out-ballance all that the lightnes of a vulgar oppoſition can bring to counterpoiſe. I leave him alſo as my complete Surety and Teſtimonial, if Truth be not the beſt witnes to it ſelf, that what I formerly preſented to your reading on this ſubject, was good, and juſt, and honeſt, not licentious. Not that I have now more confidence by the addition of theſe great Authors to my party; for what I wrote was not my opinion, but my Knowledg; ev'n then when I could trace no footſtep in the way I went: nor that I think to win upon your apprehenſions with Numbers and with Names, rather then with Reaſons, yet certainly the worſt of my detracters will not except againſt ſo good a bail of my integrity and judgment, as now appears for me. They muſt els put in the Fame of Bucer and of Fagius, as my Accomplices and Confederats into the ſame Inditement; they muſt dig up the good Name of theſe prime Worthies (if their Names could be ever buried) they muſt dig them up and brand them as the Papiſts did their Bodies; and thoſe their pure unblamable Spirits, which live not only in Heaven, but in their Writings, they muſt attaint with new Attaintures which no Proteſtant ever before aſpers'd them with. Or if perhaps we may obtain to get our Appeachment new drawn, a Writ of Error, not of Libertiſm, that thoſe two principal Leaders of Reformation may not now come to be ſu'd in a Bill of Licence, to the ſcandal of our Church; the brief reſult will be, that for the Error, if their own Works be not thought ſufficient to defend them, there livs yet who will be ready, in a fair and chriſtianly diſcuſſive way, to debate and ſift this matter to the utmoſt ounce of Learning and Religion, in him that ſhall lay it as an error, either upon Martin Bucer, or any other of his Opinion. If this be not enough to qualifie my Traducers, and that they think it more for the Wiſdom of thir Virulence, not to recant the Injuries they have beſpoke me, I ſhall not for much more diſturbance then they can bring me, intermit the proſecution of thoſe Thoughts which may render me beſt ſerviceable, either to this Age, or if it ſo happ'n, to Poſterity; following the fair path which your illuſtrious Exploits, Honour'd Lords and Commons, againſt the breſt of Tyranny have open'd; and depending ſo on your happy ſucceſſes in the hopes that I have conceiv'd either of my ſelf, or of the Nation, as muſt needs conclude me who moſt affectionately wiſhes and awaits the proſperous iſſue of your noble and valorous Counſels.

CHAP. XV.

The 7th Law of the ſanctifying and ordering of Marriage.

Beſides theſe things, Chriſt our King, and his Churches require from your Sacred Majeſty, that you would take upon you the juſt care of Marriages. For it is unſpeakable how many good Conſciences are hereby entangl'd, afflicted, and in danger, becauſe there are no juſt Laws, no ſpeedy way conſtituted according to God's Word, touching this holy Society and Fountain of Mankind. For ſeeing Matrimony is a civil thing, Men, that they may rightly contract, inviolably keep, and not without extreme neceſſity diſſolve Marriage, are not only to be taught by the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church, but alſo are to be acquitted, aided, and compell'd by Laws and Judicature of the Common-wealth. Which thing pious Emperours acknowledging, and therin framing themſelves to the Law of Nations, gave Laws both of contracting and preſerving, and alſo where an unhappy need requir'd, of divorcing Marriages. As may be ſeen in the Code of Juſtinian, the 5th Book, from the beginning through 24 Titles. And in the Authentic of Juſtinian the 22d, and ſome others.

That the ordering of Marriage belongs to the Civil Power.

But the Antichriſts of Rome, to get the Imperial Power into thir own hands, firſt by fraudulent perſuaſion, afterwards by force drew to themſelves the whole autority of determining and judging as well in matrimonial cauſes, as in moſt other matters. Therfore it hath bin long believ'd, that the care and government therof doth not belong to the Civil Magiſtrate. Yet where the Goſpel of Chriſt is receiv'd, the Laws of Antichriſt ſhould be rejected. If therfore Kings and Governours take not this care, by the power of Law and Juſtice to provide that Marriages be piouſly contracted, religiouſly kept, and lawfully diſſolv'd, if need require, who ſees not what confuſion and trouble is brought upon this holy Society; and what a rack is prepar'd, ev'n for many of the beſt Conſciences, while they have no certain Laws to follow, no Juſtice to implore, if any intolerable thing happen. And how much it concerns the honour and ſafety of the Common-wealth, that Marriages, according to the Will of Chriſt, be made, maintain'd, and not without juſt cauſe diſſolv'd, who underſtands not? For unleſs that firſt and holieſt Society of Man and Woman be purely conſtituted, that houſhold Diſcipline may be upheld by them according to God's Law, how can we expect a Race of good Men? Let your Majeſty therfore know that this is your duty, and in the firſt place, to reaſſume to your ſelf the juſt ordering of Matrimony, and by firm Laws to eſtabliſh and defend the Religion of this firſt and divine Society among Men, as all wiſe Law-givers of old, and Chriſtian Emperours have carefully done.

The Popes have invaded by fraud and force the ordering of Marriage.

The two next Chapters, becauſe they chiefly treat about the Degrees of Conſanguinity and Affinity, I omit; only ſetting down a paſſage or two concerning the Judicial Laws of Moſes, how fit they be for Chriſtians to imitate rather then any other.

CHAP. XVII. toward the end.

I Confeſs that we being free in Chriſt, are not bound to the Civil Laws of Moſes in every circumſtance; yet ſeeing no Laws can be more honeſt, juſt, and wholſom, then thoſe which God himſelf gave, who is eternal Wiſdom and Goodneſs, I ſee not why Chriſtians, in things which no leſs appertain to them, ought not to follow the Laws of God, rather then of any Men. We are not to uſe Circumciſion, Sacrifice, and thoſe bodily Waſhings preſcrib'd to the Jews; yet by theſe things we may rightly learn, with what purity and devotion both Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper ſhould be adminiſter'd and receiv'd. How much more is it our duty to obſerve diligently what the Lord hath commanded, and taught by the Examples of his People concerning Marriage, wherof we have the uſe no leſs then they?

And becauſe this ſame worthy Author hath another paſſage to this purpoſe in his Comment upon Matthew, Chap. 5. 19. I here inſert it from p. 46.

Since we have need of Civil Laws and the power of puniſhing, it will be wiſeſt not to contemn thoſe giv'n by Moſes; but ſeriouſly rather to conſider what the meaning of God was in them, what he chiefly requir'd, and how much it might be to the good of every Nation, if they would borrow thence thir manner of governing the Common-wealth; yet freely all things and with the Spirit of Chriſt. For what Solon, or Plato, or Ariſtotle, what Lawyers or Cæſars could make better Laws then God? And it is no light argument, that many Magiſtrates at this day do not enough acknowledg the Kingdom of Chriſt, though they would ſeem moſt Chriſtian, in that they govern their States by Laws ſo divers from thoſe of Moſes.

The 18th Chapter I only mention as determining a thing not here in queſtion, that Marriage without conſent of Parents ought not to be held good; yet with this qualification fit to be known.

That if Parents admit not the honeſt deſires of thir Children, but ſhall perſiſt to abuſe the power they have over them; they are to be mollifi'd by Admonitions, Entreaties, and Perſuaſions, firſt of their Friends and Kindred, next of the Church-Elders. Whom if ſtill the hard Parents refuſe to hear, then ought the Magiſtrate to interpoſe his Power: leſt any by the evil mind of thir Parents be detain'd from Marriage longer then is meet, or forc'd to an unworthy match: in which caſe the Roman Laws alſo provided. C. de nupt. l. 11, 13, 26.

CHAP. XIX.

Whether it may be permitted to revoke the Promiſe of Marriage.

HEre ariſeth another Queſtion concerning Contracts, when they ought to be unchangeable? for religious Emperours decreed that the Contract was not indiſſoluble, until the Spouſe were brought home, and the Solemnities perform'd. They thought it a thing unworthy of divine and human Equity, and the due conſideration of man's infirmity in deliberating and determining, when ſpace is giv'n to renounce other contracts of much leſs moment, which are not yet confirm'd before the Magiſtrate, to deny that to the moſt weighty contract of Marriage, which requires the greateſt care and conſultation. Yet leſt ſuch a Covenant ſhould be brok'n for no juſt cauſe, and to the injury of that perſon to whom Marriage was promis'd, they decreed a Fine, that he who deni'd Marriage to whom he had promis'd, and for ſome cauſe not approv'd by the Judges, ſhould pay the double of that pledg which was giv'n at making ſure, or as much as the Judg ſhould pronounce might ſatisfie the damage, or the hinderance of either party. It being moſt certain, that oft-times after contract, juſt and honeſt cauſes of departing from promiſe, come to be known and found out, it cannot be other then the duty of pious Princes to give men the ſame liberty of unpromiſing in theſe caſes, as pious Emperours granted: eſpecially where there is only a promiſe, and not carnal knowledg. And as there is no true Marriage between them, who agree not in true conſent of mind; ſo it will be the part of godly Magiſtrates to procure that no Matrimony be among thir Subjects, but what is knit with love and conſent. And though your Majeſty be not bound to the Imperial Laws, yet it is the duty of a Chriſtian King to embrace and follow whatever he knows to be any-where piouſly and juſtly conſtituted, and to be honeſt, juſt, and well-pleaſing to his People.

But why in God's Law and the Examples of his Saints, nothing hereof is read? no marvel, ſeeing his antient People had power, yea a precept, that whoſo could not bend his mind to the true love of his Wife, ſhould give her a Bill of Divorce, and ſend her from him, though after carnal knowledg and long dwelling together. This is enough to authorize a godly Prince in that indulgence which he gives to the changing of a Contract; both becauſe it is certainly the invention of Antichriſt, that the promiſe of Marriage de præſenti, as they call it, ſhould be indiſſoluble, and becauſe it ſhould be a Prince's care that Matrimony be ſo joyn'd, as God ordain'd; which is, that every one ſhould love his Wife with ſuch a love as Adam expreſt to Eve: So as we may hope that they who marry may become one fleſh, and one alſo in the Lord.

CHAP. XX.

Concerns only the Celebration of Marriage.

CHAP. XXI.

The means of preſerving Marriage holy and pure.

NOW ſince there ought not to be leſs care that Marriage be religiouſly kept, then that it be piouſly and deliberately contracted, it will be meet that to every Church be ordain'd certain grave and godly Men, who may have this care upon them, to obſerve whether the Husband bear himſelf wiſely toward the Wife, loving, and inciting her to all Piety, and the other duties of this life; and whether the Wife be ſubject to her Husband, and ſtudy to be truly a meet help to him, as firſt to all Godlineſs, ſo to every other uſe of life. And if they ſhall find each to other failing of their duty, or the one long abſent from the other without juſt and urgent cauſe, or giving ſuſpicion of irreligious and impure life, or of living in manifeſt Wickedneſs, let it be admoniſht them in time. And if their autority be contemn'd, let the names of ſuch contemners be brought to the Magiſtrate, who may uſe puniſhment to compel ſuch Violaters of Marriage to their duty, that they may abſtain from all probable ſuſpicion of tranſgreſſing; and if they admit of ſuſpected company, the Magiſtrate is to forbid them; whom they not therin obeying, are to be puniſht as Adulterers, according to the Law of Juſtinian, Authent. 117. For if holy Wedlock, the fountain and ſeminary of good Subjects, be not vigilantly preſerv'd from all blots and diſturbances, what can be hop'd, as I ſaid before, of the ſpringing up of good Men, and a right Reformation of the Common-wealth? We know it is not enough for Chriſtians to abſtain from foul deeds, but from the appearance and ſuſpicion therof.

CHAP. XXII.

Of lawful Divorce, what the ancient Churches have thought.

NOW we ſhall ſpeak about that diſſolving of Matrimony which may be approv'd in the ſight of God, if any grievous neceſſity require. In which thing the Roman Antichriſts have knit many a pernicious entanglement to diſtreſſed Conſciences: for that they might here alſo exalt themſelves above God, as if they would be wiſer and chaſter then God himſelf is, for no cauſe, honeſt or neceſſary, will they permit a final Divorce; in the mean while Whoredoms and Adulteries, and worſe things then theſe, not only tolerating in themſelves and others, but cheriſhing and throwing Men headlong into theſe evils. For although they alſo disjoyn married perſons from Board and Bed, that is, from all conjugal Society and Communion, and this not only for Adultery, but for ill Uſage, and matrimonial Duties deni'd; yet they forbid thoſe thus parted, to joyn in Wedlock with others, but, as I ſaid before, any diſhoneſt aſſociating they permit. And they pronounce the Bond of Marriage to remain between thoſe whom they have thus ſeparate. As if the Bond of Marriage, God ſo teaching and pronouncing, were not ſuch a league as binds the married couple to all ſociety of life, and communion in divine and humane things; and ſo aſſociated keeps them. Somthing indeed out of the later Fathers they may pretend for this their Tyranny, eſpecially out of Auſtin and ſome others, who were much tak'n with a prepoſterous admiration of ſingle life; yet though theſe Fathers, from the words of Chriſt not rightly underſtood, taught that it was unlawful to marry again, while the former Wife liv'd, whatever cauſe there had bin either of Deſertion or Divorce, yet if we mark the cuſtom of the Church, and the common judgment which both in thir times and afterward prevail'd, we ſhall perceive that neither theſe Fathers did ever caſt out of the Church any one for marrying after a Divorce, approv'd by the Imperial Laws.

Nor only the firſt Chriſtian Emperours, but the latter alſo, ev'n to Juſtinian, and after him, did grant for certain Cauſes approv'd by Judges, to make a true Divorce; which made and confirm'd by Law, it might be lawful to marry again: which if it could not have bin done without diſpleaſing Chriſt and his Church, ſurely it would not have been granted by Chriſtian Emperours, nor had the Fathers then winkt at thoſe doings in the Emperours. Hence ye may ſee that Jerom alſo, though zealous of ſingle life more then enough, and ſuch a condemner of ſecond Marriage, though after the death of either party, yet forc'd by plain equity, defended Fabiola, a noble Matron of Rome, who having refus'd her Husband for juſt Cauſes, was married to another. For that the ſending of a Divorce to her Husband was not blame-worthy, he affirms, becauſe the man was hainouſly vitious; and that if an adulterous Wife may be diſcarded, an adulterous Husband is not to be kept. But that ſhe married again, while yet her Husband was alive; he defends in that the Apoſtle hath ſaid, It is better to marry then to burn, and that young Widows ſhould marry, for ſuch was Fabiola, and could not remain in Widowhood.

But ſome one will object that Jerom there adds, Neither did ſhe know the vigor of the Goſpel, wherein all cauſe of marrying is debarr'd from Women, while their Husbands live; and again, while ſhe avoided many wounds of Satan, ſhe receiv'd one ere ſhe was aware. But let the equal Reader mind alſo what went before; Becauſe, ſaith he ſoon after the beginning, there is a rock and ſtorm of ſlanderers oppos'd againſt her, I will not praiſe her converted, unleſs I firſt abſolve her guilty. For why does he call them ſlanderers who accus'd Fabiola of marrying again, if he did not judg it a matter of Chriſtian Equity and Charity, to paſs by and pardon that fact, though in his own opinion he held it a fault? And what can this mean? I will not praiſe her, unleſs I firſt abſolve her. For how could he abſolve her, but by proving that Fabiola neither in rejecting her vitious Husband, nor in marrying another, had committed ſuch a ſin, as could be juſtly condemn'd? Nay, he proves both by evident reaſon, and clear teſtimonies of Scripture, that ſhe avoided ſin.

This alſo is hence underſtood, that Jerom by the vigour of the Goſpel, meant that height and perfection of our Saviours precept, which might be remitted to thoſe that burn; for he adds, But if ſhe be accus'd in that ſhe remain'd not unmarried, I ſhall confeſs the fault, ſo I may relate the neceſſity. If then he acknowledg'd a neceſſity, as he did, becauſe ſhe was young, and could not live in Widowhood, certainly he could not impute her ſecond Marriage to her much blame: but when he excuſes her out of the Word of God, does he not openly declare his thoughts, that the ſecond Marriage of Fabiola was permitted her by the Holy Ghoſt himſelf for the neceſſity which he ſuffer'd, and to ſhun the danger of fornication, though ſhe went ſomwhat aſide from the vigour of the Goſpel? But if any urge that Fabiola did public penance for her ſecond Marriage, which was not impos'd but for great faults: 'Tis anſwer'd, ſhe was not enjoyn'd to this penance, but did it of her own accord, and not till after her ſecond Husbands Death. As in the time of Cyprian we read that many were wont to do voluntary penance for ſmall faults, which were not liable to excommunication.

CHAP. XXIII.

That Marriage was granted by the ancient Fathers, ev'n after the Vow of ſingle life.

I omit his Teſtimonies out of Cyprian, Gelaſius, Epiphanius, contented only to relate what he thence collects to the preſent purpoſe.

Some will ſay perhaps, Wherfore all this concerning Marriage after vow of ſingle life, when as the queſtion was of Marriage after Divorce? For this reaſon, that they whom it ſo much moves, becauſe ſome of the Fathers thought Marriage after any kind of Divorce, to be condemn'd of our Saviour, may ſee that this concluſion follows not. The Fathers thought all Marriage after Divorce to be forbidd'n of our Saviour, therfore they thought ſuch Marriage was not to be tolerated in a Chriſtian. For the ſame Fathers judg'd it forbidd'n to marry after vow; yet ſuch Marriages they neither diſſolv'd not excommunicated. For theſe words of our Saviour, and of the holy Ghoſt, ſtood in their way; All cannot receive this ſaying, but they to whom it is giv'n. Every one hath his proper gift from God, one after this manner, another after that. It is better to marry then to burn. I will that younger Widows marry, and the like.

So there are many Canons and Laws extant, wherby Prieſts, if they married, were remov'd from their office, yet is it not read that their Marriage was diſſolv'd, as the Papiſts now-a-days do, or that they were excommunicated, nay expreſly they might communicate as Laymen. If the conſideration of human infirmity, and thoſe teſtimonies of divine Scripture which grant Marriage to every one that wants it, perſuaded thoſe Fathers to bear themſelves ſo humanly toward them who had married with breach of vow to God, as they believ'd, and with Divorce of that Marriage wherin they were in a manner joyn'd to God, who doubts but that the ſame Fathers held the like humanity was to be afforded to thoſe who after Divorce and Faith broken with men, as they thought, enter'd into a ſecond Marriage? for among ſuch are alſo found no leſs weak, and no leſs burning.

CHAP. XXIV.
